TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. CASWELL. Before the committee proceeds with the discussion this morning I want to say that on Thursday I announced my purpose to insist on the rule that every gentleman having the floor should be limited to his hour. I want to say further that there are five gentlemen to-day to whom the floor is assigned. As the one last upon the list has to leave the city not to return for some days it would be exceedingly unfair to him to have his time entirely consumed by extensions to other gentlemen. I give notice that while I am here I will insist upon the observance of the hour rule. I give this notice that gentlemen who have the floor may understand they should not permit interruptions if they desire to occupy their hour in the way they had proposed to do. I do this without disrespect to any gentleman, but I think it is a matter of fairness that that rule should be observed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has eight minutes of his time remaining.

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk to have read, as the foundation for the remarks I am about to make on the pending bill, an extract from Andrew Jackson's farewell address containing his parting kick to this tariff system.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is perhaps no one of the powers conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power. The most productive and convenient sources of revenue were necessarily given to it, that it might be able to perform the important duties imposed upon it; and the taxes which it lays upon commerce being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity, which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets. Congress has no right, under the Constitution, to take money from the people unless it is required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; and if they raise more than is necessary for such purposes it is an abuse of the power of taxation, and unjust and oppressive. It may, indeed, happen that the revenue will sometimes exceed the amount anticipated when the taxes were laid. When, however, this is ascertained, it is easy to reduce them; and in such a case it is unquestionably the duty of the Government to reduce them, for no circumstances can justify it in assuming a power not given to it by the Constitution, nor in taking away the money of the people when it is not needed for the legitimate wants of the Government.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] took occasion the other day to criticise somewhat sarcastically the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means for the manner in which they had produced this bill. He even went so far as to say that it was a bantling without parentage. This comes with bad grace from the minority of the committee, who up to this hour have shown to the country that they are financial and tariff eunuchs, not having the virility or the manhood to present to this House a bantling of any character. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Is it true, Mr. Chairman, that in this stage of our history we have reached a point where we have encumbered ourselves with a boomerang of a tariff, a system of taxation that can not be touched or interfered with without bringing disaster to the business interests of the country; while, on the other hand, it takes from the pockets of the people and piles up in the Treasury a surplus amounting, I assert to-day, to $300,000,000 that ought not to be there? If this is true, and if this system is to be continued, sooner or later it will absorb the whole circulation of the country, reducing enormously property values, and bringing bankruptcy and general financial disaster upon the people. Is it true, I ask, that if we touch the tariff we are to be bankrupted, and if we do not touch it we are still to be bankrupted—that we are to be damned if we do and be damned if we do not? [Laughter.]

I propose, Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question, to deal with it in a manner somewhat different from that in which it has been treated heretofore in this debate, and to show the effect that this surplus has upon the business interests of the country. As I have stated, there are $300,000,000 to-day in the Federal Treasury that ought not to be there, and if we laid not another dollar of tax upon the people of this country for the next twelve months, there is sufficient revenue already in the Treasury to meet every demand of the Government. If there was not a dollar in the Treasury except this surplus and we were compelled either to use that or to borrow money this Congress would not hesitate a moment to take that surplus out of the Treasury and put it into circulation, to use it in the payment of the regular demands upon the Government, to use it for the pension list and other appropriations, and for the payment of the public debt—I mean the sinking-fund.

What is our condition with regard to our currency system?

It is estimated (I am giving round numbers) that there are about six hundred millions of gold, three hundred millions of silver, full legal tender, seventy-five millions of subsidiary coin, three hundred and forty-six millions of legal-tender notes, and about two hundred millions of bank notes, making in all about $1,500,000,000. What is there locked up in the Treasury? The Secretary of the Treasury's latest estimate is that by the end of the current fiscal year there will be one hundred and seventy-five millions of surplus money derived from this protective-tariff system, and from the other taxes with which the people are saddled.

The Secretary estimates that by the 1st of next July there will be that much surplus over and above the needs of the Government. There are also twenty-five millions of this subsidiary coin, which, added to the one hundred and seventy-five millions, makes two hundred millions. There are to-day one hundred millions of lawful money in the Treasury for the redemption of the bank notes, and if it came to the worst, and if we were driven to the point, we could take fifty millions of the two hundred millions of gold reserve, and not in the least endanger the financial credit of the country, making $350,000,000, which I say could and would be used, were it necessary, to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government, and which we would use before we would borrow another cent or issue a bond bearing interest. But I will put it in round numbers at $300,000,000, leaving the gold reserve where it is. That constitutes one-fifth of the whole monetary circulation, which is locked up unnecessarily in the Federal Treasury. Now, what effect does that have upon values throughout this country? When we talk about a surplus of $300,000,000, it seems and it is an enormous thing in itself, but when we come to see the effects of the locking up of this surplus upon the values of the country it is absolutely startling. All economic writers hold, and in fact it is a truism, that money measures the value of all commodities, and the amount of money in circulation fixes the value of the commodities. Commodities to-day are measured by the amount of money in circulation. Now, what will be the effect of $300,000,000 more in circulation in this country?

The census of 1880 shows we had about $43,000,000,000 of property values, all told. If you should add one-fifth to that, and also the increment of eight years, which would be the case if we put out the other one-fifth of our currency, what effect would it have? Gentlemen can make their own calculations. The aggregate would reach $60,000,000,000. The farm lands of the country, excluding farm products, amounted in value in 1880 to $10,000,000,000, and to-day, if we take into consideration the eight years that have since elapsed and estimate the value of both the farm products and the farm lands, including the improvements that have been made and the vast amount of capital that has been expended in that way, the aggregate will reach not less than $15,000,000,000.

What would be the effect of placing in circulation $300,000,000 more upon the farm values of this country? It would add one-fifth, or $3,000,000,000 to their value as compared with what it is to-day; and when we hear on this floor that the farms of this country are mortgaged to an amount estimated all the way from one billion to three billions of dollars, the lowest estimate being $1,000,000,000 and the highest $3,000,000,000—when we consider this we ought to remember that, taking those mortgages even at the highest estimate, $3,000,000,000, if we should turn this surplus out of the Treasury and put it in circulation the increase in farm values would more than pay off the whole three billions. In other words, it would increase the value of the property of the farmers of this country in such a ratio as to wipe out their debts.

On the other hand, who can gainsay the fact that the terrible contraction of the currency which has been created by excessive taxation and by locking up the surplus in the Treasury has plastered the farms of this country with mortgages, and that to turn loose the surplus would enable the farmers to wipe out those mortgages?

Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], a Representative from New England, in discussing this tariff question entertained us with a very able speech, in which he gave statistics showing the great and unparalleled increase of wealth in New England as compared with other portions of the country, the enormous amount of money deposited in the savings-banks, etc. He attributed this to the enterprise, the industry, the genius, the thrift of the New England people; and alluding especially to my colleague [Mr. DOCKERY] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], he recommended that the West and the South emulate the example of New England, and thus remove the ground for the complaint which had been made of the vast disparity between the West and the South on one side and New England on the other in reference to the increase of wealth. I quote from Mr. GALLINGER, as follows:

> In the entire country there are about two hundred and sixty thousand manufacturing establishments of all kinds, employing two million seven hundred and fifty thousand people. The total capital invested in 1880 was nearly three billions of dollars. The total value of all material used was about three and one-half billion dollars, while the aggregate annual value of the products thereof was over five and one-half billion dollars. The share that the six New England States, with less than one-thirteenth of the population of the country, take in this combined manufacturing industry of the Union is that of about thirty-five thousand manufactories, or over one-eighth of all, and they employ six hundred and fifty thousand people, more than one-fifth of all.
> Of the total capital invested they employ within their own borders over six hundred and fifty millions, more than one-fifth of all; of the total value of materials used they consume nearly seven hundred millions, over one-sixth of the whole; and they yield in products of manufacture nearly twelve hundred millions of dollars, about one-fifth of all. And yet it is coolly proposed by hostile legislation to strike down this great wealth-producing, tax-paying section of our country, the section from which came the money to bind the Eastern States to the Pacific Ocean with bands of iron, which out of her abundance has built Western railroads and Western cities, and which to-day stands with open hand and generous purse ready to help rehabilitate the South whenever in good faith she is invited so to do.

Again he says:

> In New England there is deposited in savings-banks over $120 for every man, woman, and child, while in the South, upon the basis of the figures of the Comptroller, there is just about one-fourth of a cent per capita. This immense fund, $575,000,000, represents to a large extent the earnings of the laboring classes (including the farmers) of New England, and is of itself the grandest possible tribute to their industry, thrift, and capacity. And when are added the millions of New England capital invested in loans, in property in Western cities, and in Western, Southern, and transcontinental railways, some idea can be formed of the prosperity of her people.

CONTRAST OF FARMERS AND MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. HEMPHILL, of South Carolina, in his able speeches quotes as follows from the census:

> By the census of 1850 the estimated value of farms in the United States was $3,271,575,426. In 1860 the value was estimated at $6,645,045,007, showing an increase value during the decade of $3,373,469,581, or more than 100 per cent. In 1870 the value of the farms was estimated at $9,262,803,861, showing an increase during the decade of $2,617,758,861, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the value of farms was estimated at $10,197,096,776, being an increase during the decade of $939,292,915, or only a fraction over 9 per cent. (See Compendium of the Census of 1880, page 658.)
> "The value of the live-stock in the United States in 1850 was estimated at $544,180,566. In 1860 it was valued at $1,089,329,915. The increase during the decade was $545,149,349, or over 100 per cent. In 1870 it was estimated at $1,525,276,547, being an increase during the decade of $435,946,542, or less than 40 per cent. In 1880 the live-stock was valued at $1,500,464,699, being a decrease during the decade of nearly $25,000,000, or more than 1½ per cent.
> "There seems every reason to believe that between 1850 and 1860 there was a very rapid increase in wealth. In the general prosperity of the country the great farming community appears to have fully participated. Then, as now, it comprised about half of all our people. Starting in 1850 with less than $4,000,000,000 they increased their wealth by more than an equal amount in ten years.
> "But since 1860, with far more than twice as much capital, and added millions of persons employed, they have scarcely been able, even by the highest estimates the census officers could possibly make, to add as much to their wealth in twenty years as they did in the preceding ten. In 1860 farmers owned half of the wealth of the country. In 1880 they owned but a quarter. By the census estimates the other half of the community between 1860 and 1880 increased their wealth by more than $23,000,000,000. But farmers starting with an equal capital increased their wealth during the same time only a little more than $4,000,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Does not the gentleman consider it extraordinary that the country should have done so well as that after all the waste of a disastrous war and at a time when money was dropping in value?

Mr. HEMPHILL. My answer is this: That a great war and the dropping of currency to a hard-money basis ought to affect everybody else as well as the farmers, whereas in the twenty years to which I have called attention the farmers did not make but one-sixth the progress of other people. Now, it is true the coming down of the currency affected all, but if it bore six times as hard upon the farmers as upon other people, and that seems to be the gentleman's theory, it seems they were the people who needed some protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

To complete this portion of the argument it is only necessary to say that during the ten years from 1850 to 1860, when the farmers increased their wealth 100 per cent., we were under the low-tariff laws of 1846 and 1857, the average duty under the former being about 26 per cent., and under the latter about 20 per cent.; while from 1860 to 1880, a period of twenty years, during which the farmers, being one-half of the population and starting with one-half the wealth, gained only about one-sixth as much as the other half of the population, we were under the Morrill tariff of 1860 and its amendments, the average duty being over 42 per cent.

Under a low tariff, 1850 to 1860, the farmers increased their wealth 100 per cent.; in the next ten years, 1860 to 1870, with a tariff nearly twice as high, they increase only 39 per cent., and in the succeeding ten years, 1870 to 1880, under the same high tariff, they increase only 9 per cent.

Seeing what a wreck he has made of agriculture, how he has robbed the toiling millions who, through winter and summer must labor in the open fields, we might conceive how a protectionist could brace himself up to continue quietly and away from the public view to enjoy the fruits of his unjust and unfair exactions; but it would seem that nothing but inordinate vanity, born of undue self-esteem and long shielded by protection from the depressing effects of foreign competition, and especially from the "pauper modesty of Europe," could ever induce any such man to parade himself before an intelligent public in the sham character of the farmer's best customer. The thing would be absolutely ridiculous if it were not unfortunately so exceedingly expensive.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In that you take in all the Confederate States, those that were claiming to be out of the Union?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; from 1860 to 1870, as I have said, the comparison is not altogether satisfactory, because, of course, the labor was lost in the South, and other disturbing conditions prevailed, as I have said. Between 1850 and 1860 and between 1870 and 1880 there is a fair comparison.

But let us look at this question in another light; and I come to another proposition in this connection. We have been taunted with the question, "Why do you not, in the West and the South, go to manufacturing, if so much money is gained in that way?" Mr. Chairman, let us look at the history of this country for the last twenty-five years, and its legislation as affecting the West and the South on the one side and New England on the other. Before the war, as the census returns show (I have not time to read them, but will incorporate them in my remarks), under a low tariff manufactures prospered in New England. The great West and the South, having an agricultural people, were prosperous also; but all were prosperous in the same ratio, and were upon an equality, so that there was but little complaint. The people of the South and the West had all their capital invested in farms and farming.

But, sir, when the Morrill tariff law increasing the duties on imports was enacted New England was in a position to receive the benefit of that measure. Manufacturing had been her business; she had plant and capital engaged in it, while at the West capital was engaged in agriculture. What was the result, then, of the Morrill tariff? It immediately set in operation a process of transferring the wealth of the West into the lap of New England by a protective tariff. In manufacturing for the Army New England had a vast market and an enormous profit, for she sold products in greenbacks ranging all the way from 30 to 60 cents on the dollar, and received bonds paid for in greenbacks all the way from 40 to 60 cents on the dollar. New England was ready to take advantage of this legislation and did so.

What further? In 1869 Congress was called upon to further legislate upon that subject; and if I should recite the preamble of the act of 1869, which pledged the faith of this nation to the payment of those bonds in coin, it might read thus: Whereas bonds which were sold for 40 to 60 cents on the dollar are now held by the capitalists of New England, who have gathered them together under the protective tariff system, therefore the advantage shall be given to New England of making these bonds payable, both principal and interest, in coin. Of course this was not the preamble, but it was the effect of the law.

And, sir, as will be remembered, the revenues that this Government derived from duties on imports were made payable in coin for the purpose of paying the interest on this public debt; and finally the whole debt was made payable in coin. At that time there were $2,000,000,000 of public securities of the Government which had been purchased, as I have remarked, at from 40 to 60 cents on the dollar, which were thus made worth par in coin, thus nearly doubling the burden upon the people of the West and South. Not less than $800,000,000 was thus taken from the tax-payers of this country, and by this one act put into the lap of New England.

They were not satisfied even with that. They came here in 1873, and, demanding that gold only should be considered as coin, they secured the demonetization of one-half the money of the world for the purpose of doubling again the value of a debt that had already been doubled in their pockets.

O insatiable avarice, what will ye not compel mortal man to do?

For as Hood expresses it:

Gold! Gold! Gold! Gold!
Bright and yellow, hard and cold,
Molten, graven, hammer'd, and rolled;
Heavy to get, and light to hold;
Hoarded, barter'd, bought, and sold,
Stolen, borrow'd, squander'd, doled;
Spurn'd by the young, but hugg'd by the old
To the very verge of the churchyard mould;
Price of many a crime untold.
Gold! Gold! Gold! Gold!
Good or bad a thousand-fold!
How widely its agencies vary—
To save—to ruin—to curse—to bless—
As even its minted coins express,
Now stamped with the image of good Queen Bess,
And now of a bloody Mary.

It was these legislative acts on the part of Congress which threw the wealth of the country into the lap of New England and deprived the West and the South of their right to have the payment of the debt made in accordance with the original contract. I can thus see the reason why the West and the South have not recovered from the drain made upon them. They have not gone into manufacturing, because it was impossible under the circumstances to convert their farm capital into manufacturing capital.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to devote a few moments to the question of the "home market." We have heard a great deal of discussion on the question of the "home market;" and we of the West especially have been assured that this protective-tariff system is a benefit to us from the fact that it gives us a "home market." Now, we all know that wheat is the great money crop of the West; and I want to give a few statistics in regard to wheat, its exportation, its consumption at home and abroad.

Referring to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture we find that in the six years beginning in 1881 and ending in 1886, the total production of wheat in this country was 2,665,645,000 bushels; and of this the quantity consumed for food was estimated at 1,563,000,000 bushels (I simply give round numbers); for seed, 320,000,000 bushels; for exportation, 760,000,000 bushels.

In other words, for the six years the average production yearly was 439,000,000—260,000,000 bushels for food, 53,000,000 bushels for seed, 126,000,000 bushels for exportation.

Report No. 43, new series, 1887, of Statistician, page 362, is the following table relating to production and distribution of wheat:

Year.	Production.	For food.	For seed.	Exportation.	Total distribution.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.
1881	383,280,000	235,249,812	55,215,573	121,892,389	412,357,774
1882	504,185,470	255,500,000	52,770,312	147,811,816	456,081,628
1883	421,086,160	259,500,000	54,683,389	111,534,182	425,717,571
1884	512,765,900	265,000,000	55,266,239	132,570,367	452,836,606
1885	357,112,000	271,000,000	51,474,906	94,595,794	417,070,700
1886	457,218,000	277,000,000	51,528,658	151,789,135	480,317,794
Average	439,274,270	260,541,635	53,489,846	126,693,864	444,725,345

Now, who consumed this wheat? The census shows that about 44 per cent. of the population of this country are engaged in agriculture—farmers and those employed by them. So that portion of the population alone has consumed nearly one-half of the whole crop, and if you add to it seed-wheat they have consumed more than half. Where has the other gone? Seven hundred and sixty millions of bushels have been sent to foreign markets, 1,563,000,000 have been consumed at home; and who consumed it? Mr. Manning, in his report to the second session, Forty-ninth Congress, Executive Document No. 2, Part 2, page 17, shows, and shows very conclusively, that there are only about 5 per cent of our whole population engaged in pursuits which could be protected by the tariff, and they have consumed 5 per cent. of that, which would be about 19,000,000 of bushels annually.

We have exported how much? Our average of exportation has been 126,000,000 bushels in round numbers. The consumption of wheat by those engaged in protected industries amounts to 19,000,000 bushels, not more than one-third of what the farmers use annually for seed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have some more statistics on this subject. Before reading them I will state that this last fiscal year we imported, in round numbers, $692,000,000 worth of foreign goods. On that there was paid $217,000,000 of tariff duty. Assuming the farmer population of the country, who are consumers, consume one-half of that.

We have some $108,000,000 they have paid into the Federal Treasury by way of tariff taxation in one year. Is it true they have paid $100,000,000 into the Treasury for the purpose of selling to home consumers in protected industries, who consume 19,000,000 bushels of wheat annually? Is that the feast to which the farmers of this country are invited?

The home market, as far as those engaged in protective industries furnish it, consumes only 19,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, while the foreign market consumes an average of nearly 127,000,000 bushels annually. Wheat is only one item; of course, all other products exported bear the same relation, so far as protective industries are concerned. The home market of the farmer is confined almost wholly to the people who are not engaged in protective industries, for the very obvious reason that only 5 per cent. of our people are so employed.

I notice in the West there is a move to organize a farmers' trust—a confederation of farmers. For what? As I understand, sir, it is for the purpose of buying where they can buy the cheapest, and selling where they can sell for the largest price.

Mr. PETERS. Is that the declaration they made at their meeting at Topeka, Kans.?

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman asks me whether that was the declaration they made at Topeka, Kans. I inquire of him what the declaration was they did make.

Mr. PETERS. They made the declaration that the object of their association was to control the markets in accordance with the demand which might be made for wheat, and not leave each farmer at the mercy of the wheat ring in Chicago or elsewhere.

Mr. BLAND. I am glad to have the explanation of the gentleman from Kansas, for it is better than I had put it myself. In other words, to get the most possible for it.

We know the difficulty of organizing farmers in this manner. They are at great disadvantage, for what they have to buy is protected by a tariff system, and what they have to sell is attempted to be confined to this market alone. But when the confederation of the farmers turn themselves to that question they will solve the whole difficulty in which they are involved.

Mr. Chairman, in order to put the federation of farmers upon the proper track in regard to obtaining the highest price for their products, I wish to call attention to the question of exports and imports of the products of agriculture for the purpose of showing that it is the foreign market which consumes the surplus products, and that notwithstanding we have been paying for the last twenty-five years from 45 to 60 per cent. as a tax or fine from the farmers of this country for exporting their produce, a tax levied upon the articles imported by them under the pretense of protecting home manufacturers in order to build up the home market of farmers. As I have before shown, there are only 5 per cent. of our whole population of 60,000,000 people who are engaged in industries protected by this tariff.

I furnish a table found in Executive Document No. 6, Fiftieth Congress, first session, from the Bureau of Statistics, beginning with 1860 up to 1887, in which it will be observed that, notwithstanding the enormous taxes farmers have had to pay under the promise of a home market, the percentage of consumption in the home market has not increased during the last twenty-five years. This table shows the exports of domestic merchandise to foreign countries during the years indicated, divided into the products of agriculture, manufactures, and mining, and it shows, also, that the percentage of exports of agriculture in 1860 was 81.14 per cent.; in 1870, 79.34 per cent.; in 1880, 83.25 per cent.; so that after twenty years, or nearly so, of protective tariff their percentage of exports was but little greater than in 1860. In 1880 to 1887 agricultural ranges from 82 to 74 per cent.

While, on the other hand, our protective industries have promised us that by protective tariff they would be enabled not only to compete with foreign products in our own country, but they would be enabled to export largely of their products, we find in 1860 the products of manufacture exported amounted to 14.43 per cent. of the whole export trade. In 1880, thirty years or nearly so after the protective tariff, it amounted to only 9.64 per cent., a falling off. There was a slight increase from that time or from the year 1884, when it reached as high as 15 per cent., and in 1887 19.45 per cent. of the whole exports of the country. This clearly proves that our agriculturists to-day furnish as large a percentage of exports at this time with only slight variations as to years as they did thirty years ago, and that the promise of a home market has not been verified. I here insert the table, which is found on page 40 of the report referred to.

EXPORTS OF PRODUCTS OF AGRICULTURE AND OF MANUFACTURE.

The following table shows the values of our exports of domestic merchandise to foreign countries during the years indicated, subdivided into products of agriculture, of manufacture, of mining, etc., and of the exports of specie for 1860, 1870, and from 1875 to 1887:

In order to show this fact I will also produce from the same report, found on page 41, the following:

It will be observed, by reference to the following table, that our exports of the products of agriculture have consisted almost entirely of raw cotton, breadstuffs, provisions, including meats and dairy products, and leaf tobacco—these products during the fiscal year 1887 comprising 91 per cent. of the total value of the exports of all products of agriculture:

a Animals not separately stated.

In the year 1887 we exported of the products of domestic agriculture $500,713,906. On page 71 of the same document will be found the leading articles of imports entered for consumption during the year 1887, which amount to $683,418,980.70, which are dutiable under our present tariff and on which was collected $217,000,000 tariff taxes. As this may not be considered entirely fair, inasmuch as our whole importation of merchandise amounted to $726,042,878, which would include articles on the free-list, leaving about $43,000,000 that came in under the free-list. Now, if we take the whole $700,000,000 imported on which duties were paid to the amount of over $217,000,000, we find that about 30 per cent. in value of our foreign commerce was diverted from the pockets of the farmers by a tax or fine levied upon them for not selling their products at home, when, in reality, it was a surplus they had on hand for which there was no home market.

Our whole exports of merchandise for 1887 were $679,159,477. Subtract from this the whole amount of farm products leaves only about $178,000,000 of other exports. So it may be fairly assumed that the whole burden of tariff taxation, being a burden and tax on commerce itself, is a tax upon those who produce the commodities entering into and constituting nearly the whole of our commerce, to wit, the agriculturists. But to come at it exactly, and for the purpose of illustrating the matter, I will say to the agent of our federation of farmers that suppose in the next fiscal year we find that their surplus products exceed somewhat that of this past year, or should be $600,000,000, in round numbers, for which they have no market at home, unless they sell at a great sacrifice, and to dispose of which they are driven from necessity to foreign markets, and suppose the agent of that federation of farmers ships this $600,000,000 of farm produce to European countries, and there exchanges their produce for the products of those countries, products that are consumed by the farmers and their families, furnishing the farms, keeping up their stock, and supplying themselves with the necessaries of life.

We find from this 30 per cent. that was paid last year on importations they can buy those products 30 per cent. cheaper in foreign markets than here, and therefore their $600,000,000 of products in foreign markets will produce for them $780,000,000 of foreign products that enter into consumption and supplying their families and keeping up their farms. It will be readily seen that this agent of the federation of farmers has made a wise investment; that although his exports were only $600,000,000 his imports are $780,000,000, and while our protective tariff defenders would say that inasmuch as his imports had exceeded his exports, therefore the balance of trade was against us, it would be the reverse, because he had sold $600,000,000 worth of products for which he received $780,000,000, and instead of the balance of trade being against us we are the gainer of $180,000,000. So far the farmer has made a large profit. But when the commodities he has procured from abroad reach our ports the cargo is visited by a custom-house officer and 30 per cent. of the invoice cost of those articles, which would be $600,000,000, inasmuch as they are worth only $600,000,000 in the ports where they are exchanged for, but $800,000,000 here, 30 per cent. tax would be levied on the invoice price, and before the goods could be removed for the farmers to consume them, this tax of 30 per cent., or $180,000,000, must be paid, even before they can leave the custom-house.

This agent of the federation of farmers may well say, "Why is this exacted of us?" The custom-house officer could only reply that it was to discourage this sort of thing, shipping goods abroad and buying goods abroad; that this fine or tax was levied for the purpose of compelling him to buy at home and build up home industries; that it was the policy of this Government to discourage foreign exports and foreign imports; that he should have traded at home and not taken his products abroad. So that the farmers find that what ought to have been a profit to them, and would have been a profit to them but for this high protective tariff, has been ruthlessly confiscated in their hands and they have lost all their profits, amounting to $180,000,000.

Now, our Republican friends in this House will not listen to the proposition that all these manufacturing industries have formed themselves into pools, trusts, and combines for the express purpose of keeping up the price of their manufactured products, and that this high protective tariff that finds the farmers and every one else who undertakes to escape from the exactions of these trusts, imposes on him taxes ranging from 30 to 40 per cent. every time he undertakes to trade with anybody but a trust or a monopolist. We do not wonder that the farmers are endeavoring to escape from the degradation of this law, and that they are forming, or attempting to form, combinations with which to fight combinations. But, of all the pools and all the trusts that ever cursed the farmers of this land, the high protective tariff pool and trust is the gigantic father; and it is against this trust of the protective tariff, the parent of the whole brood, that they must bend every energy and fight to the bitter death, or else they will go to the wall, for they are not in a condition to oppose these pools and trusts in any other manner than in lowering tariff rates and permitting fair competition the world over, so that when the pools and trusts at home undertake to put up prices, the products of other countries may come in and counteract them. A farmer who can not see this is certainly blind.

But the farmers alone are not suffering. All the industries not protected share more or less with them in this operation, and hence it is the interest of all that protective-tariff pools and trusts should be made to succumb, and there is no mode on earth to accomplish that except by reducing tariff taxation to such a point as will admit of this fair competition. This high protective tariff, intended to discourage farm exports and exchange for foreign commodities, heavy duties laid upon imports in exchange for his products, has discouraged exports; it has compelled the farmers and all others to purchase commodities at home at prices enhanced in value all the way from 30 to 40 per cent., made possible on account of the tariff that prohibits importation for less than that.

The consequence is that four-fifths at least of all articles they consume is purchased at home, on which they are required to pay to the manufacturer himself, and not to the custom-house or the Government, all the way from 30 to 40 per cent. on every hat, coat, all their apparel, their blankets, household goods and kitchen furniture, the iron and steel in their farm implement; in fact, everything that can be made, that can be consumed, and not of their own product and consumed at home. And if it be four-fifths, then it is four times the amount of the revenue paid to the Government, that amount being $217,000,000 multiplied by four, or $868,000,000, which is a fair and reasonable estimate of the amount of money the farmers and other people of this country not engaged in protective industries are annually contributing to the protected barons or monopolies, pools, and trusts. Paying to the manufacturers and these pools $800,000,000 and the Government $200,000,000, we have at least calculation, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000 annually extorted from the people of this Government who are not engaged in protected industries, and turned over to the capitalists, who are reveling in their wealth, counting millionaires by the thousand, while their laborers, for whose special benefit they pretend this enormous iniquity is exacted, are reduced to poverty and distress, for they are compelled to compete not only with one another here, but with the foreign pauper laborers, so called, who are constantly arriving on our shores, imported for the express purpose of reducing the wages of American laborers.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, in his speech upon the tariff question, made the following observation:

> It is an interesting fact that during the period of a low tariff, from 1848 to 1860, inclusive, there was but one year in which the balance of trade was in our favor, and the net balance against us in these thirteen years was $396,216,161, drawn out of the country in gold to pay for foreign goods. Yet during the last thirteen years, under a protective tariff, only one year has the balance of trade been against us, while the aggregate in our favor has reached the magnificent sum of $1,612,659,755. [Applause.]

It will be noted in this extract that the gentleman from Michigan fails to go further back than the year 1848, and stops at the year 1860. Any one acquainted with the history of our country well knows that the discoveries in 1849 of the fabulous gold fields in California and on our Pacific coast, together with the silver products of this country, poured into the lap of the commercial world nearly $2,000,000,000, almost doubling in that short period the metallic currency of the world. It is not strange, therefore, that of this enormous gold and silver product a large portion necessarily found its way into all countries under the law of supply and demand for the metals. But money alone is not wealth. It is simply a medium of exchange of wealth. We did not send it abroad at a loss, for with it we purchased that which could either not be produced at home at all or which came to us much cheaper than we could produce it at home.

As well might the gentleman say, as I have before instanced, that should the farmers of this country export the next fiscal year $600,000,000 worth of products, which is as much wealth as money, and finding commodities in other countries 30 or 40 per cent. cheaper than they are here on account of the protective tariff, exchange that $600,000,000 worth of products for $800,000,000 worth of products in other countries, therefore, because the farmer's export was less by $200,000,000 than his import, the farmer had lost $200,000,000 in the transaction, when in truth and in fact, although the balance of trade apparently against him amounted to $200,000,000, or the balance of exports over imports, yet he had gained wealth to the amount of $200,000,000 and that wealth would go into his pockets were it not confiscated at the custom-house.

I have statistics here taken from Mr. Spofford's almanac of 1888—a table showing the value of the total imports and exports of merchandise into and from the United Kingdom. This table shows that beginning with the year 1872 up to and including the year 1887 the United Kingdom imported about $8,000,000,000 more than was exported. In other words, the imports of the United Kingdom exceeded their exports this enormous sum during the period of sixteen years, averaging about $500,000,000 a year of imports in excess of exports. In other words, according to the theory of the protectionists, the United Kingdom in that time lost in her trade $8,000,000,000. A greater fallacy never could be advanced than that the people who import more than they export should necessarily be the losers of the difference.

The whole circulating medium of Great Britain is about $600,000,000, and yet the excess of her imports over her exports amount to $500,000,000 annually. If we are to believe the theory of the protectionist, then, of course, the United Kingdom would be drained every year of nearly the whole of her circulating medium to pay this balance of trade against her; yet everybody knows that this is not true, but, on the contrary, she has not lost a dollar in that way. The truth is, it only shows that Great Britain is drawing to herself, by her great commercial supremacy, the wealth of the world, and this $8,000,000,000 shows the profit of her trade and not the loss.

This may be explained in a great measure from the fact that Great Britain or the United Kingdom, whether because she is a free-trade country or otherwise is not now important to consider, but for whatever reason may be assigned, is the great commercial nation of the world—the clearing-house, so to speak, of the world; that instead of adopting a policy to discourage trade with other countries, her whole effort is to extend her trade with all nations and all people that she may gain from them wealth. This policy has enabled the United Kingdom to become the creditor nation of the world. What she brings from southern climes she distributes to northern climes; what she gathers from the east she sends to the west; everything can be had there, whether it be the product of the north, the south, the east or the west. Her sails are seen upon every sea, her merchantmen penetrate the icebergs of the north and the torrid zone of the south. If her provinces or other nations, for the purpose of internal improvement, constructing railroads, canals or any other enterprises for which money is demanded, call on her, the United Kingdom is ready to furnish the desired capital in whatever part of the world it is required.

Even in our own country we call upon the United Kingdom for money in building up our home enterprises, of railroad construction and the like. Now, we must remember that the United Kingdom has not the money in reality to supply all these demands, nor is it supplied by money. A company, for instance, desiring to construct a railroad in South America, visits London, negotiates a loan of $50,000,000, for which bonds are issued bearing, say, 6 per cent. interest, on the road. This borrowing of $50,000,000 simply means that the banker of London gives the company a letter of credit on the merchant of London, and upon this letter of credit, to secure which bonds are issued and held by the banker, the company goes to the merchant and obtains $50,000,000 worth of merchandise, goods, implements, materials, all the essentials necessary to build the road. This is furnished in commodities and no money is handled, but there is the bond drawing interest, so that in reality the banker has furnished the merchant with the money, the company has furnished the banker with the bond as security for it, the merchant holds the money and furnishes the goods, the banker holds the bonds, and not a dollar goes out of the United Kingdom.

Now, this $50,000,000 of bonds, bearing 6 per cent. interest, requires the payment of $3,000,000 annually of interest. Now, this company in South America, to pay that interest, does not pay money. Commodities grown, produced in the country where this road is constructed, are taken to the United Kingdom, and there, by the exchange of these commodities, a mere matter of book-keeping, $3,000,000 worth of commodities has paid the banker his $3,000,000 of interest. So that we find the whole transaction is carried on without a dollar in actual cash probably having been used; and this is simply an instance to illustrate how it is that the United Kingdom has been enabled to import more than she exports.

These vast imports are commodities sent there to pay the debts the world owes to England on fixed securities on balance of trade; and this is proof of the fact that where statistics show a balance of trade, so to speak, according to the theory of the protectionist, is against the United States it does not by any means mean that the nation is a loser, but, on the contrary, in this instance at least, it is a gainer. The same thing ought to happen with this country. Our merchants ought to be enabled to supply, and but for a protective tariff would supply, our South American neighbors with what they consume. The South American company ought to have gone to New York and procured the goods and left the bonds, and that would have given us the benefit of the increment of the bonds. But a protective tariff that prevents other nations from coming to our ports without paying 30 to 40 per cent. on what they bring here has practically barred out commerce; has swept away our ships from the seas; sent us back to the barbarisms of the Asiatics who built walls around their countries for the express purpose of excluding trade and commerce with foreign countries.

And thus it is that the vast wealth of this country, especially in agriculture, and I might also say in its facilities for manufacture, its inventive genius, its industrious inhabitants, with all its vim and enterprise, willing and able to compete with any country on earth for the trade of the world, has fines and penalties imposed upon it for even daring to venture to exchange products with any other country, enslaved, fettered, and ground to the dust by the enactment of laws that are a disgrace to a civilized nation.

But for this protective humbug we would in a short period gain the world's commerce and become the masters of the seas. Do gentlemen in the debate upon the other side of this question who have so frequently called our attention to the fact that labor in Great Britain is not paid as well as it is here, and the further fact that Great Britain is a free-trade country, believe that a protective tariff would make Great Britain more prosperous than she is, or do they not know that a protective tariff would be an injury to that country? Unless they can show that the United Kingdom would be more prosperous under a protective tariff, and laborers in a better condition, then their argument falls. There is not an intelligent gentleman in the House who for one moment would rise in his seat and say that Great Britain would be more prosperous under a protective tariff than she is to-day, free trade.

When we come to Germany, where they have a protective tariff, we find labor in a much worse condition than in free-trade England or this country. Hence a protective tariff is shown to be the enemy of labor where conditions are similar, as they are in the over-populated districts of the United Kingdom and Germany. In this country salvation for labor is our extensive agricultural districts of the West, where the overcrowded cities and labor marts of the East find an outlet for the glut of labor; when labor comes in active competition and has reduced itself to distress in the manufacturing States they immediately begin the tramp to the West, and thousands of them every year go there thus to relieve the labor market of the East; and in this way, and by their labor organizations, keep up wages. It is not the tariff. But while all this is true, still we have great distress among wage-workers in this country, and while upon this point I send to the Clerk's desk to have read a circular issued by the master workman of the Knights of Labor, Mr. Powderly, vividly depicting the deplorable condition of wage-workers in that highly protected State of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

POWDERLY'S STIRRING APPEAL—CIRCULAR SETTING FORTH THE NEEDS OF THE STRIKING COAL MINERS.

The general executive board of the Knights of Labor has just issued a circular, to be read at the meetings of all the assemblies, appealing for contributions in aid of the striking anthracite miners. The circular recites a history of the trouble, and, to show that the miners are taking a proper course in the matter, speaks as follows:

"By the report of the bureau of statistics of Pennsylvania it is shown that the wages of the miner will not average more than $300 a year. In this calculation are included the wages of the sub contractor, under-bosses, and choice men, so that if the true average of the ordinary miners and mine laborers was taken the amount earned would not average more than $280 per year. The net amount received by each miner per ton for the coal he mines will not exceed from 9 to 15 cents. The advance in the price of coal to the consumer during the past year has been in many of the markets $1 per ton, or from six to ten times the amount received by the miner, who risked life and limb to bring it from the bosom of the earth.

"The advance which would be accepted would not add more than 2½ cents per ton to the cost of producing the coal. The employers are at the same time the landlords, who own the houses in which the miners live and the stores in which they are compelled to buy their daily food. The doctors that heal the sick, the undertakers that bury the dead, and the ministers who preach the funeral sermons, are the servants of the corporations. No question of recognition of the order is involved. It is simply a question of whether the men shall starve to death while at work or suffer a little extra privation for a short time in order to get means enough to keep body and soul together. No appeal for aid has been sent out from the general office more deserving of the prompt and generous action of the order."

Accompanying the circular is a personal appeal from General Master Workman Powderly. He says: "We read of the heart-rending scenes of eviction as practiced in Ireland. We are told of the terrible work of the crowbar brigade, which levels homes, severs broken, loving hearts forever, and drives dear ones from homes and kindred across the sea. None of these scenes can outrival the acts of cruelty that are practiced every day in the scourged, misery-clouded middle coal fields of Pennsylvania. In the most prosperous times the miner and his family live from hand to mouth, scarcely able to keep body and soul in unison.

"Notwithstanding all this, no law is broken, no offense of any kind is committed. A more honest, industrious, moral, or patriotic people does not inhabit any portion of our country; no more generous or manly men exist than our coal-miners. They have done everything, they have endured everything, and have sought every way to improve their condition, so as to lift it to the standard of American manhood and citizenship. Failing in that, they have continued a hopeless struggle to keep food in the mouths of loved ones while enduring every privation themselves.

"The last hope is gone, tired nature refuses to longer perform its functions, and in despair the miners have laid down their tools. They appeal to their fellow-citizens for the bread which their honest labor could not win. I unite my humble voice with theirs, and ask relief for them. Give quickly, give liberally; they deserve all that you can do. All contributions should be sent to Charles H. Litchman, box 885, Philadelphia, Pa."

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Right in this connection, this having reference to anthracite coal; is it not true that anthracite coal is on the free-list, and that this bill does not propose to change the tariff on bituminous?

Mr. BLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that all coal is on the free-list?

Mr. BRUMM. Anthracite is, and this article has reference to that.

Mr. BLAND. Anthracite is; but all other is protected.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And this bill does not change it.

Mr. BLAND. And the gentleman would not vote for it if it did. But I will answer the gentleman's point in a moment.

Now suppose, for the purpose of enhancing the value of wheat in this country, you enacted a law shutting out the use of corn; and, for the purpose of enhancing the value of anthracite coal, we shut out by law all other coal. What would be the effect? What answer can gentlemen make if the wage-workers in Pennsylvania, the most protected of all protected States, are reduced to poverty and distress worse than we see in Ireland?

It is a shame, a disgrace to the protected capital of Pennsylvania that they do not come to the relief of these starving laborers and not leave them to the necessity of appealing to their fellow wage-workers for charity. If Congress has lavished its subsidies and its money upon the protected capital of Pennsylvania they have abused, outrageously abused, the confidence of Congress and the country when they refuse to divide with their wage-workers a fair share, a living profit of this subsidy. It only goes to show what we have always contended, that the subsidies given to capital go into the pockets of the capitalists, and not a dollar of it ever reaches the wage-worker except what is necessary barely to subsist him, and in this case subsist him in a worse state than existed in the worst days of Southern slavery.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me ask another question.

Mr. BLAND. I must decline to yield, as I shall only occupy an hour.

Mr. BRUMM. I will be very brief. I wish to ask whether what the gentleman has caused to be read is not from a protectionist, Mr. Powderly?

Mr. BLAND. I am very glad to know that the gentleman has brought that to my attention. Certainly if he is a protectionist the gentleman will not dispute the authenticity or correctness of his statement in which he characterizes Pennsylvania laborers as being in a worse condition than the evicted tenants in Ireland. While on this point I desire to have the Clerk read an extract from the History of British Commerce, by Leone Levy. We have had their condition paraded in this House and before the country as being the victims of free trade. Now let us see about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

One portion of the now United Kingdom was not in a position to derive any benefit from all these improvements, and that was Ireland, then as on many subsequent occasions in a turbulent and discontented spirit; nor was she altogether unjust in her complaints, for she was really suffering from the iniquitous commercial policy pursued against her.

By the old navigation laws no productions of Europe, and Ireland included, were allowed to be exported to the colonies unless shipped from England and Wales, the only relaxation from this prohibition from all direct Irish trade with the colonies being the permission to export to them white or gray linen cloth. By a later statute no colonial merchandise could be landed in Ireland unless first landed in England, and no manufacture of wool was to be exported from Ireland to any place except England.

She could import no East India produce except through England; and even if under the reign of George I some slight freedom was granted, care was taken that it should not interfere in any way with the substantial monopoly of England. A committee of the House of Commons sat in 1778 to find means to allay the discontent, but whilst the English merchants exhibited an unworthy spirit of exclusiveness, and the Dublin merchants were loud in their condemnation of the anti-commercial policy of England, dictated as it was by the unjust, illiberal, and unpolitic opposition of self-interested people, no arrangement was possible.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good deal, as I said before, about the effects of free trade on Ireland. But any one acquainted with the history of that country, as shown by the extract which has just been read, knows it is the reverse of free trade that has brought Ireland to the feet of England, depopulated the Green Isle, and sent her children wanderers over the earth, one-half of them in the last half century, reducing the population from about eight millions forty years ago to about one-half of that now. It was the restrictive policy of the navigation laws, preventing Ireland from exporting her products to any ports other than those of England, that broke down her factories and subjugated her people, until to-day the landlords own nearly the whole of Ireland. Old England has her Ireland; shall New England also have an Ireland in the West?

It was the want of freedom of trade, it was the restrictions of her trade and commerce under the navigation laws that prevented her sending her products to any other ports save those of England, the inimical legislation on the part of England, that broke down her factories in the interest of the English manufacturers. These unequal and unjust laws imbued the spirit of rebellion in Ireland against the tyranny of England that has caused them for the century past to resist as best they could these injustices. They have demanded of England the right of free trade, the right of the liberty of the citizen, the right of free government.

And because these demands have not been acceded to, Ireland has been in a chronic state of war with England since the union. This chronic state of war and discontent has been answered by idiotic coercion acts in as many years, so that Ireland has not only suffered by these acts, but also by tyrannical military rule that has prostrated her in the dust, that has kept her people in constant strife to regain her liberties, and, although in recent years these restrictions may have been removed, yet it came too late, for comparative freedom of trade was offered her after she had been despoiled of her heritage, and her land owned by alien landlords and her substance mortgaged to the aristocracy of England. She has devoted the latter portion of her years to an effort to shake off the tyranny of England, and has had no profitable opportunity to engage in manufacture and agriculture.

Give Ireland self-government, the liberty of the citizen, the freedom of trade the whole world over, and the man who says she would not rise from her degradation and become one of the powerful nations of the earth, able to compete in trade and commerce and all that makes nations great, belies the history of that great people and slanders a noble, generous, and an industrious race. I have said this much because it has been the constant aid of protectionists on this floor to allude to Ireland as an example of the baneful effect of free trade, when the reverse is known to be true by every gentleman acquainted with the history of that people. To tell me free trade has reduced Ireland to this condition is to say that which I resent bitterly on the part of a people I know have been impoverished by other means, tyrannical and restrictive in the extreme.

But, Mr. Chairman, I leave this subject with this short allusion and come now to the question of trusts organized in this country, as I have before stated, for the purpose of controlling the markets in respect to the commodities they produce. I will print a table of these trusts, so far as I have gathered them, with my remarks.

The following is a list of a few of the trusts, together with the amount of bounty the present tariff seeks to allow them to collect fromthe people, also their expense for labor, and the excess of tariff bounty over the amount they pay in wages. Not one of these trusts could live were it not for the war tariff.

Name of trust.	Protected by duties averaging, per cent.	Adjusted to guaranty a bonus in each $100 of product amounting to—	Their whole expense for labor in $100 worth of product being—
Salt trust	50	$33	$25
Earthenware trust	56	36	40
Bessemer-steel trust	84	46	9
Plow-steel trust	45	33	29
General steel trust	45	33	29
Nail trust	45	33	32
General iron trust	45	33	25
Copper trust	24	22	32
Zinc trust	52	28	35
Tin trust	32	24	21
Lead trust	74	43	65
Glass trust	55	36	45
Soap trust	26	19	8
Linseed-oil trust	54	35	5
Rubber-shoe trust	25	20	24
Envelope trust	25	20	11
Paper-bag trust	35	26	15
Cordage trust	25	20	12
Average		30	24

Our attention is brought to the Standard Oil monopoly as an exception to the general rule in regard to these trusts. We know why the Standard Oil Company is enabled to organize its trusts. It is because there is no competition and can not be from abroad. The product is limited.

But, sir, I want to ask any gentleman on the other side this question: Suppose that to-morrow or next day, or any time in the future, there should be discovered in any country oil wells that would develop sufficiently to come into competition with our own oil, would you not put a tariff upon oil in order to protect labor engaged in the oil industry? If you did not you would belie your whole record on this subject.

On the other hand, suppose that this oil was to-day produced abroad and there was a tariff on it and the Standard Oil Trust existed, would you reduce the tariff so as to break down the Standard Oil monopoly? I pause for a reply and I dare the answer. I see gentlemen over there who have been trying to excuse this trust, this monopoly system, and they dare not answer; for if they answered they would put themselves before the country in an undisguised condition that they can not afford.

For here they are to-day with twenty-six monopolies organized in this country, protected by a tariff monopoly able to organize their trusts and their pools, because the high protective tariff prevents foreign competition. And yet you stand there defending them day in and day out, declaring that you will not give the people relief from these trusts by permitting competition to come in here in order to relieve the people of this country. Gentlemen can not escape the force of that argument and they know it. They can not answer it, and although I have appealed to them and paused for that purpose, no one raises his voice.

But we are told that this protective tariff has developed this country as it never was developed before. In listening to the arguments on this floor I would have supposed it was a protective tariff and not Morse that invented the telegraph; that it was a protective tariff and not Fulton that discovered the power of steam; that it was a protective tariff and not Watt that invented the steam-engine; that it was a protective tariff that built the McCormick reaper and mower, and that it was a protective tariff that sent the telegraph throughout this country and laid the cable under the sea so that even the words that I speak may be licked up by the tongue of fire and transmitted to the uttermost ends of the world before the breath of utterance has died upon the air.

It is the genius of invention that has made machinery produce equal to twenty or fifty men. Go to the West and ask the farmer if it is the protective tariff that plows his soil, sows his seed, and reaps his harvest, and he will tell you no, it is the genius of McCormick and those other great inventors who have invented the reaper, the mower, the thrasher, the hay-fork, which has made one man equal to twenty, and stimulated production. In spite of the tariff has this country progressed, and the tariff has added nothing, but detracted much from the progress of the West.

But we are told, on the other hand, that it is not the farmers, not the people of this country, not the consumers, that pay the tariff tax, that it is paid by foreigners and those who manufacture abroad; in other words, that the "pauper labor of Europe" is paying all the taxes derived by this Government from customs duties. Well, I suppose the same may be said of Germany, for she has a protective tariff, and also of France and of Austria.

Now is it a fact that the United States and all these other European countries are living off Great Britain, she being the only free-trade country; that she is paying for the expenses of the standing army of Germany and of France; that she is also paying the enormous tariff taxes of this Government, and yet prospering? Why, it is nonsense. I had supposed that the $300,000,000 in the Federal Treasury, or whatever proportion of that amount had been derived from the protective tariff, belonged to the American people. I had supposed that it was paid by them, and not by Great Britain or any other country.

But we are told that if we permit the importation of foreign manufactures the pauper labor of other countries will flood us with cheap goods. Mr. Chairman, we might carry that argument a little farther. Suppose they should furnish us with all our food and all our clothing and thus enable us to live without work? That would be a serious evil according to the logic of our protective friends, because it would break down all labor in the country and let us all quit work. And if the heavens should shower down to-day food and raiment sufficient to maintain us all, I suppose the other side of the Chamber would get down on their knees and pray the good Lord to deliver us from the pauper labor of the heavens. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, this brings my attention to a little discussion which occurred here the other day between the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH]. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], whom I now see in his seat, and I call his attention to the matter, stated as follows. I give the debate here as it occurred:

I want here, Mr. Chairman, as a workingman myself, to say a word on this question. If the impairment of wages, if the slackening of work shall come by the importation of manufactured goods into this country, and the wages shall thereby go down, as they must, and work be scarce, possibly Pinkerton will have to enlarge his force, because I want to say also in connection with that that the men who are outside the gates of Edgar Thomson's works to-day will win if it takes them twelve months, notwithstanding all the Pinkerton men and men who pay scab wages, whatever their politics may be. And my only dread is this, as it was shown to-day in this discussion in the case of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], that, instead of strikes being an outcome of good times, if we pass this bill, or a free-trade bill, which will only result in making the mechanics of America clothe the farmers for nothing, you will have more strikes on your hands than the Democratic party, or the Republican party either, can take care of in all time to come.

I warn gentlemen on this floor that they are walking on mighty thin ice when they strike one cent out of the American workman's wages or take one hour of the labor that goes to the support of his family, that feeds and clothes his children. For more than twenty years the mechanics of this country have been organizing, and within the last seven years there has risen up a line of organizations that even the oldest organizations stand almost in dread of, because they have the power to vindicate their rights, and a power that has been felt here on this floor more than once; and when they do they will regulate tariffs for themselves and not for any class.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Will you tell me why they organize?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Why they organize? Of course, to take care of themselves. You may talk from now to doomsday for and against the tariff, but I beg to say that the American organizations of skilled labor and the Knights of Labor of America have kept the wages up to what they are to-day; and against any one that tries to beat them down they will hold these wages. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I want, in a word or two, to answer the gentleman from New York. I speak as a laboring man. If the gentleman will lend his aid to remove from the labor of this country the curse of monopoly, and if we succeed in that effort, the mechanics and laboring men of America will more than hold their own with the balance of the world.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so. I know the monopoly he means; it is the monopoly of transportation; the monopoly that would control the shoemaking industries in Massachusetts and shut out the shoemakers of Chicago and Kansas City and St. Louis.

But the light of protection spreads itself a little wider than Massachusetts. I know very well why Massachusetts has slumped toward free trade after having had the benefits of protection. There are others that are going to get the same benefits, North and South.

As regards the monopoly the gentleman from the Milwaukee district speaks of, I know we did try to provide a remedy as far as we could by passing the interstate-commerce bill. And I am willing to go with the gentleman or with any mechanic to amend that act so as to make it a benefit for East and West alike.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. Who put these monopolies in the field? [Applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. If the gentleman is able to prove it he can go to the States of the West and find where the most of it went. It is there also he has to go for a remedy. Congress has done all it could in the matter of interstate-commerce legislation until the proper workings of the act can be found out and any amendment that is necessary can be made. If the farmers will provide a Western market for the men who make your shoes in Massachusetts and elsewhere they can sell their crops at a better price than at Liverpool. They want a home market for themselves.

The whole transportation problem is contained in the long and short haul clause of that bill. The whole battle we had in these two Congresses was with these transportation companies in the West. I do not make an exception for a single one. They put down the lowest rates for a long haul simply to dump the great East, and they will not make the short haul comport with the long haul when they can sell the product nearer home.

The gentleman from New York is mistaken when he says in this extract that the farmers desire the mechanics to furnish them clothing for nothing. What the farmers are asking is to co-operate with the laboring people everywhere, for the farmers are the most overworked people on earth, to bring down the commodities at the expense of the manufacturers and not at the expense of the wage-workers. The farmers believe, in fact they know, that capital has organized its pools and trusts and syndicates, has put up prices everywhere, and is robbing not only farmers but wage-workers.

It is to destroy these pools and syndicates that they demand a reduction of tariff duties so that when these trusts and monopolies exact an unfair and exorbitant rate in the interest of capital the capital of other countries may be so far permitted to compete with them as to sending commodities in competition with these trusts until they are satisfied with a fair compensation and a fair profit.

The gentleman from New York was quite willing to go with the gentleman from Wisconsin to reduce the tariffs of the railroads of this country; he was quite willing to join him in reducing the tax on transportation, and he attributed all the woes of the laboring men to that source. I will go with him to reduce that taxation. But what is to become of the laborers on the railroads? When you reduce the tariff rates of the railroads and the other transportation companies, will not they be compelled to reduce the wages of their laborers?

I say no gentleman can answer that question. When he claims that he is in favor of reducing the tariff on railroad transportation, and leaving the employés of the railroads, in their labor organizations, to keep up their wages, he is bound to admit that the same argument applies to the protective tariff, and more strongly, because it is kept up by Federal taxation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I say the railroad companies can reduce their tariff charges, and so can the protected millionaires. How? They can live a little less luxuriously than they do. Go into a manufacturing town and see the palatial mansions in which the owners of the capital live, and then watch the poor laborer, half starved, as Mr. Powderly claims, as he goes to his miserable hovel to lie down on his bed of straw, and then tell me who gets the benefit of this tariff.

If the millionaire himself and his family would stop dressing in broadcloths and fine silks and satins, and stop spending millions of dollars in Europe, if they would live in a little less imposing edifices, then they could devote the money they now squander upon themselves to paying their laborers better wages, and at the same time they could afford to sell their products cheaper.

So it is with the railroad companies, paying their officers from $25,000 to $50,000 a year, salaries which enable them to live in the greatest luxury, while their poor laborers are underpaid and the public is taxed. Let them get down a little from their high pinnacle and devote a part of the money which they squander upon themselves and their families in luxurious living and give it to their laborers, and they can at the same time reduce their charges.

We can reduce the tariff on railroad transportation and the protective tariff alike. I want gentlemen on the other side to meet this point, especially the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] who took that ground the other day. Let us squeeze the water out of the stocks of all these monopolists.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the protective tariff that keeps up wages, because the system shows that the laborer that is thrown out of employment in these manufacturing industries goes West, so that while there is a vast increase in population in Kansas and throughout the West there is, at the same time, larger increase of wealth in the East.

The statistics show the last decade the increase of wealth in Kansas to be $61 per capita, the increase in Rhode Island to be $135 per capita. While this certainly shows that the laws operate in the interest of the East as against the West in the distribution of wealth, the same statistics also show that the population in Kansas has increased much greater in proportion than in Rhode Island. While wealth per capita is accumulating in one section, population is accumulating in the other. In other words, as I have before stated, it shows that the lands of this country are the outlet for labor, and it is the great agricultural interest that prevents the competition in the labor market in this country that we find in older and more populous countries, and this accounts for higher wages.

A protective tariff does not raise wages one dollar, but it robs the wage-laborer of nearly one-half of his wage income by imposing on him the necessity of purchasing all his supplies in a protected market at prices from 40 to 60 per cent. greater than they ought to be. So that while he receives $1 a day nominally of wages, he is robbed of 40 per cent. of it when he purchases the necessaries of life. It is this that requires him to work twelve hours a day instead of eight—eight hours to support himself and family and four that goes into the pocket of protective monopolies. Even the wages now paid to wage-workers are maintained at great sacrifice on their part by strikes, lockouts, and constant war between labor and capital. We are told that there are also strikes and lockouts in free-trade countries, which is true.

Our protectionists on the other side of the House have constantly paraded that fact whenever we have alluded to strikes in this country. They are thus driven to the concession that wage-workers in this country are in no better condition in that regard than in free-trade England or protected Germany. The truth is, the world is the labor market. The man goes and comes as he pleases. With our constant communication every week, so to speak, with the overpopulated countries of Europe, with immigration free, wage-workers will come here whenever they find their condition can be bettered, and vice versa.

Labor having a commodity to sell, the laborer sells it on a free-trade basis; he sells it in competition with the labor of the civilized world, and at the lowest price this competition will impose upon him. He has no protection whatever. On the other hand, in this country capital is protected from competition with capital of other countries by a protective tariff. If capital here was compelled to compete with capital everywhere, as labor here is compelled to compete with labor everywhere, then capital and labor would be on an equality. This truth is self-evident. Hence we see that all the benefits derived from protecting our capitalists against the capitalists of other countries accrues to capital and not to labor.

The only way to protect labor in this country, or wage-workers, would be to reverse the system; that is to say, to let the cheap commodities that go into the consumption of life, manufactured by the pauper labor, so called, of other countries, come here and supply at cheap prices the laborer of this country. Thus laborers here would get the benefit of labor and capital abroad, and, on the other hand, to prohibit by law or by a tax all immigration or importation of any character of laborers from other countries to our shores to break down the labor market. This wage-workers in these protective industries are demanding at the hands of Congress in so far as to prohibit the importation of contract labor, but we know how easily this law may be evaded and secretly set at naught. Besides, immigration is free; people go and come as they choose, and this law is of no practical benefit.

So that this whole system has resulted in this state of affairs, namely, capital is demanding protection against the capital of other countries. Then labor, seeing the disadvantage at which it is placed, is demanding protection from immigration from other countries. If both these are to be accommodated, we have but one of two things to do. Either to build a Chinese wall around our country or else with a vast fleet and army to guard our coasts against the approach of every foreigner and all foreign importation. Indeed, so far as foreign importation is concerned, we have a practical blockade now.

It has always been considered a great calamity for any nation, even in times of war, to have its forts blockaded, to be secluded and cut off, isolated from all intercourse with the outer world. With us it would be synonymous with a declaration of war now, should any nation attempt such a thing. The whole nation would be aroused to arms to repel the insults to her. We are in times of peace, when all countries are at peace with us, blockading our ports more effectively than armies could do, by acts of Congress imposing enormous fines and penalties and restrictions upon the importation of the wealth of the world. The intelligent people of America will not long sustain such an indefensible, unchristian, and uncivilized economic situation.

Mr. Chairman, I will print with my remarks, my time having expired, a table showing the duties paid on a number of articles, necessaries of life in this country, and also a list of trusts and a list of a number of strikes and lockouts:

Mr. Chairman, I alluded in the beginning of my remarks to the fact that the surplus now in the Treasury really amounted to $300,000,000. While I favor the payment of the public debt as rapidly as it may become due, and even before it is due, so long as we have a surplus beyond the necessities of the Government economically administered, yet in view of the fact that our interest-bearing debt consists of about $225,000,000, 4½ per cents, and at this time about $690,000,000 of 4 per cents, the 4½'s not being due till 1891, and now at a premium of 8 per cent. and the 4's not due till 1907 and at a premium of 26 per cent., it is not just to the tax-payer to continue to tax him for the immediate payment of these enormous premiums. The Government saves, counting premiums and interest, only about 1½ or 2 per cent. in the investments made in purchasing bonds. This money is worth in the pockets of the people from 6 to 10 per cent. It is not good economy to take this from them for an investment that yields only 2 per cent. to the Government. The sinking-fund law that requires the payment of nearly fifty millions of this debt annually will, with a proper execution of the silver-coinage act, pay off the whole of the debt before it matures.

If we could reduce taxes so as to drain the Treasury of its $300,000,000 surplus, and as I contend it can be drained of $350,000,000, this amount of money put in circulation and taxes reduced so as to keep it there will give an impetus to business not heretofore witnessed in this country. The people demand of us less taxes and more money. On this issue we are willing to abide the result.

THE WOOL TARIFF.

The Mills bill proposes to put wool on the free-list, and our friends in the East who expect support from the farmers because there is a duty on wool are endeavoring to bring the farmers of the West to the support of the protective system. This scheme will fail. The farmers of the West know that the tariff on wool is to them no adequate compensation for this unholy system. They are ready, to show their good faith in demanding a reduction of tariff taxes, to surrender wool.

The tariff on wool is about 26 per cent. On woolen goods the farmer has to pay 68 per cent. The bill takes off this tariff on woolen goods about 30 per cent., or nearly one-half, as an offset for free wool. This will be a gain to the farmers. The sheep has got in the wrong company. They have tried to make him the keystone of the protected arch. We propose to get him out, to remove the keystone and let the arch take care of itself.

This reminds me of the story of two brothers, John and Jim. Their father had died and left the two boys a handsome patrimony, including a large flock of sheep. John was a little brighter than Jim. Jim had always been somewhat stupid. John hit upon a plan to divide the sheep. There was a pet sheep in the herd named Bob. This pet and Jim were great friends. Jim had raised him and loved him fondly. John placed an equal number of the sheep in two different pens. But in one pen he put Bob, the pet sheep, and with Bob he placed all the old and scabby sheep. In the other pen he placed the pick of the flock. He told Jim he had divided the sheep, and that Jim could take his choice of pens, supposing that Jim's love for Bob would surely result in Jim's choosing the lot of which Bob was a part. Jim goes first to the pen where the best sheep were placed. He looks carefully through the pen, but did not see his pet. He then goes to the other pen and there his eyes rested on his dear pet Bob, but looking around and over the lot of shabby sheep with which Bob had been placed he commenced lamenting to Bob the dilemma in which he found himself. At last he exclaimed to Bob that he had always loved him, and liked him still, that he was loth to give him up; but he said to Bob, you are in such bad company they would have to part. To John's chagrin Jim took the other lot. So to the disappointment and surprise of our protectionists the farmers refuse to be seduced by them. The sheep is in bad company; we propose to cut him loose from the evil influence of his associates.

The sheep has helped the other members of the combine to swindle the farmers of not less than $1,000,000,000 annually; to blanket the West with farm mortgages, estimates of which I will append as part of my remarks.

The following table, taken from the able speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] shows the per cent. of tariff in present law and the bill under consideration, in which it will be seen that the bill leaves the per cent. of duties greatly in excess of the per cent. of the cost of labor.

Table, compiled from Tenth Census, showing value of various manufactured products, per cent. of labor cost, rate of duty existing and proposed.

Industries.	Value of product.	Labor cost.	Percentage of labor.	Present tariff.	Proposed rate.
				Per ct.	Per ct.
Carpets	$31,792,802	$8,835,218	21.5	47	30
Cotton goods	210,950,383	45,614,419	21.6	50	40
Bolts, nuts, etc	10,073,330	1,981,300	19.7	59	35
Nails and spikes	5,629,240	1,255,171	22.3	43	34
Iron pipe, wrought	13,292,162	1,788,258	13.5	70	35
Oil, castor	653,900	44,714	6.8	194	97
Oil, linseed	15,393,812	681,677	4.4	54	21

Woolen goods	160,606,721	25,836,392	16.1	70	40
Worsted goods	33,549,942	5,683,027	16.9	68	40

It will thus be seen that while the labor in carpets, leaving off fractions, is 21 per cent. of the cost, the tariff is 47 per cent. In cotton goods the labor is the same and the tariff 50 per cent. In wrought-iron pipe labor is 13 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In castor-oil, labor 6 per cent. and the tariff 194 per cent. In wool hats the labor is 22 per cent. and the tariff 54 per cent. In woolen goods labor is 10 per cent. and the tariff 70 per cent. In worsted goods labor is 16 per cent. and the tariff 68 per cent.

The following is a statement of farm mortgages first compiled by the Missouri Republican from agricultural journals and other sources, and widely circulated and indorsed by many of the leading papers of the country:

Ohio	$701,000,000
Indiana	398,000,000
Illinois	920,000,000
Wisconsin	250,000,000
Michigan	250,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000
Iowa	351,000,000
Kansas	200,000,000
Missouri	237,000,000
Total farm mortgages in the ten States	3,422,000,000

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] took exceptions to the estimate and gave the following as, in his opinion, the more accurate. Admitting the lowest estimate to be the most correct, it is simply appalling:

Ohio	$350,000,000
Indiana	175,000,000
Illinois	200,000,000
Wisconsin	100,000,000
Michigan	125,000,000
Minnesota	70,000,000
Iowa	100,000,000
Nebraska	25,000,000
Kansas	50,000,000
Missouri	100,000,000
Total	1,295,000,000

Mr. BROWNE's statement makes farm mortgages the enormous sum of $1,295,000,000. This is the lowest I have seen, and I believe the $2,000,000,000 would not liquidate the farm mortgages in this country.

The following is from the Missouri Republican of recent date:

WHO OWN THE WEST?

All the advocates of high protective tariff have one refrain to their songs speeches, magazine essays, and sermons—the vast wealth of the country. "We are the richest country on the globe," they assert, "and the protective tariff has made us so;" and then they present us with a bewildering array of figures towering up into the billions to show how prosperous the land has been under the protective policy of the last twenty-six years. In 1862 we had only 32,000 miles of railroad; now we have 150,000. In 1860 we had only $200,000,000 deposits in savings-banks; now we have $1,100,000,000. In 1859 we had 2,044,000 farms; in 1880 the number had increased to 4,008,000, and at the present time it can not be less than 5,000,000. All this they tell us has been brought about by the protective policy—as if the industry, enterprise, and patient hard work of the people had nothing to do with the matter.

It may be admitted that the country is rich, and growing more rapidly in wealth than any other country on the globe. But the people have made it so, not the tariff. It has thrived in spite of protection. That policy has drawn enormous wealth from the twenty-nine agricultural States and concentrated it in the nine favored industrial States; and it is in the latter the affluence that excites the admiration of the high-tariff advocates is most conspicuously illustrated.

But, they tell us, the agricultural States have grown rich, too. They also have prospered under protection. See how farms have multiplied in the West and Northwest, and see how railroads have been built in Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin and the States and Territories west of the Mississippi, even to the Pacific, and how this vast region has been subdued to settlement.

All true. But who owns these farms and railroads in the Western States? In one word, who owns the West? The people of the West, it might be answered. But the answer would not be true, as a few indisputable figures will sufficiently prove.

First, as to farms. In 1880 there were 138,500 farms in Kansas, 256,000 in Illinois, 194,000 in Indiana, 247,000 in Ohio, 985,300 in Iowa, 154,000 in Michigan, and 134,300 in Wisconsin—making a total of 1,301,100 in the seven States named. Recent statistics collected by granger associations and printed in farm journals make the following exhibit of farm mortgages in these same States:

Kansas	$235,000,000
Illinois	1,000,000,000
Indiana	635,000,000
Ohio	1,227,000,000
Iowa	567,000,000
Michigan	500,000,000
Wisconsin	357,000,000
Total	4,521,000,000

These figures are so startling in their enormity as to seem incredible. We do not vouch for their accuracy. They present the 1,301,100 farms in seven Western States as encumbered with an aggregate of four and a half billion mortgage indebtedness, or an average of over $3,400 for each. The assessed valuation of property in these States in 1885 was as follows:

Kansas	$275,500,000
Illinois	797,000,000
Indiana	753,000,000
Iowa	925,000,000
Michigan	850,000,000
Wisconsin	436,000,000
Ohio	1,671,000,000
Total	5,707,500,000

It will be seen that the reported mortgage debts cover about four-fifths the assessed value of the farms; and the bulk of these mortgages are held in the Eastern industrial States.

Next, as to railroads. In the seven Western States named there were, in 1885, 37,000 miles of railroad with a stock and bond account and net earnings as follows:

States.	Stocks and bonds.	Net earnings.
Kansas	$195,700,000	$9,440,000
Illinois	740,000,000	16,000,000
Indiana	320,000,000	5,760,000
Iowa	165,000,000	2,180,000
Michigan	274,000,000	5,000,000
Wisconsin	236,000,000	6,900,000
Ohio	767,000,000	12,300,000
Total	2,537,700,000	57,520,000

These 37,000 miles of railroads, having a nominal value of $2,537,000,000 (over two and a half billion dollars) and yielding annual net earnings of $57,520,000, are put down in the statistics of the day as part of the property of the States in which they lie. But it is a notorious fact that only a very small fraction of their values are owned in these States. The last report of the Iowa railroad commissioners states that only one out of forty stockholders in Iowa roads lives in the State, and only one-seventieth of the capital stock is held in the State. In Illinois a similar condition of things prevails. The official report of the railroad commissioners does not state what proportion of the aggregate capital stock of the Illinois roads is held in Illinois, but the location of the capital stock of the leading roads will assist us in forming an estimate. The Illinois Central has $20,000,000 capital stock, only $685,000, or less than 3 per cent., of which is owned in Illinois. Of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, about 5 per cent. of the capital stock is owned in Illinois; of the Ohio and Mississippi stock, only one-half of 1 per cent.; of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute, less than one-half of 1 per cent. Taking these figures as a guide we may safely estimate that of the 19,000 miles of railway in Illinois, valued in stock and bonds at $740,000,000, the people of Illinois own 5 per cent.; the other 95 per cent. is owned in the rich industrial States of the East.

As Illinois is called the most prosperous and one of the richest agricultural States of the West, it may be inferred that the other States are in no better condition than it in the matter of railroad ownership, and therefore it may be broadly asserted that practically all the railroads in the seven States named, valued at $2,537,700,000 (two and a half billion dollars and over), are owned in the industrial States. The industrial States are therefore drawing a pretty round sum of money for one thing and another from the seven Western States named every year. The items may be stated as follows:

In protective taxes	$150,000,000
In interest on mortgages	270,000,000
In railroad net earnings	57,000,000
Total	477,000,000

The Western States are, in fact, being bled to death. Western farmers are actually becoming poorer and poorer every year. As a body they do not make a living, and the convincing proof of this fact is that their farms are fast passing under mortgage to the money-lending manufacturing States of the East. Twenty-five years ago these mortgages were few in number and small in amount; now they number millions and cover an aggregate value of thousands of millions, and all bear 6 to 8 per cent. interest.

The West does not own itself. It is owned by the industrial States. Twenty-six years of the malign, sectional, and oppressive policy of high tariff has done the work and done it effectually. The industrial States of the East, enriched beyond estimate by the annual tribute of $300,000,000 exacted for a quarter of a century from the other States under the false pretense of building up home manufactures, own all Western railroads, telegraph lines, and bridges, and hold mortgages on nearly all farms, their cities, and towns.

Also the following, from same journal:

THE NINE RICH STATES.

Official statistics published from time to time show that the nine manufacturing States of the Northeast have grown, and are still growing, in wealth much faster than the twenty-nine agricultural States, notwithstanding the decided natural superiority which the latter possess in richer soil, larger rivers, and better climate. In some of the agricultural States, notably the Western and Northwestern, the increase of wealth has been very large—so large in the last two decades as to furnish cause for allowable boasting and patriotic self-congratulation.

There are rich, productive farms, great cities, thriving towns, and vast systems of railroads in Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri, and we have a right to rejoice at the exhibitions of popular industry, enterprise, and power which they present. But even these surprising phenomena of growth and development are evidences of Eastern rather than of Western wealth.

These farms do not belong more than one-half—certainly not more than two-thirds—to the farmers who till them; they are mortgaged to Eastern money-lenders. These towering cities and populous towns do not belong to the populations that dwell in them; they, too, are largely mortgaged to Eastern creditors living 1,200 to 1,500 miles away. And as to the 38,000 miles of railroad in the States named, valued at $2,000,000,000, and yielding aggregate net earnings of $120,000,000 a year—they are owned almost entirely in the Eastern manufacturing States also.

The manufacturing States, therefore, not only own themselves, but have managed to possess a very large interest—nearly one-half, certainly one-third—of the Western States. How has this come about? By what process have the nine manufacturing States secured a mortgage interest worth $2,000,000,000 in the farms and cities and towns of the growing West, and the almost absolute ownership of its enormous systems of railroads, valued at $2,000,000,000 more?

The answer is a twofold one: First, through the protective tariff in favor of the special manufacturing interests of the East; and, second, through control of the monetary and fiscal legislation of the last twenty-five years.

The protective tariff which averages about 50 per cent., forces the consumer to pay $1.50 for every $1 worth of protected goods he buys; it forces the whole people to pay $150 for every $100 worth of protected goods, $1,500 for every $1,000 worth, $1,500,000 for every $1,000,000 worth, $150,000,000 for every $1,000,000 worth; and as this unjust and oppressive exaction has been going on for over twenty-five years, some idea may be formed of the enormous drain of substance from all other parts of the land into the favored manufacturing section.

And this is only one-half of the answer. The other half is to be found in the selfish and pitiless control of the financial policy of the country and the cunning manipulation of its money. The statement will appear surprising to persons who have never reflected on the subject, but it is nevertheless true, and capable of demonstration, that the nine manufacturing States—which are also the creditor States, the banking States, the capital States, and the money-lending States—have, by their adroit dictation of monetary legislation, treasury practices, and the resumption movement, actually taken from the pockets of the people $2,000,000,000 and put it into their own—and it is this very money, unjustly taken from the people, which they subsequently lent to their victims and now hold as investments in Western farm mortgages.

During the war the Eastern creditor interests encouraged the Government to issue enormous amounts of bonds, and to intrust the sale of them to their favorites. These issues aggregated $3,000,000,000, and as soon as the war was over, the same interests set about limiting the volume of greenbacks—the only money in the country at the time—with the object of increasing the value which both the bonds and the greenbacks would have when resumption should come.

The bonds were sold at a gold value of 35 to 75 cents on the $1, the average being, probably, 50 cents, certainly not over 60 cents; and when resumption of specie payment was brought about in 1878, making every bond bought for $600 worth $1,000, the bondholders made a clean profit of 40 per cent. on the $3,000,000,000, or $1,200,000,000. And this was not all. It was not even half. The advance in the gold value of the United States bonds was extended to and over all debts contracted during and after the war—say, from 1863 to 1872—State, county, city, and town debts, railroad debts, and mortgage debts.

The aggregate of these was estimated at $5,000,000,000, and as it was contracted in greenbacks, worth on an average 60 cents on the $1, resumption of specie payment strained it up 40 per cent., and thereby imposed on the debtor States, counties, cities, railroads, and individuals, a new exaction of $2,000,000,000—and this, too, went into the pockets of the creditor classes. Debts never shrink. The property and products that pay them shrink, but not the debts. The Western farmer who contracts an obligation of $1,000 at a time when wheat is worth $1.25 a bushel, has his burden virtually doubled when wheat runs down to 62½ cents a bushel.

The act of 1869, to "strengthen the public credit," as it was falsely titled, was a signal example of the selfish and unfair control of legislation in the interests of the manufacturing creditor States at the cost of the people. That act made $1,700,000,000 greenback bonds payable in coin, although coin at the time commanded a premium of 38 cents on the $1. It was driven through Congress by the bondholders—Congress being composed at the time very largely of bondholders—it yielded a clean profit to them of $646,000,000, and it virtually increased the public debt that much.

Bearing in mind that the nine manufacturing States are the creditor States of the country, and the twenty-nine agricultural States are debtors, it will be seen that the former have reaped immense harvests of money from these manipulations—and it is these immense sums that form so important an item in their present wealth, enabling them to own all the railroads in the West and to hold mortgage liens on a large proportion of the property of the Western people. In 1880 five-sixths of all the registered United States bonds were held in the nine manufacturing States, and taking this as an indication of the ownership of the coupon bonds also, we have the following statement of the ownership of the whole public debt for that year:

Public debt in 1880, $2,120,000,000.
Held in the nine manufacturing States, $1,767,000,000.
Held in all the other States, $353,000,000.

As the payments for interest on the public debt in the last twenty-five years have been $2,150,000,000, and the payments on the principal have been $1,100,000,000 in the same period—making a total of $3,250,000,000—we may form some intelligent conjecture as to where these payments found a resting place. Portions of our national debt are held abroad, but of the much larger amount held in this country five-sixths are, and have ever been, held in these creditor States, and the payments on these five-sixths therefore went to those States.

The estimated population of the United States at the close of 1887 was 62,900,000. The following figures, then, can not be far from the truth:

Population at present, 63,000,000.
Of the nine manufacturing States, 16,400,000.
Of all the other States, 46,600,000.

The following figures, taken from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, show where the capital of and deposits in the national banks are held:

National banks: Total number of shares of par value of $100 each, $5,517,000.
Number of shares held in the nine manufacturing States, 3,298,000.
Number held in all other States, 2,219,000.
Total capital, $551,700,000.
Portion owned in the nine manufacturing States, $329,800,000.
Portion held in all other States, $221,906,000.
Total deposits, $1,250,000,000.
In the nine manufacturing States, $700,000,000.
In all other States, $550,000,000.

The subjoined figures show the deposits in savings-banks, and are taken from the report of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington:

Whole number of depositors, 3,071,000.
In the nine manufacturing States, 2,847,000.
In all other States, 224,000.
Savings deposits: Total for the whole country, $1,200,000,000.
For the nine manufacturing States, $1,111,000,000.
For all other States, $80,600,000.

These statistics show where the money power of the country is to be found and how effectively the manufacturing States have wielded their authority over national legislation in the last quarter of a century to concentrate wealth within their borders. They have less than one-fourth the population of the country, but they control the national banks through the ownership of three-fifths of their capital and seven-twelfths of their deposits. They show ten times as many depositors in the savings-banks as all the other twenty-nine States, and they have eleven-twelfths of all the savings deposits in the country.

What between the protective tariff maintained for a quarter of a century for the benefit of the manufacturing section and the unjust, not to say positively iniquitous, management of the monetary legislation by those States, the West is in danger of becoming a mere group of mortgaged provinces, with no right but that of paying interest on their debts.

Mr. WOODBURN. Mr. Chairman, before discussing the main question under consideration, I propose to reply briefly to a statement of some consequence which has been made on the other side and which has not yet been contradicted. The eloquent gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, has been pleased to claim that because a Democratic House not long ago passed two measures in the interest of labor (one of them known as the contract bill), which were signed by the President of the United States, therefore his party alone is entitled to be considered the friend of the laboring men of this country. If there be no other basis for this claim, I feel that the title of his party to that distinguished honor is not unassailable. If there be any other foundation for this claim except the shallow pretense that a low tariff makes high wages, I would like to know it. I say to the gentleman that every Republican on this side of the House voted for both those measures, and that they never could have gone to the hand of a Democratic President for signature except through the intervention of a Republican Senate. It will be a very difficult matter for the gentleman to convince the people that the legislative department of this Government consists solely of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, there was another labor bill passed in this Democratic House in the last Congress. It was known as the "arbitration or O'Neill bill;" and the other side is entitled to a monopoly of all the glory of the achievement. When that measure came up for debate upon its merits a distinguished Democratic member of the Labor Committee rose in his place and denounced it as a piece of unblushing demagoggery, and characterized its author as "a good constitutional lawyer among baseball players and a good baseball player among constitutional lawyers." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in 1875, when the Democratic party controlled this House by a majority of 70, one of its first acts in testimony of its devotion to the cause of labor was the reduction of the salary of every employé of this House, though those salaries had been fixed under the Democratic administration of Franklin Pierce when the price of living was 50 per cent. lower than at the time of the reduction. From that time to the present the policy then inaugurated has been rigidly enforced in every department of this Government. Why, sir, hardly had this Administration been installed in power when its Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, by a special order, cut down the pay of every laboring man in the custom-house at San Francisco from $920 a year to $720. Think of it! Two dollars a day for a laboring man in Government employ in the land of generous habits and high wages, the golden State of California. Your Democratic Secretary of the Navy found a rich subject at the Mare Island navy-yard for the exercise of the knife of Democratic economy. By another special order he cut down the pay of every hard-working hod-carrier from $3 a day to $2.10.

Your party came across the mountains into my State and found that the surveyor-general, a most important officer to my people, had been receiving under Republican rule $2,500 a year; and by Democratic economy you reduced his wages to the level of a skilled miner, notwithstanding the fact that he was obliged under the law to give bond for the faithful performance of his duties in the penal sum of $120,000. Why, sir, in the last Congress one of the leading members on the other side of this House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], declared that the employés of this House, who had neither mileage nor passes, were no more entitled to an extra month's pay to go to their homes in the heat of summer for a little recreation than the veriest scavengers on Pennsylvania avenue. And only the other day, to my utter surprise, we heard the member from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] declaring that the policy of his party was for cheap labor. Carry that doctrine to its legitimate results and it means the substitution of Asiatic labor for American.

Mr. Chairman, it was not the Democratic but the Republican party that passed the anti-pauper immigration bill. It was not the Democratic but the Republican party that passed a bill prohibiting the importation of coolie laborers under contract. It was not the Democratic party that placed upon the statute-books of this nation that blessed law known as the homestead act. It was the Republican party that for the first time in the history of this country made labor free. I hold that the record of the Democratic party on this question ought to estop forever its leading members from posing in political contests in the attitude of the friends of the laboring men of this country.

Mr. Chairman, confining myself within the limit allowed me and paring down my remarks accordingly, I propose to reply to another statement made, not only in this Hall, but at the other end of the Capitol. Not long ago, in order to extricate his party from the dilemma in which it has been placed by the message of the President, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] declared that his party was not for free trade; that free trade was a myth and a folly. That declaration has been echoed on this floor time and again since the opening of this debate. I propose now to disprove by clear and conclusive evidence the truth of that declaration.

I call attention to the fact that before the vote was taken in the last Congress upon the question of considering the Morrison bill, the deformity of which was so hideous that it was strangled by a Democratic House, desks of members were garnished with pyramids of British leaflets to enlighten the average Congressman upon the beauties of Morrison free trade.

Another piece of evidence tending to show the free-trade proclivities of the Democratic party is the favorable report of a measure known as the "shipping bill" by a Democratic House of Representatives. It provides that foreign-built ships shall be put on the American register free, and that every conceivable article that enters into the construction of a vessel, from the keel to the bow, from the hull to the mast-head, from the nail to the anchor, shall hereafter be imported free of duty.

This interesting free-trade production is now upon one of the House Calendars, ready perhaps for an enforced consideration. Its passage will close down every ship-yard in America; throw thousands out of employment, and American ship-building will be only a pleasing reminiscence of the past. I am certain it will not receive a single Republican vote. Republican Representatives, true to the doctrine of protection, are in favor of American ships, built by American hands, out of American material, and manned by American seamen.

As further evidence of the truth of the proposition I have undertaken to prove, the message of the President, the platform of the Democratic party, has the unqualified indorsement of every British newspaper. The London Spectator, the Saturday Review, the London Times, the Economist, the London Statist, the London Post, the London Standard, the London Globe, the London Daily News, the Glasgow Herald, the People's Journal, the Haddington Courier, the Scotchman, the London Iron, the London Ironmonger, the London Colliery, Guardian, the London Echo, and the London Coal Trade are among the number. [Applause on Republican side.]

The burden of their song is that the policy embodied in the message of the President means free trade, that it touches the pockets of every citizen of the United States, and that it has set rolling a stone that will never stop until it has broken the infamous idol of protection in pieces. They declare that his message reads like an extract from some old speech of John Bright; that it is good news for England and means an increased woolen and iron trade. They claim that the "Mills bill" will put into the British treasury an extra hundred million of dollars per annum and that its passage will insure the reduction of the Irish laborer's wages and cripple his financial ability to aid his countrymen in their struggle for parliamentary independence. The following is a recent dispatch to the New York Herald from a distinguished member of the British Parliament:

To convert the United States is indeed a triumph. The Cobden Club will henceforth set up a special shrine for the worship of President Cleveland and send him all its publications gratis. Cobden founded free trade; Cleveland saved it.

It is the first message of a President of this Republic that has received the universal sanction of the British press, British statesmen, and British manufacturers. The echo of their hosannas in its honor has not yet died away on the other side of the Atlantic. It is certain to reverberate on this side in the heat of the coming political contest. [Applause.]

If there is a gap in the testimony I have adduced to prove that Mr. Cleveland and the Democratic leaders of this country are free-traders, I propose to fill it up by documentary evidence the truth of which no man dare question.

The Cobden Club is an association of British manufacturers organized in 1866 for the avowed purpose of destroying the protective tariff system in America and to facilitate the introduction and sale of British goods in the American market. This organization, founded in London, has established agencies in New York and Chicago for the distribution of British free-trade documents in political contests in this country. Its secretary is a member of the British Parliament. His name is Thomas Bayley Potter, who at the annual dinner of the Cobden Club at Greenwich on the 10th day of July, 1880, said that the Cobden Club was now about to enter a contest with a foe worthy of its steel. Their eyes were now turned westward. They were going to encounter their friends in the United States, and he believed they would be ultimately victorious. Six days after this interesting free-trade love-feast the London Times said:

It is to the New World that the Cobden Club is chiefly looking as the most likely sphere for its vigorous foreign policy. It has done what it can in Europe, and is now turning its eyes westward and bracing itself for the struggle which is to come. It can not rest while the United States are unsubdued.

The following is a London cable dispatch, dated January 8, 1888:

The Cobden Club are trying to raise a large sum of money to be spent to further free-trade propaganda, especially in spreading broadcast pamphlets and other Cobden Club literature. Lord Brassby has given a thousand dollars, others less, and the hat is going round. It is long since the club has been so active. They are indeed doing more than the fair-trade movement in England appears to require. There can be little doubt that their surplus funds are intended as re-enforcements for Mr. Cleveland in his efforts to hand over the control of American markets to British traders.

A few years since the following paragraph appeared in the London Times:

A subscription was recently opened to raise funds to circulate free-trade tracts in foreign countries. About £40,000 ($200,000) was subscribed. Some of these tracts are to be printed in New York for circulation in the United States. In addition to the above, $47,000 was subscribed by foreign bankers and importers of this city whose names are in our possession.

More than two hundred members of the British Parliament and twelve out of fourteen British cabinet members are members of the Cobden Club. Upon its roll of membership appears an army of dukes, earls, marquises, lords, peers, counts, and princes. The annual assessment is three guineas. The report of its committee shows that in 1886 they issued eleven millions of free-trade leaflets and gives to the world the following interesting information:

Your committee are not unmindful of the probable effects of fiscal freedom in America upon the world's commerce. They foresee that free trade means cheap production in the United States.

The club awards a prize of £60 for the best essay on free trade. They permit Harvard, Yale, and Williams Colleges in the United States to compete for silver medals of the club for essays on the same subject. Last year the committee kindly consented to permit the University of Indiana to enter the ranks of competition. The bankers of the club are the London and Westminster Bank and the Westminster branch, St. James's Square, London, S. W., where subscriptions are paid on the 1st day of January in each year. Its balance-sheet shows that for the year 1885 it expended £5,744 9*s.* 3*d.* I now offer in evidence the record I hold in my hand which contains the list of the members of the Cobden Club, with dates of entrance, as corrected up to the 1st day of January, 1888. On the back of the record is the motto of the club, "Free trade, peace, good-will among nations. God save the Queen." I forgot to state that the club committee declare in their report that no man can be an honorary member of the organization unless he has rendered distinguished service in the cause of British free trade.

It is so exclusive in its character that no man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow can be admitted to membership. The essential qualification is that the applicant must be a manufacturer or a nobleman.

I find in the corrected list of distinguished foreign and colonial noblemen who are members of the club, the following names and date of their admission: JAMES B. BECK, Lexington, Ky., elected in 1888.

I regret to see the name of the brilliant Senator upon the roll of an anti-American association. He sits high in the hearts of the people west of the Rocky Mountains. He is the determined foe of British monometalism. He does not believe that the capital of the nation that does not produce an ounce of silver ought to regulate the price of the American product. He does not believe that the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury should shape the financial policy of this country to meet the views of forty-six New York bankers and the money-changers of Wall street and London. His name on the club roll is more than an indication of the political sentiments of the great party that recognizes him as one of its most boasted leaders. [Applause.]

The Senate of the United States is also represented in this foreign institution by Hon. ZEBULON VANCE, of Charlotte, N. C., who was admitted in the fold in 1883.

William Endicott, jr., of Boston, Mass., a Cabinet officer of this Republic, its Secretary of War, was admitted in 1877. This ought to create no surprise, for, if common rumor reports him aright, he permits no visitor to escape without inflicting upon him an essay on the antiquity of his Anglo-Saxon ancestry and the peculiar aristocratic color of his puritanical blood. [Laughter and applause.]

Thomas F. Bayard, Delaware's favorite son, the Democratic Secretary of State, was admitted in 1883. It would be strange, indeed, if his name were not on the roll of American noblemen. Only a few days ago, at a public meeting at Birmingham, England, when Chamberlain mentioned the name of Bayard, the cheers of the multitude drowned the voice of the orator and almost set in motion the walls of the building. When in the Senate of the United States, he declared that the passage of a resolution putting wool on the free-list was the first firm step in the direction of free trade.

His diplomatic action on the Canadian fishery question, his release of three British vessels solemnly adjudged by a court of the United States to be forfeited and sold, together with their cargoes, for a violation of law in seal fishing in the Behring Sea, coupled with his cringing apology to the British foreign office for not releasing them sooner, eminently qualify him for membership in the Cobden Club. From his political acts and utterances, a stranger, unacquainted with our form of government, would be justified in concluding that he is acting in the dual capacity of an American Secretary of State and a British envoy extraordinary.

He had the honor of being elected the same day with his excellency Nuban Pasha G. C. B., G. C. M. G., and the Marquis Vilfredo Pareto. [Laughter and applause.]

David Dudley Field, a Democratic member of the Forty-fourth Congress, whose legal reputation extends beyond the limits of the Empire State, and whose party prominence is such that he was called upon by a committee of this House to dictate the names of the new States that are to be admitted after the election, joined the brotherhood in 1881. Henry George, the simon-pure free-trader, who, after being justly spurned by the labor party, allied his political fortunes with Mr. Cleveland on the principle that birds of a feather flock together, was elected the same year. W. Dorsheimer, whose recent death created a gap in the ranks of the Democratic party in the Empire State that can not be readily filled, was elected a member in 1878.

Manton Marble joined the club in 1872. This is the nobleman delegated by Grover Cleveland to bring about an international money conference in the interest of silver. The silver-producers are doubtless indebted to the President of the United States for the significant appointment of a man to such a position when he was a notorious member of a foreign institution, every British member of which is hostile to the coinage of the white metal.

W. R. Morrison, of Waterloo, Ill., was elected a member of the Cobden Club in 1876. Three times during his Cobden Club membership he was the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and had the control of the revenue legislation of the country. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRUMM. Is that Horizontal Morrison?

Mr. WOODBURN. Yes.

Is it any wonder that he was continually tinkering at a tariff revision in the interest of Great Britain that resulted always in the stagnation of business, the timidity of capital, a dearth of employment for labor, that engendered strikes, begot violence, and deprived him of a seat in Congress?

In the memorable year of 1873 Sir George Balfour, K. C. B., was elected a member of the club. This is a name that must sound rather unmusical in the ears of the wretched, ragged, starving, persecuted tenantry of Ireland, made so by the propagation of the free-trade policy of this institution that put forth every effort to elect Grover Cleveland and that is created expressly to destroy American markets.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is the Secretary Balfour to whom the gentleman refers the same secretary who is now engaged in the Tory ministry, administering the policy of England towards the people of Ireland?

Mr. WOODBURN. Yes, he is precisely the same man.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The same identical infamous scoundrel referred to. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WOODBURN. At the same time, to my utter astonishment, I find that one of the foremost men of the Democratic party, a distinguished author, a wit, a humorist, a representative of a cosmopolitan constituency in a cosmopolitan city, SAMUEL SULLIVAN COX, became a member of the noblemen's foreign association. [Laughter and applause.]

L. Q. C. Lamar, of Oxford, Miss., was elected a member in 1877. He deserves to be there. He has always had the courage to express his free-trade convictions in and out of Congress. Were he not a free-trader, he would never have been appointed a justice of the Supreme Bench of the United States.

Last but not least on the roll of the Cobden Club membership is that able and impartial parliamentarian who possesses the almost god-like power of shaping the legislation of this great country, the present Speaker of this House, JOHN GRIFFIN CARLISLE, of Covington, Ky. He is comparatively a young member, having been elected in 1883. [Applause.]

I find upon the roll of British, foreign, and American noblemen such distinguished names as the Duke of Argyle, K. T.; Sir Evelyn Baring, C. S. J. C. I. E.; Lord Brassey, of Bulkey; Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain; His Excellency the Marquis De Casa Laiglesia, Maj. Gen. Sir William Crossman, K. C. M. G., M. P., [laughter]; Viscount de Figanieri; Frederick W. C. Gibbs, Q. C., C. B.; Lord Randolph Churchill; Viscount Hampden, G. C. B.; Marquis of Lansdowne; Sir John Lubcock, Bart.; Viscount de Moser, of Portugal; His Royal Highness Prince Jerome Napoleon, of France; Hon. Sir H. Parks, K. C. M. G.; Prince Carl Schurz; Marquis de Riscal; Chevalier Charles de Schezer; Hon. Frank H. Hurd, of Toledo, Ohio [laughter]; His Highness Prince Hassan, of Egypt; Hon. Randolph Tucker, of the Commonwealth of Virginia [laughter]; Baron von Stauffenberg Ristissen; Hon. Henry Watterson, of Louisville, Ky.; His Excellency Waldimir Weshniakoff, of St. Petersburg; Henry Ward Beecher; Baron W. K. Van Dedem; and John C. Calhoun, of New York [great laughter and applause]; J. S. Moore, known as the Parsee Merchant [laughter]; William M. Singerly, of the Philadelphia Record; David A. Wells, the free-trade writer.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODBURN. Certainly; if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman state when Mr. Garfield became a member of the Cobden Club, and also when Murat Halstead, of the Cincinnati Commercial, became a member of the club? Will the gentleman please answer?

Mr. WOODBURN. Yes; I will answer that question. The book which I hold in my hand is a corrected list of all the members, British, foreign, colonial, and American, up to January, 1888, and I say the name of Mr. Garfield does not appear anywhere upon it. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Was he not a member of the Cobden Club?

Mr. WOODBURN. Never, sir. I produce the authority to show that he was not. Now let the gentleman produce his authority to show that he was. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Was not Murat Halstead a member of it? Was not Senator SHERMAN a member of it?

Mr. WOODBURN. There is not a Republican in public life to-day on the list of the Cobden Club. [Applause on the Republican side.] This is a late publication, and was sent to Senator JONES, of my State, but got into the wrong hands. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Then these names have been removed, because they are members of the club.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who removed them?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know.

Mr. FARQUHAR. By what authority does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. BYNUM. I make it upon the authority of members of the club that Mr. Halstead is a member. I have it directly from members of the club that they met him there.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, here is the official record of membership.

Mr. WOODBURN. I do not know what the gentleman bases his statement upon. I come here with the record, and you must produce contrary authority to overthrow it.

I only give the names of a few of the American members who have combined to conquer and subdue American energy and enterprise. They shine out on the British Cobden Club list like apples of gold in pictures of silver. They ought to be preserved as relics for the reverential inspection of the rising generation of American workingmen. It is strange that the roll of American noblemen does not contain the name of the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, who, by a stroke of his pen, permits a Canadian railway, subsidized by a foreign government to the extent of $300,000,000, unsubjected to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to carry freight and passengers across American territory and compete with American subsidized lines, thereby crippling their ability to pay their just debts to this Government.

I am agreeably disappointed in not finding among the names of the American noblemen the distinguished gentleman from New York, Hon. TIMOTHY CAMPBELL, a Representative in part from the greatest manufacturing city of the United States. He was once a zealous protectionist, and in that trying and exciting moment when the Morrison bill came up for consideration in the last Congress voted twice with the Republican column. But his political conversion was almost as miraculous and sudden as that of Saul of Tarsus.

A bright light from the White House fell upon him and a new faith was born within him. He recanted his errors, supplicated for pardon, was baptized by Morrison in the waters of free trade, and at the end of the ceremony, with all the fervor of a new convert, he voted in stentorian tone the third time the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Or rather, I merely wish to make a suggestion that the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL], while he may be a "suspect," is not likely to be identified with the Cobden Club, because he is an Irishman.

Mr. WOODBURN. Oh, he is just as much of an Irishman as I am; he was born there. [Laughter.]

What I say here to-day may be as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals; but as an humble member of this illustrious body I am prompted by a stout sense of duty to submit this solemn question to the American people for their solemn answer: Is the Speakership of the American House of Representatives, chairmanship of the Committee on Ways and Means, membership of the House of Representatives, and the Cobden Club, that, in the language of the London Times, can never rest while the United States are unsubdued, consistent and compatible positions? [Applause on Republican side.]

I am anxious to know if the adopted citizens of Irish birth and their descendants will continue to perpetuate the political power of a party the leading members of which adorn the roll of an organization that bodes death not only to American but to Irish industries. Cobden free trade means that parliamentary independence in Ireland is utterly valueless. It has scattered them like the Israelites over every portion of God's footstool, robed them in rags, and made them hewers of wood and drawers of water. Can they knowingly support at the ballot-box for the high office of President of the United States a leader of that party, when they are informed by the London cable dispatches of the 18th day of January last that the surplus funds of the Cobden Club are intended as re-enforcements for Cleveland in his efforts to hand over the control of American markets to British traders?

Can they still cling to a party existing upon an empty but attractive sound, that points with pride to its prime minister, Thomas F. Bayard, and who holds out as a shining example of its confidence, patriotism, and liberality an ex-member of this House who basely apologized to the British minister at Washington for his contemptible duplicity in introducing a resolution of inquiry as to the legality of the trial of an American citizen condemned and executed by a British jury and a British court? I refer to Abram S. Hewitt, the Democratic mayor of the city of New York. If Mr. Cleveland stands by his letter of acceptance and refuses a renomination, no Democrat can represent the aims, objects, and principles of the Democratic party better than Abram S. Hewitt. Do they not know that it was the Republican and not the Democratic party that exploded the old British common-law doctrine of once a subject always a subject, and established the right of expatriation? Have they forgotten that it was a Republican Congress that, in 1868, sent forth its mandate to the nations of the earth that thereafter every American citizen of foreign birth might roam over every portion of God's footstool free from hinderance and molestation; that every step he takes he is shadowed by the banner of the stars, and that the only ægis of protection he needs during the life of the Republican party is his certificate of American naturalization? [Applause.]

Are they blind to the fact that every act of consequence that is of universal application in the interest of labor that still lives on the statute-books of the nation is the emanation of Republican wisdom?

I will be disappointed if the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS], the acknowledged representative of his race, fails to rise in his seat and denounce the pending measure that the London press declares means cheap labor here and increased British importations, in view of the fact that only six years ago he was president of an organization that issued a manifesto to his countrymen calling upon them to boycott every article of British manufacture. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Only a few days ago in the heat of debate the gentleman from Ohio, Judge TAYLOR, was catechized by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] for asserting that there were too many Irishmen in and out of Congress fighting England's battles for free trade. If the statement be true it is to be regretted, and it ought not to be so. It was refreshing to hear the genial gentleman from Michigan sneeringly mention the words "Too much tariff."

The warning voice of the history of the country that gave birth to mine and his ancestors constrains me to say that the destruction of its protective system means the destruction of prosperity here and the destruction of future hopes, and the inauguration of a condition which drove his ancestors from Ireland, made Michigan his birthplace from necessity, and a seat in the American parliament a possibility. [Applause.]

I am glad my distinguished friend can not be admitted to membership in the Cobden Club, however much he may desire it. He is barred out because he is neither a nobleman or a manufacturer. [Laughter.]

I feel that I have disproved the allegation of the Indiana Senator that the Democratic party is not for free trade. I have shown from the record that the executive, judicial, and legislative branches of the Government are represented in force in a foreign organization hostile to every American interest, that flaunts in the faces of our workingmen the truthful declaration that the passage of a measure reflecting the views of the President's message means cheap labor in America and increased production in Great Britain.

If I have read this country's history aright, the attempt to force free trade upon the colonies and nip their budding industries was the inspiring cause of the American revolution.

To enforce it Great Britain did not hesitate to hire foreign mercenaries at six pence a day, and arm and officer the merciless Indian. To maintain her commercial supremacy her soldiers burnt the nation's library at Washington and the interior of the two wings of the Capitol that shelters Representatives who are dignified with membership in a foreign club that boldly avows its purpose to obtain for England, by peaceful methods, through the agency of the Democratic party, what she failed to conquer by the sword.

From the dawn of American independence she has continually struggled to make this country the outlet for the manufactured products of her pauper labor. After the adoption of the Constitution, national protective enactments were passed to encourage home manufacture, give employment to labor, and make a home market for the farmer.

The trouble with the early tariff acts was that they did not protect enough, and they but little affected England's control of the American markets.

It was reserved for the Republican party, born to make labor free, to check England's career of commercial conquest in this country. It was its mission to devise a protective system that dwarfed into insignificance all its predecessors, and, judging from its results, must be classed among the many imperishable monuments of its genius. [Applause.]

Scarcely was it perfected when it gave almost miraculous stimulus to American energy and enterprise. It conjured into existence, as if by magic, a multitude of hitherto unknown industries, and threw around them the arm of protection until they became so full of strength and vigor that they defied British legislation and British competition to destroy them.

It placed the American laborer and mechanic upon a plane so elevated that it is an insult to common intelligence to institute a comparison of their condition with the white slaves of Europe.

It has made America the workingman's Paradise. Here he drinks in knowledge gratis from the sparkling fountains of education. To him lies open every avenue that leads to wealth and political station. He feels he is a man, a sovereign, an integral part of this Republic, one of the pillars on which it rests. He is so different in manner and dress from foreign workingmen that the myriads of foreign visitors to the Centennial Exposition looked in vain for the laborers of America.

It needs no statistical information to demonstrate that the price of labor is higher here than elsewhere. It is enough to know that England can buy raw cotton here, pay the cost of transportation, manufacture it into goods, ship them to this country to compete with the home product, and pay an ad valorem duty of about 40 per cent.

She can import steel rails, pay freight and a specific duty of $17 per ton, and compete with the American manufacture. Low wages alone enables her to do it.

I need no other evidence to prove this than the voice of the swelling tide of immigration that is ever surging on the American shore.

The history of the tariff system proves that a material reduction of the duty on foreign importations of the like and kind produced here swells our revenue, diminishes home production, stimulates foreign manufactures, and increases foreign importations. It proves that proper protection maintains high wages, and by virtue of healthy competition and diversification of industry, cheapens prices.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the opening speech of the tariff debate, proves this beyond all contradiction.

He cited an extract from a free-trade magazine to show that the wages of the shoemakers in Massachusetts was 129 per cent. higher than in England, and that English shoes were dearer than those in Massachusetts, because a Yankee workman could make thirty-five pairs a day while an Englishman can make but ten, and therefore tariff did not regulate wages.

The true solution of the question of higher wages and cheaper prices is that protection started into life myriads of shoe factories in New England that competed with each other as well as with foreign establishments.

There never was and never will be a stronger point urged in favor of the reduction of the tariff than that presented by Mr. MILLS to the farmers of the country. He tells them that if an English shoemaker makes as many shoes as an American he would get as much wages and be just as well off, and therefore the tariff has nothing to do with the price of labor. It is the most striking and convincing illustration of the gentleman's opening speech. It is regarded of so much importance that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] dwelt upon it and emphasized it. It seems almost unanswerable, but party pride compels to attempt a refutation.

I read from an article that appears in the London Shoe and Leather Record in April, 1888, which has been investigating the sweating system in London. It is headed "An inquiry into the sweating system." The following is the record commissioner's report, accompanied by a wood-cut of a London shoemaker's home:

> The sweating system has once more been forced upon the attention of the public—this time with emphasis, and from an eminence that has drawn the inquiring gaze of the whole community. When the committee of the House of Lords presents its report—providing it goes to the heart of the matter—the press of Europe will have cause to wonder that in a land where the poets and the favored classes are never weary of boasting of liberty and wealth, there should exist a system of business which condemns men to a condition of slavery, at once degrading in its effects and inhuman in its operation." The analogy between the white slaves of the metropolis and the negro slaves of America is not distant. 'Tis true, no man can sell the former, yet circumstances compel them to sell themselves. Though no man dare place upon their limbs chains of iron, yet an inexorable system binds them in fetters as resistless as iron to the relentless taskmasters.

The following is a description of an English shoemaker's room he visited:

> Neither pen nor pencil can give any idea of what the room was like. It was a filthy and wretched den. Here we found (after midnight) five men and a little boy still hard at work finishing. We were quickly accommodated with stools and made welcome, though I can scarcely say that we felt at home. Besides the six workers there were in the room two women and two little girls. The latter appeared to be waiting for some fish that her mother was cooking for supper in the same room in the small hours of the morning. In baskets and on rails were grosses of boots and shoes, women's and children's, ranging in wage price from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.* per dozen. It is horrible and pitiful to think that men should wear out their lives in the manufacture of such wasteful products. Here are some of the prices:

Girls' kid button, strip waist	per dozen	2	3
Women's kid shoes, strip waists	do	3	9
Mock kid shoes, black waists	do	2	6
Lasting S. S., paper heels	do	2	6
Children's leather lined	do	1	6

This wood-cut ought to be photographed and placed in the hands of every laboror in the land to show the character of the Democratic argument in favor of free trade. It ought to be a partial offset to the harrowing picture of the wretched Pennsylvania miners, drawn by the distinguished word-painter from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN. [Laughter.]

If Mr. MILLS is sincere in his argument, it is certain that the evident purpose of the bill that bears his name is to put the shoemakers of New England upon the deplorable level of the shoemakers of London. If he succeeds, he will have acquired a claim to immortality akin to that of the gentleman that applied the torch to the Ephesian temple. [Applause.]

A general application of the rule he has invoked means that every time he runs the Democratic dagger into the tariff schedule and cuts off the duty on an article of foreign importation it strikes down an American industry that never can be revived, unless the artisans it employs are reduced to the pitiable level of his foreign shoemakers.

America, with her fruitful soil and diversified production, can compete with any nation on earth for the control of the markets of the world, if her wage earners work the same hours, receive the same wages, and live in the same way as those of other countries the products of which come in competition with our own. She can compete with England only by paying English wages. She can compete with China by feeding her laborers on rice and paying them ten cents a day. This is the kind of competition advocated by the distinguished member from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who voices the sentiment of his party in declaring for cheap labor that must necessarily result from the destruction of the tariff system.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will the gentleman allow an interruption here?

Mr. WOODBURN. Certainly, if I can get leave to finish my speech.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The time of the gentleman will expire in five minutes.

Mr. WOODBURN. Then I fear that I can not yield to the gentleman.

[Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think the gentleman ought not to refuse to permit a correction. I am sure he does not wish to misrepresent. But I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WOODBURN. The gentleman is not interrupting me. I am willing to be interrupted; I like it. But I have not time, as I shall not ask to extend my remarks beyond the hour in view of the fact that other gentlemen are to follow me.

What would be the necessity of excluding the Chinese from our shores if the fruits of their labor in China are permitted to come in competition with the fruits of American labor? What is to prevent Chinese shoemakers (and they are skilled artisans) from flooding our markets with hand-sewed shoes costing a few cents a pair and annihilating their manufacture in Newark and elsewhere, where the wholesale price is $5.50 per pair? The answer is, nothing but a high protective duty.

The seventy-eight millions of reduction contemplated by the Mills bill are taken from the American people and given to the foreign exporter. It means the destruction of the American factories unless their owners will put their employés on the labor level of Europe; and when they are extinct the price of foreign goods is sure to advance.

It is a direct assault on labor. At the proper time a motion should be made to amend its title by entitling it an "An act to destroy American industry, degrade labor, and to introduce the sweating system into the country, and for other purposes."

As far as I am concerned I believe I represent the sentiment of the people west of the Rocky Mountains in standing by every American industry of consequence. I will vote for the wool of Texas, the salt of Michigan, the lumber of Maine, the wool of Ohio, the sugar of Louisiana, and the productions of every farm. [Applause.] I hope for reciprocity when under the rule amendments are in order and will be made to preserve from the knife of the committee the silver, the lead, the wool, the borax, salt, and sulphur, the lumber, fruit, and wine of the Pacific coast.

The history of the past, the present condition of the country, compel me to stand by the protective-tariff system, because almost all it protects is labor. It has put a surplus into the Treasury that was empty and bankrupt at the time of its adoption. It knows no trust unless it be that of labor. It has been a potent factor in liquidating more than half of the national debt as well as liquidating national obligations to the pensioners of the country to the amount of more than $10,000,000,000. It has aided in the construction of three trans-continental railway lines from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. It has stood the test of experience and is stamped with the approval of the most enlightened statesmen of this nation. It may be reverently regarded as the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night that guided this young Republic through a wilderness of difficulties and placed it on the pinnacle of almost earthly glory. If the bill under consideration becomes a law, it will be forced upon the country against the solemn protest of the great majority of its farmers, laborers, and manufacturers. [Applause.]

No man ever wrote a poem who dedicated it to slavery. No intelligent American workingman ever knowingly appended his name to a petition for the passage of a measure to reduce himself to the level of a European or Asiatic slave. [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. MOORE was recognized.

Mr. BRYCE. Will the gentleman from Nevada, before he takes his seat, repeat the allegations which he made in the body of his remarks about Mr. Hewitt?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOODBURN. My remarks will all be published in the RECORD.

Mr. BRYCE. I want the gentleman to repeat them now, because as I understood them I consider them as a misrepresentation of facts. If I remember correctly he used the expressions of base and contemptible in allusion to Mr. Hewitt.

Mr. WOODBURN. I will print them and send the gentleman from New York a copy. They will all appear in the RECORD.

Mr. BRYCE. I repeat they are a misrepresentation.

Mr. WOODBURN. I have said nothing but what I can prove, sir.

Mr. BRYCE. You should have undertaken to say it, then, in Mr. Hewitt's presence.

Mr. WOODBURN. I made the statement publicly, and have authority for it.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask the privilege of saying before this House that, as I understood the words the gentleman has refused to repeat, they put a false interpretation on the action of a man who never did anything mean or cowardly in his whole life; and I repudiate the insinuation against him with the scorn which it deserves.

Mr. BRUMM. But that does not disprove the fact.

Mr. GUENTHER. It is a matter of record, and the facts are easily established.

Mr. BRYCE. It is a misrepresentation, as I have said before.

Mr. KERR. Then that is simply your statement placed against that of another man.

Mr. DARLINGTON. You can not change history in that way.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Hewitt acknowledged on the floor of the House the fact, and apologized for it right here on the floor of the House.

Mr. BRYCE. What is the gentleman's statement? If I remember correctly, Mr. Hewitt explained—not apologized.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Hewitt apologized on the floor of the House for it. I offered the resolution to investigate that very matter myself, and when you say that this man states an untruth, you say that which is false. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BRYCE. I say it is a misrepresentation, and I address myself to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. BRUMM. And I say it is not. That resolution was offered on the floor of this House.

Mr. BRYCE. And it is cowardly to interpret a man's action when he is not on hand to state the case exactly as it occurred.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman can not destroy the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen must come to order. The officers of the House will see that gentlemen are seated.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Nevada has only stated the facts.

Mr. BRYCE. I was not addressing my remarks to you, sir.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Gentlemen, you are not in the Senate of the United States now. [Laughter.] [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, is this the Senate of the United States? [Renewed laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The officers of the House will see that the aisles are cleared and that gentlemen take their seats.

[Mr. MOORE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], addressing the House a few minutes ago, read a long list of members of the Cobden Club, to the great delight of gentlemen on the other side of the House. While he was upon the floor I propounded an interrogatory to him as to whether Mr. Garfield was not a member of the club during his life time, and also whether Mr. Murat Halstead, editor of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, was not a member; to which the gentleman from Nevada responded that their names were not upon the list, and that no Republicans now living were upon that list. I hold in my hand a list of the members of the Cobden Club published in 1888, a revised list, and I wish to call attention to some of the names. I am sorry that I do not see the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] in his seat, but this is the only opportunity I have to make my statement.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But you did not repeat correctly the statement of the gentleman from Nevada. You no doubt intended to do so, but you failed. He said that no Republican of prominence was a member of that club.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman said "no Republican in public life." I hold in my hand a list of the members of the Cobden Club, upon which list appear the name of Murat Halstead, of Cincinnati, Ohio, admitted in 1880, and the name of Hugh McCulloch, ex-Secretary of the Treasury under a Republican administration——

[Laughter on the Republican side and cries of "Undoubtedly!" "Of course!"]

Mr. BYNUM. Also the name of Stanley Matthews, a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, admitted to the club in 1877, and appointed by President Garfield to the Supreme Court, no doubt, by reason and on account of his being a member of the Cobden Club.

Mr. BAYNE. He was not appointed by President Garfield at all.

Mr. MILLIKEN (to Mr. BYNUM). You are wrong in your history.

Mr. ROWELL. Stanley Matthews was a member of the convention that nominated Horace Greeley in 1872.

Mr. BYNUM. I find also on this list the name of Theodore Roosevelt, of New York; also the name of Cyrus W. Field, of New York; also the names of a number of other Republicans which I might read, but gentlemen on the other side would probably denounce them as "Mugwumps," so I stop at this point.

Mr. BAYNE. But you do not find Garfield's name.

Mr. BYNUM. Garfield's name is not here because the names of members who are dead have been taken off; but his name appears in the publication of 1871: "James A. Garfield, admitted in 1867." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Garfield repudiated all connection with that club. The election was made without his consent.

Mr. PERKINS. Without his knowledge or consent.

Mr. CARUTH. So does Senator BECK repudiate any connection with that club.

Mr. BYNUM. Here is Garfield's name in 1876. It had not been repudiated by him at that time.

Mr. MACDONALD. We never heard anything of his repudiation of it until he became a candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. WEBER. The gentleman has read the name of Mr. Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt has since recanted. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] a question. As a matter of candor and frankness, is he not perfectly well aware, as every newspaper reader in this country and every person who is reasonably familiar with political matters in this country during the past dozen years is aware, that President Garfield publicly and repeatedly repudiated any connection with that club; that the putting of his name on the list was simply a compliment paid to him without his knowledge, and that he absolutely and unqualifiedly refused to become a member?

Mr. BYNUM. It was a compliment to him I have no doubt, as it was to every other man on the list—a compliment paid on account of the sentiments he entertained and expressed. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is not a candid answer; but I suppose it is as candid an answer as a Democratic free-trader can afford to give.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman tell us when Mr. Garfield repudiated his connection with the club?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will do so with great pleasure. He repudiated it repeatedly in public utterances.

Mr. BYNUM. Well, furnish them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It will give me pleasure to do so.

Mr. BYNUM. Do it now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I can do it in five minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether Mr. J. S. Moore, who the record shows is a member of the Cobden Club, and who is commonly known as the Parsee merchant, is not most commonly known as the author of the Mills bill? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut that the authors of the Mills bill are the members of the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut. Has not Mr. Moore been in constant consultation with the majority of the committee, and has he not been a controlling spirit in the framing of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman make the charge that Mr. Moore is the author of the bill? Does he make that charge on his responsibility and veracity?

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Moore was with the committee all the time.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky (addressing Mr. BAYNE). Do you make that charge?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not make the charge, but I know that he was here all the time and in consultation with the gentlemen who form the majority of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will take the responsibility of making it on his veracity, or upon that of any other gentleman, we can then make the issue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky admit that the minority of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means were not admitted to the consultations held during the framing of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That the minority members of the committee were not admitted to the private consultations of the gentlemen of the majority?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Ah! it required private consultations, did it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen of the minority of the committee were not admitted to the private consultations of the majority. Do you suppose that we ever expected that those gentlemen would agree with us to reduce taxation? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am glad the gentleman confesses to the secrecy of their movements.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, in the brief hour allotted to me for the discussion of the pending bill it would be impossible, even if I were so disposed, to cover the broad field it traverses and attempt to show the effect upon all the different industries touched by it in case its provisions were to become law. Nor is it my intention to discuss generally the great questions of tariff and free trade.

I will consume no time in attempting to demonstrate that a protective tariff has protected American labor and American capital against foreign labor and foreign capital in the past, and, if maintained, will continue to do so in the future. All this has been done, and most ably done, by others.

It is rather my purpose to discuss the bill under consideration with special reference to its effect upon a single industry, with which I feel myself somewhat familiar. Our friends on the other side of this Chamber, conscious of the unpopularity of the doctrine, disclaim the idea of "free trade." They tell us that it is tariff revision they are after and not free trade.

We are informed by the President that—

> The question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant, and the persistent claim made in certain quarters that all efforts to relieve the people from unjust and unnecessary taxation are schemes of so-called free-traders, is mischievous, and far removed from any considerations for the public good.

I infer from this authoritative statement that the "scheme" of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of this House is not a "free-trade" scheme at all. Well, what is it? Let us see. Lumber of all kinds is put by this bill upon the free-list. So is wool, and so are a large number of other items. If all imports were treated as are lumber and wool, would the President of the United States still tell us that the question of free-trade is wholly irrelevant? And yet no one will deny that as to those articles which are put upon the free-list this Administration has declared for free trade. No amount of talk about the question of free trade being absolutely irrelevant can blind the eyes of an intelligent people to the fact that the President of the United States and a majority of the Ways and Means Committee advocate the doctrine of free trade, pure and simple, as to all articles of merchandise which it is proposed to admit free of duty, and a modified free trade as to those articles upon which any duty is charged at all. Nowhere in the report of the committee accompanying this bill, nor in any of the numerous speeches made on this floor in support of it, are we given any reason why lumber should be admitted free of duty. I am not aware that any public sentiment has demanded it. It does not appear, so far as I am informed, that any citizen has petitioned for it. Upon what ground, then, will the committee defend its action?

We have been told, it is true, in general terms that we must by legislation arrest the growing surplus in the Treasury and relieve the people from the burdens of unnecessary taxation. But the putting of lumber upon the free-list will only decrease the income of the Government by the amount of the duties collected from lumber imported into the United States, and that amount is so small that it can not warrant the action of the committee.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, the total duties collected from those items in the "wood schedule" which it is now proposed to admit free of duty amounted only to the sum of $1,026,717.78, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, $1,039,737.57. To reduce the income of the Government in so trifling a degree will scarcely be considered wise even by those of this House who feel that they must do something, if it can be shown that the result of such action would be disaster and ruin to a great industry, to the capital employed in it, and to the vast numbers of our people who labor in it and get their living by it.

By the tariff act of 1842 on "boards, planks, etc., not planed or wrought into shape for use," a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem was imposed. This duty remained from 1842 down to 1872, except that under the act of March 3, 1857, the duty was made 15 per cent. and continued until the act of March 3, 1861, restored the duty to 20 per cent. In 1872 the duty was changed from a 20 per cent. ad valorem to the present existing duty, namely, $1 per thousand feet board measure on "sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber of hemlock, sycamore, whitewood, and basswood," and $2 per thousand put on "all other sawed lumber."

The lumber imported during the years 1886 and 1887 paying the specific duty of $1 per thousand feet, when reduced to the ad valorem standard, paid a duty of only 11.73 per cent., and that paying a duty of $2 per thousand feet an ad valorem duty of 16.18 per cent. (See annual report of Bureau of Statistics, page 84.) So that it appears that the duty on hemlock and other low-priced lumber was reduced by the act of 1872 more than 8 per cent. ad valorem, and pine and the higher-priced lumber was reduced about 4 per cent. ad valorem.

It can not be seriously argued by any Representative on this floor that the existing tariff on lumber is high. I assert here and will undertake to prove that the existing duties are below the protective point, and that the difference in the wages of the labor in this industry in favor of our people engaged therein is greater than the duty upon lumber. For the purpose of illustration, the cost of producing lumber in Pennsylvania may be taken as a fair statement of its cost in all the great lumber-manufacturing sections of the country. Slight differences do exist in different parts of the country, but they are not great enough to impair the force of the illustration. It is a fact within my own knowledge, and abundantly proved by evidence in my possession, that from the time of the first ax-stroke into the tree standing in the forest until the lumber is taken from the saw and piled in the rough at the mill the labor cost alone is not less than $6 for each 1,000 feet.

The average monthly wages paid the laborer in the woods is about the sum of $30 and board, and the average daily pay of the laborer upon the saw-mills is about the sum of $2, he boarding himself. In Canada, including New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, our competitors in the lumber trade, the wages paid for the same work, average as nearly as may be one-half to two-thirds the sums paid in this country. The cost, therefore, of producing 1,000 feet of lumber in Canada would be about $3 to $4, or one-half to two-thirds the cost in the United States. Allowing that the Canadian laborer is paid two-thirds as much as the laborer here, the labor cost in Canada is $4 per 1,000 feet; and the fact remains that the American laborer receives for the same work $2 per 1,000 feet more than the Canadian. Now the duty on pine, the highest priced lumber, in which there can be great competition between Canada and the United States, is $2 per 1,000 feet. It appears to be clear, then, that the difference in labor cost alone is as great as the duty, and the laborer gets it.

If we take into account further the natural and artificial advantages of the Canadian lumberman it becomes apparent that the existing duty does not reach the point of protection. By reason of such advantages the Canadian can afford to pay the duty and still be better off in the markets of the United States than our own lumbermen. The long winters there, with the ground constantly covered with snow, cheapens greatly the process of lumbering. In the matter of freights, too, the Canadian lumberman has an advantage, and upon this point I can not do better than to quote from a letter from the Gratwick, Smith & Fryer Lumber Company, of Tonawanda, N. Y., under date of March 7, 1888, in which they say:

> The Canadian lumber mills being situated nearer the Eastern States than the mills of the producing pine regions of the United States, they have an advantage in the item of freights of at least one-half of the present duty; and if such duty were removed it would give to the Canadians control of the markets of the Eastern States, whither their product is most largely imported, so that the present rate of duty is absolutely necessary in order that Western pine lumber may be shipped to Eastern markets.

But if the existing rate of duty does not fairly and fully protect pine and the higher grades of lumber, the case is much worse when we consider hemlock, whitewood, sycamore, and bass wood. The average labor cost of producing a thousand feet of hemlock lumber is, perhaps, 50 cents less than pine, but the duty is only $1 per 1,000 feet, being $1 less than the duty on pine.

When we consider that the entire duty collected on imported "hemlock, whitewood, sycamore, and bass wood" amounted only to the sum of $41,464.27 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; and only $36,872.67 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, it will scarcely do to tell the great hemlock industries of the country that the growing surplus in the Treasury must be curtailed by cutting off the $30,000 or $40,000 a year collected from imported lumber.

Nor can it be successfully argued that the removal of the duty is in the interest of the laboring classes. Nine-tenths of the people who use lumber do not belong to the laboring classes at all. In addition to that, it is rough lumber only proposed to be admitted free of duty, and it is a well-known fact that in the ordinary frame or wooden house such lumber constitutes less than 25 per cent. of the cost. Whom, therefore, will free lumber benefit? Nobody asks it, as far as I can learn. The resulting advantage to the farmer in maintaining this great industry is tenfold greater than any advantage that would accrue to him in the reduction of the price of lumber, even if it were reduced an amount equal to the entire duty.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I call your attention to that large class of our people who are benefited by the duty on lumber. The district which I have the honor to represent embraces almost the entire hemlock belt of the country, being about 250 miles long by perhaps 50 miles wide. Reasonably accurate estimates fix the amount of hemlock in this region at 10,000,000,000 feet. Hemlock lumber is now being delivered in New York and Philadelphia at from $9 to $12 per thousand feet, and fully 90 per cent. of the prices received represent labor and nothing else. The amount of hemlock manufactured during the past three years in this section of Pennsylvania will probably average 500,000,000 feet per year, and the average labor cost of producing it is $5.50 per thousand feet, or in the aggregate $2,750,000 is paid annually as the wages of labor in this one industry alone in the limited district of which I have spoken.

But it may be asked, how will the people who labor in this business be hurt by admitting this sort of lumber free of duty? The answer is easily given. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there are vast forests of hemlock and spruce, and these countries are even now, notwithstanding the duty, competing with our hemlock in the New York market, and by reason of the extremely low duty now existing have kept the price of hemlock so low that its average value in the tree during the past eight years has not been more than 50 cents per thousand feet. Take the duty off as this bill proposes and it will be worth nothing.

But I do not speak for Pennsylvania alone. The removal of the duty upon hemlock lumber will affect, in equal if not greater degree, the lumbermen of Northern New York, with its 8,000,000,000 of feet of hemlock and spruce, and Maine, with its 5,000,000,000 of spruce. Nor will the damage stop here. Remove the duty from lumber and you immediately bring the hemlock and spruce and lower grades of pine of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the Canadas into direct and ruinous competition with the low grades of pine everywhere, used for the same purposes as the lemlock and spruce, and particularly with the pine of Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Florida. Following close upon such action the mills will close, the laborer and his family be thrown out of employment with all that that implies in the way of privation and suffering, and the investors of capital in expensive mills and plants will find them as valueless as the hemlock timber itself.

Mr. Chairman, a senseless, causeless, demagogic war has been declared by this Administration against the manufacturer. The President, in his message to Congress in December last, uses this language:

> So stubbornly have all efforts to reform the present condition been resisted by those of our fellow-citizens thus engaged (in manufactures), that they can hardly complain of the suspicion, entertained to a certain extent, that there exists an organized combination all along the line to maintain their advantage.

Taking the cue from their chief, we have been regaled by our friends from the other side of the Chamber during this debate by hearing those of our citizens who have engaged in manufactures vilified and abused without stint. Nothing worse could be said of the highwayman or the burglar.

In due time they will discover that the attempt to curry favor with the workingman by abusing the man who furnishes him the work is an utter failure. I undertake to say here and now that what the President and his followers denominate a tax "for the benefit of our manufacturers" will be found in every instance to confer greater benefits upon the laborer; and the highly intelligent laboring people of this country would indorse what I have said if they had the opportunity.

Day after day during this debate we have heard it proclaimed from the other side of this House that duties upon imports are imposed for the benefit of the manufacturer, and that the laborer, instead of being benefited, is plundered and impoverished by this "robber tariff." I deny this in general and in particular. There is no country in the world and never has been in which people who labor receive as good wages, in which education is so widely diffused, in which all the people are so well fed, housed, and clothed as in the United States under the system of protection to American industries.

The attempt to win favor for "free trade" by calling the manufacturer by harsh names and arraying capital against labor will prove a boomerang to those who have used it. In this country the manufacturer of to-day was the laborer of yesterday, and the laborer of to-day will be the manufacturer of to-morrow. The majority of the Ways and Means Committee forget that the employer of labor does not own the laborer, and that in the last quarter of a century the world has moved apace.

The grime and smoke of the factory and the shrill shriek of the steam-whistle alarm those "who dwell in tents" in Texas, Arkansas, and Kentucky. But I beg to assure them that the ægis of protection is national in character, and broad enough and beneficent enough to allow our pastoral friends in those great States to get under it. Our system makes your sheep dear and your shotguns cheap, and why are you not happy? [Laughter and applause.]

Is it not true that as a party you care nothing for the great industries of the country? What has the Democratic party ever done to build them up and foster them? The stupendous advancement in manufactures and the arts which we of this generation have witnessed would not have been possible if the official declarations of your party had been enacted into law. Let us see. The Democratic platform adopted at Cincinnati June 6, 1856, and upon which the Democratic party went out of business for twenty-four years contained this significant plank:

> Resolved, That there are questions connected with the foreign policy of this country which are inferior to no domestic questions whatever. The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world, and by solemn manifestations to place their moral influence at the side of their successful example.

In 1860 the platform of both wings of the Democratic party affirmed that of 1856, and by way of explanation the Charleston convention declared that "Democratic principles are unchangeable in their nature when applied to the same subject-matters."

In 1864 the party tried the truth of the proverb that "silence is golden," and said nothing.

In 1868 they declared for "a tariff for revenue with incidental protection." In 1872, tired and sick with "hope long deferred," they made this deliverance:

> Recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts and to the decision of the Congress thereon wholly free from executive interference or dictation.

In 1876 they used this language:

> We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

And in 1880 they declared for "a tariff for revenue only." Six times from 1860 to 1880 did the people of this country put their seal of condemnation upon "progressive free trade" and "a tariff for revenue only."

In 1884, having after the lapse of twenty-four years, learned something of the trend of public opinion, our Democratic friends adopted a tariff plank in their platform differing widely from any that had preceded it. They declared, amongst other things, that:

The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

This official declaration of the party made to the people in 1884 saved it, "as by the skin of its teeth" it is true, but still saved it and enabled it after so many years to regain power. The Democratic party obtained the inheritance, however, by the same tactics by which Rebekah obtained the paternal blessing for Jacob. By masquerading through one campaign in the clothing of the Republican party, the people were made to believe that the Democratic party would favor protection to American industries, and although, like Jacob of old, they were aware that the voice was Jacob's, yet the hands were the hands of Esau, and so they were deceived.

But the practical question is, how is this last promise of the Democratic party being kept? Does the bill under consideration pay any attention to the protection of our manufacturing industries by retaining duties sufficiently high "to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country?" Not at all, for we are told by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that—

Wages are regulated by demand and supply and the capacity of the laborer to do the work for which he is employed.

This new theory has been repeated many times by the advocates of this measure assuming it to be sound because "he himself hath said it." The gentleman [Mr. MILLS] admits that our rate of wages is higher than anywhere else in the world, but declines to see that the duties upon imports are the efficient cause, or, indeed, that they have any relation to the subject.

He deals in generalizations. He asks, "What, then, is it that makes higher wages?" and he answers by telling us that "it is coal and steam and machinery," as though America possessed a monopoly of coal and steam and machinery. I answer his interrogatory that the duty upon an imported article has much to do with the wages of labor employed in manufacturing the same article in this country. No other cause can be assigned for it. Take the labor cost of manufacturing 1,000 feet of lumber. In Canada, across an imaginary line, the laborer is paid $4, and in the United States, perhaps not 50 miles away, he is paid $6. If the law of supply and demand governed, why are not the wages the same in both countries? Canadian laborers are free to come here, as ours are to go there. No barrier exists between the two countries. A day's walk or an hour's ride would in many instances take them from the camp of the Canadian lumberman to that of the American, or vice versa.

Not only is it claimed that the tariff and the rate of wages have no relation to each other, but our Democratic friends, as this debate has progressed, have thrown off the thin disguise of pretending to favor protection and have boldly declared themselves for free trade. A few days ago the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] in discussing this bill, with a candor that I admire, distinctly informed this House that he was not only in favor of buying where he could buy cheapest, but was also in favor of hiring labor where he could hire it cheapest. I commend this doctrine to the laboring men of this country, who, as the same gentleman informs them, are robbed by the tariff. The same distinguished gentleman [Mr. HEMPHILL], as the Representative of the great State of South Carolina, with equal honesty has put himself upon record in the same speech upon the subject of developing new industries. He says:

As has been suggested by a writer on this subject, it may seem a little paradoxical to say so, but the greatest misfortune that can befall the tax-payers of this country is the establishment of a new industry by means of protection. For every time some crank of a citizen takes it into his head to make his living by some business that either does not pay at all or not as much as he thinks it ought to, the people of the country must be taxed to make good the deficiency. And every time a new metal or other marketable substance is discovered in the bowels of the earth, immediately a tax is levied upon the public for the benefit of the owner of this new wealth, and from that day it costs more labor and money to procure what we need of this substance than it did before the misfortune of this discovery befell the country. So that under this law what ought to be a national blessing becomes a national calamity. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3573.)

I do not quote this for any reason except to show the opinion held by the gentleman and those he represents upon the subject of making investments in new enterprises. It is a gem of rare value, which I am anxious to preserve. History repeats itself. John Randolph, of Virginia, made a speech in this House when the tariff bill of 1824 was under consideration. It was a violent arraignment of that bill and all who had to do with it. He insisted that all manufacturing should be done by England, and in giving his reasons he said:

It is in such a climate only that the human animal can bear without extirpation the corrupted air, the noisome exhalations, the incessant labor of these accursed manufactories. Yes, sir, accursed; for I say it is an accursed thing, which I will neither taste nor touch nor handle.

The majority who framed this bill appear to come honestly by their aversion to manufactures.

No, the promises of 1884 are not to be kept. The Democratic party proposes to be true to its history. It is now as it always has been in favor of "progressive free trade," and a "tariff for revenue only." The real difference, when reduced to its last analysis, between the advocates of and apologists for the measure under consideration, on the one hand, and those who oppose it on the other, is this: the one theorizes without regard to the especial interests of our own people, whilst the other speaks as an American citizen, after an experience under both systems.

It is gravely contended by the President and his followers in Congress that the duty imposed upon an imported article increases its cost to the consumer by the amount of the duty, and that, too, not only as to the imported article itself, but also the domestic product. It has been so often demonstrated upon this floor during this debate that the argument is not only fallacious, but the statement false in fact, that I will give but little time to it here. I say again the argument is fallacious. If in this whole Republic there were but one owner of timber land, one wool-grower, and one manufacturer of steel rails, it would be possible then that the price of lumber, wool, and steel rails might be kept to a point as high as the foreign article, plus the duty. But the argument fails for the reason that it does not take into account the sharp competition existing in the country in every protected industry. I say again that the doctrine is false in fact, because it has been shown to a demonstration that the amount of the duty constitutes no rule by which the cost to the consumer may be even approximately measured.

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that the framers of this bill had any conception either of the extent of the forests of the United States or the magnitude of the lumber interests of the country. We are, unfortunately, without reliable statistics in all the States, but such as we have certainly show that we will never be dependent upon Canada for our lumber supply.

By the census of 1880 there was standing, of pine timber alone, in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, 84,170,000,000 feet; in Pennsylvania and New York, 2,120,000,000 feet, and in the States of Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, 237,041,500,000 feet. These figures, large as they are, be it observed, are from 10 to 25 per cent. too small, as we are informed by the census reporter, and include no other variety of standing timber except pine.

No estimates are given of the timber in Virginia, West Virginia, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky, but the reporter tells us that they contain immense quantities of cypress, walnut, cherry, oak, hickory, and other hard woods, as well as pine, hemlock, and spruce; nor do the census reports give us any estimate of the standing timber in Washington Territory, Oregon, and California, but the quantity in that region, from the best information obtainable, is vastly greater than in the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota combined, before a tree had been felled there. The redwood in California alone is estimated by the census reporter at 25,825,000,000 feet. I have made no mention of the extensive and valuable forests of fir, pine, and larch in the Territories of Idaho and Montana, nor of those of New Mexico, where, we are told by the census reporter, there is—

More timber than will supply indefinitely all the population that will occupy this part of the United States.

Time will not permit me to show the peculiar injury which would be suffered by the people of California, Oregon, and Washington Territory if this bill were to become a law. Petitions signed by thousands of citizens of that section of the country, including not only mill-owners, but mill operatives as well, protesting against the removal of duty upon lumber, have been presented in this Congress and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, but that committee has turned a deaf ear to their entreaties.

With the determination that the representatives of the people and the people of this country shall hear what they say, I quote from one of these petitions, signed very largely by citizens of California.

The forest growths of this State, Oregon, and Washington Territory, the smallest fraction of which has only been touched by the ax, offer to generations to come the fullest supply of their most lavish needs of lumber, and without the supplement of the extensive virgin tracts of Alaska. There is not and can not be any justification, on the score of scarcity or monopoly, in offering to adjacent British Columbia the trade this coast is abundantly able to supply. Further than this, the pine forests of Washington Territory and Oregon, as well as the redwood forests of California, are reproductive, a new and rapid growth of the same species of trees springing up immediately, in the place of those cut down for the market.

Admit to our State free of duty the lumber of British Columbia, produced by "Chinese labor," from exhaustless forests donated to its mills by a willing government, and all these industries will be throttled to their death; hosts of laboring men from mills and woods will be idle; skilled trades will lack employment; our ships will rot at decaying wharves, for the carrying trade of the principal product that now keeps our flag afloat will inevitably be by foreign bottoms, if the production of their cargoes be in foreign lands; vast milling plants will be made valueless and the capacity of our forest growths to add to the national wealth dwindle into insignificance.

Mr. BAYNE. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to ask whether he has any estimate of the amount of timber that goes to waste annually in this country.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have not the figures here; but the amount is very large.

Mr. BAYNE. So that while there is this large waste of lumber which does not go into consumption, there can be no necessity for admitting lumber free?

Mr. McCORMICK. Not the slightest; and while on this subject, to which I am glad the gentleman has called my attention, I will make this observation: It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that every year millions of feet of lumber, worth millions of dollars, are so injured by fires running through the woodlands, resulting from causes against which it is impossible to guard, that it becomes absolutely necessary in order to save the timber that it be immediately manufactured into lumber. If you admit Canadian lumber free of duty, you destroy absolutely this American lumber the protection on which is necessary in order that it may be manufactured and brought to market. Otherwise it would go to waste.

Mr. BRUMM. There is also a large loss by decay.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But if it be a fact that some prominent statesmen on the other side are interested in Canadian forests, would not the admission of Canadian lumber to our markets free of duty be of substantial benefit to the aforesaid statesmen?

Mr. McCORMICK. Very decidedly; and I can not account for the provision of this bill putting lumber on the free-list upon any hypothesis except that the proposition is prompted by American citizens who own timber lands in Canada or is in the interest of Canadians themselves.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. I believe we never had a tariff on lumber until 1867, had we?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, sir; we have had a tariff on lumber from 1842 down to the present time.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. How long did the protection given to lumber by the tariff of 1842 continue?

Mr. McCORMICK. The duty imposed by the tariff of 1842, which was 20 per cent. ad valorem, continued until 1872, with the exception of only three years, from 1857 to 1860, during which period the duty was 15 per cent. ad valorem. By the act of 1872 there was imposed a specific rate of $2 per thousand feet on pine and $1 per thousand feet on hemlock and the cheaper grades of lumber.

Mr. BUCHANAN (to Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana). Now tackle him on something else; he has got you there. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS (on the Republican side). Next!

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will be the "next." The gentleman has spoken of the duty on lumber as keeping out the Canadian lumber and in that way being an advantage to the lumbermen on this side. I will say to the gentleman that, as I understand, the advantage operates in this way: All along the Canadian border of New England, and possibly New York, the Canadian lumbermen are brought over to our side and employed at Canadian wages in cutting the lumber for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is advocating protection.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the gentleman speak for Maine?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I speak especially in regard to the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts——

Mr. NUTTING. Leave out New York, if you please.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I will leave out New York and take in those three States. Scarcely an ax is swung to-day in a New England forest that is not swung by a Canadian, hired through the winter to take the place of a Yankee axman.

Mr. MOFFITT. And the Canadian gets the same wages as the American lumberman.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I did not catch the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOFFITT].

Mr. McCORMICK. What inducement is there for the Canadian lumberman to cross the border and come upon our side unless the wages are higher?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Wages are higher on our side, but when he comes over in that way he lowers them.

Mr. McCORMICK. My time is limited, but I think I have answered the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I see it is. When the gentleman gets through I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. McCORMICK. You can do so.

Mr. PERKINS. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] in favor of legislation which would keep the Canadian from coming to this country?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have not said anything about that. I was only speaking of the advantage which certain lumber interests get under the existing tariff in procuring their labor from Canada.

Mr. McCORMICK. It so happens, Mr. Chairman, that in every State containing our valuable forests we find also great agricultural interests, and the products of the farm find ready consumers at remunerative prices. The value of this convenient home market furnished to the farmer by the great lumber manufactories throughout the country can not be estimated, but is well understood and fully appreciated by the farmers themselves.

The lumbering interests of the country are not local. Sugar, rice, and tobacco are profitably grown only in certain localities; and whilst I am in favor of protecting every American industry that would suffer by competition with foreign labor and foreign capital, the argument that it is a local interest, and that to protect it would be at the expense of other localities less favorably situated, would have much greater force if applied to sugar, rice, or tobacco than when applied to lumber.

The magnitude of this great industry was alluded to by Mr. J. A. Whittier, president of the Saginaw Board of Trade, in his testimony before the Tariff Commission in 1882 in the following language:

If we take in the whole lumber industry of the United States we shall find 90,000 men working in mills and 135,000 working in forests, with yearly wages of $80,000,000; capital invested in mills and apparatus, $180,000,000; a total yearly product of $230,000,000 in value; and the farmers in receipt of $30,000,000 yearly for food of men and animals.

The same intelligent witness, speaking of the advantages of the Canadian over the American lumberman, says:

A Canadian statement in 1872 puts the area of pine lands north of the St. Lawrence at 287,000 square miles. Not only does that government sell these land limits low, and run its own risk of fires, but it builds slides, booms, and bridges. A report of the minister of public works gives a list of seventy-one stations on the Ottawa River and its branches, where government has built 5,000 feet of canals, 7,000 feet of slides, 62,000 feet of booms, thousands of feet of bridges, houses for keepers, etc., spending large sums for the benefit of the lumbermen.

With such a competitor, so circumstanced, it is sought by the pending bill to put the lumberman of the United States into active competition.

I have listened to the debate upon this bill from its beginning until now, and whilst I have heard much talk about the beauties of free trade in general I have failed to hear any specific reason given why there should be "free trade" in lumber. Yet lumber is put upon the "free-list" by the first paragraph of the bill. I do not forget the allusion made to "lumber" a few days since by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUDD] when I say that no reasons have been given for admitting lumber free of duty. I take it for granted that inasmuch as the gentleman represents a lumber State upon this floor he was put forward by the committee as the man of all others to give a reason for their action. Here is the argument. I quote from the RECORD, page 3585:

Wisconsin, that I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, is or has been one of the three great lumber-producing States of the Union, namely, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota; and I say boldly and knowingly now, here in my place, that Wisconsin as a State, not the people thereof, has received not the slightest benefit from the tax on foreign lumber, but has always and from the first been subject to a direct loss to the amount of that tax at least, and more, from the consequences flowing therefrom.

I pause here in the quotation to say that if I fully understand the gentleman from Wisconsin he makes the important announcement that Wisconsin "as a State" has received "not the slightest benefit from the tax." As the "people thereof" are expressly excluded in the gentleman's statement we are obliged to understand that they have been benefited.

Mr. HUDD. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. What I said was, that neither my State nor the people thereof have been benefited.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have corrected the gentleman right here, because I believed there was something wrong. [Laughter.] If on the other hand he meant to say that neither the State nor its people were benefited by the duty on lumber then he is at issue with his free-trade friends on the other side of this Chamber, for they tell us in every variety of the Queen's English that the duty does benefit the people who are engaged in the business of manufacturing the protected comodity, but that to do so they "rob" all the people who are not so engaged.

But I proceed with the quotation:

Thirty-five years ago pine lands were sold, or rather given away, by the Government to a few men or corporations at a dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and stumpage could be purchased at fifty cents and a dollar per thousand, so that now almost the entire valuable pine lands are owned or controlled by less than forty men or corporations; stumpage and its equivalent acreage now held at $5 to $8 per thousand, or $75 per acre; the men who have labored, the workman in the woods and mills, and being not far from 30,000 in number annually, their wages not materially varied from an average of $1 per day during all that time, while lumber was free under the reciprocity treaty with Canada, while it bore, if it bore anything, the 20 per cent. ad valorem after the abrogation of the said treaty, and then in all the remaining years $2 impost per thousand. But the forty men have all grown rich, while a quarter of that number are millionaires to-day, the 20,000 laborers are still workingmen, just as poor as when they slung the first ax to fell the first tree for commerce, etc.

This, too, is somewhat involved, but I understand the gentleman to make the argument that because those who first bought or preempted these lands thirty-five years ago got them cheap, and because they have largely increased in value, the Government should get even with the present owners by reducing their value by taking off the duty. The same argument could with equal propriety be applied to those who were fortunate enough to become the purchasers of prairie lands in favored localities. The increase in value has been in many instances just as great, and the right thing for the Government to do according to this logic would be to make reprisals upon the present owners of such lands and recoup the damages suffered.

The reference made by the gentleman to the reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United State was unfortunate for his argument. Under that treaty the United States tried free trade in lumber for twelve years, namely, from 1854 to 1866, but that treaty was terminated by this Government for the reason that the price of all commodities was kept down by Canadian competition, and the sufferer was the laborer, for he was obliged to submit to a reduction in wages in order to make competition possible.

The allegation that the 20,000 men who began as laborers thirty-five years ago are still at work and "just as poor as when they slung the first ax," I will not attempt to answer—that has been done as with a scalpel by his colleague [Mr. GUENTHER]—but I respectfully refer it to the same 20,000 men, and will await their reply early next November.

Mr. Chairman, as I took occasion to say at the commencement of these remarks, it is not my purpose to thresh over the antagonistic doctrines of protection and free trade. If it is said that there is a rapidly growing surplus which endangers the finances of the country, my answer is that there is no surplus; it is a misnomer. A Government in debt more than $1,000,000,000 has no surplus, even though she has $100,000,000 in her Treasury. Apply the moneys on hand to the payment of her debts, and the money will be returned to the channels of trade. She has the legal right to so use the money and has had ever since the passage of the act of March 3, 1881, and this House has with great unanimity so declared at this session of Congress. If it be asserted that the people are oppressed with taxation, my answer is that Federal taxes are nowhere felt, and the cry that excessive burdens are being laid upon the citizen is an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the people, whilst the way is being paved for "free trade," "progressive free trade," or "a tariff for revenue only," all meaning in plain English one and the same thing.

I am a believer in protection, because I believe it to be for the best interests of the people of the United States, North, South, East, and West.

Is there anything in the conduct of England or the government of the Dominion of Canada in the past that can appeal successfully to a true American to furnish a market for their surplus commodities? Does the recent treatment of American fishermen by the Canadian Government have a tendency to foster and encourage reciprocal commercial relations between the two countries?

I am not enamored of England or English ideas, and I am not here to legislate for her. Even the Cobden Club, with its bright galaxy of American membership drawn from the leaders of the Democratic party in this country, has no attractions for me. It is no part of my duty as a Representative in the American Congress to surrender the limitless markets of this country, and then tell the laboring men of free America that as the price of such surrender they are to have the privilege of competing with the underfed, half-clothed, and pauperized laborers of England and Continental Europe, and the pagan hordes of Hindostan and China, for what the gentlemen upon the other side of this House, in honeyed phrase, are pleased to term "the markets of the world." [Applause.]

Mr. STOCKDALE obtained the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Now that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCORMICK] has concluded, I would like to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MILLS. As the hour when the committee must rise is so near at hand, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] would prefer to pause now and resume his remarks when the Committee of the Whole again takes up this subject, I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has thirteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I will yield for a motion that the committee rise, with the understanding that I shall be entitled to conclude my remarks when the Committee of the Whole resumes its session.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will not the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment? I desire to redeem a promise which I made upon the demand of several gentlemen.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman can do that on next Tuesday; the hour is late now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very well. I want it understood I am ready to redeem my word, and to produce the evidence which I promised.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the tariff bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

JOHN D. MUNNERLYN.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3480) for the relief of John D. Munnerlyn, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $1,496.21 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment of the salary of John D. Munnerlyn, of the county of Burke, State of Georgia, for services as assistant assessor of internal revenue of the United States from December, 1865, to September, 1866, and for which he has never received the pay allowed by law for such services.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BURROWS. Has the bill been reported from any committee?

Mr. BARNES. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims in four different Congresses. The fact is clearly established that this man rendered the service and has never received his pay.

Mr. BURROWS. I observe that this claim dates back to 1865–'66. Why has it not been paid before?

Mr. BARNES. The facts are clearly stated in the report of the Committee on Claims which accompanies this bill. The assessor of internal revenue for the third collection district of Georgia being unable to find an efficient assistant who could take the test oath, Mr. Munnerlyn was retained as an assistant assessor, under instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and being unable to take the test oath took a modified oath. An act allowing compensation to assistant assessors who could not take the test oath was passed July 5, 1870, but the evidence of the oath taken by Mr. Munnerlyn having been lost in its transmission to Washington, his name did not appear upon the records of the proper Department, and consequently his claim under that act was rejected.

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN D. THOMPSON.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Claims—the bill (H. R. 2746) for the relief of John D. Thompson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury of the United States, to pay to John D. Thompson, postmaster at Mount Vernon, Ohio, the sum of $730.71, said sum being the amount of postal and money order funds stolen from the safe in said Mount Vernon, Ohio, post-office, on the 29th of October, A. D. 1886, without the fault of said Thompson.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

An amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, to strike out, in line 7, the words "$730.71" and insert in lieu thereof "621.71," was read and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. MATSON. I move, by unanimous consent, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of John Fletcher and put it on its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. MATSON. That bill has been reported nine times, and has passed the Senate twice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the session closes at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.; and that hour having arrived, in the opinion of the Chair it is incompetent for the House to do any further business. Therefore the Chair now declares the House adjourned until Monday next, at 12 o'clock m.

GREENOUGH'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire as to the expediency of removing Greenough's statue of Washington and its pedestal from their present location east of the Capitol to some other place on the grounds, and the protection of said statue by a suitable canopy or otherwise; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VEST. In this connection I should like to call the attention of the Committee on the Library to several facts in relation to this statue. Its present location is well known to all of us; and as it stands now it is not only an impediment to carriages and other vehicles upon the eastern exposure of the Capitol, but the statue itself is being seriously injured. We have all heard a great deal of criticism about this statue of Greenough in connection with the drapery, but I have never heard the slightest criticism as to the work itself. As a full explanation of the whole matter, I ask the Secretary to read a brief communication from Mr. Spofford, the Librarian, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read, if there be no objection.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, Washington, May 7, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Greenough's statue of Washington of colossal size, in marble, was ordered by Congress in 1832, for the sum of $20,000. The artist said it "was designed for the interior of a building, and not for the open air. Moreover, I modeled that figure without reference to an exposure to rain or frost. I think it would perish in the open air."

This statue was at first placed in the Rotunda of the Capitol, costing $5,000 for its removal from the navy-yard to that locality. The main door had to be cut away to admit it. After a year it was found so out of proportion to its location that it was removed to the open air. Total cost of transportation from Italy and removals, $24,000.

The statue, like all sculpture in marble in our climate, has suffered injury from prolonged exposure to the weather, especially in the finer lines of the work. If it were placed under a suitable canopy, in some part of the eastern Capitol park, most of the serious objections which excite criticism in its present location would be obviated.

Very respectfully,

A. R. SPOFFORD, Librarian of Congress.

Hon. G. G. VEST, Senate.

Mr. VEST. I ask that the letter of Mr. Spofford be referred to the Committee on the Library with the resolution, if it shall be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the same.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The accompanying letter will also be referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMERICAN BARK CASHMERE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 95. It will take but a moment of time.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the Senate resume consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, the land-forfeiture bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. BLAIR. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further business under the order of morning business, in pursuance of the previous order of the Senate the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass a joint resolution sent to us by the House of Representatives, which only needs to be read to pass, and which is a mere act of courtesy to a foreign nation. It will take but a moment, and I ask for its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside to enable him to move the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 95) to enable the President of the United States to extend to certain inhabitants of Japan a suitable recognition of their humane treatment of the survivors of the crew of the American bark Cashmere. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I make no objection if it does not lead to discussion. If it should lead to discussion I must object.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no discussion about it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It grants authority to the President of the United States to extend to the inhabitants of the island of Tanegashima, Japan, a suitable recognition of their kind and humane treatment of the survivors of the crew of the American bark Cashmere, lost off that coast in the year 1885, and to convey to the Government and people of Japan an expression of the high appreciation in which the Government and people of the United States hold such humane services.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia, which was called up a few days ago and objected to. The objection having been removed I ask that the bill be considered now.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that bill being acted upon this morning. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is not now in his seat, and it is quite an important measure.

Mr. FARWELL. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that the Senator from Maryland has prepared an amendment, which I propose to offer, which removes entirely his objection. There is no objection now to the bill from any quarter that I know of. I have his consent to call up the bill this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. VANCE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1430 will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PALMER to the amendment of Mr. SPOONER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment the following:

And no sale or entries shall be hereby confirmed to the prejudice of any pre-emption or homestead claims now valid under existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, and which were existing on the 1st day of January, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I beg leave to submit a few remarks in defense of the homesteaders and settlers in the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan.

In the debate last Thursday the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] opposed my amendment on the ground that it in some way confirms homestead claims, or ratifies a decision made in favor of such claims by the Secretary of the Interior. But my amendment does nothing of the kind. It simply excepts from the confirmation of cash entries proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin cases where both parties have been in litigation before the Department for years, and in which the Secretary has decided in favor of the settlers. If the cash entrymen want relief let them get it in the courts. When a patent is issued the opposing party may file a bill in equity to maintain any rights he may have. The Senator's amendment proposes to interfere with pending litigation in the Department by confirming the claim of the defeated party. I propose to leave these parties just as they are.

I take it that the Senate would look with abhorrence upon any proposition to step in between litigants over property rights in any forum and make a new law to decide the contest. Yet this is precisely what the rejection of my amendment would mean. These people have been for years in contest with each other in the Land Department. The Secretary has decided in favor of one side. The Senator from Wisconsin would now overturn that decision by confirming the title of the losing party. Independent of my amendment that would be the effect of his amendment. By rejecting my amendment he would render nugatory the decision of the Secretary of the Interior. That is all there is in it. I am asking no confirmation in favor of the settlers. They have themselves never asked any such thing. All they ask is to be let alone and have the protection of the law. The decisions of the courts and the Department invited them to make their homes there and they do not invoke legislation to protect them. My amendment leaves the parties just as they are. It simply declares that the Senate will not interfere in private litigation, particularly to help the losing party; in other words, that it will not pass a retroactive law to protect defeated claimants as against homesteaders and settlers.

What was said in debate on Thursday by the Senator from Wisconsin was misleading, unintentionally no doubt, on this point. It was evidently so to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. The impression conveyed was that my amendment was in the nature of a confirmation of the homestead claims. It is nothing of the kind. It simply says the homestead claims shall not be confirmed to the cash entrymen against the decision of the courts and the Department.

I will read both my amendments, which are amendments to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. My amendments are these:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The second amendment reads thus:

And no sale or entries shall be hereby confirmed to the prejudice of any pre-emption or homestead claims now valid under existing decisions of the Secretary of the Interior, and which were existing on the 1st day of January, 1888.

The Senator from Wisconsin also said that my amendment prevented the confirmation of cash entries even where there were no conflicts against them. This also is a mistake. It is predicated entirely upon the existence of an adverse claim. It simply provides that no confirmation shall prejudice such an adverse claim, now valid under existing adjudications.

I have not, so far, been inclined to oppose the confirmation of cases where there are no conflicts; but before any confirmation is made the Senate ought to be fully advised of the situation. It is briefly stated:

1. The starting point is the undisputed fact that none of these lands, either odd or even sections, have ever been restored to market or re-offered at public sale since the joint resolution of 1862. This fact is undisputed, and was conceded by the Senator from Wisconsin on Thursday.

2. This condition of affairs removed them from the body of lands subject to private entry. They are not subject to private entry at all. This was the decision of the Supreme Court in Eldred vs. Sexton, 19 Wallace, 189, some fifteen years ago, a citation from which I send to the desk to have read. We might as well have the history of this litigation. I ask the Secretary to read the passages I have marked in brackets.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is a fundamental principle underlying the land system of this country that private entries are never permitted until after the lands have been exposed to public auction at the price for which they are afterwards subject to entry.

They are first surveyed, then a day is appointed for their sale by the President, which is to be kept open for two weeks. At this sale they are offered at a minimum price, and can not be sold for less, but may be sold for as much more as any one will give, and what remains unsold at the close of such sale is subject to entry at that price.

There is an obvious reason for requiring a public sale before leaving the lands open to private entry. It is to secure to all persons a fair and equal opportunity of purchasing them, and to obtain for the Government the benefit of competition in case the lands should be worth more than the price fixed by Congress.

* * * * * * *

Since that time the great body of the public domain has been brought into market, after proper notice, at this reduced price, and, unless Congress by special act ordered otherwise, private entries have never been allowed unless the land applied for had been previously offered at public sale to the highest bidder at the same price. This has been the established practice of the Land Office, sanctioned by the law officers of the Government, and recognized by this court as a leading feature in our system of land sales.

It is true the lands in question were once offered at public sale at $2.50 an acre, but the reason of the rule required that they should be again offered to the highest bidder, because their condition as to price had been changed, and there had been no opportunity for competition at the reduced price. Congress meant nothing more than to fix $1.25 as their minimum price, and to place them in the same category with other public lands not affected by land-grant legislation. When they were withdrawn from the operation of this legislation, and their exceptional status terminated, the general provisions of the land system attached to them, and they could not, therefore, be sold at private entry until all persons had the opportunity of bidding for them at public auction.

Mr. PALMER. 3. In violation of the law thus established cash entries were made upon these lands, both odd and even sections. The law was well known and when settlers began to penetrate that country conflicts naturally arose. Thus it happened that as early as October, 1882, a case was decided by the acting Secretary of the Interior, following that of the Supreme Court in Eldred vs. Sexton, holding that the cash entries were invalid and that these very lands were subject to pre-emption settlement. This was the case of Sipchen vs. Ross, 9 Copp's Land Owner, page 181.

I send to the desk the report, commencing at the right-hand bottom corner of page 19, reading that within brackets on that page and the next:

The Secretary read as follows:

[Acting Secretary Joslyn to Commissioner McFarland, October 30, 1881.]

It does not appear from the records of your office that since the joint resolution of 1862 (changing route of railroad) the land in question has been reoffered at public sale at the reduced rate of $1.25 per acre. It has therefore been unoffered land since that date, and hence, under the ruling of the Supreme Court in the case of Eldred vs. Sexton, 19 Wallace, 189 (from which I quote at length, because it so clearly settles the law of the present and like cases), the entry of Ross was unauthorized.

Like reasons apply to the case of Ross, and the tract not having been re-offered under its reduced price, his entry must be canceled.

Mr. PALMER. 4. Under these decisions, by the highest legal and executive branches of the Government, holding the lands to be open to homestead and pre-emption settlement, many settlers went in and made homes, and many contests arose and have been for years pending in the Land Department.

As to the even sections, it was finally held by Secretary Lamar that although the cash entries were illegal they might, in the absence of any specific requirement of the statute that the lands should be re-offered, be confirmed by the board of equitable adjudication. (Pecard vs. Camens et al., 4 L. D., 153.) The cash entries on even sections were held to be voidable only because no provision of the statute required a reoffering, although it was required by departmental regulations, and that jurisdiction of the board was not ousted except where there was a prior adverse claim.

Under this decision patents were issued to the cash entrymen; and the pre-emption claimants, instead of applying to Congress for relief, commenced suits in equity in the Federal courts; and two such cases are now pending and ready for hearing at Marquette—Weimar vs. Ross, Murphy vs. Ross.

5. As to the odd sections, those covered by the pending forfeiture bill, the case was different. The act of 1862 expressly required a re-offering, and upon the 6th day of January, 1888, Secretary Lamar in a test case held and decided that the statute as to odd sections expressly required a reoffering; that the cash entries were therefore void, were no appropriation of the land, and he admitted the claim of the contesting settlers. (Wakefield vs. Cutter et al.) The Secretary will please read the part within brackets in the matter I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

The odd-numbered sections along the old line of road had been selected by and certified to the State according to the terms of the grant. As to these lands the joint resolution provided that upon relinquishment being made by the State of all title and claim to such lands, the State would be entitled to equivalent lands along the new line, and then provided for the disposal of such lands as may be surrendered by the State, as follows:

"And it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to reoffer for public sale in the usual manner the lands embraced in the surrendered lists aforesaid, when duly filed in his office as herein directed."

The case of Pecard vs. Camens (4 L. D., 152) involved the question as to the right to locate and make private cash entry of the even sections within the limits of the old line of the Marquette and State Line Railroad after the passage of the joint resolution of July 5, 1862 (12 Stats., 620).

In that case it was held that where the even sections had been once offered, then increased in price and again offered, and while in that condition declared by Congress to be subject to sale at the first price, and private entries were allowed therefor without further offerings, such entries are not void but voidable for the want of a restoration notice, and may be confirmed by the board of equitable adjudication.

The entries of the even sections were held to be not void because those sections had been once offered at public auction at the minimum price, being the price at which they were actually purchased, and had been continuously in the market from the first offering.

* * * * * * *

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the odd sections having been once subject to private cash entry at the minimum price occupied the same status as the even sections after the restoration of said lands to the public domain under the joint resolution of July 5, 1862, and that the ruling in the case of Pecard vs. Camens as to the even sections applies to the odd sections as well.

It is true that the odd sections had been once offered at the minimum price, and were subject to private cash entry at that price up to the time of the withdrawal of said lands for the benefit of the railroad, but the Government subsequently divested itself of the title to said lands by certifying them to the State of Michigan for the benefit of the Marquette and State Line Railroad. When the Government was afterwards reinvested with the title to said lands it was under an act that directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to "reoffer for public sale in usual manner the lands embraced in the lists of the surrendered lands aforesaid."

When the Government certified these lands to the State of Michigan it parted with its right and title in them, and upon the restoration and certification of these lands to the United States by the State of Michigan the Government took them free from the conditions that had attached to them prior to the certification to the State, and hence they were lands that had never been offered at public sale under the present title of the Government.

* * * * * * *

Entries of the even sections were held to be voidable only for want of the restoration notice, a mere departmental regulation, and were held to be not void, because the condition-precedent to the right of private entry having been performed, the power of the officers of the land office to sell at private entry attached, and having once rightfully vested would continue unless Congress saw fit to fix some other condition by which the power would be divested.

As to the odd sections, Congress fixed a further condition upon the reacquisition of these lands by requiring them to be reoffered at public sale, and this reoffering at public auction was a condition-precedent to the rights of entry of said sections.

The ruling in the case of Pecard vs. Camens does not apply to the odd sections, but, on the contrary, the reason stated in said decision for sending the entries of the even sections to the board of equitable adjudication furnishes a sufficient reason for refusing the present application.

The applications of Cutter, Frank, and Laydon will be disposed of as decided by your decision of September 29, 1887, which is affirmed.

Mr. PALMER. Under this decision, and in execution thereof, the Commissioner of the General Land Office has allowed the claim of the settlers.

Other claims of like character are also now pending to be similarly disposed of.

6. The Senator from Wisconsin now desires to have these cash entries, thus decided to be void, and which he concedes to be void, confirmed by Congressional action. This, I insist, shall not be done in any case where there is a conflict with a settler whose claim is now valid under the decision of the Secretary.

I propose to apply the same rule to these rich and influential purchasers of odd sections that has of necessity been accepted by the settlers upon the even sections. When beaten in the Department they did no whining at the doors of Congress, but like men went to the courts for redress.

The cash entrymen on the odd sections who now happen to be beaten should be likewise left to such remedy as the law gives them. If they have rights the courts will protect them. If they have none Congress ought not now to give them any by new legislation.

7. Even where there are no conflicts the equitable rights of the cash entrymen are by no means clear.

It is certain that all entries on odd sections were made by the parties and allowed by the officers in direct violation of repeated orders of the Department.

Although this has been read hitherto by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], here it is in a consecutive form in the report made by Mr. Henley, from the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, March 5, 1884, and I send it to the desk and ask the Secretary to read the part between brackets.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Commissioner to register and receiver, July 5, 1865.]

"You will not forget that all odd-numbered sections in your district, north of township 40 and west of range 21 (including the lands in contest), were withdrawn from market by order of May 26, 1865, and hence not subject to entry, location, or claim until regularly restored to market."

[Commissioner to register and receiver, May 29, 1873.]

"It appears from your returns that you have already allowed a number of entries of these lands without authority from this office; these will be submitted to the board for equitable adjudication, but you will not permit any further entries until the date of restoration."

[Commissioner to register and receiver, March 1, 1879.]

"Under no circumstances will you permit any entries of any of these lands, or take any action further than herein directed, in relation thereto, until specially instructed by me."

[Commissioner to register and receiver, August 1, 1879.]

"In disregard of the above instructions, you continued to permit entries and locations to be made upon these lands, and now report them as being in conflict with tracts listed and held for restoration by my decision of 7th March last. As I am unable to account for your action in the premises, you will please report at once, giving in full the reasons for such seeming misconduct."

[Commissioner to register and receiver, October 12, 1880.]

"By said letter of 29th May, 1873, you were directed to 'permit no further entries until the date of restoration.' Your attention is invited to said letter, and you will promptly report by what authority you have allowed entries upon lands within the limits of the withdrawal made for said railroad."

No attention whatever was paid by the local officers to these repeated orders, who, as before stated, continued to dispose of these lands, and up to October 12, 1880, had permitted entries covering over 88,000 acres of land within the limits of the railroad grant alone.

During the argument of the matter before your committee it was asserted by counsel for homestead and pre-emption settlers that most of the applications to enter were filled out in the handwriting of the then register of the Marquette office, the officer to whom the various prohibitory orders were sent; that they were frequently made on top of subsisting pre-emption and homestead claims, and that the register who allowed the most of them is now a member of a "committee of land-owners," urging the passage of the confirmatory bill and signing circulars levying assessments to aid its passage, one of which was read to your committee. Some of these allegations seemed to be sustained by the proofs.

Your committee is unable to resist the conclusion, under all the facts of the case, that not only were these private entries invalid and illegal, but that certainly in some cases they must have been made fraudulently and by collusion with the officers of the local land office. They are accordingly of opinion that an act confirming them should not be passed.

3. SETTLERS' CLAIMS.

There also appeared before your committee another class of persons alleging rights in these lands, namely pre-emption and homestead settlers. They asked no remedial legislation. They rely upon the law as it stands to protect their rights, and simply desire to be left untrammeled to assert their claims in the Department and the courts. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in Eldred vs. Sexton, and subsequent action thereunder by the Interior Department, a large number of such settlers are alleged to have gone upon these lands and initiated claims. Several hundred of such claims are now pending in the General Land Office and the Interior Department, in various stages of adjudication, but their ultimate settlement is delayed and postponed by appeals to Congress on the part of the owners of the cash entries and canal selections, similar to that now under consideration. These petitioners use their applications to Congress to stop all adjudication in the Department.

We are of opinion that none of these private entries or canal selections should be confirmed, but that the whole matter should be entirely dismissed from Congress, and that the proper executive officers or courts having jurisdiction of these matters should proceed to dispose of them according to law.

We accordingly report back H. R. No. 180 amended to conform to these views, and recommend its passage.

Mr. PALMER. It is useless to attempt to avoid this fact by slurring at a majority report of the House committee. No one ever has denied or ever can deny the fact stated, namely, that the above are direct and positive orders from the Commissioner to the register and receiver prohibiting the sale of these odd sections. They were beyond all question sold in direct and known violation of these orders. Although there may have been some innocent purchasers, and probably were, I believe that the majority knew that they were gambling when they purchased these lands. All this was done after the removal of Edwards, the honest register, who refused to allow the illegal canal selections, and the appointment of Campbell, his successor. I send up to have read what there is marked on page 18. There is a natural sequence of the selections for the canal.

The Secretary read as follows:

This was accomplished by securing the removal of Edwards, the then register, who refused to correctly act as a tool of the company, and the appointment of Ambrose Campbell, who administered the office after his appointment entirely in their interest and in the interest of other corrupt combinations. John F. Driggs, then member of Congress from that district, was attempting to carry some 11,000 acres of land for his own benefit, without paying the Government for it. The lands had been marked to his name upon the plat-books. He was unable to raise the money, and made arrangements with the company by which the lands were to be marked off to them, and they were to carry them for the benefit of Driggs until such time as he could raise the requisite amount to complete the purchase.

Edwards refused to be a party to this arrangement. Driggs and Avery, president of the canal company, then conspired to secure his removal and the appointment of Campbell. This was accomplished. The canal company thereupon secured the approval of their illegal list; the 11,000 acres of land were marked up to the canal company, and were by them carried for Driggs for some three years—until 1871—when the money to complete their purchase was advanced by one Sage, to whom the certificates issued. Driggs realized some $40,000 out of the transaction, and the canal company secured a list of its illegal selections. The whole transaction, as above stated, is shown in the testimony (Runnels, 289 to 296; Frost, 310; Sage, 364, 365; Mullally, 315, 316, 365; Churchill, 307 to 309; Exhibit No. 26, page 419).

Mr. PALMER. To show how and under what circumstances some of these selections were made, I now present the testimony taken in the investigation reported in the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship Canal Company by the Committee on Public Lands in the Forty-eighth Congress. There is but very little of it, but it will give an insight into the way things were manipulated in that land office. There are four selections marked on the three pages and inclosed in brackets, which I ask the Secretary to read from the book I send up to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

By Mr. MONTGOMERY:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. In Marinette, Wis.
Q. Across the river from Menominee, in Michigan?
A. Yes.
Q. How many years have you lived there?
A. About twenty-five years.
Q. What has been your employment for the past fifteen years?
A. For fifteen years I have been engaged in the lumber business.

* * * * * * *

Q. During the summer or fall of 1873 did you have an application from any source to make a purchase of any of the lands involved in this matter? I refer to the application of Mr. Selden?
A. Yes.
Q. Within what grant were those lands?
A. As I understand, they were within the grant of the Ontonagon and Brulé River line.

* * * * * * *

By Mr. MONTGOMERY:

Q. What did Selden say to you?
A. I can not give the conversation. I can only give you what I remember—the substance of it.
Q. Give us the substance of it.
A. He said that there was an old lapsed railroad grant, and that the lands could be entered. He thought there would be some mineral in them, and that it would be good policy to enter them. I told him that I would look the thing up; that I had heard of this old grant, but knew nothing personally about it. I found out afterward——
Mr. PAYSON. Tell what Selden and you said.
The WITNESS. I did not want to invest in it.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you afterwards make a purchase within the same limits?
A. Yes.
Q. At what time, and through whose solicitation?
A. In April, 1870, through Mr. Selden's son.
Q. Did you have any talk with other parties living there, on the subject of those lands being reserved from the market?

* * * * * * *

A. Yes.
Q. With whom?
A. It was a subject of general conversation.
Q. State to the committee whether or not it was generally known there among men dealing in the lands that these lands were within what was termed a lapsed railroad grant?
A. I think it was at that time.
Q. Afterwards you say that in 1880 you did buy some of the lands?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the solicitation of young Mr. Selden?
A. Yes.
Q. You bought them knowing the situation, did you?
A. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you expect to hold that land?
A. I was willing to take my chances of it.
Q. If you lost it, you were willing to stand the loss?
A. Yes. I did not know anything about this railroad grant until 1878. I never entered any land in that vicinity until my attention was called to it.

Mr. PALMER. 11. If any of these private entries are to be confirmed, I insist that such confirmation should be clearly limited to cases where there is no conflict, and that Congress ought not, in any event, to attempt to undo and set aside the decision of the Department in any case therein pending.

There are undoubtedly some of these cash entries that should be confirmed. They were undoubtedly honestly made, and those that do not come in conflict with the settlers and homesteaders I am perfectly willing to have confirmed. Those that lost their lands will get their money back, and I should be willing to go as far as to pay them interest upon it. But to turn men out and off those lands who have gone there by the decision of the courts, and who had good reason to suppose that they had a right there, who have cleared up farms, I think would be an outrage unworthy not only of the American Senate, but even of a much less dignified body.

Now, to recapitulate, about twenty years ago, in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that railroad grants were not forfeited by the expiration of the time which the companies were given in which to build the roads. That was what first gave the animus and awakened the people up there to the condition of these lands on the Northern Peninsula.

Then in Eldred vs. Sexton, about fifteen years ago, it was decided that the lands were not subject to private entry until first offered at public sale, and even when once offered and then withdrawn from market were not again subject to private sale until another offering.

It was under this decision that a great influx of homesteaders went in upon that land. Then in the case in the Land Office of Sipchen vs. Ross in 1882, Secretary Teller decided that cash entries on these Michigan lands (it was an even section) were void under the doctrine of Eldred vs. Sexton, and were hence open to pre-emption and homestead settlers.

Then in case of Wakefield vs. Cutter, Secretary Lamar decided that cash entries on odd sections were absolutely void, because in the case of odd sections a reoffering was required by specific provision of the statute of 1862.

These poor men, these men seeking homes, have been invited on there by the decisions of the courts and the rulings of the Land Office. I think nothing should be done to militate against their interest. Where there is any conflict let it be fought out in the courts, and not have the Congress of the United States take sides.

I have just received a telegram of the following character, which will be very good reason for the course that I am now about to take, dated—

BEAR LAKE, Mich., 6th.

To THOMAS W. PALMER:

Don't exclude pre-emption and homesteads taken since January 1. Hundreds of homes have been made since.

GEO. W. HOPKINS.

You can see, Mr. President, the way these men have been led on to these lands by the decisions of the courts and the Land Office.

I now withdraw my second amendment and submit this:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry of lands heretofore settled upon and now claimed under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws, but in all such cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties respectively according to the provisions of existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not often ask the attention of the Senate, and I do not intend to occupy the time more than ten minutes. I should be glad, therefore, to have the attention of Senators.

I am not willing to allow the Senator from Michigan or any other Senator to go beyond me in protecting the interests of any honest man who in good faith under laws of the United States settled upon these lands. My amendment is intended, accepting as I did that which he proposed, to protect all such settlers; and I ask the Senators who are here to give attention to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan which I have accepted:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] does me the honor to listen. That amendment, I willingly submit to him or to any other good lawyer, protects clearly and unqualifiedly every pre-emption or homestead claim down to January 1, 1888, which was an honest claim. No man in the Senate, or out of the Senate, has a right to invoke the protection of the laws of the United States for claims which are not honest. Under that amendment it is utterly impossible that this confirmation can be held operative to prejudice the right of any bona fide homesteader or pre-emption claimant.

Now, when it is asked that Congress shall go beyond that, I beg leave to say to the Senator from Michigan, with all due respect to him, that the proposition is subject to the just suspicion that it is the purpose to ask Congress to legislate, not on broad principles which shall fairly take in and protect all who ought to be protected, but under some specious guise or disguise to legislate for particular cases, the merits of which the Senate does not understand.

The amendment which the Senator now sends to the desk in lieu of the one which we have been debating is objectionable in two respects. In the first place, it eliminates from the subject the element of good faith and proposes to confirm to all who have settled, no matter if they have settled for hire, or in pursuance of a conspiracy, or for any other reason not in good faith under the laws of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining homes.

It goes further than that. It asks that up to the passage of this act, if it shall be passed and become a law, all men who settle or squat upon these lands shall be treated as settlers in good faith. On the 1st day of January, 1888, this controversy was known to the people of that country to be existing. This bill was pending. The matter in dispute is not a new one; and it is not just to the cash entrymen who live in different States that men, knowing this was a subject of legislation, knowing the controversy that there was about it, should be permitted to go upon these lands even while this discussion goes on and insist that their claims shall be protected by act of Congress.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, for I understand it to be a fact, that there are equities involved in the amendment which I offered, which is confirmatory in its nature, that are just as sacred as can be the equities of any homesteaders.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] the other day read from a report made by Mr. Henley, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands of the other House. I want to read for the information of the Senate—and it will take but a moment—from a report made by Mr. PAYSON, also a member of that committee, signed by Mr. PAYSON, Mr. Van Eaton, Mr. Strait, Mr. Belford, of Colorado, and Mr. OATES, recommending relief to these cash entrymen.

I take it no one will question the general accuracy of Mr. PAYSON or his devotion to the interests of honest homestead settlers. There is no man in this country who has gone further or done more or spent more time than Mr. PAYSON in recovering from railroad companies lands granted but not earned. This report enables me to answer one or two questions put to me by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], which I was not at the time able to answer. Mr. PAYSON says:

Now, the parties entitled to relief may be classified as follows:

1. Those whose titles are endangered because the lands the Government sold them had not been reoffered at public sale after having been withdrawn for railroad purposes.

I do not care whether these entries are void or voidable. I plant myself on this broad proposition, that where citizens of the United States by an honest mistake, mutual as between them and the land officers of the Government, entered lands at the Government land offices which were held out to the public as open to entry, pay their money into the Treasury of the United States, receive the land officers' certificate, pay taxes for years upon the lands, mortgage them, sell them, and build upon them, no honest government can insist upon a mere technical defect in that title and afford to refuse them the protection of confirmation. I know of no different rule of morals or good faith or common honesty which is to govern the United States in its dealings with its citizens than that which prevails among honest citizens in their transactions with each other. Mr. PAYSON further says:

2. Those whose titles are endangered because the lands the Government sold them lay within the limits of the unforfeited Ontonagon and State Line grant.

Over twelve hundred citizens of the United States are interested in these titles. Of these 384 live in Michigan, 89 in Wisconsin, 37 in Illinois, 20 in Pennsylvania, 20 in New York, 17 in Ohio, 7 in Massachusetts, and 126 scattered through other States and Territories.

Twenty-one of the original purchasers are dead, and those who now claim protection are their widows and orphans.

It is certainly not a persuasive proposition to say that where these men entered lands at the Government land offices which were held by the Government agents open to entry, paid their money into the Treasury of the United States, received patents for the purchased lands, their widows and orphans, the purchases having been in good faith, shall not be protected. I do not ask that they even shall be protected against the claims of bona fide settlers, pre-emption claimants, and homesteaders inaugurated prior to January 1, 1888. I yield to all such claims. I would not vote for this confirmatory act if it did not protect the bona fide settlers; but I am not willing to go further than that, and I think the Senator from Michigan ought not to ask the Senate to go further than that.

Again I read from Mr. PAYSON'S report:

The claimants are neither all rich nor all poor. They represent all grades of wealth. There are over four hundred, each of whom owns 160 acres or less. Some own as low as 10 acres.

Most of the larger tracts claimed are owned by a number of persons, although they stand in the name of a single individual of a lumbering company. There are probably in all over 1,200 owners, including the villagers, at Stambaugh and Iron River.

The Land Department for a term of years treated the lands within these grants as "offered" public lands, and sold them exactly as it sold other public lands. According to the conditions of the granting act, the lands were to revert to the United States in 1866. All sales were made after that date. Most of the sales were made after the governors of Michigan had formally relinquished the grants in 1868 and 1870, and up to 1874.

I believe it was the general sentiment of the profession in the country up to 1874 that under these land grants, the time having expired with performance of the condition-subsequent, the title ipso facto reverted to the United States. I remember that the Attorney-General, Mr. Williams, delivered a very elaborate opinion, based upon what he thought were pertinent decisions, in which he declared that without any entry, legislative or otherwise, upon the part of the Government, the title reverted, and that was the judgment of the officers of the United States until the Supreme Court in 1874 decided otherwise in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman. Mr. PAYSON'S report continues:

The sales were made by the Government officers in good faith, and the purchases made in equally good faith.

There have been sold in the two grants more than 800,000 acres. Over a million of dollars have gone into the Treasury therefor.

And you hold that money to-day in the Treasury of the United States taken from the purchasers, and it has been used as the money of the Government all the years which have elapsed since these transactions occurred.

Patents have issued for upwards of 483,000 acres, and 337,000 acres are held on the ordinary certificates of entry.

What do Senators say to that? Patents for these lands have issued to the purchasers to the extent of 483,000 acres, and, as I said the other day, the purchasers during these years have paid taxes on them, mortgaged some of them, and they have been subject to sale on execution. They have been treated in all respects as the lands of purchasers. Any cloud upon such a title should be removed by Congress, if in its power.

There are one or two other facts which are pertinent and proper to be brought into the discussion. I ask the attention of Senators to this statement. Mr. PAYSON says—and this subject was pending before that committee for a long while and underwent an exhaustive investigation:

More than half of the present owners bought their lands at second and third hand on the faith of the Government patent or certificate. They paid an average price of nearly $8 per acre. Some of them paid as high as $100 per acre.

I suppose that was for lands in which mineral was discovered.

The aggregate paid by these second-hand owners is upwards of $1,283,000. Most of them reside in other States than Michigan, excepting the villagers, and during all these years have paid taxes to the State of Michigan.

There are two considerable villages within the limits of these grants, namely: Iron River and Stambaugh. The owner of every lot is in danger of losing his lands and improvements. These village owners are not included in the second-hand purchasers given above, nor do they form part of the 700 owners first mentioned.

In 1882 (we have no later information) 213 persons residing in Iron River owned 243 village lots. These had improvements consisting of houses, stores, banks, shops, etc., aggregating in value $309,800.

In Stambaugh at the same time there were 39 persons owning 44 lots with improvements, worth $41,800.

These villages have grown rapidly since, and now have churches, schoolhouses, and other public buildings.

Both villages are on even sections, within the six-mile limits, and the lands, not having been reoffered at public auction, fall under the decision of the General Land Office in Sipschen vs. Ross.

Without affirmative relief from Congress, these villagers are certain to be greatly distressed by harassing lawsuits, and will probably lose their lands and improvements.

Indeed at this time the section on which the village of Stambaugh is located is under nine different applications for entry (five of which are by scrip of some kind) by adverse parties, who are asserting the invalidity of the original title we are presenting, and one of which has been made by an enterprising real-estate dealer, since the committee declined to aid bona fide purchasers, as against mere technical defect in title, the curing of which defect could harm nobody.

It turns out here that for 480,000 acres the Government not only took the purchase-money from the purchasers, but the executive officers actually executed and delivered the patents, the highest evidence of title known to the law in this country.

I desire also to call to the attention of the Senate the following statement from the report:

The village of Iron River is also under four different adverse "filings," all made in 1882, the parties making them setting up, as we are advised, this same technical defect. Several of these "scrip filings," being on these villages, are represented by one of the attorneys who oppose validating any purchases before this committee. In like condition are several iron mines, developed at vast expense and now very valuable, "filed" upon by these sharks.

The relief proposed by the substitute has been invariably approved by the different Secretaries of the Interior since the question arose.

Secretary Schurz, in a letter to Hon. George L. Converse, chairman of the House Committee on the Public Lands, under date of January 7, 1881, declared that Congress should take prompt action for the protection of the best interests of all parties concerned in these old grants, and recommends a section to the then pending bill providing for the affirmation and protection of all private entries, homesteads, etc., "to the same extent and in the same manner as if no grant or reservation of said lands had ever been made."

Commissioner Williamson made a similar recommendation in a letter to the Secretary on the 5th January, 1881.

Secretary Teller, under date of February 13, 1884, in a letter to Mr. PAYSON for the use of the committee, as to these lands, after saying that the settlers should be protected, says, "I think all parties who made cash entries in good faith, having been misled by the officers of the local land offices, ought to be allowed to make title."

Now, my proposition is simply that the title of all these cash entrymen who shall be able first to satisfy the Secretary of the Interior that their entries were made without fraud and in the belief that they thereby acquired a valid title from the Government shall be confirmed except where that confirmation would conflict with the claim of some bona fide claimant under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States down to January 1, 1888.

If my friend from Michigan can think of stronger language for the protection of honest homestead or pre-emption claimants than he has embodied in the amendment which he offered, and which I accepted, I am quite willing to accept it. I think it covers the ground absolutely already, and it is not fair to ask the Senate of the United States to enact as a law any decision of the Secretary of the Interior. A number of them have been referred to. I doubt if there is a Senator on this floor who knows what they are.

I repeat this in regard to them. If they are right, if they are founded in a proper application of correct principles of law, the Senate may safely assume that they will stand. If they are not right in law, then any subsequent Secretary of the Interior whose duty it is made to investigate and pass upon them ought to be at liberty to declare the law as to them as he finds it to be.

There are some propositions that can not be made plainer by argument. One is that a purchaser in good faith from the United States ought to be protected in his title. The other is that a bona fide homesteader ought to be protected in his title under the circumstances here. This amendment, modified by the Senator from Michigan, covers both of these propositions. If the Senator [Mr. BLAIR] in charge of this bill to-day can make stronger in the interest of honest homestead claimants the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, I shall be willing to accept and adopt his suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR. I have the original amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan which I understand is now incorporated with the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, I accepted that.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator what he understands to be the full force and effect of the words in the fourth and fifth lines "arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States?" Would it suit him as well to have those words stricken from the amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. It would suit me as well to have those words stricken from the amendments, if it would serve the homestead settlers as well, but it would not.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator will permit me to answer. For many years the land office at Marquette evidently was run in the interest of men who had money, and homesteaders' applications were rejected, and on that very account that language is used. They had no rights that the officers felt bound to respect, and therefore it is that that phraseology is used, "arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States."

Mr. BLAIR. It struc's me that——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator allow me one word further? I do not think he need discuss the subject, as I have withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to say that if he will strike from that amendment, which is already incorporated, as I understand, in that of the Senator from Wisconsin, the word "arising," I think it would be much broader to effect this purpose.

Mr. PALMER. If it will make it broader I will cheerfully accept it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, without imputing fraud to any citizens of Michigan——

Mr. PALMER. I do not impute fraud to anybody.

Mr. SPOONER. Without assuming that the land officers of Michigan were bought up, or that any large number of gentlemen who had dealings with the land office were guilty of bribery or corruption, the situation is such that the homesteaders need that language. As I understand it, they have settled in some cases upon lands which were at the time confessedly not open to settlement, lands withdrawn for railroad purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. Would the Senator object to striking out the words "arising or?"

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to it, if the Senator from Michigan is willing, although I think the words are wisely used in that connection.

Mr. PALMER. Let me get the point.

Mr. SPOONER. I think these gentlemen——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of the last day's session, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. The forfeiture bill has been under discussion a long time and I am not aware that there is further controversy when these points shall be disposed of. Unless some Senators indicate a desire to discuss the bill further, I would ask that it be continued to a vote. I think we can soon dispose of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we can get a vote to-morrow. There are several amendments made as in Committee of the Whole since the last print.

Mr. PALMER. I think the bill should go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator in charge that there be a reprint of the bill as amended in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands such a reprint has been made.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not since the 17th of April. Amendments have been adopted since then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] asks that the land-forfeiture bill be reprinted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Including the amendments already adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection and that order will be made.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PALMER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. COKE. I offer amendments to the pending pleuro-pneumonia bill to be printed. I desire that the amendments be read in the first place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As amendments to the pending bill?

Mr. COKE. Yes; the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the substitute for Senate bill 2083 as follows:

In section 1, line 12, strike out "President of the United States" and insert "Commissioner of Agriculture;" in line 14, strike out "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" in line 15, before the word "persons," strike out "four" and insert "two;" in line 19, before the word "practical," strike out "two" and insert "one;" in the same line, after the word "practical," strike out "cattle-growers" and insert "cattle-grower;" in line 20, after the word "said," strike out "four" and insert "two."

In section 2, line 21, strike out "destined" and insert "held;" and in line 26, strike out "destined" and insert "held."

Mr. COKE. I also offer an additional amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 7 of the substitute:

Provided, That the so-called splenetic or Texas fever shall not be considered a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease or disease-condition within the meaning of this act as to cattle being transported by rail to market for slaughter, when the same are unloaded only to be fed or watered in lots on the way thereto.

UINTAH VALLEY INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside to take up House bill 7936, Calendar No. 1212, for the purpose of passing the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. If it will lead to no debate I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the regular order, the Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to by him may be considered by the Senate. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7936) to restore to the public domain a part of the Uintah Valley Indian reservation, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in section 2, line 3, after the word "Interior" to insert "and upon his order;" and in line 6, after the word "cash," to strike out "entries;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That said lands shall be disposed of at public or private sale in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and upon his order, in quantities not exceeding one-quarter of a section to any one purchaser—the non-mineral land for not less than $1.25 per acre, and not otherwise than for cash.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that there be a conference on the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, and Mr. BOWEN were appointed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit some reasons why I shall not support the bill under consideration. In the first place, I regard it as unwise and inexpedient to trammel any branch of the commerce of the country beyond what is actually necessary, or to place any considerable branch of commerce under the power and control of a few men. We have seen so much of the result of the formation of trusts and monopolies that it should warn us against putting large interests in the absolute control of a few persons wherever it can be avoided with safety to the public interests.

I object to this bill principally, however, because I regard it in many of its features as distinctly violative of the Constitution, and because it seems to me if we can pass a bill like this we may regard the Constitution as a dead letter, and we would be no longer under the influence of or governed by a written constitution. I will refer to the second section of this bill as the first point to which I wish to call attention:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the said board to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, or conditions likely to convey contagion, which for the purposes of this act shall be designated as "disease-conditions," and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country.

If the powers here conferred were limited to the Territories of the United States and to the District of Columbia, we should have authority to act as prescribed by this section; but this refers to an investigation of the condition of domestic animals in the United States. That means in every part of the United States. That means that the officers to be appointed under this act shall go into the States and take hold of mere local interests and investigate matters of a purely local character. It seems to me that this can not be done.

I know that the first section of the bill starts out with a provision—

That for the purpose of better promoting the exportation of cattle and the products of live-stock from the United States, and for the purpose of increasing, promoting, and facilitating the commerce in cattle and their products among the several States of this Union, and for the purpose of removing the obstructions to such commerce with foreign nations and among the States when occasioned by the existence of contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases among cattle and other live-stock, etc.

This I regard as a sort of preamble. Perhaps it is more in the nature of a stump speech inserted in the beginning of the bill. If the language of the bill, if the terms of the bill had been to carry out what I have just read, no constitutional objection could be made to it; but directly in the second section there is a total departure from the object laid down in this part of the first section, a total disregard of the distinction as to whether the action of the commissioners is to be in reference to stock held for transportation from State to State or to and from a foreign country or that which has merely a local relation.

Another clause of the second section is that the commissioners shall have power—to examine and report upon the best means of treating, transporting, and caring for animals and the best means for the suppression of the diseases and disease-conditions of live-stock.

If it had used the words "transporting from State to State or to and from foreign countries" it would be all right, but the general term "transporting" is used, which would mean transportation wholly within a State, over which Congress has no earthly power.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether he denies the power or the rightfulness or the propriety or the constitutionality of investigating with reference to diseases of animals within the States?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly I do.

Mr. BLAIR. He will justify me, then, in calling his attention to the fact that the existing law confers that power, so that we have that same power now; that the whole power of the Agricultural Department is one of investigation and the dissemination of knowledge.

Mr. REAGAN. I will state to the Senator that I was well aware that the act of 1884 contains such a provision as he refers to, and I did all I could to try to prevent its passage in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the Senator's objection is to the existing legislation, so far as what he is speaking of is concerned, as well as to the bill which is presented by the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not feel called upon to argue as to the propriety or impropriety of the existing law. That is not the question before the Senate. The bill that is before the Senate is all that is up now. The Senator from New Hampshire will remember that under the law of 1884, to which he refers, when these officers went into a State they had to have the consent of the State authorities.

Mr. BLAIR. No, not at all necessarily so far as the purposes of investigation were concerned or the obtaining of knowledge as to the condition of diseases. If there was an effort to lay the hand of power upon the animals, to actually invade or control any existing right of the owners, then the assent of the State authorities became necessary, but no one has ever questioned the power to exercise and do everything that has hitherto been done by the Department of Agriculture, or the Bureau of Education, or the census power of the Government. No one has ever objected to what has been done under these laws so far as I know until the Senator raises the question this morning.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps the Senator is right in limiting it. I would not say without looking at the statute what is the exact limitation upon the consent of the States, whether it is as to putting the hand of power upon domestic animals or to the mere investigation. But it is not important to the view I shall take now as to how that may be, and I did not mention the fact of the requirement of the States to give consent for the purpose of being understood as approving such an expression, for jurisdiction is not a question of consent, and no State can consent to the violation of the Constitution of the United States.

I regard the words in the act as it exists relative to the consent of the State, and in the bill before us where it calls for the consent of the State, as an attempt to acquire jurisdiction by consent of the State. A State can not consent to a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Another clause of the second section is:

And to cause investigation to be made as to the existence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, glanders in horses, swine plague, hog cholera, and other diseases or disease-conditions of live-stock.

There is no provision made, I believe, for slaughtering horses, hogs, and other live-stock except cattle, but I am not sure of that. This commission is to go about through the neighborhoods and investigate everybody's stock. If owners refuse to give their consent or obstruct the action of the commission in making the investigation, then they violate the provisions of the act and subject themselves to its penalties. It seems to me that you are extending the provisions of this act to so many things that it will enable this commission to materially obstruct the commerce and business of this country.

Another clause of the second section is:

The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person or by their duly authorized agents, any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country, or to or from any Territory of the United States, or to or from the District of Columbia, or which premises, places, stock-yards, cars, and vessels are accustomed to be used for the keeping or in respect of such animals so in course of or destined for such transportation as aforesaid, in or at which they have reason to believe, and do believe, there exists any of such diseases, or disease-conditions, or any infectious matter or thing injurious to such animals, and to make search, investigation, and inquiry in regard to the existence thereof.

This clause contains some things that the commission might do lawfully, but when it authorizes them to enter into any "place or places" it means that they may go into any city, any county, any neighborhood and make these investigations, and it shows that that was intended to be so, because those are coupled with the words which might have been lawfully employed of entering into "stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country," etc.

That they might do, but they must direct their investigations to the objects of interstate commerce or of foreign commerce. They can not direct their investigations to mere local commerce and take hold of the health of domestic animals in all of the States of this Union and take charge of all sorts of animals, as this bill provides for.

Mr. BLAIR. Does not the Senator understand that this language confines the powers to be exercised to such stock as is in course of or destined for interstate or foreign transportation? The language certainly has no reference to any action on the part of the board or these national agents except what is to be confined to animals in the course of or destined for interstate or foreign transportation; but it gives the right to seek those animals which the commission believe, or have reason to believe, to be diseased, if in the course of such transportation or destined for it, wherever they may be, but they must be in places where they are so destined and in the course of transportation. So it confers no right whatever to intermeddle with animals or do a thing with regard to any matter which is not in fact a part of interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will read the language carefully he will see that it explicitly so provides.

Mr. REAGAN. I am always inclined to allow interruptions, but they confuse what I have to say when they are too long. If the Senator will answer me when I get through I shall be obliged. But to show to the Senator that I am not mistaken in the object of this bill, I will read from the twelfth section:

SEC. 12. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States, the board shall cause to be made special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease of live-stock along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries.

That clearly points to going into States along the border lines; and the Senator, when coming to examine the language, will bear in mind that there are words here which will carry out the purpose he has in view, and there is other language broader than this which authorizes the commission, independently of transportation and independently of the question of interstate commerce, or commerce with foreign countries, to go into the States and neighborhoods and make such investigations as they choose as to the condition and diseases of live-stock; and that will appear more fully as I go on.

Mr. BLAIR. Just at this point I ask the Senator's attention to the section which he quotes, section 12, and if he will read it carefully, or even without much care, he will see that it is confined only to the purposes of the investigation, not to the interference with property or its control in any way. It only depends upon that undisputed right which has been exercised always as a part of the national authority to investigate.

Mr. REAGAN. That is exactly the point in controversy. I asserted that while it is to investigate diseases it is not in relation to the interstate transportation or foreign commerce.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator, then, is certainly in error in all he says in regard to a restriction on private rights in the second section, for that is a section, the portion which he quotes, which contemplates the investigation of disease, the putting down of disease, and the twelfth section, the language of which he quotes, on the other hand is confined wholly to the matter of investigation.

Mr. REAGAN. Now I must ask to be permitted to go through with what I wish to say, and to be answered hereafter. I should like to submit my remarks in some connected order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not misstate the language or objects of the bill if I can avoid it. My object is to get at its terms and show what its meaning is. Another clause in the second section is:

Upon the discovery of the existence of any of the said diseases, or disease-conditions, or any such infectious matter or thing, the said board is hereby authorized to give notice, by publication, of the existence of such disease, diseases, or disease-conditions, or such infectious matter or thing, and the locality thereof, in such newspapers as they may select, and to notify, in writing, the officials or agents of any railroad, steam-boat, or other transportation company, or any individual or firm engaged in transportation business, in or through such infected locality, of the facts so ascertained.

This clause, if it means anything, means that these persons may go into the States and make the investigations which are proposed, and the investigations are not expressly made with a view to the transportation of interstate-commerce. It should limit the power of the commission to that stock or property which is to be so transported, and should not undertake to condemn by wholesale the stock or property of a whole community. As will be seen, if unfortunately we should get a commission under this act which might be disposed to act improperly and subject themselves to improper influences—and it will be remembered that mighty influences are always exerted to control the cattle trade of this country, as was so eloquently stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] on Thursday last—if it be the purpose to limit this investigation to property which is to be transported from State to State, the bill should so state, and should not give a roving commission the general power to condemn all the stock in a given community; nor should it contain a power, as I think I shall show directly, which would enable this commission to put the ban upon the transportation of the stock of any given portion of the country to promote the transportation and sale and marketing of the stock of another portion of the country.

Said board is hereby authorized and required to establish and maintain such quarantine of animals so in the course of or destined for such transportation as aforesaid, and such premises, places, stock-yards, cars—

That clause may not be subject to the objection which I have raised; but I read further on—and also to cause the appraisal of any such animal or animals before described affected with, or that have been exposed to, any such disease or disease-conditions, and also to cause the same to be destroyed, except as hereinafter provided.

I shall call attention later on to that exercise of power.

They shall cause all such animals so about to be destroyed to be appraised by three competent and disinterested men under oath, at the value thereof at the time of the appraisement, and the amount of the appraisement shall be paid out of any money appropriated by Congress for the purposes of this act.

Remember, Mr. President, that the gentlemen who are to be appointed to this commission have no means of ascertaining the value prescribed by the act. They give no bond. They are left free to do whatever they please, whether arbitrarily or otherwise, and they are given, as it seems to me, most extraordinary powers.

In relation to one of the clauses of the second section, which I have read, I desire to call attention to the comments of Mr. Justice Story on the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

SEC. 1901. The next amendment is, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized."

It is said by the commentator:

SEC. 1902. This provision seems indispensable to the full enjoyment of the rights of personal security, personal liberty, and private property. It is little more than the affirmance of a great constitutional doctrine of the common law.

Here the commissioners are authorized to go into a community, seize property, condemn it, and destroy it. It is true, they are to have it appraised and compensation paid, but it does not matter what its value is. There is no such thing as a proceeding under the Constitution and laws.

In section 1902 the commentator further says:

A warrant, and the complaint on which the same is founded, to be legal, must not only state the name of the party, but also the time and place and nature of the offense with reasonable certainty.

Now, referring to the second section of the bill, the fifth amendment to the Constitution contains, among other things, this:

No person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The object of this section of the bill is to secure just compensation, but there is nothing in this to show that the purpose is to condemn it by due process of law. The seventh amendment is that—

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

In section 1768 the commentator says:

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of a trial by jury shall be preserved.

Further on in the same section, it is said:

It is a most important and valuable amendment, and places upon the high ground of constitutional right the inestimable privilege of a trial by jury in civil cases, a privilege scarcely inferior to that in criminal cases, which is conceded by all to be essential to political and civil liberty.

And in the next section it is said:

It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy.

Stock may be worth more than $20; it would be very rare that any stock would be killed that was not worth over $20; and yet the right to determine its value by a jury is not given. It is in the arbitrary power of the commission. It is a proceeding such as is indulged in under absolute governments. It is not such a proceeding as is known to our system of government, and upon this point I desire to make a general observation.

All this legislation which looks to breaking down the barriers of the Constitution and sending Federal officers into the States to interfere with local and domestic matters is at war with the whole theory of our Government. The theory of the monarchies of the world is that the Crown, by whatever name known, is the source of authority and the fountain of honor. The theory of our Government is that the people are the source of authority. The theory of the monarchial governments is that the people are incapable of self-government, and must be governed by a power superior to themselves.

The theory of our Government is that the people are capable of self-government, and that they delegate such of their power as pleases them to the Federal Government and delegate such of it as pleases them to the State government, and reserve certain powers or rights which they do not delegate to either State or Federal Government, and this reservation is made in virtue of their sovereign power, the Government-making power which they possess. It has been habitual for the last twenty years for Congress to assume that the people of the States are incapable of governing themselves; and it has often happened that laws have been passed which go upon the theory that the people of the States are not capable of self-government, and must be governed by a power superior to themselves and outside of themselves—that is, by Congress and by the Federal authorities.

Whenever we come to the conclusion that the people are no longer capable of self-government then we will have changed the character of our Government, and though we may call it a republic it becomes a despotism, and as much so as Rome was long after liberty was lost. Rome was a despotism, but still called a republic.

This is a principle that, it seems to me, can not be too often invoked and too carefully considered by those who enact the laws of Congress. We ought not to lose sight of the character of our Government. We ought not to lose sight of the sovereignty of the people, their capacity for self-government, and that capacity which qualifies them to legislate in the States upon all subjects of a merely local and domestic character. If we desire to preserve our Constitution and form of government and the liberties of the people, we can not too carefully keep the exercise of the powers of Congress within its delegated authority. If we overstep the bounds of the Constitution, if we usurp the rights of the States, if we trample upon the liberties of the people, we may do it in the name of patriotism, we may do it, as all liberty has been most generally lost, under some specious plea that the exercise of power was necessary for the public good.

This bill is one of the proposed measures that looks to the fact that the people of the States are not capable of managing their domestic affairs, are not capable of passing laws to secure the health and management of the stock within them, and it assumes that Congress must do what the people of the States are not capable of doing. I mean so much of this bill as relates to purely local investigation. Of course I do not mean those features of it which, if left by themselves, would relate to interstate and foreign commerce.

I will now call attention briefly to sections 3 and 4 of the bill. I will read a portion of section 3:

SEC. 3. That the said board is hereby authorized and required to make, and from time to time alter, and publish rules and regulations not inconsistent with law providing for and regulating the agencies, methods, and manner of conducting and making the investigations aforesaid regarding the existence of said contagious diseases or disease-conditions; for ascertaining, entering, and searching the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels, respectively, described in section 2 of this act, by ascertaining what animals are so diseased or have been exposed to any of such contagious diseases or disease-conditions.

Here you see they propose to make searches and seizures directly in the face of the amendment of the Constitution which I read, without affidavit, without lawful warrant, by men, as I said before, who are to be appointed under this act, if it should pass as it is, without limit to the tenure of office, with no bond to be given, but they are to go there in the face of the Constitution and search premises and seize property.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. There is a very serious objection to the clause giving authority to search which is not mentioned by the Senator. Persons are allowed to make the searches who are mere private parties, without any official authority whatever, and without any official character.

Mr. REAGAN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Senator to allow me to proceed.

Mr. BLAIR. You have the authority. It is the commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLAIR. Will not the Senator be so kind as to point out the words he refers to? That certainly must be a proper inquiry.

Mr. REAGAN. The language is—

For ascertaining, entering, and searching the premises, places, etc.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator tell me where he is reading?

Mr. REAGAN. I am reading from the top of the fifth page. It does not limit it to property to be transported, but the private property of any citizen may be seized under this provision; the premises of the citizen may be searched and his property seized.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Texas certainly can not be thus disingenuous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REAGAN. If for a question.

Mr. PALMER. I merely wanted to ask the Senator if he does not think the phrase "the investigations aforesaid" qualifies the character of the investigation. That relates to something that has gone before it, to the places which are destined for search.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us read it and see. I will read the whole of it:

SEC. 3. That the said board is hereby authorized and required to make, and from time to time alter, and publish rules and regulations not inconsistent with law providing for and regulating the agencies, methods, and manner of conducting and making the investigations aforesaid—

That is, the investigations provided for in section 2 that I have already commented upon—regarding the existence of said contagious diseases or disease-conditions; for ascertaining, entering, and searching the premises, places——

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will go on he will see that he is entirely wrong. Just read on.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will have full time to show whether I am or not.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator made——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will be kind enough to address the Chair. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REAGAN. I will read on, after the word "places:"

Stock-yards, cars, or vessels, respectively, described in section 2 of this act——

Mr. BLAIR. "Described in section 2 of this act."

Mr. REAGAN. Yes—

for ascertaining, entering, and searching the premises, places—

If the words "premises" and "places" had been left out the rest would have been lawful—stock-yards, cars, or vessels, respectively, described in section 2 of this act, for ascertaining what animals are so diseased or have been exposed to any of such contagious diseases or disease-conditions.

Then it goes on—I continue the reading:

All such rules and regulations, before they shall become operative, shall be approved by the President of the United States, and thereafter published in such manner as may be provided for in such regulations. Said board shall certify such rules and regulations as relate to the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases or conditions to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act.

This is to invite them, but there is nothing to prevent them from going on and executing it and enforcing it without their consent. This will be observed by the reading of the section beginning in line 24:

Whenever the governor or other officer of a State or Territory, duly authorized by law, shall signify the assent of said State or Territory to such rules and regulations, or their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease or disease-conditions.

I need not read the third section, however. It is the fourth and fifth sections I was intending to comment on. The fourth section provides:

That any person who shall knowingly and willfully refuse permission to the members of said board, or to either of them, or to any duly authorized agent of said board, to make, or who knowingly and willfully obstructs said board or any member thereof or any such agent, or either of them, in making all necessary examinations of or as respecting any such animal so described in section 2 of this act—

Limiting strictly the animal and the man within the State—and suspected or believed by said board or any member thereof or any such agent to be diseased, or to have been exposed as aforesaid, or in lawfully destroying the same, or who knowingly and willfully prevents or attempts to prevent said board or any member thereof or any such agent, or either of them, from entering upon any of the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels so described in section 2 of this act as aforesaid, where any of such diseases or disease-conditions are by said board or any member thereof or any such agent thereof suspected or believed to exist, or who knowingly and willfully violates, or so attempts to violate, any quarantine established by said board under the authority of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or by both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Then section 5 goes on to provide:

SEC. 5. That any person who being the owner of, or possessed of any interest in, or in possession of, any animal described in section 2 of this act affected with or which has been exposed to any of the diseases named in section 2 of this act, or any person who, as agent, common carrier, consignee, or otherwise, shall be charged with any duty in regard to any such animal so affected with or exposed to any of such diseases, or any officer or agent charged with any duties under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly make any false representations to any person lawfully acting under the authority of this act concerning the existence of any case of any such disease, or disease-conditions, or the fact of the exposure of any animal described in section 2 of this act, to any such disease, or concerning the existence of any such disease-conditions in the premises, places, stock-yards, cars, or vessels described in section 2 of this act, or the location of any such case of disease or disease-conditions, or who shall knowingly transport, cause to be transported, or sell for transportation, as described in section 2 of this act, any animal known to be affected with, or to have been exposed to, or which he has reason to believe is affected with, or has been exposed to, any of the diseases or disease-conditions described in section 2 of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer the penalties mentioned in section 4 of this act.

I have read these two sections, and will not now undertake to characterize the monstrous character of some of their provisions; but I read them for the purpose of calling attention to the proposition that if the agents of the Government to be appointed under this act shall go into a neighborhood in one of the States and attempt to search the premises of a citizen having stock, or attempt to seize the property of a citizen, or attempt to slaughter the property of a citizen, without a trial by due course of law, if the property is worth more than $20, the man doing so may be indicted under the State authority and punished by the State laws by whatever penalty is prescribed, and if he should set up this law as his defense, I ask Senators if there is a court of respectability, Federal or State, that would not discharge him under the provisions of the act, if he is merely resisting interference with the local rights of citizens?

Mr. COKE. If my colleague will permit me, I will state that I read in a newspaper a few days ago that a court in, I think, Kings County, New York, at all events a county on or near the Hudson River in the State of New York, discharged a gentleman who with his gun ordered off the people who went upon his premises to inspect his cattle. He was indicted and tried for the violence offered and the court discharged him.

Mr. REAGAN. I am obliged to my colleague for the suggestion. It is what I would have expected from any court, State or Federal, which respected the law and the Constitution. I ask if there is a single Senator who believes that either of those sections can be enforced in the courts of the country? If they can not be enforced, they are mere brutum fulmen; why put them on the statute-book?

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to make a remark?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I think the case to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] refers has occurred under the co-operative law of the State of New York. They are in co-operation, and under the present Bureau of Animal Industry with the existing law the officers have no power, any more than they have, ever to enter upon private premises. I think that the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is in error when he is suggesting that under this proposed law they may invade private premises. They can not do that without co-operation on the part of the State, and that is expressly stated.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator that the action I referred to as having taken place in New York occurred a very few days ago, and was under the present animal industry law, the pleuro-pneumonia law.

Mr. PALMER. That is a fact.

Mr. BLAIR. And under a State law.

Mr. COKE. The people who were run off from this farmer's premises by him with his gun were sent there under the law now on the statute-book, which is a much more moderate, conservative, and reasonable enactment than the one embraced in the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is the Senator able to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has the floor.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is the Senator able to state that the transaction to which he refers occurred within the limits of an interstate transportation line? Was it within the right of way, for instance, of an interstate route of transportation?

Mr. COKE. I am not able to state that.

Mr. PADDOCK. That was probably not the case.

Mr. REAGAN. As to that——

Mr. PADDOCK. Every description to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has referred in respect to premises and places, etc., relates back to the description in section 2, and that description confines investigations clearly and exactly to the limits of the right of way of the interstate railroad route over which this commerce passes, and the language used permits of no other construction.

Mr. REAGAN. I know the construction which the Senator gives it, but I have expressed a different view in relation to it, and Senators will determine for themselves what the meaning of this language is. The fact that the stock may be on or near a transportation route makes no earthly difference. The fact that it is in process of transportation is another question. I would go far enough to admit that if it was taken to the depot or station for transportation, if it was in process of transportation anywhere from State to State or to or from a foreign country, then the law might reach it; but we can not go into the State to control private property not in process of transportation. It makes no odds if it was within 3 feet of a railroad track, we can not go into a State and seize property not in process of transportation and condemn the property of a citizen under the authority of such a law—that is, we can not do so in conformity with the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to say that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] is wholly mistaken in supposing that the places and premises mentioned in this bill, on which and into which these parties may enter and make search, are confined to a railroad or to any distance from a railroad? On the contrary, the language is broad; it covers all places within the limits of the United States in which cattle of this sort are kept destined for transportation.

Mr. REAGAN. That is the view I have of it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to read the clause in section 2 to which the Senator refers, if he will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To which Senator does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BLAIR. I only wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. REAGAN. I will yield to either Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to read——

Mr. GEORGE. What page are you reading from?

Mr. PADDOCK. Page 4, line 41.

"So accustomed to be used" in transporting this kind of cattle from one State through another State into other States beyond.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will find——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Texas just allow me one minute?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Nebraska is wholly mistaken as to the point in dispute. He refers to that part of the bill and that part only which authorizes the establishment of a quarantine. I admit that under the bill only the places he mentions can be quarantined, but if he will turn——

Mr. PADDOCK. The description is all through section 2 exactly the same.

Mr. GEORGE. But if he will turn to page 3, the point on which the Senator from Texas was animadverting with reference to search and examination, he will find this language——

Mr. PADDOCK. In what line?

Mr. GEORGE. In line 17.

The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person or by their duly authorized agents, any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation.

Not only in the course of transportation, but which may be "destined for transportation."

Mr. PADDOCK. Go on and read the whole provision.

Mr. GEORGE—

Or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country, or to or from any Territory of the United States, or to or from the District of Columbia, or which premises, places, stock-yards, cars, and vessels are accustomed to be used for the keeping or in respect of such animals so in course of—

That would apply to stock-yards—

Or destined for such transportation, as aforesaid.

I will show to the Senator when I have time that the word "destined" is a very broad word, and includes every place in which animals are kept which the owner may have any intention to ship to another State or Territory.

Mr. PADDOCK. They are animals destined for transportation, but still they are animals which must be found in these places which are accustomed to be used for purposes of transportation.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator is through I will call attention to the very opening clause in section 2:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the said board to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States—

That does not mean subject to transportation or anything about it—

their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them, or conditions likely to convey contagion, which for the purposes of this act shall be designated as "disease-conditions," and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country.

That is a very broad proposition. That is an independent clause of this second section, and the first one, and authorizes the commission to investigate the subjects named everywhere without reference to the question as to whether the animals are destined for commerce or not.

But, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I expected to do. I was partly induced to oppose the passage of this bill because of the receipt of a number of communications, resolutions, and letters, and because of the great number of memorials that have been presented to the Senate remonstrating against the passage of what is called the Palmer bill. I shall not attempt to read these letters, though there have been many letters read, nor will I read the resolutions coming from the cattle-growing associations, but I will simply refer to them.

At the twelfth annual meeting of the Northwest Texas Cattle Raisers' Association on the 13th of March, 1888, which met at Gainesville, Tex., being a large association of men engaged in stock-raising, they protested against the passage of the Palmer bill.

The Pecos Valley Stock Association, which met at Pecos City, Tex., March 15, 1888, protested against the passage of the Palmer bill, and the secretary of the association, in writing to me, states that that association alone represents 600,000 head of cattle.

The executive committee of the Texas Live Stock Association, March 23, 1888, protest against the passage of the Palmer bill.

The Cattle and Horse Growers' Association of New Mexico, April 7, 1888, protest against the passage of that bill; and at the annual meeting of the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association of the United States, which met at Kansas City, Mo., in November last, they favored a "retention of the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized."

Senators will remember the great number of memorials that have been received from cattle-growing associations everywhere remonstrating against the passage of the bill, and practically for the continuance of the present law and organization. The papers that have come to us in substance declare their fears that the object of this movement is to place the cattle interests of this country under the control of a few men, such as have been controlling the cattle markets in Chicago for a good while past, such as were referred to by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] the other day so eloquently, such as will by the power which they may exercise enable their friends in the control of the cattle combination to reduce the price of cattle where they are in the hands of the men who raise them and pocket the millions lost by that reduction themselves, and reduce the price of beef where it is to be sold to feed the people of the East. The fear is that the purpose of this is to put this interest under the control of men who will reduce the value of live-stock to the people of the West, where cattle are mostly raised, and increase the cost of beef to the people of the East who are to be fed by those cattle, and pocket the millions they may filch from both the producers and the consumers of beef.

How much there is in this I do not pretend on personal knowledge to know. We all know, however, what has been done in the past by the association that has controlled the beef interest in Chicago. We may anticipate what may hereafter come, and it is manifest from the resolutions of these cattle associations that they have confidence in the integrity, in the fairness and justice of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and they believe he will deal fairly with all the interests of the country without being used for the purpose of sacrificing the interest of cattle-growers and those who consume cattle products.

As I said in my opening remarks, it has seemed to me that it is dangerous always, when it can be avoided, to place such great interests under the control of a few men; and in view of the combinations and pools, the trusts, the various sorts of organizations that monopolize branches of business, are we not warned continually to keep commerce as free as possible, and to keep all branches of commerce out of the control of small numbers of individuals?

It may be said in answer that we already have a law which enables the Commissioner of Agriculture with those of his appointment to control this subject. So, in my judgment, unfortunately we have; but while we have, and while I think the existence of that law unfortunate, the cattle-growers and beef consumers of this country have confidence in the Commissioner of Agriculture, and they look with fear to the creation of a commission which they assign reasons for believing is intended to sacrifice the interest of both the producers and the consumers of beef.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] told us of the great extent of this interest. The resolutions to which I have referred were passed by associations that own millions of cattle, and supply a great part of the beef that goes into the markets of the country.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REAGAN. I am about through with what I have to say.

Mr. PADDOCK. But just at this point I wish to say that I think the remonstrances to which the Senator refers were addressed to the original Palmer bill. I know this was the case in my own State and in other parts of the West. That bill provided for the creation of an independent commission, a commission entirely outside of the jurisdiction and control of the Agricultural Department. It might be located at Chicago. That undoubtedly was the intention. It was assumed on the part of the committee that the commission would have its headquarters in the interior somewhere, probably in Chicago. The members of the committee who reported this bill generally were opposed to that system, that plan, that method, that scheme; and so the bill was reported providing for a commission which should be in the Agricultural Department and under the Commissioner of Agriculture, with the Commissioner of Agriculture himself chairman of the commission, absolutely controlling the whole plan, and scheme, and operation of the board. As against that plan, that method, which is provided for in the bill as it now stands before the Senate, there has been no remonstrance, in my judgment, from any part of the Union.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that I can point to them, but there is one set of resolutions here that speak of the Palmer bill as amended and reamended, and they still protest against it. I think the object of those who have amended the bill has been to obviate, at least to some extent, the objections which have been urged to it, but it is still open to the main objections to which I have called attention. It is open to the objection of going into the States and making investigations into the interests and business of private persons, seizing their property without warrant and without authority of law, condemning it to destruction without due process of law, in plain and palpable violation of the Constitution; and with the fourth and fifth sections standing in the bill, I venture to say there is not a lawyer in the Senate who will hold that it could be enforced in any court in the country.

I shall not trespass further on the time of the Senate, but yield the floor.

Mr. COKE obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Texas allow me a moment?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The issue between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself dates from the statement I made in interrupting the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in relation to the character of this bill. I stated that the bill authorized private persons, clothed with no official character, to enter upon the premises mentioned in the bill and make search. The Senator from New Hampshire disputed that proposition. Now, I will read from the bill in order to show that I am right and he is wrong.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator state from what part of the bill he proposes to read?

Mr. GEORGE. I will read from page 3, beginning in line 17:

The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person—

That is, by the personal entrance of a member of the board or of all the members of the board—or by their duly authorized agents.

It is clear that the entry may be made by the duly authorized agents of the board. If I make out that the duly authorized agents of the board are not officers I maintain my part of what is in dispute between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself.

They are not officers because they are not sworn. There is no provision for them to act under oath; and the Constitution of the United States requires that all officers of the United States shall be sworn. They are not officers because by section 11 they are not appointed by any authority recognized by the Constitution of the United States as competent to appoint officers. The Constitution is very simple upon that point; all officers of the United States must be appointed either by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or, if Congress should so permit, the appointment of inferior officers may be vested in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

There are but three agencies under our system which can make an officer of the United States. One is the President, another is the head of a Department, and the third is a court of law. These agents are nowhere designated in the bill as officers. Section 11 provides:

That the said board shall have power, and are hereby authorized, to employ—skilled veterinarians, and such other agents and employés as they may deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

The persons thus employed are mere agents of the board, clothed with no official character whatever, acting under no oath, giving no bond, and utterly irresponsible as officials. That is all I desire to say on that point.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose he will yield to me to make a suggestion just here.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] it seems to me, is supertechnical. I was aware of his great ability for keenness as a lawyer, but I must say that so far as I have read or heard, either as matter of fact in the text-books, or the traditions or the reminiscences of the special pleaders of the old time, I have never heard anything in the performances of Chillingworth or any of them that equals the hair-splitting which the Senator from Mississippi has exhibited on the floor of the Senate to-day. But with it all, I am of the impression that he has failed even upon this supertechnicality of his. He is wrong even under the perhaps loosely drawn provisions of the bill. What he said was that the bill authorizes a private person to enter upon the premises described in the bill—that is, premises dedicated to interstate commerce—and to seize and destroy the property of private citizens. He said that the bill authorized that to be done, and he reads in support of his propositions these words, and they are all that he can read in that direction:

The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person—

He says that is well enough, because the board is duly authorized to the extent of being made up of sworn officials, but he says that the administration of the oath is indispensable to the existence of the person who may do this as an official, and he quotes the Constitution, etc. Very well. It is right so far. Now come the words which he says sustain his position—

Or by their duly authorized agents.

Their duly authorized agents for what? The bill proceeds:

Their duly authorized agents, any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country.

I ask the Senator from Mississippi if this gives authority to anybody but duly authorized agents to enter upon the premises and do this work?

Mr. GEORGE. I admit that.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; then if in order that they be duly authorized to perform this work an oath is necessary to due authorization, the bill requires that they shall be sworn. Is not that so? If in order to be duly authorized they must be sworn, does not the language of the bill cover the Senator's position; for if these be persons not duly authorized to do these acts they are not persons included in the eleventh section, and if the obligation of an oath be necessary in order that they may be duly authorized to perform these acts, then the bill requires the administration of the oath. If they have no such agents duly authorized, then they have no agents who have a right under the bill to enter the premises and destroy animals, and they must go in person, they being alone duly authorized or having the official oath administered to them.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to modify the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir; for a moment.

Mr. GEORGE. The point between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself is a very simple one. The board are authorized to employ agents. When they employ agents they are the duly authorized agents of the board. I make no point and made no point upon the authority of the board to employ agents duly authorized to execute whatever the board might lawfully authorize them to do. The point I made was that these persons were mere agents of the board, clothed with no official authority, and being thus private persons, with no official character, they were authorized by the section which I read to enter upon the premises and make search; and that remains true, because, for the reasons I have stated, if they were sworn it would make no difference, as they would be deficient at the very inception of their authority. They must receive their authority in order to be officers, in order to be entitled to be sworn as officers, from either the President of the United States, the courts of law, or the heads of Departments.

Mr. BLAIR. Then it would follow from what the Senator says that the agents whose appointment is provided for in section 11 could not be duly authorized to perform the acts specified in section 2; and unless they are duly authorized they are certainly not to perform the acts, for the section does not undertake to authorize any but those who have the legal power to enter upon the premises and destroy this property.

Mr. COKE. I understand the Senator from Missouri desires to modify his amendment.

Mr. VEST. I ask leave to modify the amendment which I offered the other day to the second section of the bill. I ask leave to modify the last portion of it, so as to read:

Provided, further, That said board, its agents and servants, shall have no authority to exercise any of the powers hereby granted within the limits of any State, except in the stock-yards, cars, and vessels hereinbefore specified, without first obtaining the consent and co-operation of the executive authority of said State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to modify the amendment so as to make it read:

Provided, That the owner of such cattle or person having charge of the same shall have reasonable notice of the time and place where and when the appraisement will be made, and shall be permitted to make proof as to the value of such cattle: And provided further, That said board, its agents and servants, shall have no authority to exercise any of the powers hereby granted within the limits of any State, except in the stock-yards, cars, and vessels hereinbefore specified, without first obtaining the consent and co-operation of the executive authority of said State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PALMER. I understand that it is not under discussion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending amendment.

Mr. VEST. It is the pending amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will not qualify that a little further, so as to make it follow the phraseology of the bill in section 2:

Any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country.

I ask the Senator to qualify it so as to make it consistent with the bill. Has the Senator from Missouri any objection to that modification?

Mr. VEST. That is the language of the bill as it now reads:

The said board is hereby authorized to enter, either in person or by their duly authorized agents, any premises or places, including stock-yards, cars, and vessels, on or in which are any animals in course of or destined for transportation.

The very object of my amendment is to get rid of the language "premises or places" in which are these cattle destined for transportation. That might be 50 miles off from an interstate railroad.

Mr. COKE. I have not much to say, but I prefer to go on now with what I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. COKE. We have a bill before us, Mr. President, "to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes." We have on our statute-book, passed in 1884, a law under the same title almost verbatim. In determining whether it is expedient to pass another law upon this subject it is legitimate to inquire into the operation of the already existing law. So far as the operation of that law is concerned, I refer to what is said of it by the Commissioner of Agriculture, the officer who is charged with the execution and enforcement of it, the head of the bureau to which the law pertains, and who is held responsible for its enforcement.

Mr. Colman, in a speech made by him before the National Cattle Growers' Association (which I happen to have here, having mislaid his report, but which is identical with his report on this subject, and I read from it to show the operation of the law we now have on the statute-book) says:

Immediately after the passage of this act—

That is, the act of 1884—

and in consultation with the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, I prepared rules and regulations for the suppression of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, in accordance with section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1884; and these rules and regulations, by virtue of the authority contained in that section, became of equal force as if made by Congress itself. These rules I certified to the governors of all the States and Territories, and asked their co-operation in enforcing them. The governors of thirty-one States and Territories accepted these rules and regulations, and promised the assistance of the public officers of their respective States and Territories to secure their enforcement.

Thirty-one of the States and Territories have accepted the provisions of the law now on the statute-book and are assisting in its enforcement. The Commissioner proceeds:

I will now tell you what work has actually been done toward suppressing the disease.

That is, pleuro-pneumonia.

I placed in quarantine Cook County, Illinois, on the 24th day of May, 1887. On the same day I placed in quarantine the counties of Baltimore, Howard, Carroll, and Prince George's, in the State of Maryland, and the counties of New York, Westchester, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, and Richmond, in the State of New York. As Cook County, Illinois, was the point of greatest danger to the cattle industry, I placed in charge of the work there Professor James Law, professor of veterinary medicine in Cornell University and State veterinarian of the State of New York. In Maryland the work was in charge of Dr. Wray, and in New York in charge of Drs. McLean and Bell.

Again he says:

As a result of this work, carefully, thoroughly, and systematically performed, I am able to-day to state to you that pleuro-pneumonia has been successfully stamped out of Cook County, Illinois, and there is no longer any danger to be feared from that locality. The quarantine will be removed about the 1st of December, and the thanks of the cattle-men of the country are due to Dr. Salmon, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry; to Professor Law, and to the State board of Illinois for this successful termination of their work in Chicago.

Again he says:

In Maryland to-day we have the disease under control. The same system of quarantine that was enforced in Chicago is being established in Baltimore. Professor Law is at present reorganizing the work in that city, and it will be done as thoroughly as is possible. As the disease exists there to a greater extent than it did in Chicago, and as the contagion is, as I might say, "rooted in the soil," it will take a much longer time to effectually stamp it out.

I call the attention of Senators to what he says here:

I have thus, gentlemen, briefly sketched for you the work of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the year 1887. I might summarize it by saying that pleuro-pneumonia has been stamped out of Chicago, Ill., out of the counties of Delaware and Washington, State of New York, and the counties of Howard, Carroll, and Prince George's, in Maryland; and that it is under control in Baltimore, Md., and in the remaining infected districts in the State of New York.

The bureau at present has all the authority and law necessary for it to successfully handle the disease in the States where it exists, and the most important thing that remains to be done in the way of legislation is to obtain "the sinews of war" for next year in the shape of a sufficient appropriation that may be used for the same purposes as that given for the current year.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. He has been reading from a letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. COKE. I have been reading from a speech of the Commissioner of Agriculture made before the National Cattle-Growers' Association at Kansas City, Mo., in November, 1887, and it is identical with his report. I happen to have the speech here and not the report.

Mr. BLAIR. It is just as well; but the Senator perhaps ought to be informed that since that speech, and since the annual report, the Commissioner has testified before the committee which reported this bill that the necessary power he alludes to comes by virtue of the assent of the State authorities, and at any time that that assent might be withdrawn he would be left paralyzed and without power.

Mr. COKE. But he already has the assent of thirty-one States and Territories——

Mr. BLAIR. But it is State power and not United States power.

Mr. COKE. And the assent is still coming in from the States which have not already assented.

Mr. BLAIR. Still it is a State law, not a United States law.

Mr. COKE. It does not make any difference under what power it is done, so that pleuro-pneumonia is being stamped out and the power for that purpose is ample.

Mr. BLAIR. Ah, but it makes a difference whether a United States officer states to us that he has the power, leaving us to infer that it is by virtue of his being a United States officer, or whether he testifies that the power he has comes from the State, and he is a State officer to the extent that the power is exercised by him.

Mr. COKE. This United States officer states distinctly and squarely that the bureau has at present all the authority and law necessary for it to successfully handle the disease wherever it exists, and the most important thing that remains to be done in the way of legislation is to obtain the sinews of war in the shape of a proper appropriation this year. That is the language of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. BLAIR. It was his language last November.

Mr. COKE. That is the language of the officer responsible for the enforcement and execution of the law, the man upon whom the blame must fall if the law is not enforced. He says, "I have all the authority I want; I do not want any more; all I want is the necessary amount of money."

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator——

Mr. COKE. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not say he has not the power. The Senator will permit——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLAIR. I call attention to the fact that he is a United States officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood the Senator from Texas to assent to an interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. COKE. Very well; let the Senator go on, if he will be brief.

Mr. BLAIR. I make no assertion. I only call attention to the fact, not that he has not the power, but to the fact that since he uttered those words he has testified that the power he exercises comes from the State itself, and he has no United States power at all.

Mr. COKE. But he has got the power; I do not care where it comes from. Even if it does come from the State, he has it.

Mr. BLAIR. Precisely; but——

Mr. COKE. The States have not withdrawn it; it is sufficient; and under it he has extirpated this dreaded disease in three-fourths of the localities where it was found when he commenced the work of stamping it out; and he is still going on successfully with the work.

Mr. BLAIR. He wants more money.

Mr. COKE. He wants more money; of course he does. He can not do the work without money, but with the money he can do it, and he will do it. He wants money and not power or additional authority.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator from Texas where the Commissioner gets his power, if he knows? I do not ask him by way of entrapping him at all, but I ask him to explain it, if he knows.

Mr. COKE. Where does the Commissioner get the power? He gets it from Congress and from the resolutions and acts of thirty-one States and Territories that are co-operating with him.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator will permit me to say that I think he gets it from Congressional legislation in an appropriation act; at least, so he contends. I read from the appropriation act of 1887:

Salaries and expenses Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, $500,000; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia from one State into another, $100,000 of this sum or so much thereof as may be necessary to be immediately available.

Now, the object of this bill, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. COKE. I have heard the Senator repeatedly on this point. I do not wish to yield further.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator let me quote the Commissioner of Agriculture?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PALMER. I read from his statement before the committee. He says:

As the power to do this work now being done by the Bureau of Animal Industry comes in a large measure from the appropriation act of March 3, 1887, it would be advisable that the organic act of the bureau should be so amended as to include this authority and thus make it permanent, and not dependent on temporary legislation from year to year. I would suggest, therefore, that certain amendments be made to the act of May 29, 1884.

Those amendments are incorporated in this bill; I do not know how fully, but I think the bill is in the line of the Commissioner's desire and his statement before the committee, only that he objects to the commission feature.

Mr. COKE. I have talked with the Commissioner; I have read his report, and I have here what is exactly the equal of his report, almost identical with his report, his speech, in which he uses the language I have read to the Senate. He is satisfied with the law as it now stands. Of course he would expect the appropriation to be accompanied with the same statement of authority given him in the last appropriation act. With that he is satisfied. He is opposed to this bill. He is utterly opposed to it. He believes that the bill ought not to pass. It is at war with his report; it is at war with his speech at the National Cattle-Growers' Association; it is at war with everything he states about the operation of the existing law. He does not desire its passage; and certainly we ought to give credence to a man who has been placed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, at the head of that great Department. If we are to believe him he is doing well—well enough. It is not the want of power, it is not the want of authority, it is simply the want of money that makes him come before Congress now. He wants an appropriation to carry out and enable him to execute the power that he has.

Such, Mr. President, is the law we have. When we come to discuss the propriety and expediency of passing a law, we ought to ascertain first what the law is now, in order to see what sort of addition or amendment is needed to it, and if a new law is required what evils it is to remedy. When we come to inquire into the law now on the statute-book, we have the highest authority of the Government for saying that it subserves all the purposes for which such a law is sought to be passed now.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COKE. I had rather not.

Mr. PADDOCK. Just half a moment.

Mr. COKE. I had rather not.

Mr. PADDOCK. Under the most potential——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. PADDOCK. I beg pardon.

Mr. COKE. Now, Mr. President, so much for the law as it stands. We ought not to pass another bill on the subject at all, because the highest authority of the Government charged with the enforcement of existing laws tells us that a new law is unnecessary. But taking the new bill as it stands before the Senate, my colleague [Mr. REAGAN] has discussed its provisions quite fully, and I shall not repeat what he has said. I have offered an amendment to it, in the twelfth line of section 1, to strike out "President of the United States" and insert "Commissioner of Agriculture." The purpose of that amendment is simply this, that the bill as it stands now institutes a commission. The amendment I propose to it does away with the commission feature. The substitute as it stands unamended makes it the duty of the President—

Immediately after the passage of this act, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, four persons, who, together with the Commissioner of Agriculture (who shall be ex officio chairman), shall constitute a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, to be known as the Board of Animal Industry. The board shall contain two practical cattle-growers of known executive ability and a competent veterinary surgeon. The salaries of said four members of said board, respectively, shall be $4,000 per annum.

The amendment I have proposed strikes out "President of the United States" and inserts "Commissioner of Agriculture." I also propose to strike out "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and to provide for appointment by the Commissioner of Agriculture of two persons instead of four, who, together with the Commissioner of Agriculture (who shall be ex officio chairman), shall constitute a bureau in the Department of Agriculture to be known as the Board of Animal Industry. This board shall contain not two, but one practical cattle-grower of known executive ability, and a competent veterinary surgeon, as I propose to amend it.

The reason for the amendment is that when you substitute a commission for the single authority of the Commissioner of Agriculture you divide the responsibility, you relieve the Commissioner of Agriculture of the onus that rests upon him under existing law, and that will rest upon him under this amendment, of properly executing the law. You propose to substitute a commission composed of the Commissioner of Agriculture and four persons, to be divided and distracted in their councils, neither of them to be responsible for the proper execution of the law.

With this commission there is no responsibility on anybody for the proper enforcement and execution of the law. Responsibility is so divided that it amounts to nothing. The Commissioner of Agriculture is no longer responsible. My amendment proposes to make the Commissioner of Agriculture the head of the bureau; to give him the appointment of his assistants; to hold him responsible for the enforcement of the law, and I must confess that one reason which prompted me to offer this amendment was what was said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] two or three days ago in discussing this bill. He referred to the operation of the Chicago syndicate. He said that that syndicate had agents in the lobbies here now and that they had been here ever since this bill had been before the Senate; that they are here to advocate this bill, to lobby for this bill; and that fact is evidence to my mind that the Commissioner of Agriculture has been found not amenable to the power or the blandishments of that syndicate. I trust him because they do not want him. I desire the Commissioner of Agriculture, appointed by the President, a great bureau officer, responsible to the people of the United States, to the President of the United States, for the proper enforcement of this law. I desire no commission that can be approached through the want and absence of any responsibility, as many fear this commission will be if this bill should pass.

Why, Mr. President, I have letters from Texas, I have them from New Mexico, I have them from Arizona. I have letters from Massachusetts, I have letters from New York, and they all fear this commission. They say that if this commission is created it will be a surrender of the cattle-growers and of the consumers of beef to the syndicate in Chicago that now holds and crushes in its grasp the interests of the producers and consumers of beef.

I want a single responsibility, such a responsibility as will come from having the head of the Agricultural Bureau responsible to the country and to the President and to Congress for the proper enforcement and execution of the law, and not a scattering and diffusion and diversification of responsibilities, which, as they widen out, lose all force and efficiency. Executive force and vigor was never yet increased or promoted by a division of responsibility, while weakness and confusion always results from it.

The object of my amendment is to give force and vigor to the law by placing its execution in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who will choose his own assistants, and whose will in the execution of it will be supreme. I have great confidence in the honesty and intelligence of the present Commissioner of Agriculture. If he had been pliant he could have been easily influenced or bent to the purposes of others. If he could have been handled this bill would never have been introduced. So much for that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator give way to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. COKE. I will in a few minutes.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to observe that so far as I know there is not a human being here who has been lobbying for this bill, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], to whom the Senator from Texas alludes, is in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Kansas desires the commission feature to be stricken out of the bill. I know that, for he told me so, and the Senator from Kansas did say that lobbyists in the interest of the Chicago syndicate were and are here asking for this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator himself know that?

Mr. COKE. I do not.

Mr. BLAIR. Neither do I. The Senator might be justified in his remark, perhaps, with regard to the original bill and the original hearing before the committee; but this bill was reported for the very purpose of obviating any such relation, and it leaves large powers in the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. COKE. The most obnoxious features of the original bill are still in this substitute, as I shall be able to show.

Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to stand in the way of the Senate if it has any business in executive session, and, as the Senator from Ohio requested just now, I am willing to defer the balance of my remarks until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield now for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site suitable for the erection thereon of a commodious warehouse for the use of the United States appraiser of customs and other Government uses, in the city of Chicago, either by acquiring additional ground adjoining the site lately purchased at the corner of Harrison and Sherman streets, at an expenditure not exceeding the sum of $40,000, or by expending a sufficient sum, not exceeding $110,000, in the acquisition of another suitable site, of sufficient area to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to comply with the provisions of section 3 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property," approved May 27, 1886, in the erection of an appraiser's warehouse thereon. That after the acquisition of such site, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected thereon a suitable and commodious warehouse of brick, without towers or needless ornamentation, but strictly fire-proof in construction, and specially planned and adapted as an appraiser's warehouse for the use of the United States appraiser at the city of Chicago. The said building, when completed, including heating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, upon plans and specifications to be made and to be previously approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $250,000, and no plan of said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $250,000 for the said building; and there shall be an open space of at least 40 feet, including only lands owned by the United States and streets and alleys on every side of the said building when erected: Provided, That no part of the said sums shall be expended for site or building until a valid title to the site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Illinois shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be and remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the said State and the service of civil process therein.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAWLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM GRAY.

Mr. BREWER. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of William Gray, and put it upon its passage.

SEC. 2. That whenever complaint shall be made to the Secretary of War that by reason of the placing in any navigable waters of the United States of any bridge pier or abutment, the current of such waters has been so deflected from its natural course as to cause by producing caving of banks or otherwise serious damage or danger to property, it shall be his duty to make inquiry, and if it shall be ascertained that the complaint is well founded, he shall cause the owners or persons operating such bridge to repair such damage or prevent such danger to property by such means as he shall indicate and within such time as he may name, and in default thereof the owners or persons operating such bridge shall be liable in any court of competent jurisdiction to the persons injured in a sum double the amount of said injury: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to affect any rights of action which may exist at the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to apply the money herein and hereafter appropriated for improvements of rivers and harbors, other than surveys, estimates, and gauging, in carrying on the various works, by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government. Where said works are done by contract, such contract shall be made after sufficient public advertisement for proposals, in such manner and form as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and such contracts shall be made with the lowest responsible bidders, accompanied by such securities as the Secretary of War shall require, conditioned for the faithful prosecution and completion of the work according to such contract.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of securing the uninterrupted examinations and surveys at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, as provided for in the act of March 3, 1875, the Secretary of War, upon the application of the Chief of Engineers, is hereby authorized to draw his warrant or requisition from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury for such sums as may be necessary to do such work, not to exceed in the aggregate for each year the amount appropriated in this act for such purpose: Provided, however, That an itemized statement of said expenditures shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such rules and regulations for the navigation of the South Pass of the Mississippi River as to him shall seem necessary or expedient for the purpose of preventing any obstruction to the channel through said South Pass and any injury to the works therein constructed. The term "South Pass," as herein employed, shall be construed as embracing the entire extent of channel between the upper ends of the works at the head of the pass and the outer or sea end of the jetties at the entrance from the Gulf of Mexico; and any person who shall willfully violate any rule or regulation made by the Secretary of War in pursuance of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding $500 and undergo an imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of securing the uninterrupted gauging of the waters of the Lower Mississippi River and its tributaries, as provided for in joint resolution of the 21st of February, 1871, upon the application of the Chief of Engineers, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to draw his warrant or requisition from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury for such sums as may be necessary to do such work, not to exceed in the aggregate for each year the amount appropriated in this act for such purpose: Provided, however, That an itemized statement of said expenses shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of securing the uninterrupted work of operating snag-boats on the Upper Mississippi River and of removing snags, wrecks, and other obstructions in the Mississippi River, the Secretary of War, upon the application of the Chief of Engineers, is hereby authorized to draw his warrant or requisition from time to time upon the Secretary of the Treasury for such sums as may be necessary to do such work, not to exceed in the aggregate for each year the amounts appropriated in this act for such purposes: Provided, however, That an itemized statement of said expenses shall accompany the annual report of the Chief of Engineers.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War shall cause the manuscript of the annual report of the Chief of Engineers and subordinate engineers, relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors, and the report of the Mississippi and Missouri River Commissions to be placed in the hands of the Public Printer on or before the 15th day of October in each year, and the Public Printer shall cause said reports to be printed, with an accurate and comprehensive index thereof, on or before the first Monday in December in each year, for the use of Congress.

SEC. 9. That whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that any railroad or other bridge now constructed, or which may hereafter be constructed, over any of the navigable water ways of the United States is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of insufficient height, width of span, or otherwise, or where there is difficulty in passing the draw-opening or the raft-span of such bridge by rafts, steam-boats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to give notice to the persons or corporations owning or controlling such bridge to so alter the same as to render navigation through or under it free, easy, and unobstructed; and in giving such notice he shall prescribe in each case a reasonable time in which such alteration is to be made. If, at the end of such time, the alteration has not been made, the Secretary of War shall forthwith apprise the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute suit, in the name of the United States, without delay, in the circuit or district court of the United States for the circuit in which such bridge is located, which court is hereby invested with jurisdiction for this purpose, to recover from the owners or managers of such bridge the fines mentioned in the succeeding section of this act.

SEC. 10. SEC. 12. For examinations, surveys, and contingencies, and for incidental repairs, for which there is no special appropriation, for rivers and harbors, $75,000: Provided That no survey shall be made of any harbors or rivers until the Chief of Engineers shall have directed a preliminary examination of the same by the local engineer in charge of the district, or an engineer detailed for the purpose, and such local or detailed engineer shall report to said Chief of Engineers whether, in his opinion, said harbor or river is worthy of improvement, and shall state in said report fully and particularly the facts and reasons on which he bases such opinion, including the present and prospective demands of commerce; and it shall be the duty of the Chief of Engineers to direct the making of such survey if, in his opinion, the harbor or river proposed to be surveyed be worthy of improvement by the General Government; and he shall report to the Secretary of War the facts, and what public necessity or convenience may be subserved thereby, together with the full reports of the local engineer. Said reports of preliminary examinations and surveys shall be made to the House of Representatives, and are hereby ordered to be printed when so made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SOWDEN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A second is demanded. The Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 153, noes 14.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A second is ordered. Fifteen minutes being allowed, under the rule, for debate on each side, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to control the time in favor of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the bill which has just been read contains the amendments which the Committee of the Whole House voted in. They are two or three in number. I refer to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], relating to the harbor of Philadelphia, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY], relating to the harbor of St. Augustine. Other than those two amendments there is no increase in the aggregate over the amount in the bill which was considered by the Committee of the Whole, except a single item, an addition to the appropriation for the harbor at Cleveland, Ohio. The House will remember that when we last considered the river and harbor bill in the regular way the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] had offered an amendment increasing the amount for the harbor of Cleveland from $75,000 to $150,000. On a rising vote his amendment was adopted. I called for tellers, and while the vote was being taken by tellers, I offered to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] that if he would make his amendment $25,000 instead of $75,000, making the total appropriation for the harbor of Cleveland $100,000, instead of $150,000 as proposed by him, I would consent to it. The gentleman from Ohio has agreed to that, and the bill which is now offered for passage contains that additional $25,000 for the harbor of Cleveland. With that exception it does not contain one dollar more than the bill which was considered by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Did the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] agree to that at the time, before the House adjourned, or has that agreement been made since?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The agreement has been made since then, but it was pending at the time when the House adjourned on that day in consequence of there being no quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will yield for one more, but I can not yield beyond that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not ask to be yielded to except for a question for information.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is it not true, then, that so far as the Cleveland item is concerned, the bill upon which the House is called to vote to-day is neither the bill of the committee nor the one which was amended here? The committee's bill gave Cleveland $75,000. Cleveland asked for $150,000. And is it not true that since the House adjourned that day the appropriation for that harbor has been made $100,000 in this bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I repeat that the bill which is now offered to the House contains an increase of only $25,000 over the bill as it stood when the House last considered it in Committee of the Whole. That is the only increase in the aggregate of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But it is not exactly the same bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is the only increase in the aggregate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I am not speaking about an increase in the aggregate. Is it precisely the same bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It has been changed, also, so far as New York Harbor is concerned, not in the amount, but in the distribution. The New York city members preferred to have a larger sum for the improvement of the Butter-milk Channel in that harbor and a less sum elsewhere, and at their request I have taken from one locality in New York Harbor and applied it to another locality.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Who made those changes?

Mr. BLANCHARD. They were made upon the authorization of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Not by the House?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The change was made by the committee, but it does not increase the aggregate amount of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That may be; but it was not made by the House?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I can not yield further to the gentleman. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SEYMOUR].

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Speaker, the urgency and importance of the passage of the river and harbor bill to the commerce of the Northwest, to the work already done on the construction of a new lock at Sault Ste. Marie, and to the national character of the improvements undertaken can not be overestimated. General Poe states that the appropriation contained in this bill should be made as speedily as possible. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated two years ago for the construction of a coffer-dam. The safety of that coffer-dam is continually hazarded by the lack of appropriations necessary for continuing the work in the construction of the new lock at Sault Ste. Marie. General Poe states that unless this river and harbor bill is passed before August the appropriation contained in it for the St. Mary's Canal and the Hay Lake Channel will not be practically available until the commencement of navigation in 1889. He further states that within two years the maximum capacity of the present lock will be reached. The cost of the new lock, with its appointments, will be about $4,750,000. The appropriation already made is $250,000. Therefore, at the rate of appropriation embodied at present in the river and harbor bill the completion of the work will take four or five seasons; two or three seasons at least beyond the time when General Poe states the maximum capacity of the present lock will be reached.

The business of the St. Mary's Falls Canal has increased during the six seasons since 1881, 350 per cent. on the business of that year, being an average annual increase of nearly 60 per cent. The House from this can readily see the importance of the appropriation for this great national Northwestern work.

The freight passages through that canal were over one-half more than the entire entries and clearances of the foreign trade in the port of the city of New York, and were equal to one-quarter of the entries and clearances of the foreign trade in all the seaports of the United States. With this increase the necessity of this work to the farmers and other producers of the Northwest must be obvious.

This appropriation should be made at once, so as to allow the work to be commenced promptly. The climatic conditions of that country are such that the work must be commenced in the summer or early fall; but if the passage of this bill is jeopardized by delay, if the appropriation should not be made until the 1st of August, then, as General Poe states, it will not be available for use until April, 1889, when navigation opens.

Mr. Speaker, the passages through the St. Mary's Falls Canal were in 1887 nearly equal to those through the Suez Canal during the season of 1886. The business on the latter canal, which saves the conveyance of products from India around the Cape of Good Hope, and of so great an advantage to European commerce, is nearly equaled by the passage of freight through this new canal. Since the completion of the Northern Pacific and Canadian Pacific roads the section of country known as the Northwest is being gridironed with railroads. Settlements are continually being made, production is continually increasing, thus compelling the necessity for a new lock in the St. Mary's Falls Canal. But if anything happens to the coffer-dam recently constructed or to the present lock, navigation will be delayed, and then the interchange of freight through this water way will be restricted or prohibited during the necessary time of proper repair. Every consideration of business and public interest in the growing region of the new Northwest requires the immediate passage of this bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] has five minutes.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to make any factious opposition to the bill under consideration. It seems to me, however, that this side of the House should be slow to sanction the enormously large appropriations asked for in this measure. If it passes it will be the largest river and harbor bill that ever passed Congress. It appropriated originally, when it came to the House from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, $19,494,783.13, and it has since been amended by the committee so as to include $250,000 for the removal of certain islands in the Delaware River at Philadelphia; $35,000 for the improvement of the harbor at St. Augustine, Fla.; $25,000 increase for the improvement of the harbor at Cleveland, Ohio, and several other propositions, increasing the appropriations contained in the bill so that it now carries an aggregate of nearly $20,000,000.

How can this side of the House justify the extraordinary appropriations in this bill? In the Forty-seventh Congress a similar bill, carrying an appropriation of $18,738,875, was passed and vetoed by the President, and by a two-thirds majority in each House it was passed over his veto. How many of those that voted to pass that bill over the veto of the President failed of re-election to the Forty-eighth Congress? Did not the passage of that extravagant and reckless piece of legislation defeat the Republican party at the polls in the subsequent election and change the political complexion of the House? Who will deny that fact? What will become of the majority in this body if it follows in the wake of the gentlemen on the other side in the Forty-seventh Congress, and passes this profligate and unjustifiable measure?

Twenty million dollars for a river and harbor bill under a Democratic administration! Will the President, who is pledged to an honest and economical administration of the Federal Government, approve this bill, even if it should pass the two Houses? In the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress a similar act was passed appropriating less than $10,000,000, which failed to become a law for want of the President's approval. Is it likely, then, that he will approve a river and harbor bill that appropriates more than twice as much? To be logical he must veto it.

Now, no patriotic citizen will object to a reasonable appropriation for the improvement of the more important harbors and great rivers and water ways of the country, but to spend millions of dollars upon the smaller and insignificant rivers and creeks in the different States and Territories of the Union seems to be such a waste of the public money and so opposed to good policy that every one must condemn it.

The bill under consideration appropriates $3,392,850 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from its mouth to its source, which includes $12,000 for the reservoirs at its headwaters, $9,600 for gauging its waters and those of its tributaries, and $10,000 for the examinations and surveys of the South Pass in pursuance of existing law. The sum total of this provision may be larger than the needs of these improvements may require, but against this improvement of this great water way in the interests of commerce and navigation no serious objection can be urged, nor do I oppose it. The other great rivers of the country have been more than amply provided for by an appropriation of $6,533,268.

The principal harbors of the country, leading off with that of New York, and including thirty-six in number, have also been taken care of by an appropriation of $5,517,500 for their betterment. It appears, therefore, that this bill carries the unprecedentedly large appropriations of $15,443,618 for the improvement of the most important rivers and harbors in the country, and $4,051,165.13 for those of minor importance, not including the amount covered by the amendments added by the committee since the bill was first reported to the House. The said sum includes, however, an appropriation of $75,000 for examinations, surveys, and contingencies, and for incidental repairs, for which there is no special appropriation, for the rivers and harbors.

Deduct the $75,000 appropriated for these examinations and surveys from the $4,051,165.13 and you have a balance of $3,976,165.13 to be dumped into the smaller rivers and creeks of the country, to which must be added the increased amount of the present bill in order to satisfy the political demands of the various Congressional districts which are made the beneficiaries of this unjust legislation, and from which commerce derives little or no advantage.

This bill contains forty-three new projects, the largest of which appropriates $162,000 for the purchase of lock No. 7 of the Monongahela Navigation Company, in Western Pennsylvania. One hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars of the people's money to be taken for the purchase of this lock and the enrichment of this private corporation at the expense of the public! Is that wise and economical legislation? Under this bill Duck Creek also gets $10,000, Fairlee Creek $5,000, Nomini Creek $5,000, Jekyl Creek $5,000, Mingo Creek $5,000, Clark Creek $2,500, and Little Pee Dee River $5,000.

Thus we might dissect the entire bill and ascertain where the money is to be wasted on unimportant rivers, creeks, and harbors, in the interest of certain gentlemen upon this floor, without any material aid being really afforded to commerce.

What important bearing can these creeks have upon the commerce of the country? Captain Bixby, the local engineer in charge, who made the preliminary examination of Mingo Creek, Clark Creek, and Little Pee Dee River, reported them as not worthy of improvement; and yet, in the face of his report, this Committee on Rivers and Harbors recommend appropriations for the improvement of those unimportant creeks amounting to $12,500. What does this mean, and why this new departure? Who advised the committee to make these unwarranted appropriations? Why was Mosquito Creek overlooked by the committee, and Jekyl Creek given $5,000? [Laughter and applause.]

Did not Colonel Gillmore, the local engineer in charge, who made the preliminary survey of these creeks, report both to be worthy of improvement? By what principle or rule was the committee governed in determining that Jekyl Creek was more important than Mosquito Creek, and that it should have $5,000 and Mosquito Creek nothing? [Laughter.] Will our commerce not suffer seriously unless we appropriate $5,000 for the improvement of Mosquito Creek? [Laughter.] This is too important a matter to have escaped the attention of the committee.

Section 11 of this act appropriates $75,000 for the survey of one hundred and fifty-five rivers, creeks, and harbors in thirty-one of the States and Territories.

This is done in order to prepare the way for their participation in future river and harbor appropriations, and is the first step in that direction. Ingenious devices to catch votes, and squander the public money. Is it not high time to call a halt, and stop this reckless expenditure of the people's money without giving them an equivalent therefor? And another new feature contained in this bill is the proposition to make annual certain of these appropriations. Under the act of 1886 165 rivers were provided for, while this bill takes care of 198. Appropriations are made for 153 harbors, breakwaters, and ice-harbors as against 124 harbors, 5 channels, 2 ice-harbors, and 5 breakwaters provided for in the act of 1886. Why this numerical increase? Is there to be no limit to these items, and are we to go on increasing them until the end of time? This measure covering appropriations aggregating nearly $20,000,000 was almost forced through the House the other day under a suspension of the rules.

It would seem from the vote on April 21, by which the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands was defeated, that a majority of the House favor the passage of this monstrous river and harbor bill, that carries so large and extravagant an appropriation, while it refuses to act on legislation providing for the forfeiture of millions of acres of unearned railroad land grants. Why is it that all the important appropriation bills on the Calendar are forced to give way to this exorbitant measure? Has the "pork" been so cunningly divided amongst the members of the House in this bill that its final passage is assured notwithstanding its unreasonable and needless appropriations? [Laughter.]

It is very evident that a majority of the members of this House have been tenderly cared for by the committee in the preparation of this omnibus bill. [Laughter.] Wise and sagacious committee! Singular, that nearly every member on this side of the House who so recently took such an active and prominent part in obstructing the passage of the direct-tax bill, which involved less than $16,000,000, should have voted to pass this bill involving nearly $20,000,000, under a suspension of the rules, and they are no doubt prepared to do the same thing again.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. SOWDEN. No, sir; I can not yield.

Mr. CANDLER. I demand the right to correct the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. SOWDEN. This is a sad commentary upon consistency and considerate legislation. Where is my friend from Missouri who so gallantly opposed the passage of every public-building bill that has thus far been considered by the House? Where is this great protector of the people's money? What has silenced him in this attempted raid upon the Treasury? Why has not his eloquent voice been heard in opposition to this proposition to take out of the United States Treasury nearly $20,000,000, a large portion of which is to be wasted and uselessly expended upon the unimportant rivers, creeks, and harbors of the country? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLAND. What has the gentleman to say about his Allentown public-building bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. That is all right. My time is brief, and I can not yield for interruptions.

Do his constituents get any of the "pork," that he should be so silent? [Laughter.] It does not require a very careful examination of this measure to discover the favoritism with which some of its appropriations have been framed. It makes no provision for the continuation of the improvement of the Potomac River and flats, upon which so much money has already been expended, and which will be wholly lost unless the work so auspiciously begun is pushed to completion. Millions of dollars to be squandered upon the unimportant rivers, creeks, and harbors of the country and not one cent to complete these valuable improvements, all upon the plea that the title to some of the reclaimed land is in dispute. It is gravely suspected that where there are no votes there is no "pork." [Laughter.] The weakness and extravagance of this measure is made very clear by the committee itself when in its report it seeks to justify the immense sum it appropriates by stating that the failure of the last House to make any appropriation has thrown upon it the duty of combining two river and harbor bills in one.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask indulgence for one moment more. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. CANDLER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] has expired.

Mr. BLANCHARD rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] is recognized.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] to make any explanation he may desire.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, and I can say it in half a minute, that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] charged that every member on this side of the House who voted against the bill to refund the direct tax——

Mr. SOWDEN. "Nearly every one."

Mr. CANDLER. You said "every one."

Mr. SOWDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon—"nearly every one."

Mr. CANDLER. I accept the gentleman's explanation. I understood him to say that every member who voted against the bill to refund the direct tax was in favor of the bill. I voted against refunding the direct tax, and I will do so again, but I never have voted for the passage of such a river and harbor bill as this.

Mr. SOWDEN (to Mr. CANDLER). Now give me one-half of your time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANDLER assented.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman yields me the remainder of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] will give me one minute.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LAFFOON].

Mr. LAFFOON. Mr. Speaker, it was my original purpose to oppose the passage of this bill, because I believed that it failed to provide relief from the onerous burdens which rest upon the district that I have the honor to represent upon this floor. There is omitted from its provisions an appropriation in aid of the people who live along the Green and Barren Rivers, which, in my judgment, should have been inserted in manifest justice not only to my constituency, but to the general commerce of the country. It has been the chief desire of my whole Congressional life to relieve the oppression which an unscrupulous corporation who has control of these water ways has imposed on the wealth, industry, and commerce of my district. I had hoped for an appropriation that would have enabled the Government to break the shackles that bind my people and to rescue them from the clutches of a cormorant and pestiferous corporation, and to restore to the commerce of the country the rich resources of these rivers so long held in the grasp of an unscrupulous monopoly. I believe in the necessity of a river and harbor bill. I believe that the growth of our country demands that our rivers and harbors should be improved. But, sir, even to-day I would not be for this bill did I not have assurance from the other end of this Capitol that a provision would be attached to it giving full and entire relief to my people.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the great argument against a suspension of the rules to pass this bill three weeks ago was that here was a bill involving an appropriation of a large sum of money which had no consideration before this House, no time for debate, and no time for scrutiny of the items making up the bill. That argument has been obviated because this bill has been under consideration by the House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for three and a half days. So now it is not a proposition involving a large appropriation of money not considered by the House.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that in the three days' time when this bill was under consideration by the House not a single appropriation in the bill was stricken out, although many were called in question. Instead of the bill being decreased in amount, it is a fact known to every member here the aggregate of the bill was constantly increased.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana to state the reasons which actuated the committee in incorporating into the present bill the additional items which it contains.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the changes in reference to New York Harbor the committee intended to make when that portion of the bill was reached in regular order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will save the time of the gentleman from Louisiana by putting the question in a different form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the suspension of the rules and passage of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 161, nays 70, not voting 93; as follows:

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH CROW INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the right of way is hereby granted, as hereinafter set forth, to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Territory of Montana, for the extension of its railroad through the lands in Montana Territory set apart for the use of the Crow Indians, commonly known as the Crow Indian reservation, beginning at a point on the northern line of said reserve at or near where Clark's Fork empties into the Yellowstone River, and thence following in a southerly direction to a point at or near where said Clark's Fork crosses the southern line of the said Crow reserve; also a branch line of railway to be constructed for a distance of ten miles up Bear Creek, and commencing from the point where said Bear Creek empties into said Clark's Fork, with the right to construct, use, and maintain tracks, turn-outs, and sidings.

SEC. 2. That the right of way hereby granted to said company shall be 75 feet in width on each side of the central line of said railroad as aforesaid; and said company shall also have the right to take from said lands adjacent to the line of said road material, stone, earth, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also, ground adjacent to such right of way for station-buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water-stations, not to exceed in amount 300 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of road.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix the amount of compensation to be paid the Indians for such right of way and material, and provide the time and manner for the payment thereof, and also to ascertain and fix the amount of compensation to be made individual members of the tribe for damages sustained by them by reason of the construction of said road; but no right of any kind shall vest in said railway company in or to any part of the right of way herein provided for until plats thereof, made upon actual survey for the definite location of such railroad, and including the points for station-buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water-stations, shall be filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, which approval shall be made in writing and be open for the inspection of any party interested therein, and until the compensation aforesaid has been filed and paid; and the surveys, construction, and operation of such railroad shall be conducted with due regard for the rights of the Indians, and in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may make to carry out this provision: Provided, That the President of the United States may, in his discretion, require that the consent of the Indians to said right of way shall be obtained by said railway company, in such manner as he may prescribe, before any right under this act shall accrue to said company.

SEC. 4. That said company shall not assign or transfer or mortgage this right of way for any purpose whatever until said road shall be completed: Provided, That the company may mortgage said franchise, together with the rolling-stock, for money to construct and complete said road: And provided further, That the right granted herein shall be lost and forfeited by said company unless the road is constructed and in running order within two years from the passage of this act: And provided further, That no part of said line shall touch any portion of the Yellowstone National Park.

SEC. 6. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act. That this act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. TOOLE. I desire to say that there is a minority report accompanying this bill, and I demand a second on the motion.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. TOOLE were appointed tellers.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 25.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. TOOLE. No quorum.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is evidently a quorum in the House, and I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The rule expressly provides that this vote is to be taken by tellers.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 83, noes 41.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 33, noes 74.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 120, not voting 142; as follows:

VETO MESSAGE—NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 1406, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas."

Prior to the year 1838, a number of bands and tribes of New York Indians had obtained 500,000 acres of land in the State of Wisconsin, upon which they proposed to reside. In the year above named a treaty was entered into between the United States and these Indians, whereby they relinquished to the Government these Wisconsin lands. In consideration thereof, and, as the treaty declares, "in order to manifest the deep interest of the United States in the future peace and prosperity of the New York Indians," it was agreed there should be set apart as a permanent home for all the New York Indians then residing in the State of New York or in Wisconsin or elsewhere in the United States, who had no permanent home, a tract of land amounting to 1,824,000 acres, directly west of the State of Missouri and now included in the State of Kansas, being 320 acres for each Indian, as their number was then computed, "to have and to hold the same in fee-simple to the said tribes or nations of Indians by patent from the President of the United States."

Full power and authority was also given to said Indians "to divide said lands among the different tribes, nations, or bands in severalty," with the right to sell and convey to and from each other, under such rules and regulations as should be adopted by said Indians in their respective tribes, or in general council.

The treaty further provided that such of the tribes of these Indians as did not accept said treaty and agree to remove to the country set apart for their new homes, within five years or such other time as the President might from time to time appoint, should forfeit all interest in the land so set apart to the United States; and the Government guarantied to protect and defend them in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of their new homes.

I have no positive information that any considerable number of these Indians removed to the lands provided for them within the five years limited by the treaty. Their omission to do so may have been owing to the failure of the Government to appropriate the money to pay the expense of such removal, as it agreed to do in the treaty.

It is, however, stated in a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, dated April 6, 1878, contained in the report of the Senate committee, to whom the bill under consideration was referred, that in the year 1842 some of these Indians settled upon the lands described in the treaty; and it is further alleged in said report that in 1846 about two hundred more of them were removed to said lands.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior above referred to contains the following statement concerning these Indian occupants:

"From death and the hostility of the settlers, who were drawn in that direction by the fertility of the soil and other advantages, all of the Indians gradually relinquished their selections, until of the Indians who had removed thither from the State of New York, only thirty-two remained in 1860."

And the following further statement is made:

"The files of the Indian Office show abundant proof that they did not voluntarily relinquish their occupation."

The proof thus referred to is indeed abundant, and is found in official reports and affidavits made as late as the year 1859. By these it appears that during that year, in repeated instances, Indian men and widows of deceased Indians, were driven from their homes by the threats of armed men; that in one case at least the habitation of an Indian woman was burned, and that the kind of outrages were resorted to which too often follow the cupidity of whites, and the possession of fertile lands by defenseless and unprotected Indians.

An agent, in an official letter dated August 9, 1859, after detailing the cruel treatment of these occupants of the lands, which the Government had given them, writes:

"Since these Indians have been placed under my charge, which was, I think, in 1855, I have endeavored to protect them; but complaint after complaint has reached me, and I have reported their situation again and again; and I hope that it will not be long when the Indians who are entitled to land under the decision of the Indian Office shall have it set apart to them."

The same agent, under date of January 18, 1860, referring to these Indians, declares:

"These Indians have been driven off their land and claims upon the New York tract by the whites, and they are now very much scattered and many of them are very destitute."

It was found in 1860 that of all the Indians who had prior to that date selected and occupied part of these lands but thirty-two remained, and it seems to have been deemed but justice to them to confirm their selections by some kind of governmental grant or declaration, though it does not appear that any of them had been able to maintain actual possession of all their selected lands against white intrusion. Thus certain special commissioners appointed to examine this subject, under date of May 29, 1860, make the following statement:

"In this connection it may be proper to remark that many of the tracts so selected were claimed by lawless men who had compelled the Indians to abandon them under threats of violence; but we are confident that no serious injury will be done to any one, as the improvements are of but little value."

On the 14th day of September, 1860, certificates were issued to the thirty-two Indians who had made selections of lands and who still survived, with a view of securing to them such selections and at the same time granting to them the number of acres which it was provided they should have by the treaty of 1838. These certificates were made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and declared that in conformity with the provisions of the treaty of 1838 there had been assigned and allotted to the person named therein 320 acres of the land designated in said treaty, which land was particularly described in said certificates, which concluded as follows:

"And the selection of said tract for the exclusive use and benefit of said reserve, having been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, is not subject to be alienated in fee, leased, or otherwise disposed of, except to the United States."

In a letter dated September 13, 1860, from the Indian Commissioner to the agent in the neighborhood of these lands, reference is made to the conduct of white intruders upon the same and the following instructions were given to said agent:

"In view of these representations, and the fact that these white persons who are in possession of the land are intruders, I have to direct that you will visit the New York reserve in Kansas at your earliest convenience, accompanied by those Indians living among the Osages to whom said lands have been allotted, with a view to place them in possession of the lands to which they are entitled, and if you should meet with any forcible resistance from white settlers, you will report their names to this office, in order that appropriate action may be taken in the premises; and you will inform them that if they do not immediately abandon said lands they will be removed by force. When you shall have given the thirty-two Indians peaceable possession of their lands, or attempted to do so, and have been prevented by forcible resistance, you will make a report of your action to this bureau."

The records of the Indian Bureau do not disclose that any report was ever made by the agent to whom these instructions were given.

In 1861 and 1862 mention was made by the agents of the destitute condition of these Indians and of their being deprived of their lands, and in these years petitions were presented in their behalf, asking that justice be done them on account of the failure of the Government to provide them with homes.

In the mean time, and in December, 1860, the remainder of the reserve not allotted to the thirty-two survivors was thrown open to settlement by Executive proclamation. Of course this was followed by increased conflict between the settlers and the Indians. It is presumed that it became dangerous for those to whom lands had been allotted to attempt to gain possession of them. On the 4th day of December, 1865, Agent Snow returned twenty-seven of the certificates of allotment which had not been delivered, and wrote as follows to the Indian Bureau:

"A few of these Indians were at one time put in possession of their lands. They were driven off by the whites; one Indian was killed, others wounded, and their houses burned. White men at this time have possession of these lands and have valuable improvements on them. The Indians are deterred even asking for possession. I would earnestly ask, as agent for these wronged and destitute people, that some measure be adopted by the Government to give these Indians their rights."

An official report made to the Secretary of the Interior, dated February 16, 1871, gives the history of these lands, and concludes as follows:

"These lands are now all or nearly all occupied by white persons who have driven the Indians from their homes—in some instances with violence. There is great necessity that some relief should be afforded to them by legislation of Congress, authorizing the issue of patents to the allottees or giving them power to sell and convey.

"In this way they will be enabled to realize something from the land, and the occupants can secure titles for their homes."

Apparently in the line of this recommendation, and in an attempt to remedy the condition of affairs then existing, an act was passed on the 19th day of February, 1873, permitting heads of families and single persons over twenty-one years of age, who had made settlements and improvements upon and were bona fide claimants and occupants of the lands for which the thirty-two certificates of allotments were issued to enter and purchase at the proper land office, such lands so occupied by them, not exceeding 160 acres, upon paying therefor the appraised value of said tracts respectively, to be ascertained by three disinterested and competent appraisers, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, who should report the value of such lands exclusive of improvements, but that no sale should be made under said act for less than $3.75 per acre.

It was further provided that the entries allowed should be made within twelve months after the promulgation by the Secretary of the Interior of regulations to carry said act into effect, and that the money arising upon such sales should be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in trust for, and to be paid to, the Indians respectively to whom such certificates of allotment had been issued, or to their heirs, upon satisfactory proof of their identity, at any time within five years from the passage of the act, and that in default of such proof the money should become a part of the public moneys of the United States.

It was also further provided that any Indian to whom any certificate of allotment had been issued, and who was then occupying the land allotted thereby, should be entitled to receive a patent therefor.

Pursuant to this statute these lands were appraised. The lowest value per acre fixed by the appraisers was $3.75, and the highest was $10—making the average for the whole $4.90 per acre.

It is reported that only eight pieces, containing 879.76 acres of land taken from six of these Indian allotments, were sold under this statute to the settlers thereon, producing the sum of $4,058.06, and that the price paid in no case was less than $4.50 per acre.

It is proposed by the bill under consideration to sell the remainder of this allotted land to those who failed to avail themselves of the law of 1873 for the sum of $2.50 per acre.

Whatever may be said of the effect of the action of the Indian Bureau in issuing certificates of allotment to individual Indians, as it relates to the title of the lands described therein, it was the only way that the Government could perform its treaty obligation to furnish homes for any number of Indians less than a tribe or band; and if these allotments did not vest a title in these individual Indians, they secure to them such rights to the lands as the Government was bound to protect, and which it could not refuse to confirm, if it became necessary, by the issuance of patents therefor.

These rights are fully recognized by the statute of 1873 as well as by the bill under consideration.

The right and power of the Government to divest these allottees of their interests under their certificates is so questionable that perhaps it could only be done under the plan proposed, through an estoppel arising from the acceptance of the price for which their allotted lands were sold.

But whatever the effect of a compliance with the provisions of this bill would be upon the title of the settlers to these lands, I can see no fairness or justice in permitting them to enter and purchase such lands at a sum much less than their appraised value in 1873, and for hardly one-half the price paid by their neighbors under the law passed in that year.

The occupancy upon these lands of the settlers seeking relief, and of their grantors, is based upon wrong, violence, and oppression. A continuation of the wrongful exclusion of these Indians from their lands should not inure to the benefit of the wrongdoers. The opportunities afforded by the law of 1873 were neglected, perhaps, in the hope and belief that death would remove the Indians, who, by their appeals for justice, annoyed those who had driven them from their homes, and perhaps in the expectation that the heedlessness of the Government concerning its obligations to the Indians would supply easier terms. The idea is too prevalent that, against those who by emigration and settlement upon our frontier extend our civilization and prosperity, the rights of the Indians are of but little consequence. But it must be absolutely true that no development is genuine or valuable based upon the violence and cruelty of individuals or the faithlessness of a Government.

While it might not result in exact justice or precisely rectify the wrongs committed, it may well be that in existing circumstances the interests of the allottees or their heirs demand an adjustment of the kind now proposed. But their lands certainly are worth much more than they were in 1873; and the settlers, if they are not subjected to a reappraisement, should at least pay the price at which the lands were appraised in that year.

If the holders of the interests of the allottees have such a title as will give them a standing in the courts of Kansas, I do not think they need fear defeat by being charged with improvements under the occupying claimants' act; for it has been decided in a case to be found in the 20th volume of Kansas Reports, at page 374, that—

"Neither the title nor possession of the Indian owner secured by treaty with the United States Government can be disturbed by State legislation; and the occupying claimants' act has no application in this case."

And yet the delay, uncertainty, and expense of legal contests should be considered.

I suggest that any bill which is passed to adjust the rights of these Indians by such a general plan as is embodied in the bill herewith returned should provide for the payment by the settlers within a reasonable time of an appraised value, and that in case the same is not paid by the respective occupants, that the lands be sold at public auction for a price not less than the appraisement.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 7, 1888.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. Would it be in order to ask, instead of a reference of this message, or of its present consideration, that it lie on the Speaker's table to be called up at some future time?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS. The bill has been carefully considered by the committee. I see no impropriety in referring the message to the committee; but that members may have an opportunity of reading it, I ask that it remain temporarily on the Speaker's table. This measure is important to settlers, not in my district, but in my State. I have no interest in the matter myself. But to a few settlers in Kansas it is important. I know that the Indians who are the beneficiaries are satisfied with this arrangement.

I claim that as a matter of justice to the settlers, as a matter of justice to the Indians, as a matter of equity to all, it ought to be passed by this House. And in order that the House may have an opportunity to examine the President's views before acting on the bill, I ask that the bill and message be allowed to remain temporarily on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, the Chief Executive of the country has sent here a very important message giving his reasons for not approving this measure. When the bill was before the House I took the liberty of opposing it as strongly as I could. It is the usual course for documents of this character to be referred to the committee from which the bill emanated, and respect for the Chief Executive demands that this message shall be referred in the usual manner. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed, and on that I call for the previous question.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. MCADOO; and there were—ayes 51, noes 52.

Mr. MCADOO and Mr. NELSON. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. MCADOO, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. PERKINS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 30.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has yet voted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Having been recognized by the Chair to move to proceed to the consideration of a Senate bill, I desire to be informed what the standing of that motion will be on suspension day four weeks hence?

The SPEAKER. In case the motion is not now disposed of, it will be the pending motion on the next day for the suspension of the rules.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn was made, but as no point of order is made against the motion, the Chair will entertain it.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of John Pope Hodnett, of the District of Columbia, praying compensation for service rendered by him as counsel of the workingmen of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of 100 citizens of Westfield, Kans., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Charles Gaskins and others, heirs of David Gaskins, late a citizen of Virginia, praying to be allowed compensation for losses sustained by him in consequence of the occupation of his farm by the Union Army in 1862, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a petition of citizens of New York City, praying that the work of the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia be continued under the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed amendment to the interstate-commerce law prohibiting transportation of interstate commerce over Canadian railways in its transit between points of shipment and destination; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of N. E. Bowers, president, and R. P. Coop, secretary, of the Nashua (N. H.) Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and S. J. Frazier, Worthy Patriarch of the Sons of Temperance, and other citizens of Nashua, N. H., praying for legislation against the running of Sunday mail trains; I also present a petition of the same parties, praying for legislation forbidding interstate commerce on Sunday by railroad trains; and a petition of the same parties, praying for legislation against military drills on Sunday. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I present the petition of John Pope Hodnett, of the District of Columbia, praying compensation for services rendered by him as counsel for the workingmen of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPOONER. That matter at the last Congress was before the Committee on Claims. The claimant asks, I think, some $25,000 from the Government of the United States as compensation for services which he alleges he rendered as counsel for certain laboring men in this District. I think, perhaps, the petition ought to be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I make that motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand that there is a bill on the subject pending before the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A previous petition on the subject was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and reported back by that committee with a request that it be discharged and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was done by order of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the petition will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HISCOCK presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Ontario, Steuben, and Yates Counties, in the State of New York, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of farmers of Westchester County, New York, complaining of certain abuses now practiced under the authority of the Bureau of Animal Industry; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a mass meeting of the farmers of Westchester County, New York, held at Mount Kisco, April 16, 1888, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the sense of this meeting is that the action of the officials of the Bureau of Animal Industry, acting under the orders of the governor of the State of New York, in quarantining the cattle of Westchester County is highly injurious to the interest of the farmers, and that the manner of conducting the quarantine has been unjust, partial, and unfair.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting that the manner of the appointments made under the governor's orders of the inspectors of cattle throughout the country have been made with a view of promoting the interest of the politician without regard to the wishes or interest of the farmers.

Resolved, That we deem it unnecessary to quarantine any herds but those affected with pleuro-pneumonia, and that the restraining of the moving of healthy cattle from one place to another is not only inconvenient but oppressive, and that we demand immediate relief from the necessity of obtaining a permit to buy, sell, or move healthy cattle.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the governor of the State of New York and proper authorities at Washington, D. C., and we would respectfully ask the honorable Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the management of quarantined districts before making any further appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry.

JOSHUA B. WASHBURN, Chairman.
ARTHUR S. COME, Secretary.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Hon. John J. Bell, Ex-Governor Charles H. Bell, and other citizens of Exeter, N. H., praying for the passage of a bill for the better protection of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH presented a petition of the Providence (R. I.) Board of Trade, praying for increased accommodations for the appraisement of goods at the port of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I present a memorial of the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, composed of 250 ministers, representing 37,000 church members, who protest against the ratification of the treaty with China, lately pending, as it proposes to exclude all Chinese persons, except official representatives, merchants, teachers, and travelers. This body protests against any treaty which excludes Chinese ministers of the gospel from coming to this country, and which prevents Chinese delegates to their general conference from taking their places in that body as utterly un-American and un-Christian. I suppose, until we can appeal from the American people drunk to the American people sober, this question must be considered as settled. Under the rules I presume the memorial must lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, it was Ordered, That leave is hereby granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Charles G. Merriman, of Connecticut.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, if it will not interfere with the business of the Senate, I desire to make a statement personal to myself, which I conceive to be due to the Senate.

It is well known that I have been seriously indisposed and confined to my room almost exclusively for the last week. I visited the Senate Chamber yesterday with the purpose of making the statement then which I shall make now. The opportunity, however, did not present itself until I was suffering so much pain that I withdrew from the Capitol and went home.

Referring to a discussion in which I participated last week, I desire to say to the Senate, that, however severe the provocation which was given, yet I made use of language at that time contrary to parliamentary rules and to the rules and usages of this body and to the decorum of the Senate. I regret having used such language, and tender a proper apology to the Senate of the United States for having done so. My high respect for the dignity of this body, of which I have been for many years now a member, as well as my self-respect, induces me to make this statement.

REVENUE SERVICE IN MARYLAND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over under objection from a former day.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MANDERSON, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to amend the seventh paragraph by adding at the end the words, "designating those who were appointed under the civil-service law and those who were appointed without examination."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the seventh paragraph, by adding:

Designating those who were appointed under the civil-service law and those who were appointed without examination.

So as to read:

Seventh. Total number of employés, with names and official designations of each, in the customs service March 4, 1885, designating those who were appointed under the civil-service law and those who were appointed without examination.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no objection in the world to the Senate having all the information that is asked for in these resolutions, but unless the amendment that I have offered be adopted the information that will come will be necessarily misleading.

Mr. MANDERSON. If I may interrupt the Senator, I certainly have no objection to the interpolation of the words suggested by him in the resolution. I think it is a very proper amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator from Nebraska understood as accepting the modification?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to it if the Senate sees fit to interpolate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer the same amendment to paragraph 7, the same language precisely, to come in at the end of the paragraph.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the seventh paragraph the words:

Designating those who were appointed under the civil-service law and those who were appointed without examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to, if there be no objection; and the question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1430, being the land-grant forfeiture bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business that order is closed, and the Senator from New Hampshire moves——

Mr. FARWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2615. I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senator from New Hampshire is recognized to move the consideration of Senate bill 1430.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator from Illinois to wait until the land-forfeiture bill is taken up, and then it can be laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. FARWELL. I now ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2615 for consideration at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the pending business be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling him to move the consideration of the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia, which has been read at length as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection, unless the bill shall lead to discussion.

Mr. FARWELL. It will lead to no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that the Senator from New Hampshire would have the right to ask for a vote upon his motion if there should be any objection. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FARWELL. The bill has been previously read as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that an amendment had been or was to be proposed to the bill.

Mr. FARWELL. I will offer certain amendments now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read at length it is open to amendment, and the Senator from Illinois proposes amendments which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 3, strike out the words "of Maryland and" and insert the words "and west of;" and in the same line change the word "avenues" to "avenue;" and after "avenue" insert "and south of Maryland avenue and west of Sixth street west;" so that the clause will read:

That the said company is also hereby authorized to acquire for railway purposes such additional property as may be needed south and west of Virginia avenue and south of Maryland avenue and west of Sixth street west.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 5, after the word "it," insert "west of Sixth street west and south of Virginia avenue;" so as to read:

And to extend its tracks to its said properties, as well as those now owned by it west of Sixth street west and south of Virginia avenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the power of condemnation shall not be exercised west of Delaware avenue, beyond the limit of two squares in depth at right angles from the main track of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad: And provided further, That no property used for church or school purposes shall be condemned under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about this bill.

I am in favor of granting the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company reasonable facilities to acquire lands in this city for their purposes. I take it that this bill is a final settlement of the question of the removal of the railroad from the route granted to and now occupied by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad. I suppose it is the end of any effort to remove the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, and my own judgment, as a long sojourner here in this District, is that it is a wise settlement of that controversy. The Baltimore and Potomac Railroad have a right to their present location, and they should be encouraged to improve, to ornament, and to complete it, and this bill will enable them to take their cars from the streets and avenues of this city and to place them in grounds to be purchased by them and owned by them in severalty. So I consider that as settled.

What I wish to say is, that I think the Congress of the United States in neglecting to compel the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to take their depot out of the unsightly place in which it is now situated, and running that railroad across some twenty different squares of the city of Washington and depreciating the value of property worth millions of dollars belonging to private citizens, preventing the improvement of a large section of the city, and one of the most beautiful sections of the city, a section equal in capacity and extent and beauty of location to the northwestern section of the city, is a hardship and injustice that ought to be put an end to. I wish now to announce my willingness to participate in requiring the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to remove their tracks from their present location. I am told they are willing to remove them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where should they be removed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Their depot should be removed, in my judgment, to an equally eligible and proper site alongside the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad depot. I would require them at once to remove five or six squares from their present location, say anywhere east of Seventh or Eighth street east, there to tunnel under one of the streets, to carry their road around and bring it in alongside of the Baltimore and Potomac south of Sixth street west. If Sixth street is to be thus devoted to railroad purposes, the Baltimore and Ohio should be given equal facilities with the Baltimore and Potomac. It is not possible to bring these two corporations together in a common depot, because they would quarrel with each other. I know that in Ohio we have several places where these roads are brought in contact, and they never could agree about anything. I would put them alongside of each other and give them equal facilities and equal privileges under sharp and equal competition, and require them to make equal improvements, bridges and embankments, so as to protect the park and make the crossing of the tracks easy and safe and reduce to a minimum the obstruction and disfigurement of the park.

I merely rose to express my desire that the Committee on the District of Columbia would at the present session, in conformity with the universal wish of the people of Washington without exception, report some bill that will relieve us from the nuisance which now lies in our sight. Here is the magnificent North Capitol street blocked up.

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will permit me, I will inform him that there is a subcommittee on that matter now which has it under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all I desire; but while we are rendering additional facilities to one of these roads we ought to render equal accommodations to the other.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Ohio understand that this bill commits the Senate irrevocably and perpetually to the policy of keeping the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad on Sixth street and the park?

Mr. FARWELL. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what the Committee on the District of Columbia proposes; but the effect of the purchase of the property contemplated by the bill, the facilities extended to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, together with the general desire on the part of the business men of the city of Washington, to leave the depot where it stands, will, in my judgment, during our lifetime at least, and probably forever, keep the location of the Baltimore and Potomac depot where it is. I do not say that the committee desires it, but I say that is the effect of it.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 2——

Mr. HOAR. Does a single objection send this bill over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPOONER in the chair). The Chair so understands.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE. Can my amendment be read, sir, and printed, if the bill goes over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be read, if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the proviso already adopted to section 2, the following:

Provided, That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall be required to remove their track and depot from the public grounds which they now occupy and locate them upon the lands so acquired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] asks for the regular order.

JOHN C. GREEN.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the Senator from New Hampshire for a single moment in order that I may ask the Senate to consider Order of Business 812, Senate bill 67, and if it leads to a minute's debate I will retire from the scene and not trespass upon the courtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I can yield no further. If the Senator's bill does not require debate I shall not object.

Mr. HARRIS. If it leads to debate I shall not ask indulgence.

Mr. BLAIR. I give notice to the Senate that if another like request is made I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks that the pending business be informally laid aside for the purpose of considering Senate bill 67.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 67) to perfect the military record of John C. Green, of Tennessee.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment, in line 12, before the words "of August," to strike out "first" and insert "twelfth day;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to enter on the rolls of Company I, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, the name of John C. Green, as duly mustered into the service of the United States on the 20th day of December, A. D. 1863, and to complete his military record as follows: Captured by the enemy, while in the line of duty, at Union City, Tenn., March 24, A. D. 1864; died at Andersonville, Ga., on the 12th day of August, A. D. 1864, while being detained by the enemy as a prisoner of war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, in the very briefest way possible I wish to reply to a few observations made yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. The difference between the amendment of the Senator from Michigan and that of the Senator from Wisconsin I do not propose to discuss. I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, either with or without the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The Committee on Public Lands sought to forfeit all unearned lands, all lands opposite the uncompleted portions of the railways. That committee were of the opinion that they could not by legislative act settle the existing claims of the various claimants in the State of Michigan. They believed that any amendment of the character of this one would tend to defeat the forfeiture act. Therefore the committee said they would leave each of the parties there to seek his rights or his remedies before the Department or before the courts of the country, and so the bill stands to-day without this amendment.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin not only confirms cash entries of lands proposed to be forfeited by this bill, but thousands of acres of other lands that were entered for cash, which lands are in no way connected with this bill and are not included in the forfeiture. From the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday the Senate would infer that these lands were agricultural lands and were covered all over with homes and farms. The facts are that the great body of this land is not agricultural land. It is timber land; it is mineral land; it is land of very great value; and if the land was put up and sold to the highest bidder, as the law requires should be done, it would bring into the Treasury of the United States a vast amount of money.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office knew that these lands were not subject to sales at private entry. From 1865 to 1880, for fifteen years, he called the attention of the local officers at Marquette to the fact that these lands were not subject to private entry until they should be first offered at public sale, so as to give every man an opportunity to bid. They continued to sell them at private sale from time to time in the face of repeated orders from the Department here not to do so.

The committee that investigated the matter reported that these lands were purchased by less than thirty corporations. They purchased them at private entry, and the House report says that the register of the local land office so disobeyed the orders of his superior that the greater part of these applications were made out in his handwriting. The committee furthermore says that the people who entered these lands at $1.25 an acre were the agents of corporations; and yet the Senator from Wisconsin I presume regards them as innocent purchasers, and he says that it would be dishonest on the part of the Government not to confirm these entries.

Mr. SPOONER. Do I understand the Senator to say that he presumes I am one of the innocent purchasers?

Mr. BERRY. No, sir. If the Senator so understood me he misunderstood me. I said nothing like it. I said that the Committee on Public Lands of the House had stated that the register of the land office was interested to-day in these lands, and I presumed that he was one of the innocent purchasers of whom the Senator from Wisconsin was speaking.

Now, Mr. President, these lands the law required should be sold to the highest bidder. They were entered by these companies at a dollar and a quarter an acre in the face of the law, and now they ask the Senate of the United States to come in and confirm to them an immense body of lands, some of which the Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday had sold at $100 per acre. If a man down in the hills of Arkansas or upon the plains of Wisconsin twenty years ago purchased 40 acres of land from the Government, and built his home upon it, and for some cause his title proves to be invalid, he can only come to the Government of the United States and get back his dollar and a quarter an acre; but these parties who the Senator says paid into the Treasury a million dollars can go there to-day and get their million dollars back, because that is the law, and if their entries were invalid they have a right to have the money back. I beg the Senator to tell me why Congress should take a man's land in Arkansas and give him back only one dollar and a quarter an acre without interest, and why he says it is dishonest on the part of this Government to refuse to confirm to these syndicates and these corporations 400,000 acres of land, 800,000 acres including the even sections, but 400,000, as was said yesterday, included within the odd sections.

If these lands are worth from ten to twenty or thirty dollars an acre, as is asserted, and will bring it at public sale, the law requiring them to be sold at public sale, I ask why it is that certain favored individuals can go and purchase them at a dollar and a quarter an acre in the face of the law and not give every other person an opportunity to purchase, and then ask the Congress of the United States to confirm their titles?

These are the objections I have to it. I know no party connected with it. The information I have is from the testimony taken before the House committee contained in the majority and minority reports made by that committee. It is open to every Senator here to examine that testimony. I assert that no one can read that testimony from beginning to end without coming to the conclusion that this register acted in a fraudulent way when he allowed the entry of these lands. I can not perceive that it is dishonest for the Senate of the United States to refuse to ratify such proceedings. The ideas of the Senator from Wisconsin and mine differ if he thinks it is dishonest for any man to refuse to vote for the confirmation of these titles when this testimony, as a majority of a committee of one branch of Congress has said, shows that they were procured in that way. It seems to me that it is unjust.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] a few days ago delivered a long speech here tending to show that the party to which he belonged had been in favor of forfeiting all the unearned lands and that the difficulty was that the other branch of the Congress, a majority of whom belonged to a different party, had been the obstructionists; yet he is willing to-day to allow an amendment to go on this bill that has but one tendency, and that is to defeat the forfeiture of these unearned grants, when all parties have professed again and again that they were in favor of their forfeiture.

If this amendment is not adopted, if the several parties, the cash entrymen, the canal men, and all the other claimants have equities, let the parties come to Congress in a separate bill; but do not seek to load down this bill, which is a forfeiture bill pure and simple, with a matter which will tend to defeat the forfeiture bill and to defeat all legislation whatever.

Mr. President, I have talked on these amendments more frequently than I intended, but I am earnestly in favor of forfeiting the unearned land grants. I am earnestly in favor of the bill passing both Houses of Congress at the earliest day possible to accomplish that result. I believe that if this amendment is placed onto this bill the probabilities are that this Congress will do as the last one did—that is, that these forfeitures will not take place because of differences between the two Houses. Therefore I trust that neither the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin nor that of the Senator from Michigan will be adopted, but that both will be laid on the table, and that the bill as it comes from the committee will be passed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of this bill, for I am in favor of forfeiting every acre of unearned land granted to a State or to railway companies for the construction of railroads that there is in the United States; but this bill, general in its terms, operates throughout the United States, and it proposes to forfeit and throw open to settlement lands which have already been purchased from the United States. I think it is manifestly proper that in adopting general legislation of this character Congress should provide for the protection of those purchasers if they ought to be protected.

That they need protection no one denies. It is admitted that these Michigan entries are invalid for the reason that, notwithstanding the lands were held by the land officers to be open to entry, they had not been reoffered, as required by law. In the case put by the Senator from Arkansas as to the failure of title in his State, I should be willing to vote to confirm those titles if the purchases were in good faith. Anywhere in the United States, where a man has bought from the Government of the United States at the Government land office land, believing that it was open to entry, has paid his money, there being no fraud in the transaction, I would cheerfully vote to confirm his title, and I think nearly every Senator would cheerfully so vote.

The Senator from Arkansas can not successfully indict the integrity of all the owners of these lands by the means he adopts for that purpose. There are 1,200 of them as stated by Mr. PAYSON in his report. At least half the men interested to-day in these lands are men who have bought from the original entrymen, and hold under conveyance from them and their grantees. Certainly the Senator from Arkansas does not impute fraud to them. Some of these original entrymen, who I presume still hold the land which they bought, I happen to know, and they stand as well, and deservedly stand as well, in the community in which they live as the Senator from Arkansas can stand in the community in which he lives.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a moment for a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Will he tell me how those 1,200 owners are distributed?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. PAYSON states that they are distributed in this way: that 384 live in Michigan, 89 in Wisconsin, 37 in Illinois, 20 in Pennsylvania, 20 in New York, 17 in Ohio, 7 in Massachusetts, and 126 are scattered.

Mr. PALMER. I meant as to their property, their holdings.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know.

Mr. PALMER. They are mostly in two towns which are essentially out of this case. They are on the even sections, and the Department has decided in favor of the cash entries.

Mr. SPOONER. It is stated in this report that 400 of these people own tracts of land not exceeding 160 acres each, small tracts of land. Now we have their money; the Senator says let them come and take back their money with interest. I ask the Senate of the United States if that is any measure of protection or justice to these people. They have paid taxes on these lands for years; some of them have sold them in good faith and given warranty deeds of them. Others have made improvements upon them and it would be no fair adjudication of their claim simply to give them back the purchase-money which they paid into the Treasury.

I am utterly at a loss to understand how the Senator from Arkansas can reconcile his attitude as to this amendment with his attitude as to the bill itself which comes from his committee. I am only asking by this amendment that Congress shall protect the title of these men whom the Secretary of the Interior shall find to have purchased in good faith. Of course there is a defect in the title.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me there?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Does not the Senator know that so far as the provision in the amendment that the Secretary of the Interior shall confirm the title of those who he is satisfied entered in good faith is concerned, the decision would be on an ex parte hearing where the Government would not be represented and where these parties would only furnish evidence of good faith? So it would absolutely amount to a confirmation of that entire body of 800,000 acres of land. I care not how much fraud a register of the land office who disobeyed the orders of his superior and in his own handwriting filled out applications to lands that he knew were not subject to private entry and then afterwards became the agent through whom these sales were made may have committed, evidence will no doubt be furnished to show good faith, especially where the Government is not represented on the other side.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senate of the United States will dispose of this question upon the assumption that the statements or suspicions presented by Mr. Henley in his report are to be taken as absolutely conclusive on the questions of fact. Mr. PAYSON and the gentlemen who joined with him in the minority report say there is no evidence of collusion or fraud in the transactions, that there is no evidence of fraudulent purpose on the part of the land officers, no evidence of fraudulent purpose on the part of the purchasers; and how the Senator can talk about the Government of the United States not being represented when the amendment provides that the very officer who must first be satisfied by satisfactory proof of the good faith of these parties is an officer of the United States, a Cabinet officer of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, I can not understand. The Secretary is at liberty under this amendment to inaugurate any investigation he chooses. The evidence must be made satisfactory to him. He may demand such measure of testimony as he sees fit to be taken in such manner as he may indicate. So it seems to me there is nothing whatever in that objection.

But, Mr. President, the Senator seems to me, as I said, to be inconsistent. He would not confirm, no matter in whatever good faith the purchaser may have entered the land, one of these entries. Now this bill provides for forfeiting land on the ground that the railway companies never have earned it, and that therefore the Government of the United States has under all decisions the right to resume it; and this very bill which the Senator supports, in its second section provides—

That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed in good faith prior to January 1, 1886, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, etc.

How purchase "from the United States?" They are to be entitled to purchase by paying the regular price. The land is not to be reoffered. They are entitled under this bill to protect their purchases in good faith by paying into the Treasury of the United States $1.25 or $2.50 an acre.

Mr. BERRY. One moment. The bill provides that they shall be allowed to purchase by paying $2.50 an acre. That has no reference whatever to lands entered at private entry. It applies to the railroad lands out West, and it does not confirm their title, but simply gives them a preference over others to purchase at the given price.

Mr. SPOONER. Exactly. Where they have not paid the Government, where the land is resumed on the ground that it belongs to the Government, the bill to which the Senator agrees protects the title obtained in good faith from the railway company. True, the company did not own the land, but this authorizes the purchaser from the railroad company as against every other man in the United States, any homestead settler under the laws of the United States, to go to the land office, and by paying $2.50 an acre, take the land; now why protect the titles of men who have purchased in good faith from a railroad company which confessedly had no title, and yet refuse to protect the title of men who have purchased in good faith from the very Government itself? They authorize these men who have not paid the Government to go to the land office and pay the United States. In the cases which I am endeavoring to protect by this amendment the parties have already gone to the land office of the United States and entered the land and paid the money.

Then I should like to know—for this appears to be satisfactory to the Senator from Arkansas—how can the question of good faith in the case of a purchaser from a railway company be determined fairly to his satisfaction, and yet the Senator be able reasonably to say that the Secretary of the Interior can not fairly determine the question of good faith under the amendment which I offered.

I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate any further in discussing the proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. I desire to know why the amendment should be limited to the State of Michigan alone?

Mr. SPOONER. I limited it to the State of Michigan because these lands were all unearned in the State of Michigan, and I knew of no other instance in the country which would come within the purview of the provision. I thought it might be objected to if it were not so restricted. That is why I limited it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, is an amendment in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not now subject to amendment, an amendment in the second degree being pending.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall at the proper time, unless I change my mind or see some good reason why I should not do so, move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin by striking out, in line 4, the words "the State of Michigan" and inserting in lieu thereof "any State or Territory."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the lands in controversy have been the subject-matter of discussion in the Interior Department for several years. I do not recollect the exact statements that have been made pro and con, and I have never read the report referred to by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] as made in the House of Representatives, but I am morally certain that it can not be alleged against any considerable portion of these cash entries that there was any corruption or any fraud. What may have been the conduct of some officials, whether they made an error or whether they acted willfully and knowingly for the purpose of securing this land to themselves, I think there has been practically no complaint that the entrymen themselves committed any fraud on the Government.

It was a question that baffled and annoyed the Department for some time as to the status of these entries, whether they were valid entries or whether they were not valid. As I understand now the proposition is simply to say to the men who bought in good faith, who were bona fide purchasers, supposing that under the law they had the right to take the land, that they shall be protected in their property. If any individual conveys property that he does not have a title to, under the pretense that he has, in equity and in law he is compelled to make it good. The United States had an absolute title to this land, and nobody denied it. It was within the power of the Government to make a good title; yet the officers who assumed to do it acted without the authority which might have been obtained from the legislative department; but supposing they had that authority they made the title. They have taken these people's money, and these holders for fifteen or eighteen years, and in some instances perhaps longer, have paid the State taxes, have held possession of the land, and have believed they were the owners of it.

About 1882 there was a contest raised as to the question whether this was valid or not, and it was generally understood that there was a technicality that might vitiate the title though the patents had issued. Thereupon in some instances settlers went upon these lands for the purpose of making homes, believing that they were bona fide entitled to do so, believing that they did not interfere with the real right of anybody. They made pre-emption and homestead claims on top of the lands which the Government had already issued a certificate for, and in many cases had issued a patent for.

I understand by the amendment accepted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], that that class of bona fide settlers are protected.

In addition to this there is not any question but what a large number of people went on these lands for the purpose of getting them for speculation, and not for the purpose of making homes. They did what other people had attempted to do—get the lands for the timber that was on them. That class of men are not entitled to any protection at the hands of the Government or any consideration whatever.

I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as amended by the acceptance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, which protects every bona fide settler.

Now, then, the question is simply this: Shall we protect the men who supposed that they had a right to take these titles, as the Government said it had a right to make them; who paid their money and took their receipts, and subsequently took their patents and sold to other men, who had the same right to believe in the title, at an advance price—whether these bona fide owners and holders are to be deprived of their lands for the simple purpose of allowing somebody else to come in here and get them—because the moment they are open they will be occupied by some other persons? The Government will derive no great benefit from this transaction, even if it was right and proper, which I deny.

The lands may sell for $25 or $30 an acre, it is said. I do not know exactly where they are. That has nothing to do with the question, in my judgment. If the Government has lured its citizens into buying these lands, they believing that they were entitled to do so, it is an act of injustice on the part of the Government, because it has the technical right, to say because the land has advanced in price that it shall not now be held by those people who, trusting the authorities appointed by law to make the final conveyance, received it. Because they trusted them and took their title, are they now to be despoiled and destroyed of their rights on a mere technicality?

Mr. President, recently under a decision of the Interior Department with reference to land in the vicinity of Denver overruling decisions of the Interior Department made in two cases carefully adjudicated in 1873 and 1874, after the people had been in possession of the land, after they had had a patent from the Government in some instances for fifteen years, the Government of the United States proceeds to institute suit to set aside the patent on the theory that the lands adjudicated by the Government to a certain railroad company had never been the property of the railroad company. The land is worth in some cases a thousand dollars an acre; and who is to be benefited by that thousand dollars an acre? Is it the Government?

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Not now. The Senator may speak when I get through this illustration.

Is it the Government that is to be benefited? Not at all. The moment it is declared that these are void entries, that moment the land is open under the settlement law, and Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith and everybody else jump on to it, and the man who had cultivated it for fifteen years and who put fences on it and houses on it and had made it a garden, who has held it and paid taxes on it, is deprived of his property that some saloon-keeper who hung around the town and did nothing may go upon it and receive the benefit of the enhanced value by the labor of the former occupant.

What I mean to say is, that when the Government has by its decisions misled its citizens and justified them in buying land of the Government or of a railroad company, the Government, while it is not in law, is in morals and in decency estopped from despoiling its citizens in that way.

Now, I will hear the Senator from Arkansas if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator stated that some of this land was now worth a thousand dollars an acre.

Mr. TELLER. Not this land that is in controversy. I spoke of the Denver land.

Mr. BERRY. I want to say to the Senator that a very large portion of this land is not agricultural land; it has no houses and no ditches and no farms upon it. It is mineral land; it is iron land of great value. The Senator says that the Government would not be benefited. The law requires this land to be offered to the highest bidder. If it is offered to the highest bidder to-day it will bring from $25 to $30 an acre, it is said. If there is any reason why these men who purchased in fraud of the law, in the face of the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, shall be given by this Government the difference between a dollar and a quarter an acre and that which the land will bring at public sale to the highest bidder—if there is any reason why we should donate and contribute this to these corporations and these syndicates that do not occupy the land, I shall be glad if the Senator from Colorado would tell me what that reason is.

Mr. TELLER. I take issue with the honorable Senator. There is not any law that requires the land now in controversy in Michigan to be put up and sold at auction. It is discretionary with the Department. They may withdraw it from the operation of the settlement law and put it up. The Senator knows that upon pretty nearly every one of these pieces of land there are now four sticks laid out in the shape of a basement of a house. He knows that there is a little something done upon it by some speculator, and it is not a question whether the Government of the United States is to get what the value of the land is, but it is a question whether somebody else who has not had anything to do with this land up to the present time shall step in and have the enhanced value produced, perhaps not by the labor that these men have put upon it in Michigan, but by the holding of it until circumstances have made it valuable, upon which they have paid taxes for fifteen or eighteen years, and some man who has no claim at all upon the Government, who has never been misled by the action of its officials, who never has paid a dollar in State tax or anything else, or paid for the land, is to come in and take it as a homesteader or pre-emptioner if he sees fit.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator has just admitted that it was in the power of the Department to withdraw it from settlement and offer it to the highest bidder.

Mr. TELLER. So as to the men who bought the land in the vicinity of Denver, who bought it from a railroad company that had a patent to it, and after there had been two determinations in the Department that it was railroad land and not public land, it is in the power of the President of the United States to put up that land that has now enhanced in in value, having passed through the hands of half a dozen owners, and sell it for a thousand dollars an acre; but it would be downright robbery if he should do it; and there has not been any President who has ever sat in the chair of Washington who would have thought of doing it. The people of the United States are not so poverty-stricken and so poor that they want the Government of the United States to engage in robbing the citizens. They are willing that the Government should do what any individual would be compelled to do by the decent and respectable people of the community in which he lived, and that is, to make good his contracts and not to resort to technicalities of law. I say that the Government of the United States can not afford to take from anybody the land it has conveyed to him when the purchaser believed that he was getting a title from the Government, there being no fraud on his part.

If there was a mistake, what is the rule of equity? That the man who made it must suffer for it, and not the man who acted in good faith. If it was ignorance on the part of the Government officers, then the Government should suffer. If it was fraud on the part of the Government officers, then the Government should suffer and not the citizen, unless the citizen participated in the fraud; and it is only proposed here to treat with the bona fide people, those who acted in good faith.

Now, Mr. President, it may be that you could save fifteen or twenty or thirty thousand dollars of money by these proceedings; it may be that by resuming control of the land I have spoken of that is covered with houses in the city of Denver the Government of the United States can add to its overflowing Treasury; but does the Senator from Arkansas want that done? Does he believe that the constituents who stand behind him want it done? Does he believe the respectable people of this country want it done when it comes out of the pockets of some citizen of the United States who is himself without fault?

Mr. President, money of that kind would be a disgrace to us, and ought to bring misfortune to us as well as to be a disgrace. What we want to do is, if there has been an honest transaction on the part of the citizen with the Government, that that shall be maintained. No government in the world can afford to plead technicalities; no government can afford to say, "The law is against you; you did not know it; but in the mean time I sold you this land; I took your money; I put it in my treasury and have used it; but twenty years later I have discovered a technicality that will enable me to pay you back your money and sell the land to others at an enhanced price."

Mr. President, the very suggestion is abhorrent, it seems to me. If these people took in good faith, then the Government is bound to protect them and to make them a title if it can be made; and the only exception should be cases where there was fraud or collusion with those acting under the Government. Where the honest settler, the bona fide occupier, has gone upon the land and attempted to make title, he ought to be protected, because his interests are paramount to those of the capitalist who put his money in or of the party who has simply bought, because one or the other must be wrong. But where there is no question of occupation, where it was a fair transaction between the Government and the cash purchaser, there ought not to be any hesitation either in this case or in any other in dealing with the citizen; and that is why the committee provide in this bill that where a railroad company not having the title, not being possessed of the title to the land, attempted to sell the land and did sell it under the supposition that it belonged to the company, the citizen believing it as well as the railroad company, and then it turned out that the railroad company did not own it, the Government shall allow him, contrary to public policy now, to buy the land of the Government and not take it by pre-emption or homestead entry. It is because the Government allowed him to be misled by its conduct; and if the Government has directly misled him, then much stronger is the case that the Government should protect him.

Not only did the Government in these cases give the certificates, but years afterwards issued the patents. The Senator says that it was in violation of the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Why did the Commissioner of the General Land Office subsequently, at a period varying from a few months to several years, issue patents for these lands? The truth was that the whole thing proceeded upon a misapprehension as to the law, and that is all there was of it—a misapprehension as to the law by the purchasers and a misapprehension of the law by the Department. Now, it is said that the Government should take advantage of this mistake of the law and deprive these people of what they supposed and had a right to suppose was their property for the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is horrified at the idea that this Government should attempt to take lands because of a mere technicality, and he says the trouble arose from a mistake of the Government. I read six letters—I think there are six—from the Commissioner of the General Land Office at Washington to the local officers at Marquette, telling them again and again, "These lands are not subject to private sale;" and in subsequent letters, "You have disobeyed the orders, and I again remind you that they are not subject to private entry." In the face of that the officers at Marquette went on and sold 800,000 acres of these lands, three-fourths of which were sold to twenty corporations and syndicates, and the same register of the land office is now in partnership with the parties who purchased; and yet the Senator from Colorado says that is a mere technicality, and it would be robbery on the part of the Government to claim the lands. That may be called a technicality in the courts in which he has practiced, but in those in which I have appeared that would be called fraud, and any man who would doubt that these corporations had full knowledge of the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office was instructing the local land officers not to sell these lands at private entry—I say the man who would doubt that knows little of the operations of the corporations of this country.

Mr. President, the whole history of land grants to corporations of every character and description has been that in every instance almost the corporation has failed to comply with the conditions contained in the grant. The history of it is that wherever they have secured an advantage by the decision of any court over any poor settler, they have with merciless hand driven him from his home; and yet when they have made a mistake, when they thought they could purchase in the face of the law, when they knew they were violating the law, when this land would have brought thousands upon thousands of dollars if put up at public sale, when these favored individuals were permitted in the face of the law to take it up at $1.25 an acre and now come and make a pathetic appeal to Congress when they have possession of lands said to be worth to-day millions of dollars, the proposition that these men who paid $1.25 an acre for 800,000 acres of land should receive back only the money paid, the Senator from Colorado thinks would be a great hardship, and he seeks to make an appeal to the Senate and to its sympathy in behalf of these syndicates.

I assert that no man can read the testimony taken before the House committee, no man can read the majority report, without coming to the conclusion that in nine cases out of ten these parties had knowledge of the fraud, and they knew they were gambling, they knew they were speculating, and they have no hold upon this land but that they have secured by paying a dollar and a quarter an acre, lands of immense value, and that their hold is uncertain, and the Department having decided against them they come here now and seek to foist it upon a bill known to be popular, a land-forfeiture bill forfeiting lands granted to railroads. They know they can not get their claim through on its own merits, and their only hope is to tack it onto a bill that the whole country is in favor of, and then they hope by that means to confirm a title which was conceived in fraud and which was known to be a fraud at the time it was done; and these lands, as I said, were sold directly in face of the orders of the Interior Department. If it is right to confirm them under the circumstances, then I have said all that I wish.

I repeat that my information comes from the report made to the Congress of the United States. If it is a false report, the men who made it are responsible for it. It comes from testimony taken week by week of witnesses who have sworn to these facts.

I insist that this land-forfeiture bill, which we all protest that we want to pass, ought not to be clogged and loaded down with amendments which will have a tendency to defeat it, and then Senators go before the country and say the Senate of the United States passed the land-forfeiture bill, but the House of Representatives did not agree to it, when they are placing amendments on it which they know that no man who understands that testimony can conscientiously agree to.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what may be the rule in the courts in which the Senator pleads in Arkansas, but I know what is the rule in the courts in which I have practiced, and that is that there is no fraud to be charged on a party who does not participate in it. It certainly is not so in the higher courts of the United States. No man is chargeable with a fraud who does not participate in it. The Senator does not charge that these cash entrymen participated in fraud.

Mr. BERRY. I assert directly that that report said that three-fourths of this immense body of land was purchased, and that the committee were driven to the conclusion that it was purchased in fraud, and the purchasers must have known it.

Mr. TELLER. That was the impression of the committee without evidence, and my recollection is that there is no evidence which would justify that statement. But if that was true as to a few, what is to be done with the others? No man is chargeable with fraud, I repeat, who himself has not participated in it; and if the Government of the United States puts in a land office a scoundrel, as it frequently does, and that man proceeds to ignore the instructions of his superior, as is frequently the case, and a citizen is misled in putting his money into a purchase of land, is it any answer when he says, "I demand that the Government treat me as an individual would be compelled to treat another individual in any forum of the land," to allege that the land officer committed a fraud without any connection with the party who made the purchase of the land? There is the failure of the Senator's argument. He insists that the settler is responsible for the misconduct of the land officer and the subsequent misconduct (if he is correct) of the Commissioner who proceeded to issue a patent and the President who signed it. Was the President guilty of a fraud? Was the Commissioner guilty of a fraud?

The Senator knows, if he knows anything at all, that this whole proceeding arose from a misunderstanding of the law. There is not any question about it. If there were two men who knew that it was void they went in and bought with their own money a body of land on the supposition that some day the title would be confirmed. They must have been far-seeing men, for it has been a question in the Interior Department until within a very short time whether these were legal and valid entries. It was contended that they were valid most positively by some officers, and it has been only recently that the question has been finally settled.

The Senator from Arkansas can not obscure this question by saying that the amendment is put on here for the purpose of defeating the bill. Why, Mr. President, when did the Senator from Arkansas become the special champion of the people in respect to public lands? I do not want on a bill of this kind to go into a political discussion, but I say that there is, or ought to be, nothing of politics in this case. If there is I am quite prepared to show that the Senator need not throw any stones from that side of the Chamber when it comes to a question of fealty to the settler on the public lands on the part of the administration that preceded the war or the present and those that intervened. If he wants to open up the present administration of public affairs in reference to lands, I shall be quite prepared to meet him on any reasonable bill and at any reasonable time, and if I do not show him that this administration has done more to unsettle titles and disarrange business in the West than the value of the millions of money that he claims have been or are likely to be worth to the Government if it was recovered, I shall give up. There is no politics in this bill.

The Senator can not claim that he is more in favor of the repeal of the law that withholds these lands from settlement than I am. Years before I became charged with duty in another department of the Government, on this floor I advocated again and again a repeal of all the grants made to railroad companies that had not been complied with at that time. As an executive officer I submitted three separate reports to the President, in each of which I urged the legislative department of the Government to take immediate steps to free public land from the incubus of a supposed grant.

The Senator need not stand here, nor need any other Senator, and attempt to hurl at me the stigma that I am in the interest of wishing to give to railroad companies or anybody else the public lands, for upon that question I yield to nobody in this Chamber or elsewhere. Ten years ago in this Chamber I introduced a bill that if it had passed then would have saved the country from a great deal of scandal, from a great deal of trouble, and would have saved a great deal of land for settlers that they perhaps will never get. Not only did I put in bills as early as that to forfeit some of these grants, but a bill which would restrict settlement entirely to homestead settlers, more than ten years ago, and upon every occasion I have advocated the preservation of the public lands for the actual settlers. I did not learn that doctrine in a Democratic school, either, but I was brought up to believe not simply that honesty was the best policy, but that it was a duty; and I would no more by my legislative vote here rob a man of that which belonged to him than I would as a private citizen, and I would be ashamed of myself in the community in which I live if I sheltered myself from an engagement of mine under the statute of limitations or any technical plea. I believe in keeping and maintaining not only the spirit of honesty, but honesty itself. I say that the Government having given to these people a title which they believed to be good, it being now in the power of the Government to make good the title, it is absolute robbery, and would be a national disgrace if we did not make good the title to every man who acted in good faith, and that is the only class of men that we seek to protect by this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BERRY. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the amendment to the amendment lie on the table.

Mr. BERRY called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Arkansas withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. BERRY. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. To my clouded intellect there seems to be a great deal of irrelevant talk. An outsider would hardly appreciate what we are talking about. I know that this discussion may take a very wide range upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin; but what is under discussion now? It is my second amendment to the Senator's amendment, and it reads thus:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry for land heretofore settled upon and now claimed under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws; but in all such cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office and Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties respectively, according to the provisions of existing law.

It is one of the difficulties of my situation, Mr. President, that I was not trained in the law; and again, if I have a legal conviction, or a legal idea, I have not that technical phraseology and those sententious phrases that convince the groundlings (in which I include myself) and people who are not well versed in the law. I can not see why by reserving this right to the settlers and the homesteaders we are doing any injury to the cash-entry men, save taking away from them what is not legally theirs, and then we leave them the resort to the courts. I believe in confirming all these cash entries where there is no conflict. I will not say that there is any fraud in the entries among the purchasers. It is very evident, though, that a great many purchases were made with the conviction that they were buying into a pool; in other words, a gamble; and here is one of the evidences that I submitted yesterday from one of the parties who purchased, and it will speak for itself. This was Mr. A. C. Brown, a very respectable man.

Q. Did you have any talk with other parties living there, on the subject of those lands being reserved from the market?

* * * * * * *

Question repeated.
A. Yes.
Q. With whom?
A. It was a subject of general conversation.
Q. State to the committee whether or not it was generally known there among men dealing in the lands that these lands were within what was termed a lapsed railroad grant?
A. I think it was at that time.
Q. Afterwards you say that in 1880 you did buy some of the lands?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the solicitation of young Mr. Selden?
A. Yes.
Q. You bought them knowing the situation, did you?
A. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you expect to hold that land?
A. I was willing to take my chances of it.

That is scandal, I have no doubt. I am not talking of the legality or the weight of this in a court. I am merely stating that these men, who all bought in good faith, are not idiots. There undoubtedly were some of them innocent purchasers; but most of them knew that they were buying into an uncertain thing, and they were willing to take the chances, just as Mr. Brown says. Now, I am willing to give my vote toward the confirmation of all lands where there is no conflict by bona fide settlers. But the settlers have fought this fight for the last eight years. They have got certain rulings in the Department, and they are suspicious of all these amendments. As I said in regard to the canal discussion, I fear—and here I merely repeat—the Greeks bearing gifts. I do not pretend to call my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] a Greek at all, but that is the way it phrases. If we can protect them by the most stringent amendment that we can adopt, I am in favor of doing it.

The Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday:

Now, when it is asked that Congress shall go beyond that—

That was my first amendment:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The Senator said:

Now, when it is asked that Congress shall go beyond that, I beg leave to say to the Senator from Michigan, with all due respect to him, that the proposition is subject to the just suspicion that it is the purpose to ask Congress to legislate, not on broad principles which shall fairly take in and protect all who ought to be protected, but under some specious guise or disguise to legislate for particular cases, the merits of which the Senate does not understand.

That is what we are all the while suspecting on the other side.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. Any number.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the Senator to explain the difference between the amendment first read, and which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was willing to have incorporated in his amendment, and the amendment the Senator from Michigan is now moving.

Mr. PALMER. Please repeat the question, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator moved this amendment, which was accepted by the Senator from Wisconsin:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

That was accepted by the Senator from Wisconsin. Now the Senator from Michigan moves this amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry of lands heretofore settled upon and now claimed under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws, but in all such cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties respectively according to the provisions of existing law.

Now, I wish to ask the Senator whether there be any distinction or difference between those two amendments save this, that in the last he leaves out the words "in good faith" or "bona fide," and also that he extends the time from the 1st of January, 1888, down to the passage of the act? Is there any other difference?

Mr. PALMER. I should think there was a very great difference. If the Senator will commence on the third line of the last amendment, at the words "but in all such cases," he will see quite a difference.

Mr. BLAIR. That is in the fourth line of the printed amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Where the words occur—

But in all such cases——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I rise to say a word in reference to the order of business.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CULLOM. What I desire to say by unanimous consent is this: There are three bills before the Senate which have been talked about from day to day for nearly a month. We get about so far on this bill and then stop and take up another. It seems to me that we are making very little progress, and while I am a friend to all three of the measures that have been before the Senate, I desire to suggest to those in charge of these several measures and to the Senate generally that by consent we proceed with the consideration of this bill until it is finished, and then by consent go on and finish the bill that comes next in order, so that these bills may be gotten out of the way.

We are making no progress. The bill before the Senate is debated over and over again from day to day; about the same speeches are made, and we get no vote, and it seems to me that it is trifling away very much time that is not necessary to be spent in the way we are doing. I only suggest this in the interest of progress in disposing of the business of the Senate.

Mr. PALMER. I would say so far as I am concerned that I am perfectly willing to continue with this forfeiture bill until we arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 1430 until it is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the consideration of the unfinished business the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be informally laid aside in order that the forfeiture land-grant bill may be continued.

Mr. COKE. I shall be compelled to object, unless unanimous consent is given that the animal-industry bill shall be taken up promptly at 2 o'clock to-morrow and proceeded with until it is disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt this bill will be finished to-day if we go on with it.

Mr. COKE. I am entitled to the floor now, and I prefer not to take the floor after this bill has been disposed of, perhaps at 4 or 5 o'clock; but if I can get unanimous consent to have the unfinished business taken up to-morrow at 2 o'clock, I shall not object to this bill being continued to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CULLOM. I trust the request the Senator makes will be granted, and that we shall go on with the consideration of the forfeiture bill to-day and continue until it is completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Texas that unanimous consent be given that the unfinished business shall be taken up at 2 o'clock to-morrow and proceeded with? The Chair hears none.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire that the unfinished business be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the forfeiture land-grant bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. PALMER. Have I answered the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's answer was that there was a difference, but he did not point it out.

Mr. PALMER. This is the vital part of the second amendment:

But in all such cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties, respectively, according to the provisions of existing law.

I do not understand that that concludes any parties from appealing to the courts after they get through there if they are dissatisfied; but the point of it is that the homesteaders have fought their fight in the Department, and now they do not wish to have it all undone by the amendment, as it would be, of the Senator from Wisconsin. I, not being a lawyer, can not tell what the legal effect of that would be, but I know how lawyers can construe language. They do not want to be relegated to the commencement of that old fight, although I have no doubt that if they had money enough to keep it up they would succeed in the end. They want to have a chock put under the wheels, and not be put down to the foot of the hill again; they have got really to the top. That is the whole animus of my second amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the reason that the words "bona fide," in the first amendment, or "in good faith" are omitted in the second? Why not insert in the third line of the second amendment after "claimed," the words "in good faith" or "bona fide claimed?" What objection could there be that the two amendments should be alike in that respect?

Mr. PALMER. How would the Senator introduce it?

Mr. BLAIR. Let the second amendment read in this wise:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry for land heretofore settled upon and now claimed in good faith under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws.

Mr. PALMER. I see no objection to that.

Mr. BLAIR. Then another point. The second amendment covers time down to the passage of the bill. The first amendment covers the time to the 1st of January last.

Mr. PALMER. I gave my reasons yesterday why I introduced the amendment with this change of phraseology which withdrew that element of limitation of time, and that was this: I received a telegram from Mr. Hopkins, who is a very respectable man, as follows:

BEAR LAKE, Mich., 6th.

To THOMAS W. PALMER:

Don't exclude pre-emption and homesteads taken since January 1. Hundreds of homes have been made since.

GEO. W. HOPKINS.

Those men have gone on under the decisions of the Department. They have had greater reason for going on than any cash entryman ever had for supposing that the lands were in the market. They have had continuous decisions and rulings of the Department, and I say that they should not be limited as to time.

Mr. BLAIR. In other words, the Senator claims that there have been men who have homestead and pre-emption claims arising in good faith since the 1st of last January.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly. That limitation was withdrawn, because I got a telegram yesterday morning stating that the homesteaders were going on encouraged by the decision of the Land Office in Wakefield vs. Cutter, which ruled that "the cash entries on odd sections were absolutely void." I think that was on the 6th of last January. When we talk of these cash entrymen being invited to purchase these lands, even conceding it to be so, they have not had the encouragement to purchase these lands that the homesteaders have had to go and settle upon them. They have had not only decisions of the courts, but rulings of the Land Office.

Another thing in regard to the cash entrymen. They do not deserve the consideration that they should have if they had shown due diligence; but fifteen years ago, in the case of Eldred vs. Sexton, it was decided that their titles were not valid, and yet they have not taken any steps before Congress to have them validated except in some such way as this. That is all there is to the case.

Does the Senator from New Hampshire wish to ask any more questions?

Mr. BLAIR. Would not the Senator's entire purpose be obtained if the words "first of January" in the first amendment should be substituted by the "first of May?" Would not that cover everything that he desires?

Mr. PALMER. That would suit me. Just append that to my substitute. Do you mean my second amendment, for which this is a substitute, or my first amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. I think the first amendment. There seem to be two points of difference between the two amendments. The words "good faith" are left out of the second, and the second brings the time down to the present date, while the first stops at last January. If you introduce the element of good faith in the second amendment you already have it in the first——

Mr. PALMER. I admit that.

Mr. BLAIR. Then they are just alike. Now, if you make the first amendment cover the time down to the 1st of May, then it is just like the second one; each is like the other; and the Senator from Wisconsin in agreeing to say "the 1st of May" instead of "the 1st of January," accepts all that you ask substantially.

Mr. PALMER. That will necessitate the limitation of the 1st of May.

Mr. BLAIR. "Or the passage of the act." There would seem to be great propriety in fixing the 1st of May.

Mr. PALMER. The occupants would prefer the 1st of May to 1st of January, and I am willing to do that.

Mr. BLAIR. There can be no sort of question that amid all this turmoil and hullabaloo in the Senate and all over the country about this bill, as the amendment names the 1st of May this year these folks up there have heard about it, and if you should cover all who have made entries there in good faith down to the 1st of May you would cover everybody that would probably be there.

Mr. PALMER. Then the Senator would suggest the 1st day of May instead of the 1st day of January?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, and making that the date in the first amendment. The last part, "arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States," must include everything that is in the second amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Now the Senator will amend the second as he suggests. What is his suggestion, "in good faith?" Was it the proposition of the Senator that I should withdraw the second amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Wisconsin has accepted the first amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and if he will assent to change the date in the first amendment from January to May, and the Senator from Michigan is willing that only those shall be protected who are claimants in good faith, then the acceptance of this one change in the matter of date, and the adoption of the first amendment would, it seems to me, cover everything that the Senator from Michigan desires, and everything that either party in the controversy desires.

Mr. PALMER. Either the Senator from New Hampshire is confused or I am. The first amendment is the one that substituted "the 1st day of May" for "the 1st day of January." That is the first amendment accepted by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, as I understand it, is to amend that amendment by striking out the word "January" and inserting in lieu of it the word "May," so that it shall provide that this confirmation shall not be operative to confirm any title that comes in conflict with a bona fide preemption made prior to the 1st day of May, 1888.

Mr. PALMER. That is my first amendment accepted by you.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. That is all right. My second amendment is further up, on page 3979 of the RECORD:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed, etc.

Does the Senator from New Hampshire want to amend that?

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin, as has been stated several times, adopted that first amendment.

Mr. PALMER. And he accepts it as amended.

Mr. BLAIR. Commencing—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888.

Now substitute for "January" "May."

Mr. PALMER. That was all finished, but that is not the amendment under discussion. That comes in by a side track. I insist on my amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry for land heretofore settled upon and now claimed under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws; but in all such cases—the Commissioner of the General Land Office and Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties respectively, according to the provisions of existing law.

Here is the point of it—

And my explanation is this: They do not want to have that fight to go over again. They have fought the good fight and I hope they have finished their course, but with that left out they will not feel so.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, while the Senator from Michigan talks a good deal about his not being a lawyer, I have very little sympathy for him in that respect, for I venture the assertion that he has presented no amendment to this bill that has not been drawn by a very good lawyer.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. The second amendment was neither instigated, suggested, nor reviewed by a lawyer—the one that I have substituted the last for. That was drawn by a horny-handed son of toil.

Mr. SPOONER. But how about this?

Mr. PALMER. It was drawn by a lawyer, I hope.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says it was drawn by a lawyer. I do not think any lawyer reading it would hesitate to come to that conclusion.

I only wish to make one remark in regard to this amendment, and then I shall have no more to say on this subject.

The amendment which I have accepted was correctly stated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] as protecting adequately every bona fide settler or pre-emption claimant down to January 1, 1888. This amendment which is now offered, and which was drawn by some lawyer, leaves out the words "in good faith," and the effect of it is simply to exclude from this confirmation every claim on every tract of land upon which up to the time this act passes there shall be a squatter, whether he has squatted in good faith or in bad faith——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?——

Mr. SPOONER. Through fraud or otherwise.

Mr. PALMER. To show him my good faith.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not question your good faith.

Mr. PALMER. I accept the amendments to insert "good faith" and the limitation of time.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, "January" is changed to "May."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modifications to the amendment will be first reported at the desk to avoid confusion. The Chair understood that some modifications had been agreed upon and accepted by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PALMER. To facilitate business, I will say, for the information of the Secretary, that in my first amendment the "first day of January, 1888," is changed, by common consent, to the "first day of May."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let that be reported.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I agreed to accept that amendment if the second amendment which he now proposes was withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. Then that can be considered undone.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to lay upon the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PALMER. I should regret to have that done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Michigan that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. PALMER. I would merely say that if the motion should be adopted I should have to vote against the Spooner amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Am I to understand that this is a motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Chair please state the question again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin be laid upon the table.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know what that amendment is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read by the Secretary, though that can be done only by unanimous consent, the motion not being debatable and the reading being in the nature of debate. The Chair hearing no objection, it will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed section 9, the amendment is to add:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any private entry for land heretofore settled upon and now claimed under color of the homestead or pre-emption laws; but in all such cases the Commissioner of the General Land Office and Secretary of the Interior shall hear and determine the claims of the parties respectively, according to the provisions of existing law.

Mr. BLAIR. By unanimous consent I wish to say that that is not the amendment of the Senator from Michigan as I understand.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken. That is my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The amendment just read is the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, as the Chair understands and is informed by the Secretary.

Mr. SAWYER. I understand that the first amendment that was offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was accepted and is part of my colleague's amendment. Is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PALMER. That is the status of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PALMER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish the Senators in charge of this disputed point would state exactly what the scheme of this bill is about these questions so that we may vote intelligently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this a motion to lay on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a motion to lay on the table. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called). My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is detained from the Chamber by sickness. I do not know how he would vote on this question.

Mr. BERRY (when Mr. VEST's name was called). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If the Senator from Missouri were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. The Senator from Connecticut is away, sick.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], temporarily absent, requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SPOONER (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. I voted, not noticing that he was absent from the Chamber. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 15; as follows:

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. MORRILL] is absent on account of ill-health and may be for some days. I wish to make this announcement once for all as accounting for his not being present.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is absent from the Chamber somewhat indisposed and compelled to take a few days for rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum, and the roll-call will proceed on the pending motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to make a motion now to indefinitely postpone this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motive, if I may be allowed to say so, was simply to make a motion in order to ask my friend from Wisconsin to explain precisely the ground why this amendment ought not to be considered or adopted; but if it is not in order I will not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed on the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BERRY. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. Before that motion is put, I ask to have the amendment read as modified by agreement of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

Mr. BLAIR. There was a change in the date.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 9. That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, however, That where the original cash purchasers are the present owners this act shall be operative to confirm the title only of such said cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of January, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, I wish to accept an amendment to that amendment, fixing the limitation at the 1st day of May instead of the 1st day of January, so that it will save the right of any bona fide homesteader or pre-emption claimant down to the 1st day of May instead of the 1st day of January.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered, that the amendment may be modified as it will now be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to modify the amendment so as to make the last clause read:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this modification? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he has any objection to an amendment striking out——

Mr. BERRY. I decline to yield further. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that upon taking the question on the motion to lay the amendment on the table the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], whom I do not see in his seat, and therefore I can not vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. FAULKNER (when Mr. KENNA'S name was called). I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. VANCE (when Mr. RANSOM'S name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BERRY (when Mr. VEST'S name was called). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] requested me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pair of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] was announced.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am very willing to transfer my pair. I made a pair originally with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and did not know that a subsequent arrangement had been made; but as I am present, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] are absent, I am very glad to transfer my pair to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How does the Senator from West Virginia desire to be recorded on this vote?

Mr. FAULKNER. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

The roll-call was concluded,

Mr. MANDERSON. I announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Berry,	Coke,	Pasco,	Vance,
Blodgett,	Gorman,	Pugh,	Wilson of Iowa.
Call,	Ingalls,	Reagan,

Blair,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Payne,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Frye,	Sawyer,	Teller,
Cullom,	George,	Sherman,	Walthall.
Davis,	Hawley,	Spooner,
Dolph,	McPherson,	Stanford,

Cameron,	Hale,	Morgan,	Vest,
Chace,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Paddock,	Wilson of Md.
Daniel,	Hearst,	Platt,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Davis,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Bate,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Stanford,
Berry,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Stewart,
Blair,	Faulkner,	Manderson,	Stockbridge,

Chandler,	Hampton,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Coke,	Hawley,	Reagan,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum being present, the roll-call will proceed on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to lay the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] on the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] having been called away, I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] unto him.

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore I can not vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I desire to say that the reason for the vote I shall give, contrary to the vote that I gave previously upon this question, was based upon a reply I received to a question I propounded to the Senator from Arkansas——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would remind the Senator from West Virginia that debate is not in order pending a roll-call.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not propose to debate the question. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. BERRY (when Mr. VEST'S name was called). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] requested me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I will state that if present the Senator from Missouri would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Coke,	Palmer,	Vance,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Pasco,	Wilson of Iowa.
Blodgett,	Gorman,	Pugh,

Colquitt,	Hearst,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Daniel,	Hiscock,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Quay,
Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. BERRY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Blair,	George,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Brown,	Gibson,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Chace,	Gray,	Payne,	Teller,

Butler,	Farwell,	Morgan,	Vest.
Cameron,	Hale,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Paddock,	Wilson of Md.
Daniel,	Hearst,	Platt,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I have an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 1 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to except from forfeiture that portion of the grant made by "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, or acts amendatory thereof, conferred by the State of Michigan on the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, lying west of L'Anse, in said State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. DOLPH. I am a member of the committee which reported this bill, but I do not understand the amendment. Before voting upon it I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. PALMER. I will make the explanation, Mr. President, with the Senator's permission.

There was a grant at the same time with the carnival of grants in 1856 made to the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon road. That road has been completed. They have got their lands for the amount of road built up to L'Anse, at the foot of Keweenaw Bay on Lake Superior. There are 60 or 70 miles of that road, as marked out by the original grant, incomplete. There is no intention of completing it, but the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic road have built within the indemnity limits, and they have built the road in such a way as to give rise to the suspicion that they intend to claim that they are the successors of the Marquette and Ontonagon road and their legatees in the matter of this grant.

The amendment is only to make assurance doubly sure. The road has not been built to accommodate the people that it was intended to accommodate, and it would have been built without the grant. This is to put a spike in this inclosure that will make that assurance sure.

Mr. DOLPH. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, if all these questions would not come up before the Departments and before the courts, and the rights of everybody be determined under this general bill which forfeits the lands in the case of all uncompleted roads?

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will permit me, this amendment only declares that nothing in the bill shall be construed to exempt the forfeiture of the grant named.

Mr. DOLPH. Why should it? The bill is plain enough, in a single section forfeiting all these lands. Why should we interfere with all these grants? I move, if in order, to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PALMER. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. PALMER.

Mr. PALMER. The propriety of this amendment may be shown by the fact that this road was about 40 miles or over south of Ontonagon. Still it runs within the indemnity limits and it is suspected by a great many that that road, which has consolidated with the Marquette and Ontonagon road, will claim these lands. It seems to me that a declaration of this kind is very apt at this time and is essential and necessary, and therefore I hope the amendment will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 12, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum having voted——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Chair to state the question again. There is evidently a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. BERRY. The question is to lay it on the table—the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay on the table was not heard at the desk.

Mr. BERRY. I understood that motion to have been made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the question be put again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Chair please state the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the pending question to be upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose that my motion is in order. I moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is in order. No such motion was heard by the Chair or by the clerks at the desk. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] moves that the amendment do lie on the table.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to make some remarks, if I may be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Delaware had risen before the Senator from Oregon made his motion the Chair would recognize him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish simply to say, by consent of the Senator from Oregon——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon withdraw the motion for that purpose?

Mr. DOLPH. I will consent. Before doing that I wish to say that we have been see-sawing here morning after morning upon this bill and upon amendments that never were before the Committee on Public Lands, and which are not understood, and I thought it was time to cut off debate. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table for the present.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply wanted to give my understanding of the amendment, and if I am wrong I should like to be corrected.

I understand that the amendment simply provides that nothing in this proposed act shall be construed to exempt from the forfeiture declared certain lands granted to the State of Michigan in aid of the construction of certain railroads in that State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can not hear the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware will pause for a moment. Complaint is made that on account of confusion in the Chamber the Senator from Delaware can not be heard.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I said that I rose simply to give what I understand to be the object of this amendment so that if I am in error about it some person who may have been giving more attention to this bill than I have might correct my misapprehension.

I understand that the amendment is simply to declare that certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a certain railroad shall not be exempt from the operations of the forfeiture declared by the bill. I understand that the railroad for which the grant was made was never built, but I understand from the Senator from Michigan that another railroad somewhere within the limitations which the other road was to run is now being built, which was not the original grantee of these lands, and he apprehends they may come in and claim the benefit of the lands unless there is an affirmative declaration that the lands shall not be exempted from the forfeiture declared by the bill. If that is the object of the amendment, I am in favor of it. I am not satisfied that any other company should come in and obtain the benefit of the grant which would be forfeited by the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Delaware a question? I agree with what the Senator has said, but I ask him whether there is not some danger, by inserting this provision, of raising an implication on the other hand in favor of some other contrivance up there that does not come within this description by excepting this particular grant?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There might be, perhaps, some inference from the declaration that this grant was particularly excepted and others were not. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I confess I feel very great reluctance in dealing with any of these questions. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was apparently very fair upon its face and right in itself; yet I understand that while it may relieve certain bona fide persons, who may be injured unless it is passed, there are, possibly, some persons who have no equitable or legal claim to lands who, under the operation of that amendment, may come in and get the benefit of it. I confess that I feel great reluctance in dealing with any of these questions.

The suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont has great force. An affirmative declaration that certain lands shall not be exempted from the operation of this proposed act may leave an implication that other lands which are not specified are not treated in the same way. However, I think the amendment, so far as I understand it, and so far as it applies to the particular lands to which it refers, is right, and I shall vote for it.

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose upon the theory of this amendment that I ought to move that nothing in this bill shall be construed to prevent the forfeiture of the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad from Wallula to Portland, and so we ought to go all around through the States and Territories.

The bill as it came from the committee is a very plain one. It is very easily understood. It was proposed by the committee to forfeit all the land grants adjacent to uncompleted road, and to stop there, and then to provide for the rights of persons who have gone unadvisedly into the possession of lands under the railroad companies, and who have made improvements upon their lands.

We have been discussing this measure morning after morning during the entire morning hour. Amendments have been offered and discussed, and withdrawn and reoffered; amendments have been drawn by outside parties affecting particular interests which never have been considered by the Committee on Public Lands; and now we have an amendment offered upon the theory that some other railroad may claim some land which is covered by the bill, or that there is something in the bill that would exclude from its operation the forfeiture of some lands that are adjacent to uncompleted road.

If we can not rest satisfied with the plain declaration of the bill that the lands adjacent to uncompleted road or road not completed and in operation are hereby forfeited, we can not rest on anything.

The amendment relates to a matter that I never heard of before, and I know nothing about it. I never happened to see the amendment; I did not anticipate that it would be offered. If there is another company that has built the road and is entitled to the land I suppose that it would not be lands adjacent to an uncompleted road, and the Secretary of the Interior would say so, and the Supreme Court——

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Not at this moment. The Supreme Court would say so, and that would be the end of it. Would they not? If they are not entitled to the lands, the same power would determine that.

The first section of the bill provides for a forfeiture of all lands adjacent to uncompleted road. If that is not sufficient, and if we must strengthen it by inserting provisions that nothing shall be construed to exempt land adjacent to uncompleted roads in various States and Territories, not to be behind I suppose the Senators from Oregon should offer such an amendment as that in regard to the Northern Pacific Railroad grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I shall vote against this amendment upon the ground that I suggested to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. The amendment appears to be perfectly correct on its face, and declares what appears to be in the bill, but I have observed in the course of rather a long experience here that every bill of this kind that we pass, amended and fixed up and so on, when it comes out in the Departments and in the Supreme Court of the United States does not appear to be the kind of a bill that we thought we were passing. I am very sorry for it, and therefore I shall vote against this amendment, unless I am better advised, upon the ground that it raises an implication, and I do not know how it will apply, although it does not appear to change the state of the law as it will be after the bill is passed.

While I am up I wish to say another thing about the bill and all bills of this kind, that more than six years ago a committee of this body, of which I had the honor to be a member, to whom was referred the subject of these forfeitures as legal subjects, reported a bill most carefully considered and drawn up by the then Senator from Ohio, Judge Thurman, which would have wound up, as the phrase is, and disposed of the whole of this question upon equitable and just principles, if we could at that time have persuaded the Senate that it was a good thing to do. Perhaps I have stated that too strongly, for I am not sure after this length of time but that it did pass the Senate. It certainly met with general approval here, but perhaps in the press of business it did not get acted upon.

But one thing we may be pretty sure of, and that is that under the present decisions, as they now stand, of the Supreme Court of the United States, which finally determine all these private rights, corporate and every other, as between the United States and the claimants, when Congress undertakes to say under the decisions of the Supreme Court as they have been, and are, and undoubtedly will be, that we are to forfeit grants on the sides of roads that have been completed before the passage of the law, in the general case of these lands—there may be exceptions—we are going beyond our constitutional power and are taking away from the grantees vested rights which they have attained, although beyond the period mentioned by Congress in the construction of the roads, and that can not be taken away.

So, in this bill, which brings these questions of the rights of homestead claimants and pre-emptors, scrip, and warrant people, and all that body of persons down to a time that will turn out in point of fact to be after the road has been built, we are inviting disaster upon the very citizens of the United States whom we wish to protect, because we are standing up on their side and saying that their titles shall be good when it will turn out that they will not be good. We are doing them an injury rather than a benefit by legislation of that character, and I am very sorry for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that there is a necessity for the amendment. I am not sure but that the bill itself sufficiently protects the lands that it proposes to declare forfeited against any claim which may be set up by the railroad, referred to by the Senator from Michigan, which is now being built within the limits of the land where the other road was to go But the amendment has been offered, and what will be the effect of a negative vote? If we vote down the amendment, does not the implication arise that there was no intention to exclude that road which is now being constructed from the operation of this forfeiture? It seems to me that we are placed just in this position: If we vote down the amendment the railroad company may infer from that vote that they have a claim to the land.

It is simply to cast my vote right that I desire the information which I rose before to obtain. With my view of it, the amendment having been offered by the Senator from Michigan, I shall not feel justified in withholding my vote from an affirmative declaration that the bill shall operate to exclude that railroad from any of the benefits under the grant made to the State of Michigan.

Mr. PALMER. The object of the amendment was, as I said, to make assurance doubly sure in this case. Here is a road that is built from the terminus of a partially-completed road. It runs within the indemnity limits of the grant, but at the same time it does not go to the point prescribed in the original act, nor does it accommodate the people for whom the original road was to be built.

Any one by looking at this map [exhibiting] can see the propriety of the amendment. The Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon road, as I understand it, has been consolidated with the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic, and the first thing that we shall know will be that they will claim the lands opposite the completed portion of that road, although it was not the road contemplated by the original grant, nor does it accommodate the people whom the original road was intended to benefit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think that under the bill, as it stands, without this amendment, the people to whom he is referring will have any claim at all under the present state of the law or under this bill?

Mr. PALMER. Whether they do or not I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I think this declaration would make it so positive that they never would beleaguer the Departments for the land on the continuation of the road from L'Anse.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I will ask the Senator if he is willing to give his opinion as to the effect of the bill, as it stands, without this amendment, upon the question that he has now invited the attention of the Senate to?

Mr. PALMER. I am not a sufficiently good lawyer to determine on that. I have been mistaken so many times on points of law that I should hate to give a deliberate opinion to an august body like this, but I think that the declaration in the amendment is such that it makes that beyond cavil or peradventure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Extend it to all other roads and I would be with you.

Mr. PALMER. I was going to say that I do not know of a parallel case in the country to this. My colleague agrees with me (and we disagree in a friendly way on many things) that there is danger of the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic road putting in a claim as a successor of the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon road for the lands between L'Anse and Ontonagon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 13; not a quorum voting.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. It is obvious that we shall not do any business here this afternoon. We have had a dozen votes which were unavailing.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senator presses his motion, I ask him to withdraw it for a moment. We had this afternoon set aside on purpose, if possible, to complete the bill. It does seem to me that when we are only struggling with the inadvertence at least, if not the fault, of the Senate itself, in so many absences, the bill ought not to be thus victimized by running off home early in the afternoon. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will please withdraw his motion and let us attempt to complete the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. It is impossible to resist the siren voice of my honorable friend from New Hampshire. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish it were still sweeter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum having been disclosed by the last vote——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Chair to count the Senate to save time, so as to see whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. HOAR. That is contrary to the rule.

Mr. BLAIR. Let us have the yeas and nays. I think a call will develop the presence of a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I wish to say something when we get a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The result of the vote not having been announced, the Senator from New Hampshire asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the request in order that the Senator from Vermont may proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to make this motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the absence of a quorum having been disclosed debate is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There being no quorum, the Chair then is to order the roll to be called, unless, as I think——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the duty of the Chair under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that finding the absence of a quorum we might so far depart from the rule as to authorize the Chair to count the Senate to save time so as to see if a quorum is present; and I submit that request, if it is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I submit that there can be no departure from the rule, even by unanimous consent, when there is no quorum. The Senator from Vermont is out of order in his suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is obviously right under the rule technically.

Mr. HARRIS. Instead of a roll-call I ask consent that we take the vote on the pending amendment by yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the roll must be called first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to make a motion before taking the question by yeas and nays.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bate,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Spooner,
Berry,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Blair,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Stewart,
Blodgett,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Stockbridge,
Brown,	George,	Paddock,	Teller,
Call,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Turpie,
Chace,	Gray,	Pasco,	Vance,
Chandler,	Hampton,	Payne,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Reagan,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Hawley,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,
Dolph,	Hoar,	Sherman,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum being present, the Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish now to move (and I do it under a sense of duty to the Senate and to the country and to the private persons who are concerned as settlers on these lands), to commit the bill again to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report the same back again, amended as they may be advised, as soon as may be. In the course of amendments which have been adopted (the spirit of all of which so far as I understand I am for) I am very much afraid that we have been led into a statement of what is to be statute law that will not stand judicial investigation when these railways come to resist it; and if it does not, we are only misleading the people whom we are trying to help in getting them into lawsuits and difficulties that may bring distress upon them.

I wish, therefore, after all these discussions and all these amendments have been suggested, which present every possible phase of these controversies, that the committee may reframe the bill so as to keep it within the definite decisions of the Supreme Court, to protect every clear right of every citizen, or settler, or anybody else, and to wind up every unearned and unexecuted railway grant that has been made anywhere, and make an end of it. I think this can be much better and more safely done, after these discussions, by the committee than it can be done by the presentation of amendments in the Senate.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will agree to recommit the bill in order to put it into a final shape that will meet the general views the Senate has expressed in its votes, so that it will stand as a clear protection of private rights which can not be properly assailed, and as a clear termination of all public grants to all these corporations that have not been earned, in such a way that we shall not be sorry in two or three or four years that we have been led into such legislation, as I am very much afraid the bill will be if it passes in its present shape of phraseology.

So I make the motion that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to report the same amended as soon as may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question being on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], the Senator from Vermont moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLAIR. I could have wished, as no doubt the committee would have desired, and the Senate, which has labored and struggled with this bill in debate now for nearly two weeks, that the suggestions of the honorable Senator who has just made the motion to recommit might have been available to the committee and to the Senate during the progress of the debate. I feel sure that if there be any difficulties of a legal character in the construction of the bill as it stands at this late day, and, as I had supposed, very near its conclusion, they would have been obviated and removed at a very early period if we had had the benefit of the Senator's criticism earlier upon this floor.

It does seem to me, with great respect to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and our admitted leader here in the Senate, a little too much for him to ask, after all that has been done, the committee having considered the bill a long time and having done the best it knew how to do, the bill having been reported to the Senate, and the Senate having taken charge of it for two weeks, and having modified it very largely, so that it is not now much the bill that the committee came here with, for which the committee is largely responsible—it does, I say, seem to me a stretch of forbearance that the Senator should come in here and move to recommit to the committee itself this measure, which is the work of the Senate far more largely than it is of the Committee on Public Lands.

I do not mean by this to intimate that the Committee on Public Lands has not considered most of the points which the Senate has discussed, and which the Senate has seen fit to incorporate in this measure, and that it did not come here after due deliberation with a general bill covering, as it thought, the great leading features that it was necessary to embody in legislation touching the forfeiture of these unearned land grants. The committee thought it had considered the subject fully, and when it came here, as I have stated, with a general bill, when beyond the control of the committee, in the exercise of rights which individual members of the Senate have here on this floor, the bill has come to what it is.

I assure you, Mr. President, that it is my belief that if the bill goes back to the committee it will commence its labors again with no prospect or probability of returning the bill to the Senate in any better condition than it was in the first place.

If the bill is to go again to any committee, I think it would be a fair suggestion that it should go to some other committee, for I do not believe that the Committee on Public Lands will be able to reproduce to the Senate anything which will be more encouraging as the subject-matter whereon to commence another month of debate than that with which we came here in the first place, and I do hope that the Senator from Vermont will not insist on his motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire misunderstands me if he supposes that I implied any reflection upon the Committee on Public Lands. I made the motion in the spirit that I should have made it if the bill had been reported from the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. In its present condition the short time that I have been able to be in the Senate during these discussions I have heard it stated more than once by gentlemen whom I believe to be members of that committee, that the amendments proposed had not been brought to the attention of the committee at all. Some of them have been agreed to, I understand.

Therefore it is proper and necessary, for the Senator himself says that the Senate has changed the aspect of the bill as it was reported from the committee, that the committee, yielding to the views of the Senate cheerfully, as it may, should take the general expression of the sentiment of the Senate in regard to the general policy and scope of the bill, and put it into a shape of phraseology and enactment that will make peace instead of inviting disputes on every side out of its present aspects and phraseology, if such disputes should arise.

It is not, therefore, in any sense of criticism or complaint of the committee, but exactly the reverse, that I desire, as one member of the Senate, before I vote finally upon this bill, that the committee shall again consider it in all its new aspects and put it into a shape to meet what is the general view and wish of the Senate as expressed in the substance of these amendments, and put it in a condition where we shall not invite trouble, and disaster, and litigation upon all sides growing out of the imperfect phraseology that necessarily arises from amendments on a difficult subject like those that are offered in the Senate.

That is my motive, Mr. President, and nothing else.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the motion will not prevail. It is true that several amendments have been added in the Senate. Some of them, however, were considered by the Committee on Public Lands and reported by that committee in the print of the 7th instant. The main amendment that had not been considered and reported favorably by the committee is section 8, the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. To-day the Senate has adopted, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which I think is a very proper amendment, but it did not go far enough. I think there have been slight amendments to some of the other sections which did not come from the committee. Probably the principal one is the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] granting the right of way over certain odd sections to the city of Portland for the purpose of laying pipes for conducting water, which is not a very serious matter.

This bill has been considered carefully by the Committee on Public Lands. That committee have had during several Congresses this question of land-grant forfeiture before them. In this bill an attempt is made to do precisely what the Senator from Vermont thinks should be done, and what I think we are all agreed upon doing, though some may desire to go further. It is attempted to forfeit the lands which are adjacent to uncompleted road.

It is not to be wondered at in a general bill which applies to all railroad grants that there should have been various amendments thought necessary by Senators, and that those amendments should have been pressed upon the consideration of the Senate. That would be the case again. If the bill should be re-referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and they should proceed to consider the matter and report a bill, that fact would not cut off amendments, and we should have this same discussion to go through with again, and we should have to pass upon the amendments pressed persistently again, as they have been during the discussion upon this bill by Senators from the several States.

I suppose we are now nearly at the close of this discussion. I know of but few other amendments to be offered. There does not seem to be any reason why we should not vote finally this afternoon upon the amendments and upon the bill, and pass it.

It ought not to be forgotten also that after the bill leaves the Senate it has to receive consideration in another branch of Congress, and finally, very likely, by a committee of conference, whose report will come up for consideration in both branches of Congress. So I think we shall be only losing ground and rendering it quite likely that no forfeiture of these land grants will be had at all at the present Congress, or at least at this session of Congress, if the bill in its present condition should go back to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can report it day after to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. The chairman of the committee is not present; we shall probably not have a meeting before Monday, and it would be a long time before it could be reported. Then it would take probably a long time to discuss it and dispose of it in the Senate, as we have been discussing it at the present time. I hope, therefore, the motion will not prevail.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the motion to recommit will not be agreed to. This bill has caused the Senate a good deal of trouble and consumed a considerable portion of its time. There would be just as much difference of opinion in regard to the decisions of the Supreme Court and the constitutional authority that Congress has upon this subject after another report by the Committee on Public Lands as there is now.

There are some of us here, I for one, who do not think the Supreme Court has ever made any decision limiting the power of Congress to forfeit a railroad grant where the railroad company have not complied with the terms of the granting act. I do not believe it is competent for the Supreme Court to invade the constitutional prerogative of this body, either directly or indirectly, either by a decision of a case between parties where they have the power to make their opinion a finality, for that is judicial power, or by a direct decree that this body shall not exercise its constitutional powers.

It is true that judicial power authorizes a judge sitting as a court to make any decision, however absurd, however unreasonable, and to make it the law between the parties; but when that grows to be a public evil, and the public policy of the country is affected and set aside by either of the co-ordinate departments of the Government, then it would become a great public question for serious consideration as to what steps should be taken to effectuate the proper, the declared public policy of the country. But we shall not advance the progress of this bill by a reference of it again to the Committee on Public Lands.

This bill is a compromise on their part. They tried to avoid these questions and to forfeit that portion of the grant which is within the power of Congress without question or dispute. There have been various limitations and qualifications imposed upon this forfeiture; they may be right or they may be wrong; they may have been well considered; but surely the Senate is quite as competent as a whole to consider these questions as any portion of it. We have time, we have opportunity for discussion and consideration here as large, if not larger, than a committee has, and, so far as I am concerned, I prefer a bill settled in the progress of discussion and interchange of opinion in the open Senate rather than a bill formulated by one or two members of the body.

Now, especially in regard to these grants which are in the State of Florida, and with which I am perfectly conversant, the terms of any general forfeiture do require some qualification and some explanatory provisions in the bill which would limit them in respect to those cases that possess peculiar rights and equities so as to allow them to operate in the general protection of settlers and reserving the public domain not yet disposed of for homestead settlement; but this end might not be obtained without some qualifying provisions in the bill, and consequently, so far as that State is concerned, I am prepared to say that the amendments to the bill made in the Senate are of great value, both to those persons who, whether corporations or individuals, possess rights properly acquired, and to those who have settled upon the lands and have a right to have their titles confirmed to them.

For these reasons I hope the bill will be proceeded with and that it will not be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 9——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give it up in order to save any question about a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No further count is demanded. The motion to recommit is not agreed to. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 11.

Mr. TELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to add:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to except from forfeiture that portion of the grant made by "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1856, or acts amendatory thereof, conferred by the State of Michigan on the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, lying west of L'Anse, in said State.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 16; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have some member of the committee explain just what is proposed by section 7 of the bill relating to grants to the State of Iowa.

Mr. BLAIR. That amendment was adopted when I was not present. I respectfully turn the matter over to somebody who understands it.

Mr. DOLPH. Recently the Secretary of the Interior has revoked the orders of withdrawal of indemnity lands where the orders were made without express direction of an act of Congress. Where those withdrawals were made by the act itself, or rather where the Secretary of the Interior was directed by the act of Congress to withdraw the indemnity lands from entry under the land laws for sale, he held that he did not have the authority to revoke the orders of withdrawal. This section simply repeals so much of certain acts as contain a provision requiring the Secretary of the Interior to make withdrawals of indemnity lands as affected that question, and it is proposed that Congress shall do by this section in regard to those roads precisely what the Secretary of the Interior has done in regard to others.

Mr. ALLISON. That explanation, I suppose, is all right as far as it goes, but I do not understand that the Senator states the effect of this legislation on the land grants in Iowa. As to lands which have been purchased, what is the effect of it?

Mr. DOLPH. I have undertaken to make that statement. I would much have preferred myself that the bill should have directed the Secretary of the Interior to revoke these orders of withdrawal of lands within the indemnity limits, but the committee thought it better to repeal so much of the acts of Congress as directed the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw lands from sale which were within indemnity limits. The matter was discussed when the amendment was adopted in the Senate, and it was stated by the chairman of the committee, and I agree in that construction, that the only effect will be to now open up to settlement the lands which have not already been selected by railroad companies which are within the indemnity limits of these roads, and leave the companies, if they have not selected all the lands to which they are entitled, to arrange with the homestead and pre-emption settlers.

Mr. ALLISON. I could not quite understand why this amendment only applied to the States of Iowa and Minnesota if it is in accordance with a general principle.

Mr. DOLPH. Because there are only three cases of land grants in which it was provided in express terms that the Secretary of the Interior should withdraw the lands from settlement.

Mr. ALLISON. I make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. These are the acts mentioned in the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "act" should be inserted in the first line of section 7, on page 7.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it will be found that in the copy of the bill at the Secretary's desk that omission does not occur. The copy which the Senator has is the last printed bill, and there is a manifest omission of a word.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 7, section 7, line 4, of the bill, the section to which the Senator from Oregon called attention, I notice a quotation from the statutes declaring—

That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 17, 1864.

On examination of the statute referred to I find that it was approved May 12, 1864, so that there is a wrong citation. I move to amend in that particular.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that the defect I pointed out is not in the original bill, but it is in the last print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in line 4 of section 7, after the word "May," to strike out "17th" and insert "12th;" so as to read "May 12th, 1864."

The SECRETARY. In line 6——

Mr. ALLISON. In line 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The difficulty occurs from the fact that the Senator from Iowa reads from one print of the bill and the Secretary from another.

Mr. ALLISON. I see that that also is a misprint. The section seems to be in the handwriting of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and the date was intended to be "12th" instead of "17th." The print is "17th."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, then, that the Senator from Iowa does not move any amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I will not if the Secretary will make a distinct "two" instead of "seven," so as to make the date "May 12th" instead of "May 17th."

Mr. PALMER. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 4:

And any lands that may have been found to have been earned by the past construction of the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad in the State of Michigan shall, upon such determination, be certified and patented to said company by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOLPH. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator withdraw that motion so that I can explain the object of the amendment?

Mr. DOLPH. For that purpose I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. PALMER. I will state that I have no interest in this amendment save to give the people of Ontonagon and vicinity an outlet. The act which conferred the grant upon this road by the State of Michigan provided that they could get no land until the road was completed from Ontonagon to the Brulé River. They are cut off from the land grant by this bill. They are bankrupt as far as the road is concerned, and private parties will have to finish it. If they can get their land without the slow process of legislation through the Legislature of Michigan, they can go on, they think, and build down to the intersection of the Duluth, South Shore and Atlantic road, and thereby accommodate the people of the country and save something out of the wreck of the road. It is giving them nothing; it is only expediting the thing and giving them a credit that they otherwise can not get.

Mr. DOLPH. I renew my motion. I do not think the Senate wishes to confirm any grants.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to lay on the table an amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 8:

Provided, That the title to the land described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856, which lies adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited in the granting act, and which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida, and are held by purchase from said companies, made before the year 1856, are hereby confirmed to such purchasers: Provided further, That all the public lands within the State of Florida are hereby withdrawn from all entries except homestead entries until the pending legislation on the subject shall be disposed of, or until the present Congress shall terminate, and also except any sales of a quantity not more than 160 acres to one person, the head of a family; and the register and receiver shall have power to sell isolated tracts of land, whether offered or unoffered, when, in their discretion, it shall be thought best.

Mr. DOLPH rose.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not move to lay this amendment upon the table. I think I can give very good reasons for it.

The grant to the State of Florida is a peculiar one. There was never any disposition made by the Legislature of the State to any railroad company of any of the lands contained in the grant of 1856. Therefore, as a mere legal question, it might be that persons would have derived by purchase from the State or railroad title to lands adjacent to the completed portions of the road which were built within the time specified in the granting act, but for the defect that the Legislature never made any disposition of the land to any of the companies which built the roads.

The internal improvement act of 1855 of the State of Florida contains a section which says that the State of Florida will hereafter grant to such railroad companies as shall build any part of the lines designated in this act any lands which may be granted by the United States to the State of Florida in aid of them, without any other legislation on the part of the State, the roads being built with lands donated from the swamp and overflowed land grant and by cash subscriptions. Without any other legislation referring to the grant of May 17, 1856, there was built within the State of Florida a line of railroad by different companies from Jacksonville, on the route towards Pensacola, being one of the lines designated by the State to be built, but terminating at the town of Quincy, some 175 miles, more or less, from Escambia Bay or Pensacola. So in the other part of the State a line of road was built from Fernandina to Cedar Keys, stopping there. These two lines of road were built within the time designated by the granting act.

Supposing this legislation of the State would become effectuated by some further provision, these lands were sold along the completed portion of the road. The holders and occupiers of these lands for these many years are in this condition, without a title, without an actual disposition of the land by the Legislature, and after these roads had failed and the charters had been taken away from them and the whole system terminated, the Legislature passed an act confirming, so far as the State had any authority to do it, the title of the persons who had acquired these lands from the railroad companies so far as they were built within the time designated in the granting act. So I think there is no objection whatever to making that title good, which this bill does in other cases where there was a grant by the Legislature.

Now, in regard to this other provision which is added to the bill, and is the same as that which has just passed the Senate in regard to Mississippi, withdrawing the lands from sale until the legislation now pending, making a permanent withdrawal and opening them to homestead entry and settlement, shall be disposed of, the law in Florida has been so altered by an act of Congress passed some years ago in regard to public lands that they have been restored to cash entry. Now, in order to allow every one to have an opportunity of acquiring a home, this amendment provides that these lands shall be withdrawn from all entry except pre-emption and homestead entries or cash entries, in quantities not greater than 160 acres to each head of a family. I apprehend there will be no difficulty in regard to that, inasmuch as it is only intended, as the Mississippi act which passed the Senate was, to await the result of the general legislation on this subject now pending, which it is believed will be accomplished.

For these reasons, in order that this amendment which has been added to the bill in regard to the State of Florida, and which was necessary, may be so qualified that it will embrace the class of persons whose title is a just title, and, although not strictly legal, has all the substantial rights attaching to it, because it is derived from the actual completion of the road within the time designated by the original act, and because the Legislature of the State never made any disposition of this land to the railroad company, but has passed an act confirming the right, so far as the State had any authority to do so, of all those persons who acquired any right from the railroad companies up to the point of the completion of the roads within the time designated in the original act.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the amendment lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida on the table.

The question being put, there were ayes 20.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the question be put again. I do not think it was understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks that the question be again submitted. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the amendment of the Senator from Florida lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 20, noes not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] reserved for a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be separately stated and voted upon.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that all the amendments, with the exception of the one specified by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], be voted on in gross.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That there may be no mistake the reserved amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted, as section 9, the following:

That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad puposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, however, That where the original cash purchasers are the present owners this act shall be operative to confirm the title only of such said cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States.

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, other than the one just read, are concurred in in the Senate. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment just read.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend that amendment by striking out in the sixth line the words "by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip," and by inserting in the seventh line, after the word "laws," the words "or under State selections or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the sixth line of the amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip," and in line 7, after the word "laws," to insert "or under State selections or;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, under color of the public-land laws or under State selections or where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, however, That where the original cash purchasers are the present owners this act shall be operative to confirm the title only of such cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. That extends the principle of the amendment to all cases, and only to those cases, where there have been purchases under the authority of an officer of the United States, and where the Secretary of the Interior finds that the purchase has been made without fraud and in good faith and the Government has received and retains the consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether, if his amendment shall be adopted, it will have the effect of confirming the canal selections, the lands selected by the canal company, and if it is not in effect the same amendment he moved in Committee of the Whole and which was laid on the table upon a former day?

Mr. HOAR. It will have the effect to confirm the lands held by the canal company or persons claiming under them, if it shall turn out that that land was conveyed to the canal company by an officer of the United States; further, that the United States received the consideration and now holds it; and, further, that the title was obtained in good faith and without fraud; and I am at a loss to conceive how any man born with a capacity for the sense of justice, undertaking to act in a legislative capacity in the interest of the whole people, can refuse to confirm a title which depends upon such facts.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I am at a loss to conceive how any one born with a sense of justice and right can think that it is proper for a legislative body to undertake to confirm selections of lands, not only to the canal company but to cash purchasers, where the evidence taken shows, and a majority of the committee report, that the lands were selected in fraud; that these persons were parties to the fraud; that the purchases were without consideration, and that these parties have already received many times the value of the canal constructed.

The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin says that it shall only apply to those lands which were selected without fraud. I assert again, as I asserted this morning, that the Secretary of the Interior will be the judge to determine this, but the evidence as to whether or not they were selected or purchased in good faith will be furnished only by the parties in interest, and it practically amounts to confirming to the canal company and to the cash purchasers an immense body of land. That is the reason why I do not agree to the proposition.

Mr. PALMER. I ask to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. HOAR to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PALMER. If that is what I think it is, I am astonished that the Senator should return to the attack again. This, I suppose, confirms the canal selections. It was a nefarious transaction—I will not say from beginning to end, because there may be some very respectable people in it collaterally—but the manipulations of the selections, the removal of an honest officer, the putting in of a pliant tool, the utter defiance of law, the misconstruction of law, the defiance of law in every respect—this is one of the cases where all those terms will apply. They have taken mineral lands when it was expressly declared that they should not take mineral lands. They were confined to the lands nearest the canal, and they left a hiatus of 100,000 acres, and there it is. It seems as if [pointing to a map of the upper peninsula] Providence had come to my relief. There [exhibiting] is the map displaying just the manipulation and maneuvering of that canal company. Here are concentric circles showing——

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I ask him if it is not true that the 15,000 acres in controversy here were part of the second grant, so that there is no question of the location of the land at issue at all?

Mr. PALMER. I do not think that is so material.

Mr. HOAR. What did you say it for?

Mr. PALMER. Because I wanted to pile Pelion upon Ossa. I was a little cumulative. Now the idea; after this has taken up two or three days of the time of the Senate, to throw and inject in the last day, in the afternoon, such a proposition, surprises me. If it was by any one else than the Senator from Massachusetts, or a Senator, I should feel as if I should characterize it in very strong terms. As it is now, I am confined to the assertion that that canal company should receive no favor, except at the hands of a court and in due process of law. Let them have what they can get, but do not let the United States Congress confirm a single acre which they have gotten surreptitiously.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan concedes away his whole case. Here is an amendment which provides for the confirmation only of lands which were sold and selected by the officers of the United States, which were received in good faith and without fraud, and for which the United States has received and now retains the consideration. And he says that describes the selections of the canal company. If it does, his other statements are absolutely contradicted. And upon what do those other statements rest? They rest upon a report of a committee which was drawn and written, as a member of the Senate, the Senator's colleague [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] knows, by a person whose fraudulent conduct has been exposed here over and over again, the person who got people to go onto the lands which belonged to this canal company (the only flaw upon their title being that they were selected on lands of an unearned railroad grant which had not been declared forfeited under the old law), lands selected with the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior and under the opinion of the Attorney-General.

This man got a number of persons to go on the lands and make fraudulent entries, and make contracts with his firm to give them an interest and then to swear that those contracts never had been made; and here in this debate the affidavits of those two partners were presented, one of them swearing that the letters were written in which it was said they would hold these men by their perjury to do their further bidding, but that they were written by his partner and not by him, and denying that the contracts were actually made, and the partner coming in with his affidavit and saying that the contracts were made, and he left the firm so as not to induce men to commit perjury; and that is the man who has been furnishing material to the Senator from Michigan nearly all through this debate, as I am credibly informed, and it is upon his authority and the authority of a report made by a divided committee in the House of Representatives that this act of gross injustice is sought to be carried through, that report being written by the very senior partner of that fraudulent firm.

Mr. PALMER. Nothing could more clearly betray the poverty of the case.

Mr. HOAR. I thought I was giving way for a question?

Mr. PALMER. The intention was to ask who furnished the briefs for the Senator's remarks?

Mr. HOAR. The information for my remarks, Mr. President, was furnished to me first by Hon. Benjamin Dean, of Boston, late a member of the House of Representatives, and counsel for this canal company, a gentleman of high character and standing, a Democratic member of the House of Representatives, known probably to half the Democratic side of the House. More recently the statements were furnished by a gentleman by the name of MacGowan, who is the counsel for Mr. Malvern and a body of citizens of wealth, property, and character. Mr. MacGowan was formerly a member of the House, a gentleman of high standing and character in his profession, and the present owners of this canal company's rights are among some of the best known and most respectable people in the State of Massachusetts. My colleague [Mr. ALLEN] of the other House came to my seat this afternoon to tell me about his neighbors in the city of Lowell. They took the rights of this canal company when it had failed. They raised a million dollars of hard cash and completed the canal, and proceeded to perform all the conditions.

When this matter was first voted down it was voted down on the statement of the Senator from Michigan and of members of the committee that they would simply forfeit the lands and would not enter upon the question of confirming any of them. There was some sense in that. They would leave that to the future. They put in an amendment which I agreed to, leaving that and saying this bill should not touch it. But now you have an amendment confirming all the other titles you can think of in regard to which there are technical defects. You have confirmed the titles in the State of the Senator from Mississippi, the homesteaders; you are confirming by the amendment of my honorable friend from Wisconsin the homesteaders and cash entrymen for whose interests he has an especial concern; and now you are going to leave out of this bill and forfeit the rights of these people who, as I said, have earned their rights and have performed all the conditions imposed on them by law.

The Senator talks about fraud, and when asked what he means by fraud he says they selected mineral lands when they had no right to select mineral lands. That has been answered over and over again. They selected lands in which there were afterwards discovered iron mines, and the opinions of two Attorneys-General have been read in this debate showing that iron mines are not mineral lands within the meaning of our land laws.

Then the Senator said, and he has undertaken to repeat it now within two minutes when the Senator from Oregon put him the question, that they went away from the neighborhood of their canal. The answer to that is that there was a second act of Congress. Finding that there were not lands sufficient to build the canal under the first grant, there was a second act of Congress, giving them an additional 200,000 acres and authorizing them to go anywhere within the upper peninsula of Michigan; and the 15,000 acres here in controversy were selected under that, and that was done after the opinion of the Attorney-General was taken that they might go there, and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, how idle to keep up this parrot cry of "fraud!" "fraud!" "fraud!" The answer to the whole thing is that this amendment so carefully prepared by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin remits all these questions to the decision of the future:

> Shall be operative to confirm the title only of such said cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States.

And the former part of the amendment limits it only to the cases of lands of which the proper officers of the United States made disposition.

It may be that the Senate sits to perform these high acts of legislation; in my own State we call the highest legislative body of that State "the general court;" and it was the understanding of our ancestors that men charged with legislative functions have also the duty, the obligation, and the responsibility in dealing with the great interests of citizens that come before them which rest upon judicial officers; and I say it is a burning shame, it degrades the character of the Senate itself when citizens come here over and over again with a claim like that I have stated and the Senate turns its back on account of these demagogic cries which are attempted to be made, and especially when the Senate turns its back on them when the concoctors of these frauds are sitting in the gallery inspiring the attack.

The Congress of the United States granted 200,000 acres of land to pay the men who should build this canal, so essential to the commerce of that stormy and dangerous coast on that lake, and it was built; and by a second act it was declared that this land might be selected, as I have said, anywhere in the upper peninsula of Michigan; and it was said also that the land should be selected by an officer appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the selections should be confirmed by the Secretary; and in every single instance the facts upon which these titles depend were submitted to the Attorney-General of the United States by the Secretary of the Interior, and they had the approbation of both those high officers; and the only flaw, the only possible defect that the ingenuity of man can conjure up in the title of this canal company is that an old railroad grant had been made, the railroad never having earned the lands, it being supposed, until the Supreme Court decided otherwise, it being held by the Attorney-General of the United States and by the Land Office, that when the railroad company had forfeited its land by failing to complete its road those lands were open to selection by other grantees; and it turned out ten years afterwards that because this old sleeping railroad title was still there, never earned, giving no rightful property to the railroad company, therefore the selection of these lands were invalid.

Mr. GEORGE. May I be allowed to ask a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator wish to be understood as saying that the only reasonable objection to the validity of the grant to the canal company is that some of the lands are located upon lands which had been granted by an act of Congress to a railroad company and not earned by that railroad company?

Mr. HOAR. I do mean exactly that thing.

Mr. GEORGE. And that before the decision in Schulenberg vs. Harriman the land officers of the United States recognized the law to be that on the mere failure of the grantee, the railroad company, to comply with the conditions of the grant the grant was forfeited, and acting on that theory permitted the canal company to take up these lands? Is that the interpretation?

Mr. HOAR. I mean to say exactly that thing, and I mean to add to exactly that thing that the governor of Michigan, to which State this land had been granted for a railroad, made a release to the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the canal company complied with all the conditions of the grant to it?

Mr. HOAR. The canal company complied with all the conditions, and the governor of Michigan so certified. Now, Mr. President, I undertake to say that there is not a member of this body who, having made a grant of land which had failed to his grantee by such a defect, would go home and look his neighbors in the face if he was not ready and eager to do everything that lay in him to confirm it; and is it true that this great, proud, strong, rich American people has a less keen sense of honor than that which dwells in the breast of the very humblest of its legislative servants?

Mr. GEORGE. Now I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts another question. Is the sole effect of the amendment which he has offered, and which is now pending before the Senate, to secure to this canal company the lands which I have referred to in the former colloquy I had with the Senator?

Mr. HOAR. That is the sole effect, and that is upon the condition expressed by the clear statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that they "have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States," and that the parties "have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States."

Mr. PALMER. I think nothing shows the poverty of the case of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts as much as the fact that he has got a phantom that he fights, and that phantom is some lawyer who is stuffing me with information. He does not controvert the facts; at the same time he concedes that attorneys are filling him with information. As a matter of course we have to get our information from somewhere; but in addition to the information I get from attorneys I bring in reports of the House of Representatives, and I was about to have them read the other day and I handed them to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator indulge me?

Mr. PALMER. Always.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask in the presence of the Senate the honorable Secretary of the Interior of the last administration, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], if he does not know these facts that I have stated, if he does not know them on examination, thorough official examination, to be true?

Mr. PALMER. There were so many that the Senator should specify which one.

Mr. HOAR. The whole statement of the case.

Mr. PALMER. He would hardly like to commit himself to all of the Senator's statements.

Mr. TELLER. I have not had occasion to examine this canal question for some time. It has been very thoroughly examined from time to time, and was while I was in charge of the duties of Secretary of the Interior. I think the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is substantially correct. Those are the facts as I understand them and remember them.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator please recapitulate those facts concisely so that we shall know. There were so many facts stated.

Mr. TELLER. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he controverts the statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and if he does, to what extent does he differ with him on the facts?

Mr. PALMER. I can not say whether I can controvert them, but I will try. If I had the RECORD here to know exactly what the Senator said, I could talk more consecutively and more understandingly.

If he says that the only fault of the canal company was that they unintentionally took lands not thinking them to be mineral, and they afterwards turned out to be mineral, I shall not try to contradict him at all. I will merely read from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The best way is to be sustained by documents, and I am only sorry that I have not the current literature here to-day. I supposed the fight was off, and therefore I did not bring up four or five reports showing the nefarious character of this whole canal operation. I will say here, and I say it from——

Mr. GEORGE. "Nefarious," did the Senator say?

Mr. PALMER. N-e—nefarious. I will say that the canal never was completed within the specifications of the Department; that now those arms or piers which were to have afforded a harbor of refuge are not of such a character as to be anything but a damage to navigation, and we shall come before Congress and ask for $350,000 to get this canal out of the hands of that company so that we may make it of practical benefit to navigation on the Lakes. I do not think they have rendered an equivalent.

Mr. GEORGE. Was the canal built according to the terms of the act under which the lands were granted?

Mr. PALMER. I think I can say not with positive certainty, and I will have the literature to fortify me to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the honorable Senator if he, his colleague, has not stated that that canal was completed, and that he went through it himself on the largest steamers?

Mr. PALMER. I think I have heard him say that, and I have heard the Senator from Massachusetts say so a great many times. I do not say they intentionally misrepresent, but I know that such is not the fact. I will place my word against both.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. In the first place does the Senator claim because the land proved to be iron land that it was without the grant?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir. I claim that it was without the grant because it was designated as mineral land, and I can show the reports sustaining that.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think the Senator can sustain that from the Department.

Mr. PALMER. I am merely taking the Department's reports.

Mr. TELLER. That iron land is mineral land within the meaning of the grant?

Mr. PALMER. It was never supposed to be iron land until long after.

Mr. TELLER. If it had been iron land it would not have been excepted from the grant.

Mr. PALMER. Some of the finest copper mines in the world were developed on the margin of this grant.

Mr. CHACE. Right here will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. I want to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. I want to know distinctly whether he says that those copper mines are on this very property or not?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. They are on this property?

Mr. PALMER. You mean the property that we are talking about?

Mr. CHACE. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. No; I think not.

Mr. CHACE. Then I ask the Senator if that bears on this question?

Mr. PALMER. Not at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Are the mineral lands involved in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PALMER. There is a large quantity of iron lands, but I understand from the former Secretary of the Interior that iron lands are not considered as mineral lands. I am perfectly willing to be fair. I do not want to obscure this question by a lot of collateral issues, as seems to be the desire of the other side. But what I say is that the Senate should not want to do anything or ought not to do anything towards confirming lands gotten in violation of law, even although the particular lands I speak of may not have been so gotten, and where they rendered no equivalent I say that we ought not to confirm their title.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the specific violation of law through which these lands were gotten?

Mr. PALMER. These lands that I speak of now?

Mr. GEORGE. The lands referred to in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. We are talking about them.

Mr. PALMER. I do not think that there is any particular violation of law about them.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail. If you want to know anything more about the canal company—I dislike to use epithets; I do not want to hoist any red flag in the way of some agent who is pressing the canal claim in season and out of season—this canal company, not satisfied with having one or two lawyers, has had as many as seven ex-members of Congress who have had access to the floor. This canal company can take care of its own interests without coming here as a supplicant to ask us to confirm an irregular selection.

They knew they were violating the law. They have had able counsel all the time while they were going in upon this railroad reservation. To-morrow morning, if this shall be continued, I can give a little more history of the canal company.

I will say this now: That the canal has never been completed within the specifications; that, notwithstanding my colleague says that the largest vessels can be floated through it, I think I risk nothing in saying that he is mistaken, that he has not been through it within two or three years.

Mr. HOAR. The governor of Michigan has given his certificate.

Mr. PALMER. Which one?

Mr. HOAR. Governor Bagley.

Mr. PALMER. He has been dead several years.

Mr. HOAR. Now, my honorable friend will pardon me. I think this country is entitled to have each one of these facts understood. The Senator from Michigan says that this canal is not completed. My information is that it is completed. The Senator's colleague says that it is completed and he has been through it on the largest steamers. Now, I ask the Senator this question, whether the law did not make it the duty of the governor of his State to inspect the canal and certify whether it was complete, and whether he did not make that certificate—a governor of high character, Governor Bagley? The Senator answers and says he has been dead some years.

Mr. PALMER. I owe the Senator an apology. I thought he was asking in the present tense. He was speaking of the present condition of the canal, and I thought he was bringing to bear Governor Bagley's assertions on that point, and I was surprised when he said Governor Bagley. That was all. I did not mean to cover the thing with derision at all; but the canal has never been completed, notwithstanding the assertions of my very respected colleague, for whom I have the highest regard. I do not think he will reiterate, against my assertion, that the largest vessels can go through the canal.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The Senator will excuse me. I asserted this, and I reassert it, that the Portage Lake Canal was built, according to the certificate of the governor of Michigan, in accordance with the act authorizing its construction. Governor Bagley, of Michigan (whose word was always good in Michigan, and the people of Michigan had the greatest confidence in him as a careful, conscientious man), took a competent person with him, visited the canal, inspected it, found it was completed in accordance with the act granting lands for its construction, and so certified. Now, I think I am right in saying that if he made a mistake and it was not exactly completed in accordance with the contract, that would be immaterial. It was not so; but if it had been, I think the certificate of the completion of the canal was conclusive upon that point.

That canal was built and completed and accepted, I will not say how many years ago, but twelve or fifteen, perhaps more, perhaps sixteen or seventeen years ago. The piers extending into the lake were built, like all the works, or nearly all the works on our Great Lakes, of wood. They were timber piers, such as were required by the contract. It may be possible, in fact I believe it is true, that those piers have gone somewhat to decay, that while those piers extended into Lake Superior to get sufficient depth of water, I think 13 feet, to comply with the requirements of the contract as certified to by the governor, in the course of years they have gone to decay, the sand has accumulated, as it does at the end of all piers constructed on the lakes, as any gentleman familiar with them knows, and from time to time it is necessary to change them. The fact that the canal is not in as good order now as it was and will not pass vessels drawing the same amount of water that it did when it was completed has no effect upon this question at this time. The canal was undoubtedly constructed in accordance with the contract; the certificate provided for was given by the governor, and as a matter of law is final.

I want to say further, while I am upon my feet—I did not propose to be drawn into this matter, and I dislike very much to differ with my honorable colleague on such a subject, and I am only led to do so when it seems to be absolutely necessary—I want to say that there never would have been any question as to the title to the lands which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts seeks to confirm, the 15,000 acres, had it not been that those lands were within the limits of an old railroad grant, and I desire to say only two or three words on that point.

The grant within the limits of which these lands are situated was made to the State of Michigan in 1856. The act granting these lands required that the railroad should be built in ten years or the land should revert to the General Government. The ten years expired in 1866. The Land Department construed that granting act to mean just what it said on the face of it; that if the road was not built in ten years the lands should revert to the General Government. Thereupon after 1866 the Department restored the lands to market. They were open for canal selections, and these lands were selected. They were open to cash entries, and sales were made for cash. They were open to homestead and pre-emption, and such locations were made. That state of things existed until 1874. From 1866 to December 1874, when the Schulenberg vs. Harriman decision was made, the lands were open to sale to anybody who would pay for them, open to homestead entry, open to selections of the character made by the canal company; and it was only after that Schulenberg decision that the lands were withdrawn from market. These selections were made within that time.

My idea is that upon the passage of this bill, when the Government asserts a right of forfeiture which has existed since 1866, and the Government comes into the possession of these lands again by virtue of that forfeiture, Senators should keep in mind that these canal selections were certified by the governor of the State of Michigan for the benefit of the canal. Now the fact is that the legal title under the Schulenberg decision to these lands is in the State of Michigan, and the General Government can not convey title.

The same holds good in regard to the cash entries you have heard so much about for the last week or ten days. The Government undertook to sell lands between 1866 and 1874 which its officers supposed they had a right to sell, because the road was not built within ten years. They sold those lands; they selected the 15,000 acres for the canal company. The Supreme Court in the Schulenberg decision of 1874 decided that the Government was not in possession of a legal title to those lands, but the title was in the State of Michigan. I am no lawyer, neither am I a "horny-handed son of toil," as my colleague is.

Mr. PALMER. I think I have the floor.

Several SENATORS (to Mr. PALMER). Do not interrupt him now.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I think the honest and honorable thing, and the thing which the Senate should do, is, if they pass this bill, thereby reinvesting the Government with the title to these lands, to make good what they attempted to do in years past. I think that view of the case should commend itself to every honest and honorable man. I did not mean to say anything about this matter, and I will not say more now. I was going to take up another branch of the subject, but I will not do it.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, my colleague has not met the point wherein he and I differed, and that was in regard to the capacity of the canal for floating the largest vessels on the Lakes. We might as well close——

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. They were obliged by their contract to give 13 feet of water. They gave more.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Secretary please read what I send to the desk?

The CHIEF CLERK. "House of Representatives, Report No. 684, Forty-eighth Congress, first session."

Mr. PALMER. It is the report of Mr. Henley, from the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. TELLER. I think that report has been read here about half a dozen times.

Mr. PALMER. There have been statements in regard to the completion of the canal made which that contradicts. I do not myself like to contradict unless I have the authority for doing it.

Mr. TELLER. If there is any defect or any vice in this title it does not grow out of the fact that the canal was not completed. That is a new defect.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. TELLER. Let me finish. I want to make my statement so that everybody can understand what I mean.

If there is a defect in this title it is because at the time, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], who has just taken his seat, said, the title was in the State of Michigan and not in the General Government when the certification was made. Now, whether the canal was completed or not, is not a question for us. That has passed beyond the domain of discussion. We said that the governor of Michigan should determine that question. He having determined it, if he made a mistake, everybody understands in law that that is conclusive upon us.

There is no evidence that he made any mistake. There never has been any respectable claim, I think, that he made any mistake. The whole defect, I repeat again, on which these people have been kept from receiving benefit from the land was because there was a misunderstanding in the Department at the time that the certification was made of the rights of the General Government with reference to lands included in that grant, of which there had been no re-entry by the Government, and up to the day of the Schulenberg vs. Harriman decision every act of the Government was in consonance with the act spoken of here.

The Government treated the land as its land and not as the land of the grantee mentioned in the act, whether it was the State or whether it was a company; and I say now whether or not the canal was built is not a question for discussion. The question simply is, whether the Government will now make good the title that it has given to these people or attempted to give them more than fifteen years ago, because the decision in the Harriman case was made in 1874 and the certification was before that. In 1872 I am told the certification was; I do not remember. That is all there is of it; and if we do not make the title good by an act, there is no other way they can get it. The executive department can not give it to them; it must be by legislative action.

As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, if anybody can show any reason why they should not have it, it must be because they did not complete the canal and because Mr. Bagley and they were guilty of fraud. That would vitiate it, and that alone, and nobody in Michigan or anywhere else has ever suggested that Governor Bagley did not certify to that which in his judgment was right.

If he made a mistake, I can say for the legal profession that it is beyond controversy to-day, that when a matter of that kind is left to a tribunal and it has decided it without the right of appeal expressly being claimed or reserved, that decision is final and can not be inquired into by any power, much less can it be inquired into by the United States in a case of this kind.

Mr. PALMER rose.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator before he proceeds allow me to modify my amendment? I wish to add a few words. I desire, with the leave of the Senator——

Mr. PALMER. If it does not involve any further remarks.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir. Where I say "under State selections" I wish to narrow it strictly "under State selections confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification of the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. GEORGE. Does that limit the amendment?

Mr. HOAR. It limits it only to the State selections which the Secretary of the Interior approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "laws," it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and to insert "or under State selections confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. PALMER. This is the most intangible, impalpable, illusory, misleading, nebulous fight that I ever was in. [Laughter.] Part of the time it is the equities, part of the time it is the equivalent, part of the time it is the law, but all the time on general principles "We want the land." [Laughter.] All I have to say is that from the very inception of the removal of the register at Marquette this thing has been open to very grave suspicion, and I contend that it can be shown very evidently, and so that it can not be controverted, that there was collusion at Marquette, and it is a well-known rule of law, I believe—so I have heard it stated in this Chamber—that no man or no corporation can take advantage of its own fraud. Now I would like to have the Secretary read that report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. PALMER. It is the report I have indicated.

The SECRETARY. "House Report No. 684, Forty-eighth Congress, first session."

Mr. DOLPH. Is that subject to objection?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; it is part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is not subject to objection. The Senator from Oregon can object to its being read by the Secretary, but the Senator from Michigan can read it himself.

Mr. DOLPH. I do object, because it has been read over and over again.

Mr. PALMER. Nothing will give me greater pleasure than to read it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not customary to object to the reading of papers by the Secretary.

Mr. DOLPH. I withdraw the objection at the suggestion of some Senators.

Mr. PALMER—

It will be observed—

The report goes on to say—that under the two granting acts——

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to give way for an adjournment.

Mr. PALMER. Presently—

these lands were required to be selected in the tiers of sections nearest the canal, of unappropriated land, not mineral, not covered by pre-emption or homestead claims; and 200,000 acres (those included in the grant of 1865), beyond all controversy, were limited to lands subject to private entry. The selections were in fact made contrary to almost every one of these provisions of law. They were not in the tiers nearest the canal; they were made without reference to subsisting pre-emption or homestead claims; they were made of lands not subject to private entry, and over 15,000 acres were upon lands within this railroad grant and withdrawn for its benefit.

It is well known that this canal company knew that they were entering these lands in contravention of the law. They had able lawyers backing them up all the time who were interested in the company.

It will also be observed that the company was required by the granting act to construct a breakwater, harbor, and ship-canal at least 17 feet in depth, and that by section 5 of the act of 1865, if the work was not "completed" within two years (afterwards extended to December 1, 1873), the lands thereby granted should "revert to the United States."

It is satisfactorily shown to your committee that no sufficient harbor or breakwater has ever been constructed, and that all that has ever been done by the company or its successors to earn this grant was to build a canal about 2 miles in length, connecting Portage Lake with Lake Superior, and at one end thereof build two piers some 600 feet in length, extending into the lake. Even this work was not reported as having been done until June 25, 1875, over eighteen months after the right of forfeiture had accrued under the extending acts. (Governor's certificate, appendix to Canal History, pages 73, 74.)

It still further appears, from the official records of the office of the Chief of Engineers, in the War Department, that the said canal had not up to 1879 been completed in the manner required by the act, particularly as to the depth of water required, actual soundings in that year by the Government engineers showing an average of much less than 13 feet. Your committee has no information that any work has been done upon the canal since that date.

December 16, 1879, Maj. Henry M. Robert, of the Engineer Corps, United States Army, reported as follows upon this subject:

"I do not think the entrance to the canal can be said to be completed until the piers are extended to a depth of water equal to that which is considered necessary at the harbors constructed directly by the United States. If this were done a great deal of the difficulty experienced in entering the canal would disappear. It is not to be expected that a vessel can be easily steered in rough water when its keel almost touches the bottom. This lack of depth of water at the head of the canal is, in my judgment, the greatest difficulty at this point, and the remedy is for the canal company to complete the work, to aid which the United States donated 400,000 acres of land."

From all the foregoing your committee find that these selections were mainly, if not wholly, made contrary to the provisions of law; that the company, during the period allowed before forfeiture, had not performed the work required; that it has never constructed any sufficient harbor or breakwater; that the canal itself, as finally finished, was not "completed," and never has been completed as prescribed by the granting act; and that the company has no equities entitling it to favorable consideration. Your committee are accordingly of opinion that no act confirming these selections should be passed.

Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

JOHN FRUCHIER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of April 12, directing the Secretary of State to transmit to the Senate a copy of the correspondence in his Department in regard to the case of John Fruchier, an American citizen who has been impressed into the military service of France, I transmit herewith a report in relation thereto from the Secretary of State, together with the accompanying papers, not considering their communication to be incompatible with the public interests.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, May 8, 1888.

Mr. STEWART. The person to whom the message relates, who was impressed into the French army, has been released since the resolution was introduced. The correspondence it may be important to print or it may not. I presume the message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, without the order to print, if there be no objection.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the message and accompanying papers from the State Department, in relation to the imprisonment of this American citizen, may be printed. I do not think there will be any objection to it, and it is very desirable that they should be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of C. P. Eppert, no adverse report having been made thereon.

AMENDMENTS TO A BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, is before the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. It is now evident that we are approaching a final vote upon the bill. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] has made a motion to adjourn, and desires an adjournment, wishing to be heard further, I understand, and not having his documents all here, I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill may be resumed to-morrow morning immediately after the conclusion of morning business, and that the vote be taken upon the bill and amendments at half past 1 o'clock.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire to ask the Senate to agree to take the final vote during the day, some time during the session to-morrow.

Mr. PADDOCK. Say 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the formal morning business to-morrow the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill 1430, and that the vote thereon and upon the amendments be taken at half past 1 o'clock.

Mr. CALL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida objects.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be resumed to-morrow morning, immediately at the conclusion of the morning business, and that it be continued until the bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is reminded that a previous order of the Senate requires the resumption of the pleuro-pneumonia bill at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BLAIR. I will modify my request. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be resumed at the termination of the formal morning business to-morrow, and I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to continue its consideration until the bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the consideration of Senate bill 1430 be resumed to-morrow morning at the close of the formal morning business. Is there objection?

Mr. EVARTS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects.

Mr. EVARTS. I object in the hope that we may go on and vote on the bill to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] has moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. I withdraw my motion if there is any chance of concluding the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I think there is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not finish the bill to-night; it is simply impossible. There is a long speech to be made on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as has been read by the Secretary. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CALL. I do not think the bill ought to be passed without a more mature consideration of the matter. I design to address some remarks myself upon the subject.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator care to speak on the pending amendment?

Mr. CALL. I do, and I shall renew the motion to adjourn; I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to adjourn the Senator from Nevada asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

Mr. STEWART. At the request of several Senators I withdraw the demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 21.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bate,	Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Blodgett,	Davis,	Pasco,	Vance,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa.
Call,	Gorman,	Reagan,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Sabin,
Coke,	Hawley,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—21.

Berry,	George,	Palmer,	Teller,
Blair,	Hiscock,	Pugh,	Walthall,
Chace,	Hoar,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Md.
Chandler,	McPherson,	Spooner,
Dolph,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Evarts,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hearst,	Quay,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Ransom,
Beck,	Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Frye,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Butler,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cameron,	Hale,	Morrill,	Voorhees.
Colquitt,	Hampton,	Platt,
Daniel,	Harris,	Plumb,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. BLAIR. Now let us have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I was in favor of an adjournment because I think that the Senate ought to consider somewhat carefully before it passes an amendment of this character. The Interior Department, it is well known by a complaint arising from all over the United States, has disposed of an empire of public lands without the authority of Congress, precisely upon the grounds upon which this amendment is based.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator from Florida will yield for the purpose, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. CALL. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is called for.

Mr. HOAR. May I have unanimous consent to make a statement? I voted against a motion to adjourn, but it was lost by a bare tie. I think it is hardly worth while to ask one-half of the Senate to stay here against its will. I therefore will move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his request for a division, and——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has disposed of the controversy on which we were going to help his amendment through. I ask unanimous consent that we resume the consideration of the bill to-morrow morning at the termination of the formal morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill 1430. Is there objection?

Mr. COKE. Unless it is understood that the bill gives way to the animal-industry bill at 2 o'clock, I object.

Mr. HOAR. That will be done.

Mr. CULLOM and Mr. SAWYER (to Mr. COKE). It can not interfere with you.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire of the Chair if the effect will not be as the Senator from Texas desires?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the adjournment of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the Senate as unfinished business the bill from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, known as the pleuro-pneumonia or animal-industry bill.

Mr. COKE. Then I make no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. BLAIR. It is the understanding that the Senator from Texas will have the floor at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the agreement is that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow morning the Senate will resume the consideration of Senate bill 1430.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair first lays before the Senate the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NEW YORK INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House at the adjournment yesterday was a motion to refer the President's message to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. Will it be in order as a matter of privilege, if the message and bill go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and put it upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order to move to bring it before the House for consideration. The matter does not lose its privilege at all by reason of its reference to a committee, and it is a matter of privilege to move to discharge the committee from its further consideration for the purpose of bringing it before the House, the same as in a case involving the right of a member to a seat on the floor. Is there further objection to the reference of the message?

Mr. PERKINS. I make no further objection.

The message and bill were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NATIONAL ARMORY, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation for shafting, fixtures, etc., for the new milling shop, National Armory, Springfield, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting plans and an amended estimate of an appropriation for the further development of the water-power pool at the Rock Island, Ill., arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

UINTAH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7936) to restore to the public domain a part of the Uintah Indian reservation in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, the amendments simply change the phraseology and do not alter the sense of the bill at all. I therefore ask unanimous consent that they be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 20, after the word "Interior," insert "and upon his order."

Mr. PEEL. The Committee on Indian Affairs have formally passed on the amendments this morning, and I now move that they be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STONE, of Missouri, until Saturday of next week.

To Mr. COBB, until the 16th instant, on account of important business.

WILLIAM R. BLAKESLEE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARLINGTON] had a matter pending before the House yesterday morning when the regular order was called. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] demanded the regular order, but the Chair is advised that he has since withdrawn his objection to the bill. The bill and report were read yesterday. The Clerk will again report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 550) for the relief of William R. Blakeslee.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the record of "dismissal from the service on account of incompetency," now standing against the name of William R. Blakeslee, late surgeon of the One hundred and fifteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and instead thereof show him as being honorably discharged.

The report (by Mr. FORD) is as follows:

William R. Blakeslee resides in Coatesville, Chester County, Pennsylvania. On the 2d of October, 1861, he appeared before the State board of surgeons at Harrisburg, Pa., to undergo an examination for the position of surgeon of one of the Pennsylvania regiments then about to be organized and sent into the field for the defense of the Union. This board was composed of Henry H. Smith, surgeon-general of Pennsylvania, and three other eminent medical gentlemen. Having been examined by said board, he was notified on the 8th of October following that he had been reported to Andrew G. Curtin, governor of Pennsylvania, by the State board of surgeons as worthy of the appointment of surgeon. After receiving his commission he was mustered in the United States service, on the 29th of October following, assigned first to the Thirty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, and soon after to the One hundred and fifteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, then forming in the city of Philadelphia.

He continued with his regiment nearly two years, participating in various battles in which the regiment was engaged, receiving the approval of the medical officers in the corps and division under whom he served.

It appears from the testimony that he was not a favorite of the colonel of the regiment, and that he was required to undergo an examination in December, 1862. On the 23d of January, 1863, he was dismissed from the service for incompetency.

He was afterwards mustered into the service of the militia regiments of Pennsylvania, organized to repel the invasion of that State by the Confederate army, in whose service he continued for eleven months, performing the duties of surgeon to the satisfaction of State Surgeon-General King, of Pennsylvania, Surgeons John Campbell and Jonathan Getterman, of the United States Army.

Henry H. Smith, M. D., formerly surgeon-general of Pennsylvania, says:

"This application for modification of a record and restoration to rank seems to me, from my knowledge of Dr. Blakeslee, only justice to a worthy officer."

William Pepper, provost professor of the theory and practice of medicine of the University of Pennsylvania, uses the following language, under date of March 28, 1887:

"Having known William R. Blakeslee, of Coatesville, for years, and being acquainted with his good professional standing and with his excellent personal and medical qualifications, it gives me pleasure to indorse the above petition."

Dr. Hayes Agnew, professor of surgery in the University of Pennsylvania, says:

"I fully indorse the above."

William White, surgeon of the Philadelphia Hospital, says:

"I warmly indorse the above."

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DARLINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION IN BRUSSELS.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the joint resolution (S. R. 70) and to put it on its passage.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That said invitation is accepted, and that there be, and there hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to effect the purpose of this resolution, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State for the purpose of such representation at said exhibition.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures which may have been incurred under the provisions of this resolution, together with any reports which may be made by the representatives of this country at said exhibition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as that exposition is to be held next month I believe, I should like to hear a statement from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] as to how the money is to be expended, and in what manner it is expected that the United States will be represented at the exhibition.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] will withdraw his objection. This is not a private matter. It is a public matter, a matter of international courtesy, and this is the only opportunity we have to get it before the House. I ask the gentleman to remember that this Government is going to invite the whole world to participate in the celebration of the centennial of the discovery of America three or four years hence. This resolution is in the way of a return for the courtesies we have received from other nations, and I trust that the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague [Mr. CHEADLE] will at least allow a statement as to how the money is to be expended.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us have the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BRYCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

On Saturday last the gentleman from Nevada made a statement in regard to Mr. Hewitt in his speech which I asked him at the time to repeat, as I was not quite certain of his exact language.

This he declined to do, and thereupon I made a denial of the gentleman's words as I understood them to be.

My denial was contradicted and I have accordingly awaited the appearance of the gentleman's speech in the RECORD in order that I might ascertain the exact language used by him in regard to Mr. Hewitt.

I find it to be as follows:

> Can they still cling to a party existing upon an empty but attractive sound, that points with pride to its prime minister, Thomas F. Bayard, and who holds out as a shining example of its confidence, patriotism, and liberality an ex-member of this House who basely apologized to the British minister at Washington for his contemptible duplicity in introducing a resolution of inquiry as to the legality of the trial of an American citizen condemned and executed by a British jury and a British court? I refer to Abram S. Hewitt, the Democratic mayor of the city of New York.

In vindication of my denial I ask that the Clerk may read the following telegram, received yesterday morning from Mr. Hewitt.

The Clerk was proceeding to read, when

Mr. BRUMM said: I do not object to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRYCE] making any explanation as to anything that occurred on the floor of the House; but it strikes me that the reading of a telegraphic message from any person——

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to have the fact settled whether this involves a matter of privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. It affects the veracity of a member.

Mr. BRYCE. My statement has been contradicted; and in proof of the statement, I now propose to have read——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will suspend a moment. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] makes the point of order that no question of privilege is involved here.

Mr. COX. Under the rule anything is a question of privilege which involves the reputation and character of a member.

The SPEAKER. As a Representative only.

Mr. COX. As a Representative only. My colleague [Mr. BRYCE] was challenged here as to his veracity in making a certain statement. It seems to me clear this case comes within the category of the rule.

Mr. BRYCE. I am not here, as I understand, in any position except in my Representative capacity, and any statement made by me must be made in that capacity.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the rule were carried to such an extent, a question of privilege would be presented whenever a member was accused on the floor of having made an erroneous statement as to a matter of fact. That would be an extension of the rule far beyond any construction which has heretofore been put upon it. Of course each case must stand upon its own circumstances, and it is sometimes very difficult to determine what is strictly a question of privilege within the terms of the rule. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. COX. In order to save time, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. BRYCE] may be allowed to proceed. It seems to me but justice that this vindication of the chief magistrate of the city of New York should be placed on record. That is all there is of it. I am sure my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] will not object.

Mr. BRUMM. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. This may be a very proper matter for a personal explanation; but the Chair does not think it comes within the rule as a question of privilege.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to make a brief personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask the Clerk to read the telegram which I have already sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, May 6, 1888.

HON. L. S. BRYCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Have just seen the reports in newspapers. WOODBURN's statements as reported are simply untrue. BRUMM's statement is probably due to forgetfulness. He is entirely wrong. I never made any statement whatever in the House on the O'Donnell business, and never made any apology there or elsewhere. There was nothing to explain or apologize for. The story that I apologized to the British minister was a lie which I contradicted at once in the newspapers in which it appeared. No charge was ever made in the House, and hence I never had occasion there to deny it. The newspaper charge was utterly false, and was contradicted by Mr. West as well as myself. You were quite right to interpose a flat contradiction, and I thank you for it. Will write more fully.

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan (during the reading). I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. My inquiry is whether this telegram can go into the RECORD. Some time ago I tried to get into the RECORD a telegram from the governor of the State of Michigan under very similar circumstances to the present, but I failed in my effort. If a telegram from the governor of Michigan is to be refused publication in the RECORD, I do not see why a telegram from the mayor of New York should receive greater consideration, because the State of Michigan far excels the city of New York. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The case to which the gentleman from Michigan refers arose during a call of the House. At a time when there was no question for debate before the House, the gentleman from Michigan rose in his place and desired to have read a telegram. A point of order was made, and the Chair ruled that the telegram could not be read. In the present case the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRYCE] proposes to have a telegram read as part of his remarks, which are being made under the leave of the House just given.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I see and appreciate the difference. [Laughter.]

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the telegram.

Mr. BRYCE. I now ask the Clerk to read a letter which I have received this morning from Mr. Hewitt.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, May 7, 1888.

MY DEAR BRYCE: A lie once started never ceases to circulate, and every time it reappears it comes up with new additions. Infama crescit eundo. I telegraphed you last night that you were perfectly right in interposing a flat contradiction to the statements of WOODBURN and BRUMM, as they were reported in the newspapers. I have not seen the RECORD, and therefore do not know the exact form in which the charges finally stand.

But the facts are as follows: On the second Monday of the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress I introduced a resolution requesting the President to apply to the British Government for a suspension of the sentence of death against O'Donnell, who was to be executed in the course of the week. This resolution required unanimous consent, and was shown to the Speaker and the leading members on both sides, in order that there might be no objection. It passed, and owing to my efforts was presented to the President on the same night, and the request to the British Government made within twenty-four hours. This action was taken in good faith, and my part in it was never criticised by anybody until some one started the story that I had gone to the British minister to apologize for my action. This, of course, was an unmitigated lie; but it was true that I did see the British minister two days after the passage of the resolution, not for the purpose of discussing it, but in the course of the interview I urged upon him the importance of granting the request in the interests of international comity. No reference was ever made to this matter on the floor of the House; but the story which was circulated was promptly denied by me, not only to reporters, but specifically by a note addressed to the editor of the Irish World, who had made inquiry of me on the subject. Subsequently, in January, Mr. BRUMM introduced a resolution into the House, which you will find on page 477, part 1, volume 15, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Forty-eighth Congress, namely:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to make inquiry whether any foreign minister accredited to the Government of the United States has endeavored to mollify the effects of a unanimous resolution of this House by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members."

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who towards the end of February following made the following report, which you will find on page 1431, volume 15, part 2, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

"The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred resolution No. ——, to wit, resolution that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to make inquiry whether any foreign minister accredited to the Government of the United States has endeavored to mollify the effects of a unanimous resolution of this House, by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members, beg leave respectfully to report that they have under the instructions of the resolution made inquiry and have obtained no information as to whether any foreign minister has endeavored to mollify the effects of a unanimous resolution of this House by representations reflecting on the honor and integrity of its members, and the committee ask to be excused from the further consideration of the resolution.

"Whereupon the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

Mr. BRUMM never offered any other resolution which could have any reference to the O'Donnell matter. My name was not used in connection with these resolutions, and I never made any statement upon the floor of the House upon the subject. There was nothing to explain, either to the House or to anybody else, the allegation that I had in some way intervened with the British minister having been previously denied in the newspapers, where it was made. I am quite sure that when Mr. BRUMM recalls these facts he will withdraw the statements which he is represented to have made on the floor of the House, to the effect that I made an apology at any time, or anywhere, in reference to my connection with the O'Donnell business.

As to the main question, I inclose herewith, first, an interview which I had with a reporter of the Sun immediately after the occurrence; secondly, a letter which I addressed to the editor of the Irish World, narrating all the circumstances, and an editorial in which the editor exonerates me from the malicious charges which had been made; third, a letter from the British minister, in which he distinctly states that I not only made no apology to him, but that I urged favorable consideration for the resolution. I suppose that this statement disposes in full of the malicious slander of which I have been the victim, although I know it will continue to be repeated. If this letter and these documents can be inserted in the RECORD, there will at least be a complete and final official denial of the falsehood which has been many times repeated in the newspapers, but so far as I know has never before been uttered upon the floor of the House.

Yours, sincerely,

ABRAM S. HEWITT.

Hon. LLOYD S. BRYCE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRYCE. I send to the desk to be read a letter from the British minister to Mr. Hewitt.

The Clerk read as follows:

MR. HEWITT AND THE BRITISH MINISTER.

BRITISH LEGATION, Washington, D. C., January 14, 1884.

DEAR MR. HEWITT: In reply to your note of yesterday asking me whether in the course of a social visit you were kind enough to pay me some days ago you said or did anything which could be construed as an apology for your action in moving the resolution in the O'Donnell case, I have only to say I did not regard what you said to me in the light of an apology for the resolution, but an explanation of the peculiar circumstances which prompted it on your part in the interest of the friendly relations which exist between the countries.

This impression was moreover strengthened by your allusion to the moderate language, in your opinion, of the resolution which you gave as a reason why you thought the request for delay in execution of the sentence should be granted, and by your saying that other resolutions less considerate in form had been proposed to you, and, as you were informed, would have been offered if you had not framed one so satisfactory to both sides of the House as not to meet with a single objection, which would have defeated it. I may add that I could not presume there was any evidence, from what you said, of any want of sincerity on your part in moving the resolution in question.

Believe me, yours, very truly,

L. SACKVILLE WEST.

Mr. BRYCE. I think, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I ask the gentleman in this connection whether he has the words that the British minister actually used? The gentleman has not stated at all what was the exact language of the minister or what the conversation was, except on one side.

Mr. BRYCE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that these documents fully justify my position in denying that there was anything base or contemptible on the part of Mr. Hewitt in the matter referred to. In short, they show conclusively that Mr. Hewitt never apologized to the British minister or to this House, as asserted.

It is plainly the purpose of the gentleman from Nevada to excite against Mr. Hewitt the feelings of a warm-hearted and generous people with whose struggles for liberty I heartily sympathize, as I have often heard Mr. Hewitt say he does himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I can only state that I did not seek this controversy. It was thrust upon me, and I could not do otherwise than try to vindicate a gentleman closely connected with me by marriage, and for whom I have besides the highest esteem. This vindication I have made, and I now leave the matter to the calm sense of this House, without regard to partisanship, and to the sober judgment of the American people, which is always right.

I ask unanimous consent that the extracts referred to in Mr. Hewitt's letter be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that certain inclosures in a letter which has been read be printed in connection with his speech. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

[From the New York Sun.]

MR. HEWITT AND MINISTER WEST—WHAT MR. HEWITT THOUGHT AND SAID IN REGARD TO THE O'DONNELL RESOLUTION.

When the dispatches from Washington which charged Congressman Hewitt with duplicity in the matter of the O'Donnell resolution were shown to him yesterday he read them through with a smile. Then he said: "In regard to the statement that I called at once on the British minister and informed him that the resolution didn't mean anything and would amount to nothing, and in other terms belittled it, I have only to say that it is wholly untrue. It is true that after the passage of the resolution I called on Minister West, but my visit was simply a social one. He had called on me and I returned his call. My visit had nothing whatever to do with O'Donnell or the O'Donnell resolution."

"In the course of the conversation during your stay with Mr. West was any reference made to the O'Donnell resolution?"

"Yes; it was discussed by us. I took the position that an American citizen in a foreign country had been on trial for his life, and that as an American citizen he was entitled to a fair trial, and that it was the duty of the American Government to see that he had such a trial. Further, when an American citizen had been convicted of a crime and had been sentenced to die, and the time elapsing between the sentence and the execution was so short as to prohibit a proper examination of the record to ascertain if the trial had been fair, then it was the duty of the Government to ask for an extension of time."

"What did Mr. West say to that?"

"He said that O'Donnell had had a fair trial. I replied to him that that was precisely the point at issue, and the point on which our Government ought to be satisfied before the condemned man was executed."

"What led you to introduce the resolution?"

"Before the introduction of the resolution I had an interview with the Secretary of State, in which I took precisely the same position that I took before Minister West, but I had some doubt whether the Secretary would act in the matter. So I introduced the resolution to make sure that something would be done. In doing this I made no reference to the fact that O'Donnell was of Irish birth. To me his nativity made no difference. He was an American citizen and entitled to his rights as such. If one of those rights was to be hanged for a crime, he ought at least to be hanged according to law."

"It is further charged, Mr. Hewitt, that you went over to the Republican side and begged Republican members, one of them a Philadelphian, to object to its consideration, and that the request was indignantly denied."

"That is also wholly untrue. When I had prepared the resolution I did hand it to prominent members on both sides of the House. It was a matter that required unanimous consent, and I passed it around in order that members might know what it was. This was done to avoid objection, instead of to invite it."

"It is asserted that you said to Minister West that you had introduced the resolution deliberately to forestall one of more belligerent purport, which you said would surely have been introduced and passed had you not thrown yourself into the breach."

"This is untrue, like the rest. I said I had drawn the resolution with great care, in order that it might be within diplomatic usage, and that it might not contain any matter that would give any one in the House cause to object to it. I have been criticised in some quarters because I introduced the resolution at all. Such criticism arises from a misunderstanding of international law. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to see that American citizens in foreign countries are protected in their rights, and that even when guilty of crime they are entitled to a fair trial, and that where time is necessary to ascertain the facts the Government should insist that the time be granted. I think Great Britain has made a mistake in denying this request for time to make an examination. The time will come when she will regret her action. I made no apology to Mr. West, nor was it necessary to make one. I have not seen him since, and I do not know whether he made any representations to his Government concerning my position or not. My position was that of Marcy, Webster, and Seward in reference to the rights of American citizens abroad. I shall be sorry when our Government takes any other position."

[Irish World, March 29, 1884.]

THE HEWITT-WEST AFFAIR—MR. HEWITT'S OWN EXPLANATION OF HIS INTERVIEW ABOUT O'DONNELL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1884.

Editor Irish World:

My attention has been called to an article in your paper of March 8th entitled "Mr. Hewitt and the O'Donnell resolution." I supposed that I had disposed of the calumny when I assured you, in reply to your note, that there was no truth in the allegation that I "had gone to the British minister immediately after having introduced the resolution, and had in effect assured him that the British Government need not be influenced by the action in the O'Donnell case, as it was only a piece of buncombe."

I now repeat that all these allegations are absolutely untrue, and I am surprised that after my uniform and reiterated denials any doubt should exist upon the subject. It certainly has not escaped your observation that not a particle of affirmative proof has been produced in support of the charge against me, and that in calling upon me to make further explanations you require me to prove a negative, which is neither reasonable nor often possible, although in this case, fortunately, I am able to do it by a simple statement of the facts as they occurred.

Before the O'Donnell resolution was offered, on the morning of December 10, I decided to call upon the Secretary of State in reference to the case, not because any human being had asked me to intervene, but from a sense of duty which I could not resist. I had seen it stated that Mr. Justice Denman had made a charge to the jury in regard to the evidence which, I was told by the lawyers, would be good for a new trial in this country. I had learned to my surprise that there was no right of appeal in a criminal trial at Old Bailey except to the clemency of the Crown. It was also known to me that a question of jurisdiction had been made as to whether O'Donnell should be tried at Cape Town, where the ship first reported, or in London, to which she was at once ordered.

The question in my mind was not whether O'Donnell was guilty or innocent, but whether, if he were an American citizen, his legal rights had been respected. In my interview with the Secretary of State, after learning that the Department had already decided O'Donnell to be a citizen of the United States, I called the attention of the Secretary to the questions involved, and urged him to consult with the Attorney-General as to O'Donnell's rights, adding that the American people would hold the administration responsible for their assertion and protection. The Secretary kindly said that he would give prompt attention to the subject, and I left the Department.

Later in the day my colleague, Hon. William E. Robinson, asked me to read the draught of a resolution which related to the O'Donnell case and give an opinion as to the propriety of offering it and the prospect of its passage in the House. After examination I told him that I did not regard it as proper in form and did not think that it could get the unanimous consent required for its introduction. He then asked me to go with him to the lobby to see some gentlemen who were interested in the case. Complying, I found a number of persons, for whom Captain Condon appeared to be the spokesman. They submitted draughts of other resolutions, which I thought objectionable. I tried to prepare one as we stood in the lobby, but finding it impossible I went with Condon to a committee-room, where, after several attempts, I framed the resolution which was finally adopted by the House, and which Condon said would be entirely satisfactory. In order to get it passed it was necessary to have unanimous consent and the recognition of the Speaker. Hence it was shown to him, and to leading members on both sides, some of whom approved and others said they would interpose no objection, which it was my object to avoid, and not to create, as has been absurdly asserted.

The resolution thus offered and passed unanimously went to the Clerk's office to be engrossed. I urged the engrossing clerk to prompt completion, and afterwards went to the office of the Clerk of the House to insure its immediate delivery to the President. General Clark had, however, left his office, but one of his subordinates agreed to deliver a note to him, which I hastily prepared, and which has since been found and returned to me by General Clark, as follows:

"MY DEAR GENERAL: I think that the O'Donnell resolution ought to be delivered to the President to-night, or to-morrow morning at latest, as it may save O'Donnell's life if promptly attended to.

"Yours, in haste,

"ABRAM S. HEWITT.

"General CLARK."

The next morning he assured me that the resolution had been delivered to the President on the night before in accordance with my request.

I have no personal knowledge of the action of the President, but I have no reason to doubt that the request was duly forwarded to the British Government and pressed in the same good faith which characterized its introduction and passage by the House.

Meanwhile a young English friend had come to make me a visit. On Wednesday morning, two days after the passage of the resolution, and when it was no longer in my mind, he asked me to make a call with him on the British minister. That this suggestion was purely accidental is evident from the following extract from a private letter which I have since received from my young friend:

"Some one has forwarded me extracts from the American papers, in which they seem to have made capital for political purposes out of the visit you were unfortunate enough to have accompanied me in to Mr. West when I was with you in Washington. As you never would have gone to see Mr. West at all that day if it had not been for one of the embassy coming in to call on me, they must have drawn very considerably on imagination to invent the story I read of your purposely visiting our representative to explain your resolution about O'Donnell."

The fact is that Mr. West had recently left his card at my rooms, and, as we missed seeing each other the year before, I felt it important to take an early opportunity to return his visit according to the custom usual among gentlemen. The O'Donnell resolution was not in my mind, and I had not the slightest intention of referring to it in any way, but it was spoken of in the course of conversation, and I improved the occasion of a purely social visit to urge upon Mr. West the propriety of the request, and the desirability of acceding to it gracefully in the interest of the friendly relations between the two governments. Not the slightest reference was made to its being made for political effect.

The other less considerate resolutions were referred to, as Mr. West says in his letter, which you have already published, merely as an additional reason why the request should be granted. I do not know that I would have been derelict if I had neglected the opportunity thus afforded me to enforce the request, but how I come to be censured for having urged the propriety of the President's appeal for delay, and the good effects of granting it, passes my comprehension. Certainly, if I had made the visit expressly for this purpose, it would have been proper and commendable. How it could be less so, because the visit was accidental, I fail to see.

I forbear to make any comment upon the motives of those who have circulated malicious stories to my prejudice, but I deem it right to say that you have been misled by erroneous reports (made in violation of the injunction of secrecy) of the occurrences in the room of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as you can readily ascertain from any member of the committee who was present on the occasion. Certainly I was not on the defensive, and no rebukes were addressed to me.

Finally, let me assure you that there is not the slightest foundation for any charge of bad faith against me; but that my motives, from first to last, were neither to gain nor lose popularity, but solely to perform my duty as a representative of the people by seeing that the rights of American citizens in foreign countries were duly guarded and protected. If my call on the British minister within two days after the passage of the resolution was an "unfortunate coincidence" I certainly turned it to good account by urging the granting of the request upon the representative of the British Government, in whose hands were "the issues of life and death" in O'Donnell's case.

Finally, let it always be remembered that moderation and courtesy afforded the only possible chance of securing a favorable response. I would have been guilty of gross folly if I had taken any other attitude in my intercourse with the British minister, with whom it is alike my duty and my privilege to preserve friendly relations.

Respectfully, yours,

A. S. HEWITT.

[An incident in a man's life, like a passage in a book, ought to be read in the light of the context. Mr. Hewitt's career has been clean and straightforward. His simple word respecting any question of fact that might be raised would have been sufficient for us. But Minister West's story of the "explanation not an apology," with a few delicate touches here and there, suggested to many minds that there was some sort of an entangling alliance in the affair. It looked like a distinction without a difference. Doubtless the English minister, whatever disguise of friendship he puts on, would like to see Mr. Hewitt punished for his action in the O'Donnell case, and doubtless, also, he does not feel a particle of sincere regret at the embarrassment that has been given to Mr. Hewitt.

England is thoroughly perfidious in her dealings with other nations. Those that she selects as her emissaries are men who are cold-blooded as they are suave. An episode in the life of Ben. Franklin is here called to mind. Lord Hillsborough, a member of the British Government, had expressed himself in private concerning Franklin in very angry terms, calling him an intermeddler, "a factious, mischievous fellow," and the like.

But to Franklin's face my Lord Hillsborough acted quite differently. He affected to be very liberal, wished well to Ireland, was particularly in love with America, and was very kind and attentive to old Ben., who was his guest for awhile. "He wished," writes Franklin, "that I would favor him with my sentiments. He seemed attentive to everything that might make my stay in his house agreeable to me, and put his eldest son, Lord Killwarling, into his phaeton with me to drive me a round of 40 miles that I might see the country, the seats, and manufactures, covering me with his own great-coat lest I should take cold. In short, he seemed extremely solicitous to impress me and the Americans through me with a good opinion of him (and, of course, ultimately with a good opinion of England through him). All which I could not but wonder at, knowing that he likes neither America nor me; and I thought it inexplicable but on the supposition that he apprehended an approaching storm. But I think all the plausible behavior I have described is meant only by patting and stroking the horse to make him more patient while the reins are drawn tighter and the spurs set deeper into his sides." These are the methods which men in England's interest always employ. Americans who "dearly love a lord" are caught in the snare. But Franklin's head was level as his heart was well disposed.

On a review of the whole affair seen in the light of Mr. Hewitt's long and unblemished course, we do not for a moment question that he acted in entire good faith with respect to the O'Donnell resolution; but he was unhappy in his subsequent policy, if the term may be used, which to some appeared a weakness, and which the Englishman's letter does not strengthen, but which Mr. Hewitt himself (and he certainly is the best exponent of his own intention) says was based solely on "moderation and courtesy" with a view to the "securing a favorable response." But here let the matter end. Generous remembrance of Mr. Hewitt's noble services in the past and a sense of justice in the present demand his vindication.—EDITOR IRISH WORLD.]

Mr. WOODBURN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLOUNT. Before this debate goes any further I would like to have some understanding as to when it is to terminate.

Mr. WOODBURN. I desire to make a few remarks in vindication of myself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object to that; but I think there ought to be some limitation.

Mr. WOODBURN. I shall occupy not more than two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I have been three times a member of this august body, but I never have——

Mr. ROGERS Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr: SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. If we are to have questions of order discussed here we want order preserved on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will resume their seats, and public business will be suspended until order is restored on the floor.

Mr. WOODBURN. But I never have in my lifetime knowingly made a charge that I can not substantiate. I do not regard the denial of the British minister—or his letter—as a denial of the charge. In fact it is an admission that Mr. Hewitt did so say. It is no better authority than the gentleman's statement that he knows the facts to be otherwise because he is related by marriage to Abram S. Hewitt.

When I made this charge I was informed by a reputable gentleman in Washington, who was on the floor of the House when I did make it, that he was one of a committee of three representative Irishmen delegated by the Irish organizations of America to investigate the truth of this charge made against Mr. Hewitt; and that member of the committee stated to me, and said he could prove it, that the result of their investigation and deliberation was that Mr. Abram S. Hewitt was guilty. One of the committee is correspondent of the New York Irish World, and another is Mr. O'Meagher Condon; and taking their statements in addition to the current literature of the day, and with additional statements made by reputable members of the House, I made the charge, and do not take it back. I must have better authority than a letter over the signature of Mr. Abram S. Hewitt, the interested party, the defendant in the case, to warrant me in changing the assertion that I made.

Mr. BRUMM rose.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] desires to make a brief statement.

Mr. BRUMM. My friend from New York will bear me out in this statement, that after the controversy that occurred here a few days ago we had a conversation with each other, a friendly conversation; that we looked over the RECORD to see what had been said, and that I there and then agreed that the gentleman might either not publish anything in the RECORD with reference to it, or that he might strike out the word "apologize" and insert "explain," or fix it up in any way to satisfy himself consistently with the truth.

I stated that I had no disposition to hurt the feelings of anybody, and certainly no disposition to do injustice to Mr. Hewitt. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BRYCE] did fix up the RECORD. The record is not as it was. But I have no objection to make to the manner in which the gentleman saw fit to alter it from what actually was said. He fixed it up to suit himself, and I have no objection to make.

But, Mr. Speaker, when the charge is made that there was no explanation made by Mr. Hewitt, so much of that charge I still maintain is false, or at least not correct. The apology was made by Mr. Hewitt; and, according to my recollection, it was made on the floor of the House in a speech by Mr. Hewitt, and I shall take the trouble to examine the RECORD at leisure to see whether I am not correct in that recollection.

But, however it may be, whether made on the floor of the House or not, the explanation—and that is the mildest term I can use—was made by Mr. Hewitt before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I asked to go before that committee, but I never was summoned before it. At my request I was permitted to make a statement before that committee, and I asked the committee to summon Mr. Hewitt as a witness. I also requested that they summon the British minister to be investigated and questioned, but no action was taken by the committee.

Mr. BRYCE. Why did they not?

Mr. COX. They had no power.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, I am not questioning now why they did not. I am only stating the facts to the House. Let the country judge as to why they did not; but they did not, at all events. There was certainly no harm at least in requesting the British minister to appear before the committee and submit himself to a cross-examination, and also request Mr. Hewitt to come before them and submit himself to examination and cross-examination. Neither was done.

A day or so after I appeared before the committee I was told that the committee had permitted Mr. Hewitt to come before them and make a statement, not in my presence, not with notice to me, but with no notice to anybody that was interested on the other side in that resolution, and without being subjected to cross-examination, and a short time after the resolution that was read was brought into this House.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that was an explanation at least, if not an apology; if not, I do not know what you might call it. It was enough to convince the committee that they ought to accommodate Mr. Hewitt by going no further in the matter, for they did not make any investigation at all.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] is entitled to the floor; he has thirteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is said that when Burke, Pitt, and Fox contended in debate in the British Parliament they were so supremely masters that no one else dared to speak when they had spoken. Yet as time went on it was found that some members, on occasions when great questions were being discussed, would rise to their feet and in apparent forgetfulness give expression to their feelings on the pending measure. On one of these occasions the member who had spoken was approached by a brother member of Parliament and asked how he dared to speak after Fox had spoken. His reply was, "Because, sir, I am as much interested in that subject as he."

So, Mr. Chairman, my excuse, if indeed an excuse be necessary, for addressing the committee on the bill now under discussion is that my constituents are as much interested in the Mills bill as the people in any of the districts represented on this floor by the managers of this debate.

The questions presented are not new. The best manner of raising a revenue to support the Government and what measures should be adopted to relieve the recently politically emancipated colonies from the equally grinding and humiliating commercial superiority which England held over her late dependencies were questions which the fathers of the Republic were early called upon to meet and solve. It is said that it was the boast of the younger Pitt, during the period of our political existence under the "Articles of Confederation," that the united colonies had not only been reconquered as commercial dependencies, but that they were a surer source of revenue to England than before they had gained their political independence.

The history of that period furnishes us an instructive lesson. With no regular and uniform system of import duties, and no power under the Articles of Confederation to compel the several States to pay their proportion of the sums found necessary to support the Government and float the large debt incurred in the war for independence, the condition of our forefathers was deplorable indeed. They, however, were equal to the occasion, and the first step to insure a permanency of that liberty for which they had so long contended was in the framing and adoption of our Constitution.

The question that then met them is the one which is now before us, namely: The best method of deriving a revenue. An examination of the debates at that time will show as wide a range of opinions and quite as vehement declamation as have been indulged in in the discussion of the present proposed tariff measure.

The first Congress which assembled under our Constitution declared in favor of the wisdom of the policy which the Republican party has ever contended for, in the enactment of a law which affirmed that—

It is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactories, that duties be laid on imported goods, wares, and merchandise.

Hamilton, in his celebrated report to the House of Representatives in 1790, demonstrated with a logic that was irresistible that if we were to become a recognized power among the nations of the earth, the protection of home manufactories of all classes and kinds was the most direct and surest method. Time has demonstrated the wisdom of his words and his far-seeing statesmanship. The bitterest opponents of what we denominate our protective system are compelled to admit that our periods of greatest national prosperity have been under well regulated and adjusted protective tariff laws, while our periods of greatest financial depression and distress have followed the repeal and readjustment of those laws under the leadership of the believers in free trade and the declaimers for that glittering generality that the "world's market" furnishes a place where you can buy your needed articles of consumption the cheapest and sell your surplus products the dearest.

Henry Clay, the founder of our "American system," in discussing this great economic question, stated, in a public address, that the most disastrous period he had ever witnessed to our financial, commercial, and industrial interests had been during the seven years preceding the tariff of 1824—a period when the Millses, Carlisles, and Breckinridges of that day had obtained control of our national affairs and ingrafted upon our statute laws their heresies of free trade—and that the period of greatest prosperity to all our commercial and industrial interests was during the seven years following that act of 1824.

The history of those times confirms the statement of that great friend of American industries, and had he lived to see the wondrous change wrought under the tariff laws of our country from 1860 to the present time well might he have accounted it among the most glorious monuments to his memory that during his long, useful, and brilliant public career he was ever the champion and friend of protected industries in this country.

Mr. Blaine, in his letter accepting the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1884, brought before his countrymen in forceful language the results of this system in the following statement:

After 1860 the business of the country was encouraged and developed by a protective tariff. At the end of twenty years the total property of the United States, as returned by the census of 1880, amounted to the enormous aggregate of $44,000,000,000. This great result was attained notwithstanding the fact that countless millions had in the interval been wasted in the progress of a bloody war. It thus appears that while our population between 1860 and 1880 increased 66 per cent. the aggregate property of the country increased 214 per cent., showing a largely enhanced wealth per capita among the people. Thirty thousand million of dollars had been added during these twenty years to the permanent wealth of the nation—$1,500,000,000 per annum.

This marvelous showing of national prosperity has no parallel in the world's history. It is the wonder of all nations, and will forever remain a monument to the patriotism and statesmanship of the Republican party. It is at this wondrous prosperity and an overflowing National Treasury that the assaults of the Democratic patty are being directed. The President's message clearly defined the issue upon which the coming campaign is to be fought, and his note of alarm is taken as the slogan of his party. Disguise it as his more discreet followers may, the fact can not be kept from the American people in the campaign of 1888, that the Democratic party is committed fully, unequivocally, and irrevocably to the doctrine of free trade.

The Republican party in the campaign of 1884 called the attention of the public to the platform of the Democratic party, adopted at their convention in Chicago, and claimed that a change of administration meant a change in these economic principles which govern our revenue system and industrial interests; but like the responses of the double-dealing oracle at Delphos the Chicago platform was interpreted by the Democratic speakers and leaders to meet the requirements and wishes of all classes, trades, and callings.

In our industrial centers it was interpreted to mean protection to wage-workers; while in the blue-grass regions of Kentucky it was interpreted to mean trade as free as the air we breathe or the sunlight we absorb.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, your party came into power by practicing a system of false pretenses on the American people unequaled in the history of political parties. At the close of the late civil war the broken and disorganized fragments of the Democratic party were gathered together, tenderly nursed, and sought to be reorganized and united on abandoned issues of the Republican party in its march of progress and reform.

Learning nothing in each defeat, but gaining in audacity and power to dissimulate its real motives and present a seemingly patriotic exterior, while it harbored dark and murderous designs upon all the great manufacturing, agricultural, and material interests of our country, it nerved itself to a superhuman effort in 1884, and by various fraudulent and false charges against the party of the people, and the claim that an overflowing Treasury meant overtaxation and distress to the great laboring classes, it succeeded in being, after a quarter of a century, restored to national power.

As a matter of historical interest, Mr. Chairman, I call to your attention the position of the Democratic party in the State of New York. The Republican speakers, from one end to the other of that State, charged then, as is now demonstrated, that the success of the Democratic party meant the disturbance of the protective tariff laws of our country. That was denied, but by whom? Did you send your Speaker, Mr. CARLISLE, or the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, Mr. MILLS, to the State of New York to expound the Democratic doctrine and explain your Chicago platform? Did Mr. HEMPHILL, of South Carolina, and Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, go to that State and talk to the manufacturers and the mechanics their views on free trade and protection, as they have expressed them on the pending bill during this debate?

No, sir! The managers of your party during that campaign knew that the imperial State of New York, with its diversified interests, could never be carried on the political and party principles of these men. Whom did they look to? When your columns were wavering and defeat seemed inevitable, you all turned, Mr. Chairman, to the brainiest and safest man in your party. You called for Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, to come to the State of New York, and in a series of speeches well advertised and largely attended, he explained to the voters of that State that the tariff system of this country should not be disturbed in case of the success of the Democratic party, and that the plank in the Chicago platform upon that subject meant only a wise and judicious adjustment of the inequalities which we all acknowledge, and which we all contend should be remedied. His well-known record upon this question, his integrity and worth, all united to give weight to his utterances. And it could be his proud boast that his efforts in the State of New York in behalf of his party made it possible for Grover Cleveland to occupy the President's chair.

How have his efforts been repaid by your party? And how have his pledges on its behalf been kept? If Dame Rumor can be relied upon, Mr. RANDALL is no longer a welcome visitor at the White House. His counsels are no longer potent with his party, and his influence in his own State has been attempted to be crippled and curtailed by raising up a rival who basks in the sunshine of Presidential favors and whose unlimited control of Federal patronage has been liberally used to humiliate and disgrace this friend of American protection who was the once honored leader of his party in this House.

I stated, Mr. Chairman, that the issue presented is the issue of free trade as against protection, and in support of that charge I appeal to the message of the President which was sent to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of this session. The logical conclusions to be drawn from that message lead inevitably to a re-establishment of free trade in this country. It has been so received and so interpreted, not only by unprejudiced minds on this side of the Atlantic, but has been hailed with shouts of delight in free-trade England.

I will quote but a single paragraph from the Glasgow Herald:

"It is a condition which confronts us, not a theory." Precisely so. Words almost identical with these have been used and with enormous effect in this country by Adam Smith, by Richard Cobden, and by Sir Robert Peel. President Cleveland may say to others, therefore, and think what he chooses, but he has precipitated the inevitable struggle between free trade and protection in the United States, and that is tantamount to saying that he is on the side of free trade.

I could multiply like statements from English journals and English public speakers regarding the President's message almost without number, had I the time. But I take it to be unnecessary, for there is no Democrat on this floor bold enough or audacious enough to claim that the President's message has not been interpreted in England as favoring the free-trade doctrines as taught by Richard Cobden.

But I will not stop here, Mr. Chairman. The Speakership of this House is an office in honor, dignity, and influence second only to that of the Presidency. I hold in my hand a paper which gives a list of the names of the American members of the Cobden Club and the dates of becoming members. In running my eye over that list, I find that JOHN G. CARLISLE, of Covington, Ky., became an American member of the Cobden Club in 1883. I would not knowingly do Mr. Speaker CARLISLE a personal injury or misstate his political position. The sources from which I have derived this information have seemed to be authentic and reliable. But, sir, before commenting upon it I will pause for a denial of this charge, if one can be truthfully made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Yes; for a question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to ask the gentleman if Mr. CARLISLE was a member of that club before General Garfield was a member of it or not?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman knows that General Garfield repudiated his election to that club, while Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE seems to be proud of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. When did General Garfield repudiate it?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I can not go into a controversy about that. I have made the charge and thrown down the gauntlet for the Democratic party to deny that the Speaker of this House is a member of the Cobden Club. If any man can truthfully deny it let him step forward. If not, let him hold his peace.

What a spectacle does this exhibit to the manufacturers, business men, and laborers in New York, who were deluded into voting the Democratic ticket in 1884, under the promises and pledges of such speakers as Mr. RANDALL. What a spectacle, Mr. Chairman, does it exhibit to our industrial interests wherever they may be found. The follower of Richard Cobden, and a firm believer in his free-trade principles, by a solid Democratic vote is made the Speaker of this House—is elected to a position, Mr. Chairman, where he has almost autocratic powers in shaping the legislation of our country. He, and he alone, has the power of naming the Committee on Ways and Means, the committee which has exclusive jurisdiction of the revenue bills of the House. In that committee, so prepared by this disciple of Richard Cobden, do you, Mr. Chairman, find among the Democratic members of that committee a single man who agrees with Mr. RANDALL on this question of protecting American industries? Not one. They are firm believers in the principles of political economy as expounded by Mr. Speaker CARLISLE.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the principles of the Cobden Club dominate the legislation of this House and stand sponsors for the bill now under consideration. The chairman of that committee in opening this debate gave expression to these sentiments with an abandon and freedom that is truly refreshing. And the praise that he has received from free-trade sources has been unstinted. I quote but a single paragraph from Henry George's paper—the Standard—under date of April 28:

POLITICS THAT MEAN SOMETHING.

Mr. MILLS's speech in opening the tariff debate, as printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, justifies the impression produced by the telegraphic reports. It is a manly, vigorous, and most effective free-trade speech, abounding with telling points that go to the very heart of protection. It ought to be largely circulated as a campaign document.

But, Mr. Chairman, to establish the charge I have made it is unnecessary to quote from free-trade journals, either at home or abroad. But a day or two ago one of the trusted leaders of your party delivered a speech upon this floor in support of this bill, and stated the principles of free trade with a precision and ability that would have done credit to Mr. Cobden himself. I refer to Mr. HEMPHILL, of South Carolina. In the course of his remarks, in speaking of the manufacturer asking for protection, he said:

But against what? Not against the "pauper labor," for they are not here, and not against the products of their toil, so long as these are not sold here, but the protection asked for is against allowing Americans to buy or exchange; i. e., against the natural right of any free man to make his purchases where his taste inclines him, or his judgment or interest dictates; so that it is not against the pauper labor of Europe, or of any other country, but it is against the right of the American people to buy where and what they please that this protection is demanded.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will ask the gentleman a question. Do you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly; I think that is right.

Here, Mr. Chairman, are the answers of a man who is too honest in his convictions in favor of absolute free trade to hesitate or dodge when the direful consequences of such a policy are so pointedly brought out. This doctrine, you will observe, it is found necessary to state in advocating the enactment into a law of this so-called Mills bill. Mr. HEMPHILL belongs to the dominant faction of the Democratic party. He is recognized as one of its leaders, and his counsels and those who are in political sympathy with him, as expressed in his speech, will control the administration of the Government so long as the Democratic party remains in power.

What does this doctrine that the manufacturers and the employers of this country "should be permitted to hire where they can hire cheapest" mean? It means, Mr. Chairman, that the owners and managers of the coal mines of Maryland and Illinois, and the coal and iron mines of Virginia and Alabama, Pennsylvania, and these other great States interested in these industries, can lock out their employés for any cause or pretense and fill their places with the contract labor of Europe. It means that the factories and furnaces in all of the great manufacturing States can be supplied by starving operatives from Belgium, England, and other overcrowded countries of the Old World. It means that the scenes of squalor, of poverty, and distress found among the laboring poor of Europe, which make the heart sick to contemplate, shall be the future lot and portion of the great laboring classes of America. Ay, Mr. Chairman, it means more than that. It means that the importation of Chinese coolies, which to-day, like a great cancer upon the body-politic in the Pacific Coast States, threatens their lives, shall be renewed and be unrestricted. The very contemplation of such results shocks the sensibilities of every friend of labor. I pray God that in my time the economic principles which lead directly to such results will never find sway or control in America.

But, Mr. Chairman, the condition of our National Treasury is pointed to as an excuse for the passage of this iniquitous bill.

In the language of the President, a "condition confronts us," namely, an overflowing and ever-increasing surplus in the Treasury. This is taken as an excuse for the framing and passage of the Mills bill by this Congress. Before giving some of the reasons which constrain me to oppose this bill, I desire to say that if the President and his advisers would use a little of the common sense which characterizes the conduct of a Western farmer, no trouble would be found in disposing advantageously to the Government of this surplus. An Illinois farmer with a well-filled wallet and a good bank account besides, would not become frightened or dismayed at the idea that his annual income from his farm exceeded the actual necessities of conducting the same and supporting his family, and especially so if he owed any large sums to his creditors, and his farm needed new fences to properly protect it, and improvements in the way of barns and other buildings to care for the stock and farm implements which he had gathered about him. As a sensible man he would liquidate his outstanding indebtedness with his surplus money, so far as he would be enabled to do so. What remained would be used in repairing his fences and building new, that his farm might not be overrun by his neighbor's stock, and in the construction of barns and sheds, that the horses, cattle, and other stock might be protected from the storms of winter.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that to meet the obligations of the Government during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, will require $326,000,530.

The yearly income of the Government from all sources aggregates $383,000,000.

The sources of this income are as follows:

Import duties	$228,000,000
Internal-revenue taxes	120,000,000
From sales of public lands	10,000,000
From national banks	2,000,000
From interest and sinking fund, Pacific Railroad	2,000,000
From customs fees, fines, penalties, etc	1,150,000
From fees consular, letters patent, and lands	3,500,000
From sales of public property	330,000
From profits on coinage, assay, etc	9,000,000
From deposits for surveying public lands	150,000
From revenues of District of Columbia	2,400,000
From miscellaneous sources	4,500,000

This aggregates $56,470,000 as an income of the Government in excess of its expenditures during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, under the estimates, as I have already stated, of the Secretary of the Treasury. If the expenditures are less than those estimated, the surplus at the end of the fiscal year will of course be correspondingly increased. This surplus can not exceed the Secretary's estimate more than ten or fifteen million dollars. Our outstanding indebtedness, as shown by the Treasury reports, is $1,706,833,377.17. Of this vast sum $228,054,600 4½ per cent. bonds mature in 1891. The law of March 3, 1881, empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to apply this surplus money in the Treasury, or so much thereof as he might consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds. This law, Mr. Chairman, it seems, has been well understood by every person in this country, excepting, perhaps, the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, as authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use any surplus in the Treasury to purchase or redeem United States bonds. One of the purposes for which that law was enacted was to keep the money in circulation among the people and avoid financial distress.

The present Administration has studiously ignored the provisions of this law, and has permitted millions upon millions to accumulate in the Treasury, and now use this as a pretext for attacking our industrial interests. The remedy proposed by the President is to attack our protective-tariff system in the inequitable, illogical, and purely sectional bill now under consideration. That great Democratic leader, Samuel J. Tilden, who has now gone to his long rest, in a letter full of patriotism, and inspired by the true spirit of statesmanship, in the early part of the present Administration, called the attention of the President and his countrymen to the defenseless condition of our seacoast cities, to the thousands of miles of our unprotected seaboard, and advised that liberal appropriations be made from the Treasury for coast and harbor defenses. Why, Mr. Chairman, does not this Administration set in circulation some of these hoarded millions in the Treasury by appropriating them to such noble and patriotic purposes? Why sit idly by and send up the impotent cry that a crisis is imminent in the financial affairs of our country from this surplus in the Treasury when it could be used to restore our Navy, now the derision of the world, to its old-time glory? Why not use some of these surplus millions in harbor improvements and in improving the great water ways that run to the sea?

The answer is plain to all thinking men. The free-trade faction of the Democratic party has obtained supreme control of the Government. They long for the day when the principles of political economy as taught by Richard Cobden shall control, not only the trade and commerce of this country, but our manufacturing and industrial interests as well.

By the methods which I have here hastily sketched they have sought to bring about this "condition" which the President in his message tells us "confronts us," and now pretend that they are seeking to allay the same by the remedies proposed in the Mills bill. This bill is presented under the seductive title "to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue."

An examination of the bill, however, discloses a very different purpose. The framers of this bill fear the result of the exposure of their free-trade doctrine, and seek to cover their real purposes by pretending that they are not to interfere with the manufacturing and laboring interests of the country by an indiscriminate assault upon the tariff laws, but rather by a judicious and equitable revision of the same.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is sectional in character. I propose now to call the attention of the committee and the country to some of its provisions, in support of this charge. Wool is an agricultural product, and one in which the farmers of this country are extensively interested. In Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan it is an important branch of husbandry. More or less attention is paid to sheep-raising, either for wool or for mutton, in all the Northern, Western, and Northwestern States and Territories. More than one million persons are engaged in this industry. The capital invested, at a low estimate, on the very highest authority aggregates $350,000,000. The number of sheep in this country aggregate 43,544,755, and the total clip of wool for the year 1887 was 269,000,000 pounds. The Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means propose to "simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue" by putting this vast industry on the free-list, and in their report to the House accompanying this bill they give as one of their excuses for putting it on the free-list that it is a "raw material."

I deny this, Mr. Chairman. Wool is no more a raw material than woolen cloth is a raw material. It is the finished product of the farmer. It requires months of care, labor, and the expenditure of capital to produce it. And when it is washed and clipped it is presented by the farmer as his finished product to the manufacturer to go through another process before it reaches the consumer. The woolen cloth furnished by the manufacturer holds the same relation to the person who takes it from him to cut and make it into clothing that wool does to the manufacturer. Each is the finished product of the one producing it. This illustration is sufficient to demonstrate the falsity of the excuse given by the Ways and Means Committee for putting this product upon the free-list.

Another excuse given is to reduce the price of woolen goods. If the Democratic members of that committee are not seeking to strike down this great industry, but believe, as they pretend, that putting articles on the free-list will reduce the price to the consumer, why did they not in this bill put all woolen goods on the free-list along with it? To reply in the style of argument in which they so freely indulge, they deprive the farmers engaged in this industry of all benefits of our protective-tariff system and still make him pay tribute in the purchase of his woolen goods to the already overprotected woolen manufacturer. Gentlemen, to be consistent you should have the courage of your convictions and put all articles in which wool is used on the free-list along with it. This is the test from which you shrink. You are afraid that the people of this country will not sustain you in the coming campaign in this attempt to interfere with our protective system, and hence seek to cover these attacks upon it by the specious arguments set forth in your report accompanying this bill. That this vast industry will be injured by being placed on the free-list is apparent to the most casual observer.

Under the stimulating effect of the protective-tariff laws of 1867 our flocks increased from 28,477,951 sheep in 1870 to 50,626,620 in 1884, an increase in that short space of time of more than 77 per cent., while under the reduction of the revision of the tariff of 1883, this vast number has decreased to 43,544,755 sheep in 1888, a loss to the industry of 14 per cent. in the number of sheep in the short space of four years. With a protective tariff which will properly protect this industry the time is not far distant when the American farmer will furnish all the wool consumed in this country. To put it on the free-list means its destruction.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I can not refrain from quoting the following from a speech delivered recently by Hon. George L. Converse, of Ohio:

The production at home of woods and woolens in quantities sufficient to supply the wants of the American people is necessary for our defense in war, and our independence and comfort in time of peace. Successful military campaigns can not be carried on without woolen clothes for the soldiers. More soldiers die from exposure than are killed in battle. Neither of these great industries once destroyed can be again restored within a short time. Their restoration would require many years, and the men who by legislation would knowingly destroy them here and remit them to the keeping of foreign nations can not be classed among the friends of the Union.

To illustrate the sectional character of this bill, I now call the attention of the committee and the country to the manner in which this Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means have legislated on the subject of rice. This also is a farm product; and of the 110,131,373 pounds produced in the crop of 1879, as reported in the census of 1880, 100,635,513 pounds were produced by the Southern States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, a Southern product, as you will see, and cultivated in Democratic States. During the three last years the amount of rice entered for consumption from foreign countries, and the duty paid thereon in the form of tax by consumers as our free-trade friends contend, is as follows:

Year.	Entered for consumption.	Duty.
	Pounds.
1885	116,392,598	$1,619,576
1886	92,596,341	1,184,257
1887	95,585,490	972,614

Rice is a food product consumed largely by the laboring classes of this country. Why not furnish cheap food as well as cheap clothing, if the argument of the majority of the committee is to prevail, and put rice on the free-list? But instead of that, Mr. Chairman, we find that the tariff on rice is increased rather than diminished, and the importers of that food product have called the attention of the public to the fact that the duties now proposed in the Mills bill are actually higher than those which prevailed during the war, from 1861 to 1864. It is claimed by those who are conversant with the process and expense of rice culture that it can be grown and sold at 3 cents per pound, cleaned, pay all the charges of production, and leave a good margin of profit to the planter. And at 3 cents per pound cleaned, 44 bushels to the acre nets the planter $22 per acre. And at 80 bushels per acre, which it is claimed is not an unusual yield, a net profit to the planter of $48 per acre.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, this is an industry which it is claimed should be protected by a high duty on imported rice. A less number of persons are interested in this country in rice production than in the production of wool. The capital invested is less and the product is one which is used in every home. No argument can be used for placing wool on the free-list which will not be as forceful in placing rice on the free-list. It is easier, however, in this so-called revision of the tariff laws, to strike a blow at an industry cultivated in Republican States than to interfere with those which prosper in Democratic States.

Again, Mr. Chairman, why not place sugar on the free-list? Here is a product as universal in its consumption as tea or coffee. The quantity and value of sugar imported into the United States during the past five years, as shown by the official records of the Treasury Department, are as follows:

Year.	Pounds.	Value.
1883	2,133,956,284	$91,519,476
1884	2,756,416,896	98,262,907
1885	2,717,884,653	72,519,514
1886	2,689,881,765	80,773,744
1887	3,136,443,240	78,411,224

The amount entered for immediate consumption, with the duty paid on the same, during this period was:

Year.	Pounds.	Value.
1883	2,049,668,786	$44,665,647
1884	2,562,719,594	47,560,750
1885	2,748,646,118	50,885,916
1886	2,701,020,874	50,265,538
1887	2,999,450,481	56,567,466

Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, that the people of this country pay a tax annually on imported sugar of nearly $60,000,000. If the object of this bill is to reduce the revenues and furnish cheap food for the people, how better can that object be subserved than by placing sugar on the free-list? The whole sugar-producing interest in this country, on the most accurate and reliable authority, does not exceed in value $60,000,000. This interest is limited almost wholly to Louisiana. The sugar consumed by the rich and the poor during a period of less than eighteen months is taxed by import duties in an amount sufficient to pay for the entire capital invested in that interest in this country and leave many millions besides. And yet the friends of this Mills bill, for the alleged purpose of reducing the revenues of the country $5,390,054.73 duties on imported wool, are willing to imperil this great wool industry with its aggregate capital, as I have already shown, of $350,000,000. If wool or sugar must be placed on the free-list, which,

I ask, in the name of justice, will best subserve the interests of the people and at the same time contribute most to reduce this dangerous surplus in the Treasury? Nothing but the most partisan and sectional feeling could have prompted this bill which covers these two great farm products—the one protected and the other on the free-list.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I for one shall vote to put sugar on the free-list, and if my voice and my vote will have any influence in determining that question, the laboring people from my section of the country shall no longer pay a tribute to the planters of Louisiana in the way of an import duty on that product.

But, sir, when I say this I do not mean that I should place the sugar planter at the mercy of foreign competition. I believe that the production of sugar can in time be increased to meet the entire demands of the country and that it can be produced here sufficiently cheap to drive from the market the imported product. Until that time I would protect it by a bounty, as France and other countries have done in developing this wonderful industry. Many other products are placed on the free-list which come in direct competition with the products of the Canada farmer. This will undoubtedly prove eminently satisfactory to the Canada producer. He is protected by the laws of Canada from any competition with the American product, while his surplus products can be shipped to this country free of duty and put in competition with the products of the American farmer. Among those products are potatoes, beans, peas, fresh vegetables of all kinds, meats, game and poultry; plums, prunes, currants, dates, hemp, etc., and many other articles which I might name.

And still, Mr. Chairman, your party, which is committed to the support of this bill, has the audacity to pose as the friend of the farmer. During the debate almost every friend of the bill has denounced the manufacturer and claimed that what is paid on imported articles produced by him is robbed from the people by taxation. It is a charge easily made, but under a well adjusted revenue law incapable of proof. The tariff laws are, first and foremost, for raising a revenue to maintain the Government, and, secondary to this, to develop the varied and wonderful resources of this country and insure to the laborer a fair and just compensation for his services. That the system has worked well is apparent from the well-fed, well-clothed, and well-paid mechanics of this country.

I shall not stop to indulge in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] characterized as a bewildering array of figures to establish this. Every intelligent man knows it. If there are individual exceptions, as claimed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], they arise from exceptional causes not incident to the tariff laws, and, like all exceptions, prove the rule.

Our mechanics and laborers furnish a picture of contentment and prosperity that can not be duplicated among the laboring classes in any other country in the world. If anybody is interested in breaking down our tariff system it is the manufacturer. If he could have free trade in the hiring of his employés we would no longer find the intelligent and prosperous class of workingmen who are an honor to our country. The starving hordes of Europe would be shipped here to supplant them. Here is an interview with Judge Caton, of Illinois, one of the large manufacturers in our State, published in the Chicago Tribune shortly after the President's message was given to the country:

INTERVIEW.

Have you read the President's message?
It has been read to me.
What do you think of it?
It is a remarkable document, in view of what a message is supposed to be.
What will be the result of it?
The tariff question is now squarely brought before the country as a national, a political, and a Presidential issue. A notice has been served that the Treasury is sucking up the money which ought to be in circulation, and that the business and commercial prosperity of the country is at stake, and must be considered in preference to other questions.
You seem to be in favor of a reduction of the tariff?
I am at the present time.
Why?
Well, among other things, I am a manufacturer.
And as a manufacturer you believe that the tariff should be reduced?
I do; and for a reason which I think has not been advanced. The manufacturer is not making any money, and does not profit by the tariff. The skilled laborer gets the profit. Advance the tariff on the manufactured article, and the confederation of trades advances his wages often above the tariff advance.
You say you have had experience. In what direction?
As a glass manufacturer. I think we have in Ottawa the best glass-works in the country. We seem to be busy at all times. Up to date I have never received a dividend. On the contrary, in order to preserve our plant and the capital invested in it, I have advanced funds from time to time and the several works instead of paying me a profit are in debt to me perhaps a hundred thousand dollars or more. The high tariff imposed for our protection has all gone to the skilled laborer. The blower, lowest in the scale of usefulness, gets $4 per day, and the best men $8 per day. The blowers are like the iron puddlers at the blast-furnaces who get from $8 to $12 per day. I believe, if the tariff were abolished and our works shut down for a year, as they would have to be, the laborer would return to reason and allow our business to be conducted with some profit to the manufacturer. I am not alone in this view. I think you will find the sentiment growing among manufacturers that their invested money brings no return, but rather outlay, and that the only remedy is in the abolition of the tariff and a general suspension of manufacturing until the labor system shall be placed on a paying basis to capital.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, until the labor system of this country shall be like that of Belgium and free-trade England. This is the deliberate judgment of a man not only eminent in Illinois, but whose fame is not confined to the limits of his own country. This great glass industry which he mentions as being located at Ottawa, Ill., has not escaped the tariff tinkers who prepared the Mills bill. A large reduction has been made in the tariff on all kinds of imported glass of the character produced at this manufactory. In view of the deliberate judgment of Judge Caton, as expressed in the interview which I have just had read, I ask you, is this not a blow at the laborers engaged in that industry? As he well states in the interview, he does not stand alone in this view favoring the removal of our tariff laws. It is a feeling that is finding favor with the great capitalists and manufacturers everywhere in the country. It is not patriotic, not calculated to subserve the best interests of the country in developing our great and varied interests and resources. It is purely selfish, and if successful, by the adoption of free-trade principles in this country, can have but one result, that of degrading the American mechanic to the level of the European operative.

My time is too limited to take this bill up in detail and show all of its inconsistencies, its partisan and its sectional character. I will be pardoned, however, for calling to the attention of the committee a little incident which occurred during the address of Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, the other day in support of this bill, as illustrating its partisan character. It is important in the approaching campaign that the State of Virginia shall be continued in the list of States which furnish 153 solid electoral Democratic votes. In the earlier days of our Republic Virginia favored free trade because her labor was free. There was a consistency in the Virginia planter, who owned his laborers, demanding absolute free trade. But since the blighting curse of slavery has forever disappeared the people of that State have come to realize that Virginia can never recover her old time position in this Union of States without the development of all of the diversified interests which are found in such rich and abundant supplies within her borders. And learning wisdom from the example of such manufacturing States as Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, her citizens, instead of bending their energies to one product or industry in the State, like Moses of old, who smote the rock in Horeb and brought forth abundant supplies of water for the preservation of the children of Israel, have blasted the rocks in her mountains and brought forth rich iron ores in abundance; have mined the great coal fields which have slept for ages undisturbed, and have started on that new era which, if unimpaired by the substitution of free trade for our protective system of home industries, will restore Virginia to that exalted position she once held when she was known as the "Mother of Presidents."

The logic of this bill would place iron ore and coal upon the free-list; and had the same disregard for the great industries which flourish in Northern and Republican States, as I have already pointed out, been followed in the preparation of this bill those articles would have been placed there. And it is even claimed by many that such is the fact from the proper construction of the bill. The construction, however, was combated by Mr. MCMILLIN in his speech the other day, but his argument did not seem to satisfy the Virginia Representative [Mr. O'FERRALL].

The following clipping, however, from the Washington Critic of April 26 indicates that an understanding has been reached between these two gentlemen, who are willing to destroy the wool industry and jeopardize an invested capital of $350,000,000 by placing that farm product on the free-list.

Here it is:

THE IRON AND COAL TARIFF.

There was a little talk yesterday that the Ways and Means Committee would amend the tariff bill so as to include iron and coal on the free-list, but Mr. MCMILLIN has assured Colonel O'FERRALL, of Virginia, that nothing of the kind is contemplated, and what is more, the phraseology of the tariff bill will be changed so that all doubts on the point of free iron and coal will be removed. This will be interesting news to the people of Southwestern Virginia.

Aside from the argument that the necessities of the situation require that the State of Virginia shall give its electoral vote to the Democratic party this fall, no argument can be urged in favor of a duty on those products that will not be equally effective in protecting all the vast and varied industries of this country, many of which are being jeopardized by advocating the passage of this bill, and will be utterly destroyed if it becomes a law.

I can not sympathize with those who denounce protection of home industries as a species of robbery. The argument in favor of protection rests upon the great principle of the advantage of diversified production. Every industry is stimulated and benefited under a well-regulated tariff law. It keeps the currency in circulation among our people instead of draining our country of it and sending it abroad to purchase products manufactured in foreign countries and thus avoids financial distress. It brings the consumer and producer together and saves the cost of transportation. Fifty men composing a community all engaged in agriculture would each only have one consumer for his products. Diversify their interests by placing them in groups of ten, and each group of producers would have his home market increased fivefold. If each engaged in a separate industry, each would have fifty consumers for his product, and they together would become a self-sustaining and independent community. Sound economic principles require that so far as may be practicable, every section and locality in our country shall have diversified interests, numerous enough to be self-sustaining. Economically considered, it is the development of that political idea which has made the New England township the model political organization of the world, a little republic in itself. And as the great Frenchman, De Tocqueville said, while it exists the Republic will flourish.

So while this protective theory is maintained our country will go on in its marvelous accumulation of wealth and prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], in his free-trade argument here the other day, in his attempt to establish what he characterizes as the iniquitous protective system, claimed that our tariff laws discriminate against the great West from which we both come, and took the States of Massachusetts and Illinois and contrasted their wealth per capita in 1860 and again in 1880, and drew what seemed to him a very pleasing picture to the detriment or disadvantage of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. I had hoped that I should have the opportunity of perusing his remarks in the RECORD before making any answer to his unjust statements, but that privilege has been denied by his discreetly withholding the reporter's notes of his address.

Among his many claims was that the average per capita of wealth in Illinois in 1860 was $227, and that in the twenty years intervening from 1860 to 1880 the State progressed so slowly in the development of wealth that her per capita of wealth was but $255 in 1880, while the great manufacturing State of Massachusetts, with a per capita of wealth of $631 in 1860, by the development of her manufacturing industries had increased her per capita of wealth in 1880 to $888—an increased per capita in Illinois of $28, and in Massachusetts of $257. These figures, as I learn, are based upon the assessed valuation of the property of these two States at these two different periods. His conclusions are drawn from them without taking into consideration the fact that the assessed valuation of the property in Massachusetts is obtained upon an entirely different basis from that in Illinois. Of course his conclusion and argument drawn from such figures are utterly worthless. The total true valuation of the property in Massachusetts in 1860 was $815,237,433, and her total true per capita wealth at that time was $662. The total true valuation of the property in Illinois was $871,860,282, and her per capita wealth was $509. The total true valuation of the property in Massachusetts in 1880 was $2,623,000,000, and her per capita wealth $1,471. The total true valuation of the property in Illinois in 1880 was $3,210,000,000, and her average per capita of wealth was $1,043.

These figures indicate a very different showing for the great agricultural State of Illinois than the gentleman from Missouri sought to establish. And when you take into consideration the fact, Mr. Chairman, that during this period the percentage of increase of population was nearly double in Illinois to what it was in Massachusetts, instead of establishing that our tariff system is detrimental to the agricultural interests it proves just the reverse.

In 1860 Illinois had 143,310 farms only, while in 1880 they had increased to the number of 255,741, an increase in number of 77 per cent. in the twenty years. The value of farm lands in Illinois in 1860 aggregated $408,944,033, while in 1880 the aggregate value of farm lands in the State was $1,009,594,580, an increase to the farmers of that State in the value of their farms in the short period of twenty years of 146 per cent. What a magnificent showing for the farmers of Illinois!

And I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, the great cause of this increased wealth in our farm lands. It is because our citizens have not been content to have a foreign market for the products of their farms, but have sought to establish a home market by the encouragement of the investment of capital in manufactories within the limits of our State.

We believe in diversified interests, and that the nearer the produce consumer can be brought to the farm the better it is for the farmer. And as a result of that policy we have increased the number of manufacturing industries of our State under the tariff laws which have been in force since 1860, 240 per cent. And the capital invested in manufactories during the same period has increased 410 per cent. This is added to the permanent wealth of the State, while the number of persons who have been called to the State to work in our factories and furnaces and be fed by our farmers has increased 530 per cent.

Time will not permit me to dwell upon this great State. Her history for the last twenty years speaks for itself, and no better indorsement of the wisdom of the Republican party in insisting upon the protection of our home industries can be asked for than it affords.

The claim that is made that the Republicans are in favor of continuing war taxes is most happily met and refuted by Mr. MCKINLEY, in the following from the report of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee:

It is a striking fact that all of the reductions of taxation which have occurred since the conclusion of the war, with the exception of the trifling ones made by the acts of March 1, 1879, and of May 28, 1880, aggregating a little over $6,000,000, were accomplished while the party now in the minority was in the majority and in control of legislation.

A brief summary of what has been done in this regard will be both suggestive and instructive.

By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction of the revenue from customs duties was:

Free-list	$2,403,000
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	23,651,748
Total	26,054,784

By the act of May 1, 1872, tea and coffee were placed upon the free-list, making a reduction of $15,893,847.

By the act of June 6, 1872, tariff duties were further reduced, and the reduction by the—

Free-list	$3,945,724
Estimated reduction from the dutiable list	11,933,191
Total	15,278,915

By the act of March 3, 1883, from tariff:

Free-list	$1,365,999
Estimated reduction from dutiable-list	19,489,800
Total	20,855,799

The foregoing estimates were made when the several bills were passed.

Of internal taxes the following have been the reductions made by the party now in the minority since the conclusion of the war:

By the acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,381,199
By the acts of March 31, 1868, and February 3, 1868	54,802,578
By the act of July 14, 1870	$35,315,321
By the act of December 21, 1871	14,436,862
By the act of June 6, 1872	15,807,618
By the act of March 3, 1883	40,677,682
Total	284,421,260

This we present as the result of Republican legislation from July 13, 1866, down to and including March 3, 1883.

The Republican party was in control of the House of Representatives from the first-named date to March 4, 1875. During that period it will be observed that taxation was reduced and revenue diminished in the aggregate sum of $284,421,260. On the 4th of March, 1875, the control of the House passed to the Democratic party and remained with it until the 4th day of March, 1881, a period of six years. During these years the internal revenue was reduced $9,388,935. On the 4th day of March, 1881, the Republican party was reinvested with control of the House of Representatives, holding it for two years, during which time it reduced taxation and revenues from custom sources in the estimated sum $20,855,799, and upon internal revenue $40,677,682, and a grand total of $61,432,481.

Since the 4th day of March, 1883, the House of Representatives has been dominated by the present majority party, a period of five years, and no taxes have been reduced and no curtailment of the revenues has taken place, although warned of a threatened surplus not only by the present Administration, but by the preceding one of President Arthur. It will be observed that from 1875 to 1888, a period of twenty-two years, the control of the House has been equally divided between the two political parties, each having eleven years.

During the eleven years of Republican control the revenues were reduced (estimated)	$362,504,569
During the eleven years of Democratic control the revenues were reduced	6,368,993
Difference in favor of the present minority party in the House of	356,135,654

Whatever inequalities may exist in our present tariff laws the Republicans are willing and anxious to remedy. This bill increases instead of diminishes the inequalities of the law. With its title it "keeps the word of promise to the ear, but breaks it to the hope." If it becomes a law in its present form widespread disaster will follow in its wake.

I should, as I feel regarding this bill, be false to my own convictions and to the best interests of the good people who honor me by sending me here to represent them, if I failed to enter my solemn protest against this unholy attempt to overthrow the great industrial interests of America. [Applause.]

Before Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, had concluded his remarks his hour expired.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I do not desire to occupy more than five minutes longer.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I do not wish to be discourteous, but there are a number of gentlemen who will not be able to get even a half hour. I must object. The gentleman can print the remainder of his remarks as many gentlemen will be compelled to do.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will be allowed a few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Chairman, I begin by calling attention to the constitutional provisions for taxation. There are three:

First. Article I, section 2:

Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers.

Stating how the numbers shall be determined.

Second. Article I, section 8:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Third. Article I, section 9:

No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

WEBSTER DEFINES—

Duties as: tax, toll, impost, or customs; excises; any sum of money required by government to be paid on the importation, exportation, or consumption of goods.

Excise as: an inland duty or impost operating as an indirect tax on the consumer, originally paid only on certain articles of home industry and consumption, and afterward levied also on imported articles; also levied on licenses—the right to deal in certain commodities.

Imposts as: impost, that which is imposed or levied; a tax, tribute, or duty, laid by government on goods imported into a country; an impost on land or other real estate and on the stock of farmers is not called a duty, but a direct tax.

Taxes generally: to subject to pay a tax, or taxes; to impose or assess upon; to lay a burden upon; especially to exact money from, for the support of government.

It will thus be seen duties, excises, and imposts are but other names and designations for taxes used in the generic sense.

Tariff. Whence came the word?

Appleton's Cyclopædia, says:

Tarifa, a town of Spain, situated in the narrowest part of the strait of Gibraltar, was named in honor of "Tarif, Ibu Malik," a Berber chief, who founded it, and during Moorish dominion stopped all vessels passing by, and compelled them to pay duties at fixed rates; whence the word tariff in English and other languages.

It is thus seen from the orignal derivation of the word it meant "a forced tribute;" something exacted without adequate compensation being rendered. And unfortunately, in a high protective tariff, the original meaning still prevails and is enforced; for deny it who may, when a duty as impost is laid so high that the Government gets but little or no revenue from its imposition, and the manufacturer has its benefit, it ceases to be a tax and becomes a tribute. In these constitutional provisions to the plain unsophisticated mind there lurks no taint of special privileges, no pretense for unequal laws, but the belief that all laws made pursuant thereto shall be uniform, just, and even-handed.

I freely admit that a government must have revenues adequate to its necessities, so that it may maintain itself on the one hand with dignity and upon the other with justice to its subjects. And yet in all its revenues, come from what source they may, an eye must be kept to a decent economy in the administration of public affairs to the end the people's substance be not squandered, extravagance engendered, or corruption fostered to blight and wither the public weal.

In the way of raising and exacting taxes the ingenuity of man has never devised one borne so cheerfully, with so little complaint, as the indirect method known as the tariff. Under this system abuses, wrongs, inequalities, and gross impositions have been and are daily done and perpetrated that under any other system of taxation could not last beyond a session of the legislative power authorized to remedy these evils.

Why is it so? Because the tax being paid at the custom-house upon the entry of the goods into this country is at once added to their value, and from thenceforward is incorporated into and clings to them as a part of the original value, through all successive purchasers and owners, whether importer, jobbing, wholesale, or retail dealers, finally to be paid and borne by the party who purchases for his own use or consumption.

If the idea of paying taxes was continuously present to the consumer at the time he purchased; if by law a great schedule of taxes was required to be publicly exposed in all stores, as if a great sign were displayed thus—

Woolen shawls	tax, 88 per cent.
Soap	tax, 15 cents per pound
Blankets	tax, 80 per cent.
Camphor	tax, 5 cents per pound
Brussels carpets	tax, 59 per cent.
Croton-oil	tax, 30 cents per pound
Clothing, ready made	tax, 68 per cent.
Blacksmith hammers	tax, 2½ cents per pound
Flannels	tax, 73 per cent.

And so on, through the nearly four thousand articles upon the tariff list, it would not be long ere the voice of the people compelled their Congressional servants to reduce taxation to the lowest point commensurate with the necessities of an honest and economical administration of the Government.

But the indirect mode of collecting taxes by the tariff method insidiously puts all thought of taxation in the background and out of sight. A man's necessity for coffee compels him to buy it. His comfort exacts the purchase of a blanket. His ease and quiet a cigar; his vanity, a silk hat; his pride, a broadcloth coat; and while he thinks he is sating his necessity, comfort, or pride, he little recks he is paying a tax of 1 cent, or $1 to his government, and three or more dollars tribute to some giant manufacturing industry, not to say monopoly.

Hence it is, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this indirect or tariff mode of collecting taxes is the favorite one with all rulers in civilized countries; for by appealing in four thousand ways to all the passions that excite or sway mankind, whether of pride, vanity, comfort, or necessity, the admitted inequalities of our present and remaining war taxes have been perpetuated to the present hour.

A tariff is, and always will be, a necessity to raise taxes in this country. The independent habits of our people, their freedom in all the past from inquisitorial visits and demands of the tax-gatherer, as well as the demands of the Federal Constitution, all compel its perpetuation.

Oh for a year of direct Federal taxation to the end that rings might be broken, monopolies exposed and taught a lesson, economy once more introduced into the hearts and souls of every one interested in good government, and the people made to rely upon themselves and their own efforts, and not look to Government for a thousand things they, the people, ought to do for themselves, and for every tub to stand upon its own bottom.

Some in the country may ask, why can not we have direct taxation, so that we may know exactly what we get, for what we pay? I answer, we can, but only at such rates of inequality as to be more glaring and unjust than even the ills we complain of in the present tariff.

The Constitution, the paramount law of the land, imposes the reverse of that which is imposed by all State constitutions, namely, that a direct tax shall be based and levied in proportion to population, and not upon values or property.

To illustrate:

By the census of 1880, Florida had a population of 269,493, and an assessed valuation of $30,938,319; Rhode Island a population of 276,531, and an assessed valuation of $252,536,673. Here the population is nearly equal, yet the man in Rhode Island with $8 in property to that of the man in Florida with $1, pays the same amount when levied by the Federal Government.

Again. New Hampshire had a population of 346,991 and an assessed valuation of $164,775,181, while Nebraska, with the larger population of 452,402, had an assessed valuation of only $90,585,784. Hence the man in New Hampshire with over $2 in value would pay no more than the man in Nebraska with less than $1.

Such inequalities in taxation are not to be borne; and whatever causes may have impelled our forefathers to favor direct taxation based upon population, sure it is, that by an almost universal assent, we in State taxation base it upon property. Think of a Vanderbilt or a Gould being taxed no more per head for his family than my genial friend from New York City, whose Irish wit so often enlivens the dull tediousness of a committee meeting.

In time of great pressure we have resorted to excises, internal taxation, or revenue and income duties; but the general verdict of the country has been that these were extraordinary or war taxes; and not to be continued after the crisis had passed that called them into existence, or war debts and obligations had ceased; to exact their imposition.

My own judgment is, and I believe nearly or quite in accord with the practice of the country, at all times even down to the present; namely, customs duties must furnish all ordinary demands to run the Government in times of peace. Excises proper, internal revenues, income taxes, and direct taxation, may and should all be resorted to in time of the nation's peril. And if I could have my own way and judgment, I should keep and maintain at all times a sufficient internal-revenue tax to pay all pensions and the remainder of our war debt, together with its annual interest, holding them to be obligations arising from the necessities of war, and not chargeable upon the revenues of the Government as incidents of a time of peace. And while I would especially retain taxes upon whisky and tobacco, I would remove all restrictions and inquisitorial features and personal examinations of books and papers that have done so much to make the tobacco tax odious before the country, and permit its free sale to any person who desired to purchase.

For several years past this nation has been confronted with the singular problem not of "how to raise taxes," as all other nations are, but the unique one of "how to lower them," and in this we apparently have more difficulty than England, France, Russia, Austria, or Germany have to fill their depleted treasuries, and we quarrel among ourselves like Kilkenny cats on what ought to be a loving duty in the interest of a long-burdened, sadly-taxed people. All, even the most rabid of our Republican friends, admit the urgent necessity of a reduction of our surplus taxes, yet they all demand, as do some of our own friends, that it be at the expense of their wives' kindred to the remotest generation, and that they can all be sacrificed upon the altar of economy; but no sacrifice upon themselves or upon their kindred is to be tolerated or borne for one moment.

For one I do not believe the tariff a sacred law, nor do I believe as the necessities for large revenue on the part of the Government disappear that there should be any more hesitancy on our part to an intelligent application of ourselves for its reduction to the standard of a sufficient amount only, and no more, to run the Government upon a basis of common honesty and economy consistent with a decent dignity for a Government so great and imperial in all its resources than there should be to a revision of our penal code if there was an intelligent general demand for such revision.

Prior to the war no such idea prevailed, for from 1789 to 1857, a period of sixty-eight years, no less than thirty-two tariff laws were passed, the last being approved March 3, 1857, under which the rates of duty imposed were exclusively ad valorem, arranged by schedules and ranged from 4 to 30 per cent., averaging about 18 per cent. as against 47 per cent. at present. It was an honest tax; it told its levy plainly. No pitfalls were in it, under the guise of specific duties, as in the present tariff, where the specific rate is alike upon West of England broadcloth, worn by a Vanderbilt, or upon cotton-warp reversible cloth worn by a weaver. The specific duty is alike on both, 35 cents per pound; on the broadcloth, weighing 20 ounces per yard, it is only a tax of 37.2 per pound, and with its ad valorem of 40 per cent. on its cost make together a tax of $1.81.2, or 50.3 per cent. of the factory price, while in the weaver's covering, 35 cents per yard specific duty, and 30 per cent. ad valorem, make the enormous tax of 180.7 per cent. of the factory price.

Here the ad valorem tax is 5 per cent. lower in favor of the weaver over the Vanderbilt. The specific tax of 35 cents per yard is the same, yet the pitfall is dug for the poor man. His eyesight is blinded by the lower ad valorem, and not being an expert, he is deluded into silence. Away with the specific duty! Let us know openly what we pay; let the Government hide nothing, but boldly declare the rate of taxation in a manner to require no explanation nor an expert to calculate it. A high meed of honor should be given to the Mills bill because of its effort to bring this about. I believe this extract from the majority report to be superbly true:

The specific duty is the favorite of those who are to be benefited by high rates, who are protected by competition, and protected in combinations against the consumer of their products. There is a persistent pressure by manufacturers for the specific duty because it conceals from the people the amount of taxes they are compelled to pay to the manufacturer. The specific duty always discriminates in favor of the costly article and against the cheaper one, and therefore it imposes a heavier burden as it goes down from the highest-priced articles to the lowest. This discrimination is peculiarly oppressive in woolen and cotton goods, which are necessaries of life to all classes of people.

If the tariff is so great a blessing, surely all home manufacturers who believe in it ought to be willing to admit and boldly advocate the rate per cent. of taxation imposed, and not seek to cover it up.

Among the beauties, if not the very chief glories, of a tariff for protection are the assertions that it creates diversified and new manufacturing industries and will establish them throughout the length and breadth of the land, build up happy families, and give to more wage-workers and laborers homes, buildings of their own; make them freeholders and land-owners; also to sit in the shade of their own vine and fig-tree, with no cruel or avaricious landlord lying in wait to turn them out upon the cold charity of a selfish world, whether it be in the heats of summer or the sleet and ice of winter—than a tariff for revenue will create and give. And I presume that the advocates of a protective tariff on the other side of this Chamber not only assert this, but honestly claim a belief, if not a conviction, of its entire truth.

I seriously doubt that the effect of a protective system is either, first, to increase the number of manufacturing establishments (but I do believe, on the contrary, it fosters, with its hot-house influences, all the great and established existing factories, and enables them to eat up and absorb new and small ones, and to prevent in point of fact the creation and the scattering of new, small, and infant establishments throughout the country).

Second. It does not tend to either increase the number of families nor to increase the number of their dwellings; but on the contrary its influence is exerted in a contrary manner, and tends both to lessen the ratio of families in the land and the dwellings needed for separate homes for families.

Observe these figures taken from the census:

In 1870 there were 252,148 manufacturing establishments, with a capital of $2,118,208,269. In 1880 there were 253,852, with a capital of $2,790,272,506, an increase in establishments of 1,704, but an increase of capital of the enormous sum of $674,063,837, with an increase of employés of 678,599. If this is to continue for all time, and why should it not, when five men out of six contribute of their means to help the sixth man, when in the name of conscience and of justice will Missouri, and Kansas, and Iowa, and Nebraska, and the great agricultural States of the West get their share? An increase of 1,704 in ten years. Thirty-eight States, and ten years in a decade. This shows all around a little over four new establishments to a State per year. To satisfy Missouri, with her 3,000,000 people, the four should each be as large as Cramp & Son's establishment at Philadelphia, and that would not give Missouri the cramps either.

What has done this? Let me quote from the Census Compendium, page 926:

The fact that, in the face of a large increase in the number of hands employed in manufactures, of the amount of material consumed, and of the value of the products, the number of establishments shows hardly an appreciable gain from 1870 to 1880, notwithstanding an increase of 30 per cent. in population is amply accounted for by the well-known tendency to the concentration of labor and capital in large shops and factories. The establishments of 1870 showed 8 as the average number of hands, and $8,400 as the average amount of capital; those of 1880 showed 10.7 as the average number of hands and $10,992 as the average amount of capital.

What is the increase of hands? Six hundred and seventy-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-nine, and of this number we may fairly assert 277,795 were females and 241,338 were between ten and fifteen years of age.

The gainful lust of a high protective tariff, in its inordinate race for wealth, spares not the women and children; but as they can be more easily imposed upon and obtained often for a pittance when their labor will supply the place of a man, we find in the census reports this pitiful story (see page 1344, Compendium United States Census):

We see thus that if we compare the number of occupations returned in 1870, increased by the rate of increase which took place during the decade in the population over ten years of age, with the number of occupations actually returned in 1880, we find a deficiency in the agricultural class to the extent of 42,341; an excess in the class rendering professional and personal services of 577,832; in that engaged in trade and transportation of 258,907, and in that engaged in manufactures or mechanical and mining industries of 311,238, making a net excess in all classes of occupations of 1,105,636.

* * * * * * *

If we ask how the relative excess of occupations in 1880 over 1870 is distributed according to sex, we shall find that of the total excess, namely, 1,105,636, as stated, nearly one-quarter is of females, the number of females reported as pursuing gainful occupations having increased from 1870 to 1880 in a higher ratio than the number of males. Thus:

Number of females in gainful occupations in 1870	1,833,288
Increased by the ratio of increase in the female population since 1870, namely, 29.03 per cent	2,369,502
Actual number returned in 1880	2,647,157
Relative excess	277,795

Of this excess about two-thirds appear in the last of the four classes indicated, showing the effect upon the employment of women produced by the extension of the factory system.

If we inquire how the same excess is distributed according to age, we shall find that a disproportionate share falls in the class between ten and fifteen years of age, showing a further effect of the extension of the factory system in the increased employment of young children. Thus:

Number of persons of both sexes between ten and fifteen years of age reported in 1870 as in gainful occupations	759,161
Increased by 18.65 per cent., the ratio of increase in the population of this age from 1870 to 1880	877,018
Actual number reported	1,118,356
Relative excess	241,338

In the cruel decade from 1870 to 1880 we find the lustful demands of avarice extorting the services of 277,755 women in excess of the increase in same ratio as males. And when the total excess of 405,635 is divided up into classes upon age limits, we find in the class of children from ten to fifteen their relative excess over what it should be is 241,338.

The curse of a servitude until recently unknown is upon the women and children working ten or more hours per day in heated apartments. They day by day become more feeble and less fitted for future duties and functions in the married life.

Last Christmas week I journeyed through New England. I had better opportunities, it being the holidays, than ordinary to see the factory hands. They were out in holiday attire, but their pale countenances and haggard looks bespoke them old before their time; yet of the thousands I saw but few were Americans. Whence came they? From Canada, from Italy, and from Germany. On every hand—in the cars, at the depot, by the wayside—I heard the foreign tongues spoken, and various gentlemen assured me that American girls and American children were almost unknown in the mills. And this is another chapter in the history of a protective tariff! Oh, avarice, not liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!

With all the burdens imposed upon our agricultural people, I thank Jehovah that the burden of selling and destroying their women and children for avarice has not yet fallen upon them, for it seems that they have saved from their little ones, or rather from the population over ten years of age, the number of 42,341 inside of their usual rate of increase as laborers.

Now let us look to its effects upon married life and to its housing: for be it known to you, a protective tariff is the universal great panacea, the one great solvent, that unfolds all the secrets in Nature's hidden arcana. It creates fortunes; it populates the wilderness, builds cities, tunnels mountains, and, I will add, builds monopolies, makes giant trusts, with anaconda folds, to embrace a whole country and sixty millions of people; also creates giant fortunes in a shorter era of time than ever before known in any country in any age or any era, and ought, of course, to make happy families also.

Aladdin's lamp pales its glory before the shining luster of a protective tariff, and the slave of that lamp stands ready to abdicate his mystic power because he can not serve the spirit of a protective tariff instead of his lamp.

In 1850 there were 3,598,240 families in this country who had 3,362,337 dwellings to live in; at that time only 235,903 families were apparently without separate homes for themselves. In 1860 there were 5,210,934 families, and they lived in 4,969,692 houses or dwellings. Thus 241,242 families were without separate homes in all the land. The families had increased 1,612,692 in numbers, and all of them had new homes but 5,339. Glory alleluiah! The millennium is at hand, and the protective tariff has done this surely. One million six hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and ninety-four new families in the past decade, and all but 5,339 possessed of new homes. All hail and glory to a protective tariff! But hold on! This period from 1850 to 1860 was the period of lowest tariffs this country ever knew or had.

From September 14, 1851, to March 3, 1857, it had enacted four tariff laws, the duties running lower and lower until the last only ranged from 4 to 30 per cent., averaging 18 per cent., instead of from 10 to 300 per cent. and averaging 48 per cent., as does our present tariff. What comfort in the land is expressed in the figures 1,612,694 new families in ten years, and all living in new houses except 5,339! Surely it must be a low or revenue tariff that did it. No discontent abroad in the land then! Tramps unknown; the word is not yet coined.

Now let us look at the decade from 1870 to 1880, a decade under the highest tariff this country has ever known; one claimed by its friends to be a distinctly protective tariff. In 1870 there were 7,579,363 families living in 7,042,833 dwellings. During the decade from 1860 to 1870 the number of families without dwellings had increased to 536,510, an increase, not of 3 per cent., or 5,339 only, but an increase of 295,268 families without houses or dwellings, an increase of over 100 per cent.—yea, of 123 per cent.

But, observe, this is under a new era of a high protective tariff, imposed between 1860 and 1870. Yet what misery is involved in the figures 295,268 families unable to find a separate home or dwelling, either to buy, build, or rent to live in, as against 5,339 families in the decade from 1850 to 1860. But the opposition will say this is a consequence of the war period. Be patient and let us see what we will see.

We will now look to the decade from 1870 to 1880 for its story. In 1880, 9,945,916 families had 8,955,812 dwellings to live in or occupy. In this decade the families increased 2,366,553 in number, but the dwellings only increased 1,912,079, leaving a total of 990,108 families in the land without separate homes or dwellings.

Thus in this decade the 536,510 unhoused families of 1870 had become 990,108, an increase of 433,598 in ten years, an increase of almost 100 per cent. in the decade, as against 123 per cent. from 1860 to 1870, as against 3 per cent. from 1850 to 1860, of homeless and houseless families for Democratic times and a low tariff; as against 123 per cent. and nearly 100 per cent. for Republican rule and a protective tariff running through two decades.

Poor men of the land, choose ye which you like the best, and then, in November, 1888, do your duty at the polls like free men, who, knowing your power, dare assert it.

I now ask, who apparently got the "boodle" of the ten years from 1870 to 1880.

We see the manufacturers by their own reports, for they furnish the statistics that make the census reports, got an increase of capital of $674,063,837 at the discontent and misery of 453,598 homeless and unsheltered families in the same period. But I am not quite done with families and their dwellings. Between 1850 and 1860 the increase of families was 44.8 per cent. in numbers, and the increase of their dwellings was 32.4 per cent. This was in low-tariff times. Comparing now between 1870 and 1880, in high-tariff times, the increase in number of families was 31.2 per cent., while the increase in their dwellings was only 27 per cent. This shows an advantage for the first decade of 13.6 per cent. in families, and 5.4 per cent. in dwellings.

In this last decade, in 1873, with the greatest panic, came a new order of beings theretofore unknown in this country. Tramps. Five hundred thousand strong; tramps, tramping over the country. Skilled laborer, mechanic, agriculturist, all felt the baneful effect of the panic. A new era is ushered in; and since then strikes, lockouts, tramps, discontent, degradation and misery have appeared in such numbers and so universally over and throughout the country, and even still abide with us, as the recent commotion on Western railroads and in the Reading coal regions attest, as to all alike indicate that if capital is satisfied labor is discontented and day by day becomes more so. And all this in spite of a protective tariff. Can I not say it is the legitimate fruits of an unequal and unjust system of tribute that robs the poor to make the rich richer?

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The tariff has destroyed our shipping, our merchant marine. Let us see. The tonnage of vessels built in the United States on the entire seaboard in 1857 was 285,453 tons. Thirty years afterward, in 1887, it was 83,061 tons.

The record of 1857 under a low tariff has only been exceeded twice, to wit, in 1864 it was 291,306, and in 1865 it was 310,421 tons—the two last years of the war, and then only under the impetus of a great national demand created by the war.

The record of 1887 is the lowest of all the thirty years save that of 1886, when it was 64,458 tons.

But it may be said, why take only the entire seaboard; why not include the vessels built upon the Great Lakes and upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries, built to accommodate our great and growing internal and domestic commerce, where the construction of foreign vessels can not come into competition with our home-built vessels, and the story may be different?

Let us see. Total tonnage built in all the United States in—

	Tons.
1857	378,805
1887	150,450

The year 1857 was only exceeded in two years, to wit:

In 1864	415,741
In 1865	394,523

Again, the record of 1887 is the lowest of all the thirty intervening years except 1886, which was 95,453 tons.

These figures show the same story as the seaboard tonnage. Under the stimulus of war times and a war demand, 1864 and 1865 are the years, and the only years, showing a larger tonnage of vessels of all kinds than in 1857, and they show further that in 1886 the lowest building ebb was reached. But now under Democratic rule we are apparently entering upon a new era, the increase in 1887 upon seaboard building being 25 per cent., and upon all vessels 60 per cent. May this new era spread on and on; under beneficent legislation and the fostering influence of Secretary Whitney may a new navy be built that shall be our pride and glory, to be manned by sailors who shall in zeal and devotion to country emulate the heroism of a Farragut in lashing himself to a mast, and to the world-wide renown of a dying Lawrence, shouting, as he is carried below decks to die, his last command: "Don't give up the ship."

The operation of a high tariff by increasing the price of all articles entering into the construction of vessels, coupled with the foolish policy that our citizens shall not buy abroad the vessels our carrying trade requires and register them in America as American ships, to be protected by American laws and the American flag, has practically destroyed our sea-going marine and made this nation contribute annually one hundred millions or more to the wealth of other nations.

I call attention to an article published in the Missouri Republican April 28, 1888:

FREE TRAVEL—BUT NO FREE TRADE.

On Monday last "eight big steam-ships started across the ocean from New York carrying nearly one thousand passengers," as we learn from the Eastern papers. These one thousand American tourists will pay out for passage money, going and returning, $200 each, or $200,000 in all, and every dollar of the money will go into the pockets of foreigners, for every one of the eight big steam-ships is a foreign vessel, most of them British. American tourists do not travel in American steamers for the very good reason that there are none. The moment an American traveler going to Europe or the West Indies or South America steps off the pier in New York or Boston harbor on the steam-ship that is to bear him to a foreign land he treads a British deck and pays his passage money to a British subject.

On the same day that these 1,000 tourists embarked for Europe, the incoming steam-ships landed at Castle Garden in New York harbor 3,500 immigrants. They paid for their passage $30 each, or $105,000, every dollar of which also went into foreign pockets, for the steam-ships that brought them were foreign-owned. Here was over $300,000 paid out in one day in New York for passage money from and to New York. And it is going on every day in the year. The number of American tourists carried abroad and brought back home this year will be about 125,000, and their passage money to and fro, at $200 each, will amount to $25,000,000. In the same time 700,000 new immigrants, it is estimated, will be brought over, whose passage money at $30 each will amount to $21,000,000. Here is $46,000,000 paid out in one year for passage money to foreign steamships, to say nothing of the $60,000,000 more which the 125,000 tourists will expend in traveling and sight-seeing, and for clothing, jewelry, books, relics, pictures, curiosities, and bric-a-brac in Europe.

Why is not this $46,000,000 paid to American steam-ships? The answer is there are no American steam-ships running abroad. Our tariff makes it impossible to build them as cheap as they can be built in foreign ship-yards of untaxed materials, and so the American lines of thirty years ago, under the Democratic régime, have been driven from the ocean. But why do we not impose a tariff on foreign travel, and encourage the building of American steamers? A tax of 50 per cent., or $50 on every person who goes aboard or returns in the cabin of other than an American steamer, and of $15 on every steerage passenger, would protect home ship-building and establish American lines to all parts of Europe.

Why is not this done? Because the wealthy manufacturing States are opposed to it. They do not believe in free trade, but they do believe in free travel. They say the American people shall not buy British, German, and French goods, but they themselves, all the while, are buying passage from British, German, and French steam-ship owners. The great army of American tourists is made up in the rich manufacturing States. The wealthy mill and factory owners of those States are large consumers of foreign travel. They like to go to the lands of pauper labor—"free-trade England," Germany, France, and Italy, learn foreign manners, and bring back trunks filled with cheap foreign clothing; and while they think foreign goods ought to be made dear by a high tariff, they want foreign travel kept cheap.

While on a visit to Groton, Mass., in the late holidays, I called upon Governor Boutwell at his home. In the course of a conversation I had with him he stated that in his opinion it was one of the crowning glories of Republican rule and statesmanship in this country that it had practically destroyed our shipping. Not understanding his reason for such belief, I asked him to please explain, when he stated that a high or protective tariff had done it by giving to American wage-workers on land higher wages than they could earn at sea; that they could be fed, clothed, and housed better on land than at sea, and their moral condition better cared for, and he thanked God it was so. I said, "Why not legislate so as to secure the greatest social and moral benefits for labor on sea as well as land?" To which, as I remember, no answer was made.

Direct taxes and internal revenues were the direct result of war necessities. They began in 1862 and practically disappeared from our revenues in 1873.

Internal revenues began in—

1863 with	$37,640,787.95
1864 with	109,741,134.10
1865 with	200,464,215.25
1866 with	309,226,813.42

A princely sum, and then began to diminish, for—

In 1867 it was only	$266,027,537.43
In 1868 it was only	191,057,589.41
In 1869 it was only	158,356,460.49

And all this reduction was on the imperial wealth of the country. Wealth demanded the reduction and wealth obtained it in the removal of the income tax, bank taxes, and decrease in internal-revenue taxes of $228,000,000. And this decrease was made year by year at the dictation of capital. See the following estimates:

By act of 1866	$65,000,000
By act of 1867	90,000,000
By act of 1868	23,000,000
By act of 1869	45,000,000
By act of 1870	55,000,000

All legislative sympathy and thought was for capital, none for labor, none for the farmer and his interests, and to this day the burdens exacted of them as war necessities and imposed by the war tariff still continue. This is well shown by the following article from the Washington Sentinel:

The minority report of the Ways and Means Committee, signed by WILLIAM D. KELLEY, THOMAS M. BROWNE, T. B. REED, WILLIAM MCKINLEY, Jr., and J. C. BURROWS, claims that the Republicans during eleven years of their control of the House of Representatives reduced the revenues $362,000,000 in round numbers.

Assuming this claim to be true, which it is not in some respects, let us see how these so-called reductions were made, for whose special benefit, and for whose injury. The exposures are to be found in Mr. MILLS's speech. The Republicans began their "war measures" by raising the tariff rates from 18 to more than 40 per cent. average. They created the internal-revenue system.

Among the items of the latter was a tax on home manufactures, which in 1866 brought in a revenue of $127,000,000. That was less than 5 per cent. on the value of the manufactured product of that year, which had an increased protection of 22 per cent. as against the former tariff.

There was also an income tax which produced $72,000,000 in the year 1866.

The official reports show that in a population of more than 35,000,000 at that time only 461,170 persons had incomes above the exemption, and they represented the enormous annual income of $707,000,000. The remaining thirty-four and a half millions of "plain people," as Mr. Lincoln called them, had only sufficient resources from their different forms of labor for a decent and too often a very pinched support.

Now these two internal taxes operating directly on prosperous manufacturers, then enriched by exorbitant gains, and on a class with great incomes, yielded together $200,000,000 every year to the Treasury, in round numbers. Had these taxes, falling on a wealthy class most able to bear them without the least strain, been continued for ten years, the public debt would have been extinguished.

Then there were the 3 per cent. taxes on railroad companies, insurance companies, and express companies, taxes on bank capital, deposits, and bank-checks to swell the aggregate of so-called "reduction of revenues" in the minority report.

All these taxes, which only touched wealth and great corporations, were abolished by Republican Congresses, while not a dime was removed from the burdens that bore hardest on the poor and afflicted, the workingman whose shoulders were forced to carry the load. And in 1883, when the tariff was revised by a bill which originated in the Senate, contrary to the Constitution, the Republicans repealed the tax on playing-cards and put 20 per cent. tax on the Bible.

Day by day this session each member has received circulars and letters begging, ay, demanding that the duties upon their special manufacture be let alone, stating if any reduction be made they are driven to bankruptcy. Ay, under the spirit of avarice they boldly demand some part of the burden incident to their business shall by law be lifted from their shoulders and put upon their fellows, confessing themselves bankrupt if left to their own unaided effort, skill, industry, and perseverance. In the name of our American race, the most inventive, energetic, industrious, thrifty people the world has produced, I deny it. Take away the hot-house manure of a protective tariff and put the country and industries upon the basis of a tariff for revenue only; admit raw materials not produced in this country, for the benefit of our many languishing industries; lower the taxes on necessaries of life; equalize them in the interest of the farmer and laborer, and all our manufacturing industries will have a healthy growth, become more diversified in numbers, and be scattered more uniformly over the land. The people will then pass from under the shadow of unequal laws, now breeding a great discontent, leading to strikes, lockouts, riots, anarchists, and socialism.

Let us go back to the wisdom of Jefferson, stated in his first inaugural address:

Still one thing more, fellow-citizens, is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people—a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government, and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities. * * *

Again:

Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political. * * * Economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid.

Observe, please, encouragement of agriculture is the principal; commerce is the handmaid. All manufacturing industries practically become the subjects of commerce; their products must be put into markets and sold. This is commerce, but the curse of the country is we have reversed this order. Commerce is the principal and agriculture the handmaid and servant, bearing the burdens of commerce as well as its own. Agriculture, holding in its ranks half the laborers of the land, finds all equality before the laws taken from it and special tributes given to commerce. Agriculture is burdened beyond its capacity. Besides paying tribute to commerce, it takes upon itself, having no surplus capital of its own at command, through its lands and farms, the furnishing of security by way of mortgages for the surplus millions of commerce. This is shown by the mortgaged and unhappy condition of all our Western agricultural States, until they stagger and groan like a whipped galley-slave under the burden.

It is estimated that the lands in the following States are mortgaged as follows:

Indiana	$175,000,000	Iowa	$120,000,000
Ohio	350,000,000	Nebraska	25,000,000
Michigan	125,000,000	Kansas	100,000,000
Wisconsin	100,000,000	Illinois	200,000,000
Missouri	100,000,000
Minnesota	70,000,000	Total	1,363,000,000

I have said that I did not consider the tariff law sacred. I quote from the message sent to this Congress by the President:

For present purposes, however, the last number given should be considerably reduced. Without attempting to enumerate all, it will be considered that there should be deducted from those which it includes 375,143 carpenters and joiners, 285,401 milliners, dressmakers, and seamstresses, 172,726 blacksmiths, 133,756 tailors and tailoresses, 102,473 masons, 76,241 butchers, 41,309 bakers, 22,083 plasterers, and 4,891 engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, amounting in the aggregate to 1,214,023, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

To these the appeal is made to save their employment and maintain their wages by resisting a change. There should be no disposition to answer such suggestions by the allegation that they are in a minority among those who labor, and therefore should forego an advantage, in the interest of low prices for the majority; their compensation, as it may be affected by the operation of tariff laws, should at all times be scrupulously kept in view; and yet with slight reflection they will not overlook the fact that they are consumers with the rest; that they, too, have their own wants and those of their families to supply from their earnings, and that the price of the necessaries of life, as well as the amount of their wages, will regulate the measure of their welfare and comfort.

I call attention to two points in this. First, that only 2,623,089 laborers in all the United States are protected, less than 18 per cent. To aid 18 men make a living 82 men must contribute to their prosperity without compensation. Second, the President says "there should be no disposition * * * to allege the protected are in the minority, among those who labor, and therefore should forego an advantage."

To accuse a man who is in favor of tariff reform, and a revenue tariff only, as a free-trader is common with our Republican friends. To-day in the attitude of parties on the issue of revenue reform it seems to stand with as much force as a term of obloquy, pity, and contempt as the words copperhead or traitor did during the war. To all such I can only say that I had rather be a free-trader in reality than a robber boodler who believes in maintaining unequal laws imposed upon the many for the benefit of a comparative few.

I am now, and long have been, astounded that the moral sense of New England does not rise against such unequal legislation; but, thank Providence, daylight is breaking, her moral conscience is aroused. [Laughter.]

Listen. The Missouri Republican, of May 2, 1888, has the following editorial:

The most ludicrous product of the tariff controversy is a labored editorial in a Boston high-tariff paper to show that protection is not stealing! William Lloyd Garrison, in a talk before the Young Men's Christian Association of Boston, had declared that a protective tariff is "anti-Christian," and F. W. Bird, a prominent citizen of Boston, had said: "If I can't get a living by paper-making without special favors from the Government, which legalizes stealing from my customers, I will do something else;" and thereupon the Boston Advertiser stumbles through a solemn argument to show that "the American manufacturer uses neither force nor fraud; therefore he does not steal." It is evident that the Massachusetts protectionists are growing ashamed of the twenty-five years' habit of forcing their customers to pay them $1.50 for $1 worth of goods when they find it necessary to show that it does not literally violate the decalogue.

As an abstract question of right, who is there who dares to say, with his hand upon his heart, looking to God, "I have not the right, the God-given, inalienable right, to buy what I may need or require wherever I can buy it most cheaply?" Not one. The taxing provisions of our Constitution and their limitations have all been cited in your hearing by me this day. They are the supreme law. In them is declared, "taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States." This word "uniform" is surely comprehensive enough to mean that Congress should deal out in the taxation laws even-handed justice to all its citizens. I admit that by a long series of laws, precedents of protection for protection's sake, and not for revenue, have been established, and it may be too firmly to be questioned as matter of law. Yet, nevertheless, the facts remain that there is no language in the Constitution to indicate authority for them, nor will the moral sense of a large portion of mankind ever fail to denounce the doctrine when it exceeds the demands of revenue. I am no free-trader; there can be none in this country. The provisions of the Constitution prescribe otherwise.

Revenues are and must continue to be raised by customs duties, and I am willing now to say on the record what I have often said on the stump, that within the limits of a tariff for revenue only, I am willing, yea, as an American citizen, prefer from patriotic motives, I trust, that the same should be so adjusted and placed, as to nurture, cherish, and "protect," if you will (I do not like the word "protect" just now very well), American industries, rather than that they should be so imposed as to be an incubus upon, and aid in tearing and dragging them down. I would have this, however, to be, in Democratic language, an incident, and not the purpose and object of the law. To this extent, and in this only would I go. Beyond this protection ceases its patriotic demands, and charity for the ones at home demands a cessation of tribute, as all taxation beyond the revenue limit surely is.

Millions for defense of government, if needs be, but not a cent for tribute beyond the revenue line, should be and will be our campaign rallying cry. Again, who is there that dares say, as a question of morals, as a question of right, as a question of even-handed justice, that one citizen shall not stand before the law on the plane of equality with every other citizen; that his burdens shall be the same, no lighter nor heavier than any other man's, and that a tribute forced by law under any guise as a plea whatever against his assent, to aid in upbuilding the fortunes of another is tyranny, yea, confiscation under the forms of law?

What quid pro quo have the farmers, 7,670,493 strong? Almost one-half of the mighty army of laborers practically receive nothing. On the contrary, they are to-day mortgaged many hundred, ay, hundreds of millions of dollars to those who have in the past received the benefits of protection.

In the nine contiguous protected and manufacturing States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania is held nearly all the concentrated surplus wealth of the nation. The railroads of the State of Illinois are valued at $638,500,000. The report of the railroad commissioners of that State show that 95 per cent. of this vast sum is owned in the manufacturing States. The same is very nearly true of Missouri, and, I believe, of Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Colorado, and the Western Territories.

The census of 1880 shows fifty-nine life-insurance companies in the country, with ledger assets of $420,000,000. Of this number some thirty are in said nine States, but they have over $375,000,000 of the assets.

Mr. WARNER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANSUR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman object to foreign capital being brought into our State?

Mr. MANSUR. I do not object to that. But I want to get some for ourselves. I do not want it all owned away from us.

Mr. WARNER. Do you not encourage foreign capital coming in to build our railroads?

Mr. MANSUR. I have been trying with you to get it.

Mr. WARNER. I knew it.

Mr. MANSUR. But we have been trying to get rid of a bad bargain. I will ask the gentleman, would you not rather have your own capital all owned in Kansas City than to have it come from abroad?

Mr. WARNER. As the gentleman speaks of Kansas City, I will say that that city has more prosperity than any other point in the State of Missouri, and one great reason is that we have invited the influx of foreign capital.

Mr. MANSUR. Have I not paid my tribute to the wonderful growth of that city?

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit an inquiry?

Mr. MANSUR. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEAR. Could the people of Iowa have built their 8,000 miles of railroad or could the people of Missouri have built their 6,000 miles of railroad without foreign capital?

Mr. MANSUR. No, sir; they could not have done it; but I wish our State had got that capital under laws more equitable and more general in relation to a sense of justice.

Mr. GEAR. I will ask the gentleman further, what analogy is there between the tariff and the construction of railroads in those two States?

Mr. MANSUR. If there were only 1,740 factories established in the last ten years, while their capital has increased $700,000,000, it is evident we did not get our share of that in the West.

Again, these nine States have in their savings-banks, deposits aggregating $1,100,000,000, while in the other twenty-nine States there are less than thirty million deposits. Again, in the United States there were 73,114 holders of United States registered bonds. Of these 54,545 were in the nine States named. Again, the amount of registered United States bonds was $645,000,000. Of this, the banks, insurance companies, trust companies, etc., held $227,451,550, and these banks and other companies holding these bonds are practically owned in the said nine States, leaving 418,000,000 held by individuals, of which sum $329,563,500 was owned in said nine States.

Again, these nine States are unlike the Western States in this: They own their own railroads (and ours too); they practically own the manufacturing establishments of the nation, also. The sea-going shipping, the telegraph stock, the telephone stock, the stock of the great factories for making arms, sewing-machines, and other rich corporations of the land.

Official figures in the Almanac for 1888, by the Librarian of Congress, show the actual assessed value of the real and personal property of all the States to be $22,954,630,201, divided between the manufacturing and the other States as follows:

Nine manufacturing States	$10,137,612,665
Twenty-nine other States	12,817,017,586

That is to say, the 15,000,000 people in the nine manufacturing States own nearly as much of the assessed value of all the States together as is owned by the 45,000,000 of people who live in the twenty-nine agricultural States.

And now they are at last about to own the "brains" of the nation, according to the New York Herald.

"TRUSTS," AND THE PEOPLE.

Thus, in these times we see the ablest lawyers, the ablest chemists, the greatest inventors, the most ingenious mechanics, the most competent business managers in the pay of great corporations, combinations, and trusts, doing obediently the unscrupulous will of the aggregated and selfish capital which employs them. Thus we see more and more even our public men the servants of trusts and corporations.

Thus we see growing in this country a great, unscrupulous, powerful plutocracy, banded together more and more closely, resisting by the help of its hired agents every attempt to reform abuses and to re-establish liberty, crushing out opposition, more and more greedily grasping power, and bribing the best intellect of the country into its service.—New York Herald.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I have tried to show while the operation of a protective tariff does build up manufactories into monopolies, does create great wealth, and will admit that all persons relatively, whether laborer or employer, who share in it, "as the fountain from which all blessings flow," live in better houses and possess more comforts and luxuries than those who live outside its charmed circle, yet to sum up I deny,

First. That its tendency is to create new industries, nor does it tend to scatter them abroad in the land.

Second. I deny that it tends to the growth of the number of families, the great bulwark of society, upon which all the moral prosperity and happiness of the nation depend.

Third. I deny that to the average laborer, including very many in protected industries as well as all those outside thereof, it operates to facilitate his securing a separate dwelling for his family, with all the moral and social benefits flowing from such condition of separate life.

Fourth. I deny that it is good for our merchant marine and shipping interest, but on the contrary has destroyed it.

Fifth. I deny that it is good, or tends to good, for the farmer and the agriculturist and those dependent upon him.

Sixth. I deny that the benefits, in the great aggregate, flowing from it are to be compared in extent with the gross wrongs, the burdens, and impositions it places upon labor in the aggregate.

Seventh. To meet its demands it robs the cradle, in taking small children into its employ by the thousands and thousands.

Eighth. It imposes too much work upon the females of the land, drafts too heavily on their numbers, saps their constitution, and unfits many of them to become happy and healthy mothers.

Ninth. It breeds indifference to human rights, and tends to educate men for selfish, avaricious motives, to argue, ask for, vote for, and maintain unequal laws of taxation with special privileges.

Tenth. The great wealth and corporations of the land are continually hiring and taking our strongest and most intellectual men into their employ, who, by their ability, are able to greatly aid in still further maintaining unjust laws, and perpetuating financial manacles upon labor and its interests.

This is the condition of affairs to-day in America, and it is still further aggravated by the condition of the finances, with $150,000,000 locked up in the Treasury, with an annual surplus of $100,000,000. A great, a national cry has for years gone up in the land, "Reduce our taxes!" Both parties have heard this cry; both parties for twelve years past have stood pledged to come to the rescue of the people. The Republicans would not when they could, and the Democrats could not when the great majority of them would. For all these years the Republican party, as it does to-day, stands in the attitude of obstructing all measures of reduction of taxation.

Let us see what in 1884 each party authoritatively declared in their national platforms:

The Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests.

Republican tariff plank:

We therefore demand the imposition of duties on foreign imports shall be made, not for "revenue only," but that, in raising the requisite revenues for the government, such duties shall be so levied as to afford security to our diversified industries and protection to the rights and wages of the laborer, to the end that active and intelligent labor, as well as capital, may have its just reward, and the laboring man his full share in the national prosperity.

ITS PLEDGE.

The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus.

I charge and believe the Republicans were and are now hypocritical in their platform pledge, and will now, as they ever have done, almost unitedly oppose any measure of reduction that applies to custom duties.

I believe a few Democrats in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, by their defection from the ranks of the revenue reformers and alliance with the Republican party, were able to defeat temporarily just and wise measures of reduction On this point I cite from a speech delivered in the House by Mr. MCKINLEY as follows:

The Democratic majorities in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, although committed by party utterances and by platforms, as well as the pledges of leaders, to a reduction of duties to a revenue basis, were unable, with all their party machinery, and the free use of the party lash, to accomplish even a step in that direction.

Every proposition for a change was met with the almost solid opposition of this side of the House, which, with the assistance of a few Representatives on the other side from Pennsylvania and the New England States, was strong enough to insure, and did insure, the substantial defeat of every measure looking to a disturbance of the existing tariff rates.

Yet I believe further that the heart of the masses of the great body of the Democratic party beats in unison with its great head and leader, Grover Cleveland, and under his promptings, aided here and there by a patriotic Republican, will in the next ninety days achieve a glorious victory over the combined cohorts of the world, the flesh, and the devil, with their right bowers of monopolies and trusts thrown in. So mote it be! [Applause.]

And now in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, while I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, let me invite attention to these final thoughts. That they will provoke criticism of a fierce order I believe; and yet I believe them true and worthy of the consideration of thoughtful men.

To quote:

The power of taxation is the one most liable to abuse.

* * * * * * *

Given a purpose or object for which it may be lawfully used and the exercise of it is unlimited.

It is, therefore, the most pervading of all the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of people; the power to tax is the power to destroy, and a striking instance of this truth is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage.

* * * It can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other. * * * To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less robbery because it is done under the form of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

So said Judge Miller, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Loan Association vs. Topeka (20 Wallace, 663), and so to-day say the great Democratic masses of the country. Your protective-tariff law as it now exists is here well described. It is robbery, not taxation. It is a legislative decree confiscating in extorted tributes the property of toiling millions for the benefit of protected manufacturers and monopolists, who now have special privileges to accumulate wealth which are not granted to the many. And this is done by forms of law. These protected manufacturers and monopolists are the bulls of the law and the land, engaged in upholding the laws that grant these favors. They are first cousins, if not twin brothers, in theory with the socialist and anarchist of the land. These last are the bears of the laws and the land, who do not desire the power of the laws destroyed, but wish them exercised in a different way and manner and for different purposes.

To illustrate: Giant fortunes, springing up like mushrooms the land over, must be at the expense of the multitude, with a corresponding deprivation and misery among the masses going on to counterpoise the accumulated wealth of the few. This breeds a sense of wrong; a belief widespread that the laws are unequal and imposed for the benefit of the few. The laws thus tending to create giant fortunes are brought into contempt and breed socialism and anarchism. The law of taxation must be perpetuated. There is no escape from it. It is like fire—a great benefactor or a great tyrant and monster, as it is properly harnessed and controlled on the one hand, or, on the other hand, set loose to become a destroying demon.

Take the 60,000,000 of people in this land, arrange them like this: Place them all in one line, put at one end all the monopolists and protective-tariff men who believe in the doctrine of enforced tributes to build up their fortunes; in the center all those who believe in taxation for revenue only, and at the other end put all the socialists and anarchists who believe in the power of the law, the same law, as the monopolists and protective-tariff men, but demand a reverse use of it, who declare if the law can be perverted and used to build up fortunes it can also be legally used to tear down and destroy fortunes and divide them up among the multitude, and for the same reasons given by the monopolist and protective-tariff man for his use of the law, to wit, That it is for the good of society, for the benefit of the multitude.

One class appeals to the law power to build up fortunes and act as bulls in maintaining the law as it is; the other class appeals to the law power to tear down and destroy wealth, and act as bears in the use of this power to destroy and divide fortunes and wealth. Do they not as believers in a perverted taxing power become fairly amenable to the charge of being kindred under the law? In the use of the law of taxation there is no safety outside of its exercise for public purposes of revenue only. All exercise beyond that limit is surely dangerous.

Twenty years ago neither socialism nor anarchism was known in this country. Now their adherents and believers are in numbers unknown; but still as discontent spreads, and unequal laws and taxation prevail and are maintained, their numbers increase, and the time may come (I sincerely hope not) when the late uprising in the streets of Chicago by the anarchists shall be as child's play to greater riots and uprisings on the part of thousands, determined at all hazard to get rid of unequal laws, unjust taxation, and special tributes.

Then the monopolists, quaking in terror in their palatial homes, will have no protection against the vengeance of the mob, except in the superior numbers of the great conservative classes, who by the millions stand on the line indicated by me between these two kindred yet widely separated theories and people, and demand the return, as they now do, of the country to equal laws for all, even-handed justice for all even if the heavens fall, with special privileges for none, and who by their mighty numbers and conservative determination will and shall prevail.

Then again shall come a period in the land when all men before the law shall be equal, all men shall again be brethren and shall lie down together, and a little one shall lead them. [Applause.]

ADDENDA.

I am permitted by the kindness of Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER to use this table, prepared by him for an article in the North American Review in June, 1883, which shows relatively the amount of taxes and of tribute for year 1882, under the tariff law, wherein is shown that on twelve classes of enumerated articles the Government, while raising by import duties $194,464,758, afford protection to home manufacturers on same twelve classes of articles, to enable them to exact on their products from their home customers a tribute of $556,9 8,657, or nearly three times as much as the Government tax:

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the greatest infirmity of the American Congress, and the greatest calamity of the American people, is the constant agitation and discussion of questions that ought to have been buried out of sight and forgotten fifty years ago. Free trade is an exotic that never should have been permitted to take root on American soil. It was conceived in treason and born in treachery to human rights and human liberty. It made its first appearance as a political question amid the throes of nullification and secession in 1831, and became the sheet-anchor of American slavery from that time forward. John C. Calhoun and his followers, who had been the advocates of protection before this, at once became the champions of free trade. The first blows which were struck by New England against American slavery were so diverted that they fell with increased force upon American protection. New England was not only the birth-place of abolitionism but she was the center and home of all our manufacturing industries. The South resolved to destroy protection in order to destroy New England and protect slavery.

If New England had never aimed her shot and shell at the institutions of slavery, the South never would have built her fortifications of State rights, secession, and free trade. And in order to perpetuate slavery and make it profitable to the slave-owners, it was thought necessary for the South to buy cheap clothing in Europe for themselves and their slaves, and cheap food in the North, where no industry was to have an existence except that of agriculture. The North was to furnish the South food and the South was to furnish Europe cotton, and under this arrangement the South was not only to be the masters of the slave, but they were to be our masters as well. This is simply the way in which free trade came into American politics. It had its origin in Southern hatred for New England abolitionism, and ought to have ceased when the barbarism of slavery ceased. Hence free trade is nothing more or less than a fragment of the rebellion, and is as dangerous to the business of the country in 1888 as secession was in 1861; and if successful it will be as hateful in the statutes of the country as it was in the Confederate constitution which the rebellion sought to vindicate. Free trade has no more right to supplant our protective system than the Confederate constitution has to supplant the Constitution of the United States.

The protection of American industries is not a mere policy, a mere business question; it is a question of patriotism, a question of loyalty to the American flag, to the American laborer, and to the American home. It is a choice between self-defense and self-development on the one hand, and self-annihilation and self-destruction on the other. Upon its success or defeat will depend whether our people shall be the skilled laborers, artisans, and mechanics of the world, or whether they shall be "hewers of wood and drawers of water." The protection of American labor, the building up of American industries, the protection of the American workshop, and the elevation of the American home is a national achievement, worthy the support of every American patriot. The protective system stands as a wall of fire between American laborers and the degraded, half-paid laborers of Europe.

THE SURPLUS HOBBY.

There has been in the United States Treasury, time and again since the war, as much surplus as there is now, and sometimes more, and yet this is the first time that any great ado has ever been made about it. Republican administrations simply paid it out, reduced the national debt and stopped the interest. President Cleveland could have done the same. He did pay out part of it, and refused to pay more on account of having some doubt about the validity of the law authorizing such payments. This law was passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and while this fact raised some doubts in his mind as to the propriety of such legislation, the law which increased his salary from $25,000 to $50,000 a year was passed in the same way, and I have never heard that he had any doubts about his right to draw the increase.

Mr. Chairman, this talk about the surplus deserves the contempt of all decent men. It is the merest sham, the hollowest pretext, the most contemptible subterfuge. This money was accumulated and held in the Treasury for a purpose. It is the result of a Democratic conspiracy to destroy our protective system. To this end the river and harbor bill of the last Congress was defeated, the dependent pension bill and a hundred other pension bills were vetoed. The appropriation bills of the last Congress were made $10,000,000 less than the actual expenses of the Government, the Blair educational bill, which had passed the Senate almost unanimously and which would have passed the House by a two-thirds vote, was throttled, in order to pile up money in the Treasury. And the men who did this point to the surplus as a peril to the country, and possibly meet in midnight conclave and laugh with ghoulish glee at the smoke and flame which their incendiary fires have created.

We all agree, Mr. Chairman, that the money ought not to be locked up in the Treasury; that it ought not to be withdrawn from the channels of trade; but we insist that there is no necessity for it being in the vaults of the Treasury; that it ought to have been applied to the payment of the national debt, and to the purposes of the General Government. Let us examine the extent of this surplus. The customs tax or tariff receipts last year amounted to $217,000,000, the internal revenue amounted to $118,000,000, and all other incomes to $35,000,000, aggregating $370,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the necessary expenses of the Government for the next year will amount to $326,000,000 (using round numbers), leaving an actual annual surplus of $44,000,000.

There is now in the Treasury a surplus of about $60,000,000, and hence a year from now the surplus will amount to about $100,000,000, unless the Treasury estimate is cut down by reduced appropriations. This is making no provision for the river and harbor bill which passed this House yesterday, which carries about $20,000,000; no provision for the dependent pension bill, for the Blair educational bill, nor for any other like appropriations. And yet President Cleveland, in order to alarm the country and foist upon the people his free-trade heresy, discarded the precedents of a century, ignored the obligations of the Constitution, and substituted a free-trade bulletin for a Presidential message. And the Ways and Means Committee, in order to carry out the decree of their master, did what no committee of Congress ever did before, excluded the Republican members of their own committee, the members of the House, the members of the Senate, the farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, miners, laborers, and business men, hundreds of whom came here to be heard, and some of them came thousands of miles, from any participation in the preparation of this bill. The Republican members, made a part of the committee by the Constitution and laws of the country, were not permitted the privilege of crossing a "t" or dotting an "i" in this remarkable bill, nor did the chairman have the courtesy to make to them a polite bow and say, "By your leave, gentlemen." This bill was framed by Southern men to subserve Southern interests, as I shall hereafter show.

NO SURPLUS IN FACT.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand what the Ways and Means Committee mean when they propose to reduce the surplus $75,000,000 or $100,000,000.

The outstanding interest-bearing debt is $1,200,000,000. The present so-called surplus is only 5 per cent. of this sum, and if every dollar of it is held for this purpose it will not be sufficient to pay the 4½ per cent. bonds when they become due; and yet the country is thrown into a state of alarm and the destruction of the industries of the country is threatened because of this pretended surplus in the Treasury. We need every dollar that is now in the Treasury and all that we can collect from existing laws, if we make proper use of it.

Our fortifications are falling into decay, our seaport cities are unprotected, our merchant marine should be rebuilt, the dark pall of illiteracy that now hangs over the Republic should be removed, the 28,000 Indian children that are now hiding in the mountains and caves of the West need compulsory industrial education, and last, but not least, there is in our midst a great army of men who laid the idol of their youth, the sunshine of their home, the joy of their hearts upon the altar of their country for whom this Government has made no provision whatever. And there are thousands of widows, who waited and watched and wept while their husbands wrecked their fortunes, their business prospects, and their health in following their country's flag wherever a battle was to be fought or a victory to be won, whose pension claims are daily rejected by the Government.

Dependent fathers and mothers whose brave sons sleep where no flowers are ever strewn, are daily falling into graves where no Government aid can ever reach them. That tall shaft that casts its shadow across this National Capital ought to remind us that George Washington left a still more enduring monument when he declared that every soldier who risked his life, the ruin of his fortune, and the happiness of his home in saving the life of his country, was entitled to ample provision for himself and his family through all the declining years of his life. This was Washington's kind of patriotism, and I pray that the day is not far distant when we shall have a man in the White House whose patriotism and sympathy for the soldiers of the country will be akin to that which moved the great heart of Washington.

The Democratic party is not in harmony in regard to the disposition of the surplus. In this House we are considering a bill that proposes to reduce the surplus; but in Indiana the late Democratic State convention, which nominated the chairman of the Invalid Pension Committee as its candidate for governor, has declared not only in favor of liberal legislation on the pension question, but in favor of a service-pension law. The platform reads as follows:

> The Democratic party is the faithful friend of the soldiers, their widows and orphans, and in appreciation of the heroic and unselfish services of the Union soldiers and sailors, we declare in favor of liberal legislation in their behalf, including an enactment by Congress of a just and equitable service-pension law as a recognition of patriotism and a reward for honorable services rendered the Government.

I would like to inquire whether the other side of this House is in favor of a service pension, and if so whether all the surplus in the Treasury will not be needed for this purpose, and for the further purpose of equalizing bounties, paying arrears, paying prisoners of war, for paying the soldiers the difference between greenbacks and gold, and for such other liberal legislation as is comtemplated in this Indiana Democratic platform? I would like to know how many on the other side of this House propose to stand by this newly fledged Democratic idea? I will answer. This platform is only meant to catch votes. Gabriel will blow his horn before the Democratic party will ever favor such legislation. It is the same scheme that was perpetrated in Ohio in 1883, when the Democratic party promised in its platform to restore the duty on wool. This pledge was a success in Ohio. The Democratic party carried the State, elected the governor, the Legislature, and a United States Senator, but the duty on wool was never restored. I think the soldiers of Indiana will scarcely be caught in so flimsy a net as a Democratic resolution.

This is not the first time, Mr. Chairman, that President Cleveland waked the echoes of the nation's danger by sounding an alarm. On the 24th day of February, 1885, eight days before his inauguration, he wrote a letter, addressed to a member of the House of Representatives, calling upon Congress to repeal the silver-coinage law, which required $2,000,000 of silver to be coined each month. He announced the startling fact that gold and silver were about to part company; that the time of this separation was perilously near; that gold was about to be displaced by the excessive coinage of silver.

He depicted financial ruin, the disappearance of gold as a circulating medium, and all the horrors of an unprecedented contraction, which he said would follow the use of the so-called silver dollar in case the coinage of silver was not immediately stopped. The law was not repealed, gold did not disappear, but has grown more plentiful from that time to this, and the fearful contraction he foresaw never came. His Democratic brethren paid no attention to that alarm, and some of them will pay no attention to this.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the President a question. I would like to ask him this question: If the accumulation and retention of $60,000,000 in the United States Treasury is a menace to trade and commerce, and liable at any moment to bring upon the country financial ruin, what effect would an annual drain of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 have upon the country if the balance of trade were that much against us, as it most certainly will be if this bill should become a law? Or, in other words, is a surplus of this amount locked up in the United States Treasury any more completely withdrawn from the pockets of the people than it would be locked up in the treasuries of Europe? Not a particle. If it was a good thing for the President to sound the alarm of the nation's danger when this surplus was sleeping quietly in the vaults of the Treasury, how much more important is it just now for him to arouse the nation and call the attention of the country to the fact that a bill is now under consideration in the American Congress that threatens to so increase our imports that $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year will be permanently withdrawn from the United States. And should this bill pass, this annual drain of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 will go on from year to year until the nation is stranded, as it was before the war, when all of the gold that we had dug from the mines of California was carried across the seas to pay for foreign goods, and we were left without money and without credit.

Then there is another fact to be considered. The excess of our imports over our exports, which must necessarily be paid in gold, will destroy the equilibrium between gold and silver, enhance the value of gold, withdraw it from circulation, and cause a contraction of the currency of the country, which can only result in panic and distress. Here is a danger a hundred-fold more imminent and more to be dreaded than the existence of a surplus twice as large as the one now complained of. To send money out of the country to buy anything we can produce at home just as well as it can be produced abroad is a national calamity. It is just so much money thrown away. Money is more than wealth or property. It is the circulating medium of the country. It is the measure of values and means of exchange. Before we had a high protective tariff we were constantly buying more than we sold, and the consequence was that other countries were enriched at our expense.

Since we have had a high protective tariff the order has been reversed; we have sold more than we bought, and the consequence is that gold and silver have flowed into our country, and we now have more gold and silver than any other country in the world. And this money that we absorb from other countries increases our capital, and is invested and reinvested, first in one enterprise and then in another, and the wealth and prosperity of the country will increase as long as this influx of money continues.

If the balance of trade should be against us, as it would be under this bill, long enough to reduce our stock of gold in the United States $200,000,000, the value of the property in the United States would shrink at least 25 to 50 per cent. This would be an inevitable result.

No one will dispute that the volume of our money is the measure of our values; and when a great shrinkage comes, as came in 1857 from this same cause, and in 1873, when we were passing from inflation to resumption, the destruction of values and the bankruptcy of individuals must follow. Gentlemen on the other side talk a great deal about mortgages, as though they indicated the near approach of poverty and bankruptcy. This is not true. In times of prosperity they are the best security in the country, and these loans are alike beneficial to the mortgagor and the mortgagee. But when our tariff duties are reduced, and our imports exceed our exports, and our money goes abroad for foreign goods, and our volume of money becomes too small to do the business of the country, then it is that a mortgage ruins a mortgagor, because the mortgaged property is so reduced in value by the inevitable shrinkage that always follows this condition of trade that it will only sell at one-half its former value. A farm worth $10,000 when our exports exceed our imports may only sell for $5,000 when the current of trade is turned against us. This is what tariff tinkering does for poor men and for men who are in debt. How many thousands of men have passed through this same experience? Hence it is that we pay too much for the whistle we buy abroad, no matter how low the price.

If any one has any doubt about the reduction of tariff duties increasing our imports, and carrying just this much more money out of the country, let him look at the past. Since the war we have placed on the free-list imports which had paid in duties to the Government $23,000,000 annually, and we reduced the duties on other articles $55,000,000, and to-day the revenue from duties on imports is greater than at the close of the war, for the simple reason that a reduction of duties increases imports, and consequently increases the revenue. This is a result that can not be avoided, and it is the rock upon which every free-trade ship has been wrecked. And this is just as true of a family as it is of a nation. If a family buys more than it sells it will come to bankruptcy as certainly as the sun shines, and it is only a matter of time when this will occur—and after all a nation is only a great big family. If there is a sincere desire to reduce the revenue there are but two ways to do it; one way is to increase the free-list and the other is to increase the tariff. I favor the latter method.

CONFISCATION MEASURE.

Mr. Chairman, the Mills bill ought to be styled a confiscation act. That is what it will accomplish. Manufacturing establishments that cost hundreds of millions of dollars will be worthless if this bill becomes a law. Establishments that gave employment to labor and added greatly to the wealth and prosperity of the country will no longer have any value. This is the reciprocity which the South returns for the magnanimity of the North at the close of the war. Confiscation then was regarded as barbarous and cruel; now it is statesmanship and wisdom. That confiscation applied to the South; this applies to the North. The men who led the armies of the rebellion are now in the councils of the nation, and, instead of appreciating the magnanimity that restored to them their property and their citizenship, they now conspire to confiscate the private property of the manufacturers of the country. The South hated New England because it gave birth to abolitionism. Does it hate the manufacturers of the North because they made the suppression of the rebellion possible?

But it will be discovered that the confiscation of property will not be confined to the North alone. I have a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee from the Crystal Plate Glass Works at St. Louis, Mo. The stockholders of this company declare that they invested their money in this business upon the faith they had that the Government would not reduce the existing tariff on plate-glass. Under this belief they have invested $1,500,000 of capital, and at their works 30 miles below St. Louis, Crystal City has grown up, and is the home of their operatives. The stockholders, who are residents of Missouri, Ohio, Michigan, New York, and Connecticut, declare that if the reduction of the duty proposed in this bill is made they will be compelled to close their factory.

Although there are but four establishments in the United States manufacturing plate-glass, the price has been reduced one-half, and on some kinds fully two-thirds; and instead of a duty of $1 per square foot increasing the price this much, as the President suggests, it has resulted in reducing the price of plate-glass fully $1 per foot, and this has been the result in almost every instance where an American industry has been established.

These plate-glass factories which this bill is intended to destroy disburse in this country annually millions of dollars for labor and materials, every dollar of which remains in this country and goes to make a market alike for the farmer and the manufacturers, and prevents the importation of glass from abroad, which would carry many millions of dollars out of the country. What is this bill, then, but a measure of confiscation? The manufacturers of this country invested their money in these great enterprises, relying upon the integrity and good faith of the Government. Shall they be betrayed? Shall their property be destroyed?

ELEVATION OF THE MASSES.

Some gentlemen seem to think that the benefits of a protective tariff will cease when all countries adopt the same system. Great Britain is now almost the only free-trade country in the world, and yet she raises by a revenue tariff about $100,000,000 a year. Instead of this being a reason why we should abandon our protective system, it is a reason why we should preserve it. A high protective tariff accompanied with wise and just laws is a method by which a government can elevate its citizens to a higher plane of civilization. The United States is doing this now, but we can not lift the whole world up. We make laws for our own country, but we can not make laws for other countries. Charity begins at home, and our first duty is to protect American labor, increase its compensation as much as possible, protect the American market, patronize American manufactures, and keep at home American money.

Not only this, but a protective tariff is an element of national strength. The thrones and crowns of Europe are now facing the problem of taxation and debt as they never did before. The United States is the only government in the world that is reducing its national debt and its aggregate taxation. In ten years we reduced our aggregate taxation about 10 per cent. In the same period Europe increased her taxation over 25 per cent. In the same time France, Germany, Great Britain, and Russia increased their taxation an average of nearly 40 per cent.

In addition to increasing taxation, every country in Europe has been increasing its national debt, while under our protective system we are reducing our aggregate taxation, paying off our national debt, and have nothing to complain of but a surplus. But instead of guarding the welfare of the American Republic and watching the interests of the American people, we find this House engaged in an attempt to unfurl the British flag and open the American market to British free trade, and only about an hour ago it was charged on the floor of this House that Speaker CARLISLE is a member of the Cobden Club, and no Democrat dared deny it.

TIN-PLATES AND IRON ROOFING.

Mr. Chairman, if a duty of 2½ cents per pound were placed upon tin-plates, as was intended to be done by Congress a few years ago, sixty-six tin-plate works would be built in the United States and fifty thousand workmen would be at once employed in the manufacture of tin-plates in our own country. At present every tin pan, every tin bucket, and every tin kettle now used in the United States is made from tin-plates manufactured in Great Britain. If we were to have a war with England to settle the fishery dispute, or some other vexed question, we would have to go without tin buckets and tin pans until we could build our own works and manufacture our own tin-plates. Is it not a little humiliating that we must depend upon England for every sheet of tin-plate used in this country?

Since the first effort was made to protect this industry by adequate protection we have paid Great Britain $225,000,000 for tin-plates alone, which gave $180,000,000 of wages to English workmen. And we are to-day supporting in Great Britain, beneath the folds of the British flag, sixty-six tin-plate works and fifty thousand English workmen who devote their whole time in making tin-plates for American consumption. We import and consume the entire product of these sixty-six mills, which employ fifty thousand workmen. We purchase and import annually 70 per cent. of all the tin-plates made in England and Wales. Is this a wise policy? Is it right to send $20,000,000 annually to England for tin-plates which we can make in this country as well as they can be made any place in the world, provided the American manufacturer is protected against the cheaper labor of Europe?

The ad valorem duty on pig-iron is 43 per cent., on scrap-iron is 56 per cent., on galvanized iron 60 per cent., and on common sheet-iron 75 per cent., while the duty on tin-plates, the highest grade of any of these articles, is only 22 per cent.; and now the Mills tariff bill proposes to place tin-plates on the free-list and disappoint the last hope of saving this great industry to American workmen.

From 1873 to 1878 we erected in Ohio and Pennsylvania, at great cost, several tin-plate works and made as good tin-plate as ever came from any country; but these mills were crushed by the English manufacturers, who reduced the price of tin-plates from $14 to $5 per box, and the fires had scarcely gone out of the crippled tin-plate works in Ohio and Pennsylvania until the English importer put up the price of tin-plates to his own liking. This, Mr. Chairman, is free trade in tin-plates. It admits the product of cheap European labor into our markets at a low price until it destroys competition, and then the foreigner has a monopoly of the markets and gets his own price, and the money which rightfully belongs to the American manufacturer and to the American laborer goes to the European aristocrats who live on the blood of the hungry whose toil they steal and the tears of the down-trodden whose homes they blight.

The destruction of this great industry which would give employment to fifty thousand of our own people and support to nearly half a million more is not all that is embraced in this proposition to place tin-plates upon the free-list. It is intended by this reduction of duty on tin-plates to destroy the manufacture of sheet-iron and sheet-steel. There is couched in the Mills bill a secret stab at the manufacturers of sheet-iron and sheet-steel which does not appear on the surface. These products are apparently protected, while tin-plates, which are sheet-iron and sheet-steel coated with a thin film of tin, are placed on the free-list. There are now about 150,000 tons of sheet-iron made in the United States, while there are annually imported 280,000 tons of sheet-iron in the shape of tin-plates and terne-plates, which are sheet-iron covered with tin or a mixture of tin and lead. About one-third of the sheet-iron made in the United States is used for roofing and siding purposes, for which tin-plates can be substituted. What good will it do the manufacturer of sheet-iron or sheet-steel to have the highest protection on these products when tin-plates and terne-plates, which are composed of from 95 to 98 per cent. iron or steel and from 2 to 5 per cent. tin and lead, come in free? It seems to be the policy of this bill to slay not only the first-born of every American industry, but to take the life of the inmates of homes where the lintels and door-posts have been marked with the insignia of protection.

In Russia sheet-iron is used almost exclusively for roofing. The government buildings are all covered with iron roofing, and they are so made and so put on that they constitute the best roof in use, in the opinion of the Russian people and the Russian Government. The use of sheet-iron for roofing in this country is yet in its infancy, and yet there are many millions of dollars invested in it, and it already consumes and creates a demand for about one-third of the sheet-iron made in the sheet-iron mills of the country, an amount equal to the entire production of fifteen sheet-iron mills; and as timber and slate shall become more and more expensive this industry will demand a still greater product. But if tin-plates, which are 95 per cent. sheet-iron, are to come in free the effect will be not only to diminish the product of sheet-iron mills fully one-third, but it will destroy the sheet-iron and sheet-steel roofing business entirely.

This, Mr. Chairman, is what free tin-plates mean to the men engaged in iron and steel roofing, to the men engaged in the manufacture of sheet-iron and sheet-steel, and to the fifty thousand men who desire to make tin-plates on American soil and under the American flag. And the only reason why these industries are at the peril of foreign competition is that the foreign tin-plate workers are only paid about one-half the prices paid by the makers of tin-plates in this country. Is the aid of this great Government to be invoked to destroy these industries, or shall they have some sort of adequate protection?

FARMERS AND FARMING.

There is one branch of the tariff that I understand so thoroughly that it is not a matter of argument, but a matter of personal knowledge. I refer to the effect of a protective tariff upon a farming community. I was born on a farm in the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent, and I know by experience what farm life is and what the needs of the farmer are, and having lived all my life in this district, I have seen the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff in its effect upon the farmers of my district. I have seen the hardships, the privations, the rigid economies, the poverty, the bankruptcy, and the distress which existed under a Democratic revenue tariff, and I have seen the marvelous growth and prosperity which was developed by our system of protection.

Under the revenue tariffs of the Democratic party the farmers sold their wheat at 37½ cents a bushel, their corn at 15 or 20 cents, their horses at $50 or $60 per head, their cows at $10 or $12, and their eggs at 4 cents a dozen. Turnips, potatoes, apples, peaches, and pears rotted in the field for want of a market, and I have seen the time when there was absolutely no market for anything. Laboring men worked for 37½ cents per day, except in harvest, when they got 50 cents, and there was no eight-hour law then; a day's work was measured by the sun. There was only one skilled mechanic recognized in that day, and he was the cradler who cradled the wheat and oats and rye, and he got a dollar per day; but the man who cut with the scythe or sickle or thrashed with the flail only got 50 cents and worked from sun to sun. The great struggle with the farmer at that time was to get money enough to pay his taxes. If he could do this he was content to get along the best he could in supplying his other wants. His store bill, if he had any, was paid in grain, or pork, or beef, or some other product of the farm, and the laborer was paid with an order to the store. And while everything that he sold was cheap everything he bought was dear. Cotton cloth, calico, salt, nails, iron, steel, edged tools, etc., were a great deal higher than now.

The farms were as good as any I have ever seen in any State of this Union, and yet the farmers at that time raised their own wool, spun their own yarn, wove their own cloth, and made their own clothing. More boys went barefooted than wore shoes, more men went without overcoats in mid-winter than went with them, more people walked to church than rode in carriages; there were then more flannel dresses than silk, more sun-bonnets than velvet, more bare floors than carpeted, more walls without paper and pictures than with them, and a hundred-fold more hard work than leisure. Under the protective system, which this bill seeks to destroy, our farming community has grown and prospered. The homes of the farmers and the homes of the laborers are full of comforts and luxuries. Farms have increased in value, good markets and good prices have come to the farmer's door, and he now gets more for his small fruits and vegetables than he then got for all the products of the farm and field.

The district I now represent earns more, buys more, and consumes more than half of the State of Ohio did under a revenue tariff, and I believe has more money. The day laborers have more money in their pockets, see more, handle more, and use more than the wealthiest farmers did then. This is what protection does for the farmer, and the half is not told. And yet these free-traders who learn their wisdom from the Cobden Club, or from the British free-trade press that so warmly greeted the President's message, tell us that protection is robbing the farmer. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee may talk in that way to the beardless stripling who knows no better, but he need not repeat that stale story to the gray-headed farmers of my district, whether they be Democrats or Republicans.

WOOL AND WOOLENS.

In the Forty-eighth Congress I made a speech on the tariff in which I said so much about wool, and so little about anything else, that my friends called my speech a "wool speech." At that time I was almost the only one that discussed the wool question at any length, but in this Congress no speech is considered complete without an elaborate discussion of this question. My constituents are largely engaged in wool-growing and are deeply interested in the protection of this industry. I have presented to this House memorials and resolutions from wool-growing associations, hundreds of petitions, signed by thousands of wool-growers and farmers, asking for the restoration of the duty of 1867, and for the modifications of the tariff laws agreed upon here in Washington, in January last, by the wool-growers and the woolen manufacturers; and I have been careful to have the body of these petitions and memorials printed in the RECORD, and I will say in addition, that these petitions and memorials represent the universal demand of the wool-growers and farmers of my district without reference to party or politics.

Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to say that the wool-growers and many of the wool manufacturers would feel very little interest in this bill if they thought its defeat would not be followed by certain other legislation which they have been heretofore demanding. These industries are already prostrate, and are almost beyond the reach of further injury. There is not a single woolen mill in the country that uses Ohio wool, or any good American wool of any kind, that has made a dollar this last year, unless it be some mill that is making some novelty or specialty, and most of these mills have lost money. Since the reduction of the duty in 1883 the number of sheep in this country has been reduced from 51,000,000 to 44,000,000; the annual wool product from 320,000,000 pounds to 260,000,000, and this reduction has extended to every State in the Union.

In 1882, the year before the duty was reduced, the amount of wool imported was 64,000,000 pounds; last year it amounted to 114,000,000 pounds.

The importations of woolen yarns during the year ending June 30, 1883, before the reduction took effect, amounted in value to $433,000; in 1886 they amounted to $2,283,000. Importations of worsted goods in 1883 amounted to $963,000; in 1886 to $5,295,000. The duties on these two items alone from 1883 to 1886 increased the surplus $6,568,000. The United States in 1860 only consumed 86,000,000 pounds of wool; in 1886 it consumed 400,000,000 pounds, a development largely attributable to the growth of the American wool industry, an industry which is as much an American industry as any other on the continent, and yet to-day it lies mangled and bleeding for want of necessary legislation. Mr. Washington Belt, in his little pamphlet on wool, states that the loss which wool-growers would incur if wool were placed on the free-list would be as follows:

Shrinkage in the value of—
Lands	$280,000,000
Labor	25,000,000
Flocks	25,000,000
Wools	25,000,000
Total loss to the wool industry	355,000,000

And all this loss is to be inflicted upon the wool-growers to keep $6,000,000 out of the Treasury and to give manufacturers their raw material $25,000,000 cheaper; and it is now a question whether the wool-growers shall lose $355,000,000 or whether the manufacturers shall annually pay $25,000,000 more for their wool. Suppose manufacturers could save this sum by buying cheaper wool, who would be benefited? The manufacturers themselves declare against such a proposition. The signatures of 360 of the leading New England and Eastern manufacturers lie before me protesting against free raw materials. And I propose to quote from two of the most reliable New England manufacturers in proof of the fact that the woolen manufacturers are not asking for free raw material, but are protesting against it.

I will read an extract from some remarks made by Mr. Joseph P. Truitt, one of the best informed and one of the most conscientious manufacturers in New England:

I am opposed to that provision of the Mills tariff bill which admits wool free of duty, for the reason that free wool would be of no lasting benefit to the American manufacturer. It is stated as one of the principal reasons why this policy should be adopted that the manufacturer would obtain his wool so much cheaper.

If it is true that the abolition of wool duties would result in the cheapening of that article to the extent of the duty now paid, there is abundant reason for opposing it, for every pound of wool and every yard of goods now in the hands of dealers, merchants, and manufacturers would decline in value to a corresponding extent; and, as every sheep in the land must share in the depreciation, the immediate loss would be so great as to be almost incalculable. Every mill in the country would be compelled to stop: thousands of operatives now happily employed would be thrown upon the streets, and millions of yards of goods would be placed in the auction rooms for sale at prices that could only entail a fearful loss to the manufacturers; and while in this weakened condition the tide of foreign importation would come rushing in like some vast tidal wave, stifling and burying out of sight the industries of America, and years might elapse before they again recovered from the evil effects of this ill-advised measure.

Free raw material is the pioneer of free goods, for we can not expect that the wool-grower will consent to a policy of protection which embraces everything he buys and excludes every article which he produces and wants to sell.

The success of woolen manufacturing in this country is founded upon sheep husbandry at home, and the wool-grower is just as much entitled to protection upon the wool in which he invests his capital and which he exerts his skill to produce as the manufacturer who asks for a tariff in order that he may put it into goods; and I conceive that it is not only fair and honest, but that the very success of our business depends upon the support we give to the wool-grower. To admit wool free of duty means nothing more or less than the destruction of sheep-raising for wool in America.

We have seen the clip of this country grow under a protective tariff from 160,000,000 pounds in 1866 to about 320,000,000 in 1883, and we have also seen it decline under a badly constructed tariff to 265,000,000 at the present time. If it decreased at such a rapid rate when only a slight reduction was made, at what a frightful speed will it disappear when all protection is removed. Already the sheep are being killed off; wools costing 30 cents to raise are being sold at from 22 to 26 cents; the wool-grower is alarmed, and shows that he feels his loss by retiring from the business.

Without going into figures to show how certainly the clip is shrinking I will state that I am opposed to free wool for the reason, above all others, that it would inevitably destroy wool-growing in America, thus leaving us entirely dependent upon foreign markets for our supply. This would be no benefit to us, for instead of obtaining our wool cheaper than we do now we would have to pay more. At present we have our home clip to fall back on when we can not buy wool abroad, but then we would have but one market in which to buy and we would be compelled to compete with European buyers, who have many advantages over us. At present we only have to buy about 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 pounds of clothing and combing wool abroad, and then we would have to buy over 300,000,000 pounds, provided our mills were able to run at all. This does not include carpet wools.

If the price of wool in London is now 14 pence, it would unquestionably advance upon the appearance of American buyers for 300,000,000 pounds of wool. How much that advance would be no one can say, but it is generally believed it would be so great as to deprive us of all advantage that free wool might be supposed to bestow.

The only sheep that our farmers would probably be obliged to keep would be those known as mutton sheep, which grow medium and low-grade wools. Merino sheep would disappear entirely, so that all fine wools for delaines, fine worsted coatings, and knit-goods would have to be brought from abroad. So long as plenty of wool grows in Australia and South America this would be all right, but when some calamity happened reducing the clip, and wool consequently advanced, we would long for the wool clip of America which was so ruthlessly destroyed by this bill which is before us.

I believe, then, that all the promises of relief based upon free wool in this bill are a fraud and unreliable. It is not true that we would obtain our wool cheaper. It is true that we would lose our home wools. It would not give the citizen a suit of clothes one dollar cheaper, and it would reduce his wages more than by any means he could hope to gain. It would result in free-manufactured goods, for the farmer would never rest, if you made wool free, until he made goods free. I believe in the old motto, "United we stand, divided we fall." The wool-grower and manufacturer together can stand against all the assaults of politicians, and I am therefore in favor of protection from the lamb in the field to the clothes on our backs; and I desire now to enter my emphatic disapproval of free wool.

I desire also to read an extract from a statement made to the Boston Herald by Mr. James Phillips, a well-known and trustworthy manufacturer of Fitchburg, Mass. He says:

It has been clearly demonstrated by those who have studied the subject historically and statistically in all its details, that without protection the wool-growing industry of the United States will be destroyed; that under normal conditions a sufficiently high protective tariff will make the industry remunerative and prosperous; and that when under a protective tariff the prices of wool have been so low as to make wool-growing unremunerative, it has resulted not from the tariff, but from abnormal conditions, and but for the tariff the decline of the industry would have been much greater.

It is hardly possible to present the facts which point unmistakably to these conclusions in the present discussion, but in a general way it may be stated that precisely the same reason which makes it impossible for the woolen manufacturer in the United States to compete with woolen manufacturers in foreign countries, namely, the difference in cost of labor, enters into the problem of wool-growing. In other words, the cost of labor engaged in wool-growing in South America, in Australia, in Russia, and in other countries is much less than in the United States. Then, the cost of pasturage in those countries is less than in our own, to say nothing of climatic differences which make it necessary for us to feed and care for our sheep during the cold winter months. All these facts have been brought out in an unmistakable way by the

WOOL-GROWERS OF THE COUNTRY.

They have made as good a case in favor of protection as can possibly be made by any other industry. There can be no doubt of this. If this is admitted, and even free-traders must admit it, then I claim that it is impossible for any man who considers himself a protectionist, let alone any manufacturer who asks for protection for his goods, to discount his own arguments by denying the statistical evidence presented by the wool-growers of the United States. The history of the development of wool-growing in the United States is the same as that of any other protected industry. Its growth began when a tariff was enacted that enabled the American producer to compete with his foreign rival; that encouraged him to go ahead and improve the breed and quality of his sheep and increase the weight of its fleece. Like the other industries, the wool industry reduced when the protective barrier was lowered, and increased and developed rapidly when the tariff of 1867 secured for the American wool-grower the American market, until, in 1883, our flocks, stimulated by the tariff, reached over 50,000,000 sheep, and the product of the wool, in pounds, was 308,000,000.

Then came the fatal reduction in 1883, together with the importation abuses in the form of "ring waste" and "noils," and from that time to the present the number of sheep has declined, the wool product has decreased, and our native product has been supplanted by the foreign. These are simple facts which must be faced, and the point I wish to emphasize is, that these facts can not be construed one way for wool-growers and another way for wool manufacturers. As we now stand our annual consumption of foreign wool aggregates about 100,000,000 pounds. Of this, however, probably 80,000,000 pounds are carpet wools, largely of a kind not raised here. Our own product, which under adequate protection should be about 300,000,000 pounds, with about 20,000,000 pounds of imported wools of similar quality, supplies what we need at the present time for home manufactures of clothing and for other purposes.

Practically, therefore, our home supply of wool is nearly equal to the home demand for clothing purposes, and with adequate protection will undoubtedly continue to be so, and soon fully supply this demand. The value of the wool product is about $100,000,000 per annum, depending on the market prices. Wool is the sixth in order of value among the agricultural products, being exceeded only by corn, hay, wheat, cotton, and oats. Only one country in the world, Australia, excels us in the quantity of wool produced.

We who live in manufacturing States, which only produce 1,250,000 sheep, are apt to underestimate the importance and the ramifications of this great industry throughout the agricultural regions of the country. One hundred millions annually. What does that mean to the farmers of the United States? Well, suppose that by the passage of this free-trade bill this industry is seriously injured or destroyed, what will be the consequence to the farmer? Anything which impairs the prosperity of a country is damaging to the interests of that country, and of a country without the effects being felt in other parts, any more than you can develop and make prosperous a part of a country without that development and prosperity benefiting the country as a whole. The wool product, as I have shown, is one of the most important, and it furnishes to its producers the means for purchasing our manufactured articles.

Were this industry destroyed it would deprive them of the purchasing power, and the loss of this home market would depress the value of woolen products far in the excess of any advantage that would be gained by giving the manufacturer his wool at a lower price. The immediate effect of admitting wool free would undoubtedly be to depress its value, but as soon as this effect had been accomplished, and the wool industry of this country paralyzed or exterminated, the secondary effect would be a material advance in price, growing out of the absence of competition among American wool producers and the increase of the American demand for foreign wool. This effect would be felt for many years, and until the growth and production in barbarous countries had increased in proportion to the increase in the American demand. The final result would be that in place of an industry furnishing now $100,000,000 annually to our people in cash, with which to purchase commodities manufactured at home, the growth and development of the wool industry in barbarous countries all over the world would have been encouraged to such an extent that it would be almost impossible ever again to develop the industry in this country except by the re-enactment and permanent establishment of a high protective tariff. Even then it would take a long series of years to bring the wool production of this country up to its present proportions.

Referring to the distribution of this industry, it is perhaps necessary to call attention to the fact that no one agricultural product is so widely and uniformly distributed as that of wool-growing. In 1886 New England produced about 1,250,000 sheep; the Middle States, 3,000,000 sheep; the Southern States, 11,000,000; the Western States, 15,000,000; the Pacific Coast, 10,000,000, and the Territories, 7,500,000; total, 47,750,000. The importance of the wool-growing industry and its advantages to the farmers of our whole country are apparent from the above figures. Nearly all the products of the small farmer, by far the most numerous class, are consumed by the farmers themselves and their families. They can not eat or wear the wool they raise, so they sell it, and it forms, among the majority of farmers, their principal cash resource for the purchase of clothing and all other manufactured articles.

I have quoted at length from these two gentlemen for the reason that they are experienced manufacturers and have a personal knowledge of the wool industry.

Mr. Chairman, the reduction of the duty on wool and woolens in 1883, a measure I voted against, and a measure which is now deplored by all protectionists, is not the only cause of the prostration of these industries. The shameless interpretations and constructions of the Treasury Department have reduced the price of wool more than the reduction of the duty itself. One great wrong was inflicted upon this industry in the refusal of the Treasury officials to hold that worsted goods are woolen goods. They are made entirely of wool, and are as much woolen goods as cloth made of cotton is cotton cloth. And this distinction between woolen and worsted goods let in millions of dollars' worth of so-called worsted goods at a reduced duty, and to this extent destroyed the demand for good wool. Another Treasury decision let in lap waste, a sample of which I have before me, at 10 cents per pound when the duty should be 30 cents, as it is the very highest grade of wool and thoroughly scoured. I received this sample from Justice, Bateman & Co., wool merchants of Philadelphia, Pa., and I shall read their letter in regard to it:

PHILADELPHIA, April 28, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We send you a sample received this day from Liverpool, marked No. 1, which is lap waste such as by the recent decision comes in at 10 cents per pound duty, instead of 30 cents. This wool is selling in England at 50 cents free on board, duty 10 cents per pound, while the wool from which it is made costs 11½ pence, or 23 cents in the grease. The shrinkage is 51 per cent., and the scoured cost 47 cents, so you see that waste is 3 cents per pound higher than scoured wool in Liverpool. This is made up of broken pieces of top. The Mills bill admits top free, therefore this article will be free, and as 90 per cent. of Ohio wool is used for worsted purposes and the first process is to make it into top, under the Mills bill tops being free, they will be made in Europe. Therefore what is to become of the 90 per cent. of Ohio wool which at present enters into the manufacture of such tops as are made in the United States?

Very truly yours,

JUSTICE, BATEMAN & CO.

Hon. JOS. D. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.

Here is another sample, called tops, which ought to be classified as a manufacture of wool, as it is thoroughly scoured and partly manufactured, and yet it is only charged a duty of 10 cents per pound, whereas scoured wool, under the law, pays 30 cents per pound, and there was as much of this brought in last year as the whole wool crop of Pennsylvania.

The importation of this lap waste and tops at 10 cents per pound has the same result as letting in fleece wool at 3½ cents per pound, as it takes 3 pounds of unwashed wool to make 1 pound of this, and even more, as this is the very best of the wool. Messrs. Justice, Bateman & Co. say in another letter that—

Ninety per cent. of the wool of Ohio enters into tops, and if the tops are to be made abroad, as they will be if on the free-list, it will be a very much more serious blow to Ohio wool-growers than the friends of the Mills bill ever contemplated.

The cause of low prices and dull sales in the wool market is found partly in the crippled condition of woolen manufacturies, partly in the discriminations against home productions, partly in the injustice of the law of 1883, which reduced the duty on woolen goods as well as on wool, partly in the use, by means of improved machinery, of carpet wools for clothing, but none of these, nor all of them put together are doing as much harm to the wool grower as the unfriendly and unjust rulings of the Treasury Department to which I have just called your attention.

Mr. Chairman, I have received a good many newspaper articles in relation to the magnanimity of the Texas people, which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee professes to represent. It is said that Texas has more sheep than New York and New England both, and yet it is said that Texas is in favor of free wool. I have clipped from the New York Sun, a Democratic newspaper, the following article, containing resolutions adopted by the Cattlemen's Association of Western Texas, which I shall read:

MILLS ATTACKED AT HOME—THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE CATTLEMEN'S ASSOCIATION OF WESTERN TEXAS.

The spirited resolutions adopted by the Cattlemen's Association of Central Texas, at their convention at Waco, had better be kept from Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS for the present, unless the health of the statesman's nervous system has been pretty well re-established.

The preamble of the resolutions adopted by Mr. MILLS's constituents holds him responsible for a tariff measure which retains the duty on fencing wire while removing the duty from the flocks the fences inclose; which puts hides on the free-list, while retaining the duty on manufactured leather; which does not materially interfere with the duty on woolen goods, but wipes out the tariff on raw wool; and which, in short, would destroy the cattle and wool raisers' interests. The resolutions then go on to declare that Mr. MILLS "does not represent the Ninth district nor the State of Texas in his position, and that his course tends to destroy the material industries of his constituency." We quote further from the text of the resolutions adopted by Mr. MILLS's wool-raising constituents:

We deprecate the course of Mr. MILLS, and put ourselves on record in hearty condemnation of his conduct and his bill.

We consider his action in rendering protection to the powerful and pampered industries of the East and North, and withholding it from the struggling industries of his own constituency, undemocratic, unpatriotic, and unrepresentative.

We condemn the Providence speech of Mr. MILLS, wherein he guarantied protection to the Rhode Island people and agreed to rob the Texas people.

Forsaken by our Representative, we urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to work against the Mills bill, and we call upon all good men from other States to protect Texas, if her own Representatives fail to do so.

Protection on raw wool is purely a protection to the producer, the farmer, as well as the sheep man, and should be maintained; and, finally,

If Mr. MILLS persists in and urges the proposed removal of the duty on wool and hides, it is the sense of this, a representative body of his constituency, that he abdicate his seat, and hereafter we will withhold our support at the ballot-box and elsewhere.

I have in my hand a circular of Justice, Bateman & Co. giving the present prices of wools and the prices at which the same wool will sell if placed on the free-list. I will only give the prices of four classes of unwashed and four classes of washed clothing wool.

Classes.	Average market price in Philadelphia, May, 1888, under tariff act of 1883.	Free wool prices for American fleeces on basis of scoured value of competing grades in London, May, 1888.
Unwashed clothing:
Fine unmerchantable, XX and above, Ohio	32	13
Fine unmerchantable, X and above, Michigan	21	12
Fine unwashed clothing, XX and above, choice	20	13
Fine unwashed, X and above, average	19	12
Washed clothing:
Ohio and Pennsylvania XX and above, choice	30	18
Ohio and Pennsylvania XX and above, average	29	17
Ohio and Pennsylvania X	29	17
Ohio and Pennsylvania medium, three-eighths to one-half blood	36	27

There is another cause for the depreciation of wool which I have discovered, and I do not think that the wool-growers have any appreciation of the extent of it. I refer to the use of carpet wools in the manufacture of clothing. Washed carpet wools which only pay 3 cents per pound duty can be used in the manufacture of many kinds of clothing, and clothing, too, that comes into competition with the products of woolen mills that use high-priced wool. I refer to this simply in proof of existing wrongs.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to a discrepancy in the Democratic party. In Ohio the Democratic press is in favor of the Mills bill because they say that it will increase the price of wool to place it on the free-list, and in proof of this they refer to the depressed prices of wool after the passage of the law of 1867, while the Ways and Means Committee and the President's message declare that the object of placing wool on the free list is to enable the manufacturer to obtain cheap wool.

The answer to this is found in the fact that the prices of wool in London fix the prices of wool all over the world, including the United States. And when the prices of the world fell the prices of wool in the United States fell also, and the prices of wool in the United States would have fallen as low as the price in the markets of the world but for our tariff and the premium on gold. It was because wool declined in London that the American price of wool declined from 70 to 50 cents, and but for the tariff of 1867 and the premium on gold our wool would have gone down from 70 cents currency to 18 cents gold, as it did in London. It was not protection that reduced the price of wool, but the enormous increase of sheep in the Argentine Republic and in Australia, where sheep have increased from 40,000,000 in 1858 to 320,000,000 in 1887; and as this increase of wool progressed the price of wool in the markets of the world declined, the supply of wool rising and the price of wool falling, and in this way the price of wool all over the world, including the United States, was brought down, and but for the tariff and the premium on gold it would have gone still lower.

When wool the same in quality as our XX Ohio washed wool will sell in London at 18 or 20 cents a pound, American money, it is impossible for American wool-growers to compete in the markets of the world. The Argentine Republic and Australia, where a league of land can be bought for a few hundred dollars, where labor is worth only a few pennies a day, and where sheep live on pasture all the year through, have advantages that we have not, and unless the wool-growers of this country are adequately protected the waste lands which can only be used for feeding sheep will be worthless, the American flocks will be destroyed, a million men will be robbed of their employment, several millions of people will lose their means of support, and $100,000,000 a year will be sent out of the country for wool.

MANUFACTURE OF STARCH.

There is another industry in which the farmers of this country are interested that this bill aims to destroy. I refer to the manufacture of starch, which furnishes to the farmer a market for his corn. The following figures can be depended upon as showing the importance and extent of this industry in the United States at the present time:

Number of corn-starch factories	24
Capital invested	$10,000,000
Daily capacity, bushels of corn	40,000
Annual capacity, bushels of corn	12,480,000
Acres of land required to raise corn, at 26 bushels per acre	480,000
Farmers necessary to raise corn, 3 men per 100 acres	14,400
Annual capacity, pounds of starch	261,920,000
Value of starch produced annually	$12,476,800
Laborers employed in factories	3,500
Amount of wages paid annually	$1,638,500
Average rate of wages per day	$1.50

The present duty on starch is 2 cents per pound, and this bill proposes to reduce the duty to 1 cent per pound, but does not propose to reduce the duty on corn, which is the starch-maker's raw material. Why should the duty on starch be reduced? There is no starch manufacturer in the United States to-day making 5 per cent. on his capital stock, and I know personally that many of them are losing money. The average sales of the manufacturers for the past year will not exceed 4 cents per pound, which is the average export price for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and at this time is about the average cost of production. A bushel of corn will yield 28 pounds of starch, and when the corn costs 56 cents per bushel, the starch in the corn will cost 2 cents per pound. The labor and chemicals employed will cost 1¾ cents per pound. Insurance, transportation, taxes, and a very small profit will consume the other five-eighths of a cent.

If the duty on starch is reduced as proposed it will utterly destroy this industry. Who is complaining of the price of starch? It was never so cheap before in the world. The only object of reducing the duty is to let in potato starch from Germany, where the average wages in starch factories is 60 cents a day, as against $1.50 a day in this country. I hold in my hand a late German paper giving the present price of potato starch at Berlin and Hamburg, the two great centers of Europe for potato starch; and this selling quotation reduced to American money is $1.94 per hundred pounds. Adding freight from Berlin to New York City, 12 cents per hundred, would make the cost of European potato starch laid down in New York or Boston $2.06 per hundred, which is less than the cost of the corn at the present time, without taking into account the cost of manufacturing. Hence it is evident that this reduction of the duty on starch of 1 cent per pound will destroy this industry, increase imports, send our money abroad for starch, and greatly increase the surplus.

THE HOME MARKET.

The discussion of the tariff question resolves itself simply into this inquiry: Shall the alien or foreigner, to whom we are under no legal obligations, who neither fight our battles in time of war nor pay our taxes in time of peace, have access to our markets on the same terms as an American? This is what England wants; this is what the Cobden Club wants; this is what free-traders want.

As well might the Englishman ask to ride on our railways free of fare, or stay at our hotels free of charge. The privilege of selling in the American markets is a franchise of great value, and belongs as a matter of right only to Americans. There is no other such market beneath the circle of the sun. And why? Simply because our laboring people are better paid than the laboring people of any other country in the world. Go to any city or town or village and inquire why the people buy so much and the answer will be, because poor people are well paid. They will tell you that the market is not made good by the few rich men who live in it, but by the masses of poor people who labor for a living.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means declared a great truth in his Texas speech when he stated that we consume more of the products of our own labor than the 200,000,000 people on the continent of Europe. That is true. There is no people in the world that buy as much, or eat as much, or wear as much, or live as well as Americans do, and what men earn is the measure of what they consume, and this is why the American market is the best in the world. The annual products of the farm are estimated at $8,000,000,000 and the manufacturers at $7,000,000,000—an aggregate of $15,000,000,000, and all this is consumed in this country except about 6 per cent.

Why should we surrender to the world a market like this with a prospect of getting others in return? We had better aim to occupy our own market as nearly as we can. There is now imported into this country $45,000,000 worth of woolen goods which we should manufacture at home, and out of our own wool. There is imported into this country annually about $300,000,000 of other articles that ought to be manufactured in this country. And if we could do this and keep this money at home, we would have very little need of a foreign market or of a foreign trade. But they tell us that this is narrow philanthropy; that broad statesmanship embraces the whole world, and not a little Republic like ours. But I remember that about two thousand years ago a free-trade scientist propounded this question, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar or not?" The ringing answer has come down through the centuries, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Two thousand years later we will make the same response; we will be just to all nations and all lands; we will render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's and unto America the things that belong to America.

There is a way, Mr. Chairman, in which our export trade can be increased, and I would like to suggest it to the other side of this House. The way to build up an export trade is to build up a merchant marine, to place American ships on every sea, and to send American seamen into every port, until there will not be a harbor in the civilized world where our flag will not wave or where our wares will not be seen.

TRUSTS AND MONOPOLIES.

There is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that is not at all surprising, and that is that all the changes should be rung upon trusts, pools, combinations, monopolies, and strikes. This has been the stock in trade of the Democratic party so long that it has grown old and musty. The stench of it is offensive, and the sound of it disgusting. A trust may be a good thing or it may be a bad thing, depending altogether on its purpose, but neither trusts nor pools nor combinations nor strikes have been fostered by protection. They have afflicted free-trade England just as much as they have America. And experience has shown us that where a trust or combination is not destroyed by its own weight it is cured by competition, and if legislation is necessary to check any unjust combination I am ready to grant it.

But what has the tariff to do with trusts or strikes or monopolies? Did the tariff have anything to do with the whisky trust or the Standard Oil trust or with the cotton-seed oil trust? Not a particle. It certainly had nothing to do with the coffee trust, for coffee was on the free-list, and if the tariff has had anything to do with the sugar trust why does not this bill place sugar on the free-list, where it ought to be? The idea of a manufacturing establishment which every town and village in this broad land will welcome as a Godsend, with offers of land and money and exemption from taxes, being a monopoly when the business is open to every man alike, is too absurd for consideration. The man who has a patent-right has a monopoly of his invention for seventeen years. The man who has written a book has a monopoly of his copyright, but no manufacturing establishment is a monopoly. The business is open to all. The tendency of protection is right the other way.

The multiplicity of factories, their wide distribution over the country, and their close proximity and relationship to the consumer, make unreasonable combinations impossible; while articles manufactured abroad fall into the hands of a few importers who can very easily combine and fix their own prices, as they have done a thousand times already.

THE MYSTERY OF PROTECTION.

The argument against protection to which the demagogue usually resorts is ridicule. He wants to know how it is that protection will cheapen cloth and raise the price of wool? how it is that protection will cheapen hats and caps and raise the price of labor? I would say in reply that the object of a protective tariff is not for the purpose of cheapening anything. That is not its aim, though it often is the effect. The object of a protective tariff is to diversify labor, to equalize emoluments, to secure a just recognition of individual rights, and a fair distribution of accruing benefits. To accomplish this we must protect American labor. In doing this we bring the producer and the consumer together, get rid of middlemen, and save transportation. This gives to the farmer a market for his crops which are perishable, and saves the freights on those that are not. If we were to feed 3,000,000 operatives in Europe, they might pay there enormous prices for our agricultural products and yet the farmer here receive a mere pittance; but when we bring these manufacturers to our doors a lower price than they paid there will be a high price to the farmer here, and a benefit to both.

The cheapness of manufactured products comes largely from the use of machinery, the sharpness of competition, and the saving of transportation. And the wisdom of good wages to the laboring man and good prices to the farmer is found not only in the benefit to them, but in the benefit which accrues to the capitalist and to the country in the creation of a market which has no parallel in the world's history, for all classes become consumers and add to the common prosperity of rich and poor alike. It does not satisfy hunger to tell a man that bread is 4 cents a loaf if he has no 4 cents. It will not keep away the chill of winter to tell a family that blankets are $3 a pair if they have no means of getting the $3. It is not a question whether we shall pay this price or that; but the question is, how shall we get the means with which to buy? How can we best provide for ourselves and our families? Under what system can we obtain the best home, the best food and raiment, and the most of this world's blessings? What plan has given the best results? Go to yonder immigrant, who is only one of a half-million who land on our shores every year, and ask him—look into the pale faces of his half-clad wife and children and ask them.

WHO PAYS THE DUTY?

The President in his message and the speakers on this floor declare that the consumer or purchaser of a dutiable article pays the amount of the duty in addition to the cost of production, no matter whether the article is imported or not; or, in other words, that the duty on the imported article raises the price of the American product of the same article an amount equal to the duty. If this is true, omitting freight, the price of the article here would always be obtained by adding the duty to the price in London or Liverpool. And the price in London or Liverpool would always be ascertained by subtracting the duty from the price here. This being admitted, let us test this theory. The price of a certain quality of cotton cloth is 8 cents a yard in London, and the duty is 5 cents a yard. These added together, according to the free-trade theory, would give us as the American price 13 cents a yard; but we find that we can buy the same quality of goods here as cheap as in London. Take the price here, 8 cents, subtract the duty, 5 cents, and it will give 3 cents as the price in London; but it can not be bought in London any less than 8 cents, the price here. Take corn-starch. The duty on it is 2 cents a pound. The wholesale price here is 4 cents a pound. Subtract the duty from the price here and it will give the price in London at 2 cents a pound; but corn-starch in London is 5 cents a pound. Take the London price of starch at 5 cents a pound and add 2 cents duty to it and this would make the price of corn-starch here 7 cents a pound, 3 cents too much.

The price of steel rails in this country is $31.50 a ton. The duty is $17 and the freight $2.50, making $19.50 tax on imported rails. This deducted from $31.50, according to the free-trade theory of the President, leaves $12 as the British price of steel rails; but instead of this the British price is $20 instead of $12.

The steel-rail industry owes its existence in this country to the high tariff of $28 per ton, under which the price came down and down until steel rails were sold at $27 per ton, $1 less than the duty. Take still another illustration. The duty on cut nails is $1.25 a keg and the American price is $2 a keg of 100 pounds. If the President's theory is right these nails ought to be bought in Europe at 75 cents a keg, but they can not be bought any place in the world for such figures. Cut nails have been sold in this country at $1.85 when the duty was $1.50 a keg. Chloroform sells for 35 cents a pound while the duty is 50 cents a pound; and there are many articles that sell for less than the duty. At the time a heavy duty is placed upon an import the price may go up, but when its manufacture is once firmly established in this country it will just as certainly come down, and when an article is placed upon the free-list the price may for the time go down, but as soon as American competition ceases it will just as certainly go up.

Take wool for an example. If it should be placed on the free-list the price will immediately go down about 10 cents a pound; but when the American wool industry shall have been destroyed, when the American wool-growers shall have gone into bankruptcy, when the world's product of wool shall be lessened by the destruction of the American crop, the price of wool will be higher than it has been in many years. And although we would then restore the duty it would take a great many years to build up the wool industry again and we would be left for a great while at the mercy of the importers. Take one hundred articles in common use in your home, in your family, and in your business, and compare the present prices under a protective tariff with the prices of any revenue period in the past, and the prices of ninety-five of these articles will be 100 per cent. lower than they were then, and some of them will be 500 per cent. lower, and a great deal better, while wages are higher than they have been during this century. The foreign manufacturer and the importer are compelled to pay these duties after competition has once gained a foothold in this country. America is the dumping-ground for foreign manufacturers, and they send their surplus here and sell it at any price they can get.

I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that there are other industries in my district, such as glass, potteries, etc., seriously affected by this bill, and I shall have something to say of them when we come to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, when amendments will be in order. I want now to protest against this bill as being intensely sectional, offensively partisan, and grossly inconsistent. Why is it that an iron hoop that goes around a bale of cotton is placed upon the free-list and an iron hoop that goes around a bale of hay is made to pay a duty? Why is it that the duty on sugar is retained at a high rate while wool is placed on the free-list? Why is it that the rice of the South is given a high rate of protection while the lumber of the North is placed on the free-list? Why are the rice and sugar and cotton plantations of the South protected, while farms and forests of the North are turned over to the tender mercies of free trade?

And I desire also, Mr. Chairman, to protest against that feature of this bill which substitutes ad valorem for specific duties, a change which can only invite undervaluation, perjury, and fraud, and ultimately bring the whole protective system into contempt and failure; and I am willing to base my objections to this change upon the reasons given in Secretary Manning's report. But more than all, Mr. Chairman, I protest against the passage of this bill because of its effect upon the industries and the labor of the country. The effects of this bill would not be confined to manufacturing. While we are here to-day discussing this question, the mason with his trowel, the carpenter with his hatchet, the painter with his brush, the miner with his pick, and the laborer with his shovel, are no longer able to get employment because the improvements of the country have been paralyzed by this bill. And behind these brawny laborers stand anxious wives, with wrenched hands and tearful eyes, anxiously inquiring whether their food and raiment are going to be parceled out between the laborers of America and the paupers of Europe. In this bill they see, as they see the stars in the heavens above, the coming destruction of American industries and the desolation of the American home.

But I am glad of one thing, Mr. Chairman, and that is that we are not, in the approaching campaign, to have the usual Democratic straddle on the tariff question. The President has taken the party shackles into his own hands, and has fastened one end of the party chain to the foot of British free trade and has welded the other around the neck of the Democratic party. Wherever free trade leads the Democratic party will follow. The President's organ has announced that the Democratic protectionists will be taken from the head of the procession and sent to the rear to do hosital duty. Think of the men who have given to the Democratic party all the character it has had in twenty years bathing the foreheads, washing the feet, and paring the corns of the free-trade Democrats whom the President and the Speaker of this House have so recently made the leaders of the Democratic party!

Mr. Chairman, if Henry Clay could compare the seven years before the tariff of 1824 with the seven years that followed as a vindication of the wisdom of protection, the Republican party of to-day only needs to compare the twenty-four years that followed the tariff of 1861 with the twenty-four years preceding it. When this comparison is made the world listens, the thrones of Europe tremble, the downtrodden of every nation and kindred and tongue take courage. The sunshine and rain and dews of America have been fresher and sweeter than ever before. The hearts and hopes and homes of the poor have been lifted up. Bands of steel and bands of sympathy have bound sixty millions of people together as humanity was never interwoven before. The mountains of iron and coal and copper join hands with capital and toil and skill, and the sickly Republic which the Democrats deserted in 1861 is to-day the foremost nation in the world. America, in her gold, in her silver, in her agricultural products, in her manufactured products, in her railroads and telegraphs and telephones, in her colleges and schools and churches, in all that go to make a great nation and a great people, has outgrown all the empires and kingdoms and nations of the planet we inhabit.

The Republican party lifted the old starry flag from the mud into which the Democratic party had trodden it and placed it above all the flags of God's green earth. On sea and on land, at home and abroad, the Republic has won honor and respect. And when the world's great volume of national immortality is written, and when the political parties of the ages are assigned their places in the world's history, at the head of the column will stand the name and deeds and triumphs of the Republican party. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States in his annual message has pronounced the present tariff laws "vicious, inequitable, and illogical."

This charge, made as it is by the Chief Magistrate of the country, against the laws which raise the revenues for the Government is a grave one, but it is undeniably true. The Committee of Ways and Means insert in their report upon the pending bill a table to show the true nature of duties under the tariff laws. A slight study of this table will clearly demonstrate the distinction between a specific and ad valorem duty, and why the manufacturer clamors for the one and despises the other. The ad valorem duty means a charge or tax on the article according to its value, and is not like the specific duty which fixes arbitrarily the tariff, regardless of the value of the article taxed. The specific duty makes the poorer people pay the same tax for a yard of cloth worth 45 cents that the rich man pays for a yard of broadcloth that costs $3.66; but this fact the specific tariff conceals. Is it not fair to tax the article according to its value? A tax ad valorem, or according to value, on the yard of broadcloth above mentioned, which costs $3.66, would, at 40 per cent., make $1.44, while on the cloth which costs 45 cents per yard the tax would be 18 cents, and the duty would be fair to both. As it is, the tax is 180 per cent. on the cheap cloth the poor man buys, and is only 50 per cent. on the high-priced broadcloth.

I will use the table set out in the report of the committee, and to it ask special attention, for, as the committtee well say, it is worthy of careful study:

This table is well worthy of careful study. In examining the figures given in the column headed "Price at factory" and the column headed "Per cent. of price at factory," which the total duty amounts to, the startling inequalities in the rate of duty to be paid in this country becomes apparent. The highest-priced goods named in the table is West of England broadcloth, worth $3.60 per yard in Leeds, the specific duty being 35 cents per pound and the ad valorem duty 40 per cent., making a total duty of 50.3 per cent. on the value at the factory. This is on a high grade of goods. In looking at the bottom of the table the last entry is for cotton-warp reversible cloth, made in imitation of a bette kind. It is worth but 45 cents per yard at the factory. The specific duty is the same as on the West of England broadcloth, 35 cents per pound, the ad valorem duty is 35 per cent., but the specific duty and the ad valorem duty together make the rate on the price at the factory 180.7 per cent. That is to say, the cheaper the goods at the factory the greater is the proportional increment of duty. The column headed "Per cent. of price at factory," which shows the percentage that the duty is of the factory price, brings this out clearly.

The committee refer to the cotton goods schedule for further illustration of this idea, and call attention to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on revision of tariff, February 16, 1886. They say:

It will be seen in his report by the tables sent to him by persons dealing in cotton goods imported into the United States from foreign countries, that cheap goods, costing 3.55 cents per yard pay 176 per cent. duty or tax, while those costing 8.12 cents per yard pay 77 per cent. duty; and goods that cost 4 cents per yard pay a duty of 94 per cent., while those that cost 2 cents per yard pay a duty of 208 per cent. These inequalities run throughout the whole system of specific duties. It is that feature that commends it to the manufacturer of the competing article. As these excessive rates are thought to be more hurtful in cotton and woolen goods than in the articles embraced in other schedules, the committee have substituted the ad valorem for the specific duties as to the articles in the woolen schedule, and in all except yarns in the cotton schedule.

I now quote these words from the platform of the Republican party of 1884:

The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff, and to reduce the surplus.

Then they admitted the inequalities and promised the people to correct them. This was four years ago. When and how, gentlemen, do you intend to redeem this pledge? It was solemnly given to the people of this country in 1884 in convention at Chicago when you were appealing for votes, and though only a few weeks will elapse before you are called upon to express yourselves upon this subject in a national platform, you have not kept the pledge already given. In view of your conduct and history for the past two Congresses since that solemn pledge was given to the people, how can you come before the country again and excuse yourselves for your failure? Have you even tried to keep it? Did you not, as one man, in the Forty-ninth Congress, on at least two occasions absolutely refuse to consider the question of correcting the irregularities of the tariff and the reduction of the surplus, which you had pledged yourselves to the people to do? Twice during that Congress the Democratic party said, let us take up the tariff question, revise it in a spirit of fairness to all interests, lower taxes, reduce the surplus, and relieve the people of the oppression upon them, but you responded with a unanimous no. You said by your votes, this matter does not deserve consideration at the hands of Congress.

The Democratic party was endeavoring to keep the pledge it made at Chicago "to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all parties." This was right and proper. A party, as well as an individual, should faithfully keep and observe pledges. The highest sense of duty to the voters of the land demands this. Party platforms and pledges should mean something; and when a party in national convention in this country solemnly pledges itself to carry out any given policy on a great subject it should be held to a strict accountability.

In no other way can the intelligent voters of this land decide with which party they will affiliate. Shall it be said party platforms are only made to catch votes? Are our people to be educated to such a standard of political morals as this?

The Republicans have presented no bill to this House "for the purpose of reducing the surplus or correcting the irregularities of the tariff which they admit to exist." They content themselves simply by opposing the reasonable, fair, just, and conservative measure which is pending as the result of Democratic thought and action. It is not claimed that the pending bill is a perfect one. Upon the bill generally, or as a whole, the Committee of Ways and Means say:

The committee have determined to recommend a reduction of the revenues from both customs and internal taxes. They have given the whole subject a careful and painstaking examination, and in the revision of the schedules have endeavored to act with a spirit of fairness to all interests. They have carefully kept in view at all times the interests of the manufacturer, the laborer, the producer, and the consumer.

The bill herewith reported to the House is not offered as a perfect bill. Many articles are left subject to duty which might well be transferred to the free-list. Many articles are left subject to rates of duty which might well be lessened. In both respects the bill could be improved; but in its preparation the committee have not undertaken or felt authorized to construct a new and consistent system of tariff taxation. They have dealt with the existing system, seeking to free it of much of its injustice, to simplify its provisions, to diminish its complexity, and as far as practicable to lighten its pressure on the tax-payer and make it more contributory to our industrial prosperity and progress.

Furthermore, we have felt constrained to consult the opinions and give weight as far as possible to the views of our associates from different parts of the United States, always subordinate, however, to the paramount consideration of the welfare of the entire country. From the beginning of our Government tariff legislation has been based on the principles of mutual concession. The present bill does not depart from this precedent.

The Democratic party, in the effort to keep its pledge to the people, here and now attempts, as it has heretofore done, to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests. Let us hope that when the vote is taken no Democrat will prove recreant to that pledge. [Applause.]

If the bill is not perfect, let him come forward in the proper spirit, ask for concessions, and keep the faith with the people.

Too much time has already been spent, and is yet being consumed, by gentlemen on this floor arguing the theory of protection and free trade. However interesting these arguments are—and much learning has been displayed by gentlemen in their advocacy of one or the other theory—it is not, I respectfully submit now, a question of either protection or free trade.

As the President so aptly expressed it in his annual message to Congress, "it is a condition which confronts us, not a theory." He wisely added, "the question of free trade is absolutely irrelevant," and so, I add, is the question of protection in so far, I mean, as this bill affects that question.

Gentlemen may discourse upon the beauties of protection, and they have done so; but that is not the question to which we must, as intelligent legislators, address ourselves. It is to the condition in which we find the country, and not so much what brought about this condition, that demands our immediate attention. We have an overflowing Treasury. The laws under which taxes are collected are putting into the Treasury vast sums in excess of the necessities of the Government. Various expedients have been resorted to by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury for some time past to keep down this rapidly accumulating surplus. Large sums have been expended by the Treasury Department in the purchase of Government bonds not yet due for this purpose.

In some instances a premium of more than 24 per cent. has been paid out for these bonds—that is, for a hundred dollars of such bonds more than $124 has been paid. By such resorts as I have just mentioned the people have been relieved to some extent and immediate danger averted. The surplus, however, has continued to accumulate, so that by the 30th day of June, 1888, it is estimated that the surplus in the Treasury will amount to the enormous sum of $150,000,000. This sum is to be locked up in the vaults of the Treasury for no purpose whatever. It can not be used for any demands of the Government. The people will have paid it. If the Government does not need it, it should be returned to them? [Applause.]

This condition is not to stop with the 30th of June, but on and on and on each succeeding month will see from ten to twelve millions of dollars added to this enormous and unneeded surplus.

Shall we legislate so as to stop this drain upon the people's pockets, this hoarding up of their money? Or shall we till overcome by disaster debate the theory of protection and free trade? If the situation is not relieved by legislation at once, or at least at a very early date, it requires no prophetic ken to foretell that financial convulsion and widespread disaster will follow. This bill is not free trade, nor does it break down the system of so-called protection; but it will bring some relief to the country, and for this reason it should pass. It is to my mind a silly cry made by gentlemen opposing this bill, that its passage will bring ruin upon the country. When did the country ever have so high a tariff before? Never until the late war was there any such rate of tariff taxation as was then enacted; yet the country grew and prospered everywhere up to that date. The rate of taxation is now, on the average, over 47 per cent. The passage of the pending bill only reduces it a small sum. After its passage the rate will be higher than under the highest tariff passed during the late war, and this bill is more protective than the highest protective measure ever enacted before the war. It will leave it higher than the rate recommended by the Republican Tariff Commission of 1883.

This was a commission organized to recommend to Congress what the rate of taxation should be. They were so-called experts. They made their investigation and recommendation to Congress. This was in 1883; and the present bill, if it passes, will leave the rate of taxation higher than those Republican experts said it should be. Yet "there is ruin to come to the country if the bill is enacted into a law."

Gentlemen need not make such foolish and extravagant assertions, and expect the people of this land to be thereby deceived. This bill will add no more to the free-list, with the one exception of wool, than was recommended by President Arthur and his Secretary of the Treasury, Folger.

Lest I be accused of doing President Arthur injustice, I will quote his exact words from an annual message to Congress. He said:

> Without entering into minute detail, which under present circumstances is quite unnecessary, I recommend an enlargement of the free-list so as to include within it the numerous articles which yield inconsiderable revenue, a simplification of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, particularly those of cotton, iron, steel, and a substantial reduction of the duties upon those articles, and upon sugar, molasses, wool and woolen goods.

This is nearly all the pending bill does. The last Republican President recommended this; his Secretary of the Treasury went even further, and yet to do the very thing they recommended should be done will ruin the country if now done by Congress?

The idea of ruining a country by abolishing its needless and unnecessary taxes was never before heard of in the history of any people in the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, absolute free trade is not possible in this country now. To raise the enormous revenue required for the support of the Government a tariff is necessary, but Congress should be careful to raise on more revenue than just enough to support the Government. No matter how low the tariff is that raises this revenue some protection will thereby be afforded to our manufacturers. Just to what extent a tariff or revenue law shall be made protective is a question of vital interest to the people, and should be well understood by them. It is, as I shall show, susceptible to very great abuse.

It is gravely argued on this floor, and has been always asserted by the friends of protection, that protection raised the wages of labor. The time was when the rallying cry was "Protection to American industries," sometimes called infant industries, but now we only hear of protection to American labor. It is not meant by this that protection raises alone the wages of persons who are employed in special industries or manufactories protected by the tariff. To do this would be to admit that the benefits of protection are partial and not shared by all laborers, and protectionists will not do that. Can it be that laborers on a farm, or in an industry not protected by the tariff, are benefited by this so-called protection? Are their wages increased by it? What, let me ask, is the object of the protective tariff? It is to check the importations of foreign goods and thereby increase the price of American goods and articles that the manufacturer of such goods and articles in the United States may receive the larger profits.

How does the fact that the manufacturer gets more money for his goods insure the further result that his laborer gets larger wages? It is even denied that the manufacturer is thereby made the better able to pay larger wages; but are wages measured by the ability of the employer, or are they not rather measured by the demand for the labor and the supply at hand? Unless protection, by enabling the manufacturer to pay large wages, necessarily insures larger wages, and further, unless this protection to only some of the industries not only insures the larger wages to all labor, whether employed in protected industries or not, it must follow as inevitably as night the day that protection does not raise the wages of labor.

Who will insist that because a manufacturer or capitalist has the ability to pay more therefore he does pay higher wages than his fellow-manufacturer who has not so much ability to pay? This is absurd. A man who buys labor buys it like any other commodity, at the market price. This is true, even if the protected manufacturer has to send across the water to the old country and import his labor, and this imported labor, too, being the very labor which he is urging a high tariff in this country to protect the labor here against. If the object of his fatherly care is the protection of our people here who labor, why will he bring the people of the older countries and place them in competition with the laborers whom he pretends to regard so tenderly? The market price is fixed, not by the ability of the buyer, but by the demand and the supply. The richest banker or railroad magnate pays no more to his porter or blacksmith than a poor farmer does. He has the ability to pay more, but the market price is fixed, and he takes advantage of it.

A man in my town wishes to get built a block of store houses, a duplicate of a block already there which cost $20,000. He is rich, for that country. He already has many bonds, a number of buildings, and is obtaining large rents. His income is handsome. When he lets out his contract to erect these buildings is he governed by his ability to pay? We will imagine the poor day laborer who bids on this job saying to him: "Sir, you are rich and able to pay; therefore I will charge you $25,000 for this work." But the answer comes: "You built yonder block for $20,000, and I want it simply duplicated." "Ah," says the poor laborer who is living under a protective tariff, whose labor is protected, and where it is claimed men pay wages in proportion to their ability to do so, "sir, you are able to pay more than your neighbor who owns yonder block. That is all he has. You are rich. You must pay in proportion to your ability." This would end the controversy.

The merchant who hires his clerks does not grade their wages by his ability to pay them, but by the demand for them, the supply, and their efficiency.

Since the close of the late unhappy war our people in the South have not had the time to devote in politics to the study of the inequalities of the tariff, or indeed of any economic question of government. It has been with us more a matter of life and living, how to take care of rights dearer to us than mere questions of political economy.

That time, happily, has passed away. We find ourselves under the old flag with our rights unimpaired, I mean our political rights, and while we have submitted uncomplainingly to the onerous burden of Federal taxation, our people are now beginning to inquire into this question. In the two canvasses I made for a seat on this floor, my Republican competitors took decided ground in favor of the present high protective tariff. In each case I argued as best I could against protection and in favor of a tariff which would raise only the revenue necessary for the economical support of the Government. This is my present position. What, let me ask, is the tariff, which is but another name for tax, laid for? Is it not only to raise the funds whereby the Government may be administered? What power has Congress to lay a tariff except for the purpose I have indicated. This question has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I beg leave here to quote from that august tribunal.

In the celebrated Topeka, Kans., case, Justice Miller of the Supreme Court said:

Of all the powers conferred on the Government by the Constitution, that of taxation is the most liable to abuse.

And further:

This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another so as to ruin the one class, and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other—if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised. To lay, with one hand, the power of government on the property of the citizen, and with the other bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes, is none the less robbery because it is done under the form of law and is called taxation. Beyond a cavil, there can be no lawful taxation which is not laid for public purposes.

Again, I quote from Judge Cooley, formerly judge of the supreme court of Michigan (see Cooley's Constitutional Limitations):

Constitutionally a tax can have no other basis than the raising of revenues for public purposes, and whatever governmental exaction has not this basis is tyrannical and unlawful. A tax on imports, therefore, the purpose of which is not to raise revenue, but to discourage and indirectly prohibit some particular import for the benefit of some home manufacturer, may well be questioned as being merely colorable, and, therefore, not warranted by constitutional principles.

This being true, whence comes the power to tax the people to build up monopolies and make rich certain special interests by subsidy?

I remember, sir, one argument I have heretofore had to meet, and I have heard it repeated on this floor, that all high protective duties or taxes are paid by the foreigners who manufacture goods and bring them here to market. How is this? Recently I read this statement:

In 1881 the duty on the best plate-glass was 112 per cent. Glass of this kind selling in Belgium for $386,000 was imported here, and, at 112 per cent., duty or tariff was paid on it to the amount of $437,000. It was then sold here in the United States for $850,000. Now, who paid this duty? Did the Belgium manufacturer? If he did, then out of the $386,000, which was all he got for his glass, he paid $437,000 to our Government for the privilege of sending it here. In other words, he gave us his glass for nothing when he could have sold it at home for $386,000, and he gave us $51,000 more for leave to do so.

If this glass only sold for $386,000 in Belgium, when it was brought here and sold to our consumers for $850,000, of which $437,000 went into the Treasury as taxes, I want to know if the consumers here did not pay this tax? But for the high tariff of 112 per cent. on the glass our consumers here would have been able to buy it at $386,000, and the transportation added. There can be no answer to this argument. In many instances, however, the tariff is laid so high that it amounts to a total prohibition of the importation of the goods so taxed. Then what is the inevitable result? If the goods are not imported, you say of course the Treasury gets no tax or tariff. This is true; but while this is true, our people who have to buy these goods from American manufacturers, thus prohibited from importation by reason of high duty, pay the increased prices all the same. Not that it goes into the Treasury, for in this case it goes into the pockets of the American manufacturer in the shape of subsidy or increase in profits. Many of the cheapest of woolen goods are thus taxed so high they are not imported. The duty on them varies from 115 to 200 per cent., and they can not be brought here by foreign merchants and sold after paying this high rate of tariff duty. The American manufacturer, however, knowing this, charges from 75 to 150 per cent. more for these goods than the foreigner, and is secure against his competition.

Who pays this increased price to our manufacturers? Not the foreign importer, for we have seen he does not in this case import on account of the high duty, but it is all paid by the poor consumer in our country who is compelled to buy these cheap woolen goods. And even in cases where the foreigner imports his goods, if he pays duty upon them he is not at last the party who suffers most under this tariff for protection. The best statistics we have show that the proportion of American goods we use to foreign goods is about five to one; so that the tariff raises the price of goods to our people about five times where it places the tax once upon the foreigner who brings his goods here for sale. Therefore when $1 is paid into the Treasury for tariff our people have paid $5 to the American manufacturer in the shape of subsidy. As we raise every year about $200,000,000 by the tariff, it follows that to do this the people pay five times this sum, or ten hundred millions in subsidy. Such a law for taxation is not right and can not be defended on any just or equitable principle; yet any propositions which look to any reduction of taxes or the giving of any relief to the people are met by the cry of "free trade," and that an assault is being made upon the great American system of protection.

From what I have said, sir, it must be apparent to all that protectionists in making the law to collect the revenue for the administration of the Government do not look to revenue as the result of such law. I quote from an editorial in a leading Republican protective organ, the Ohio State Journal, of recent date, the following:

The principle of protection does not primarily look to revenue at all. Duties amounting in the aggregate to a million dollars may easily mean a hundred millions in benefits to home producers.

This is frank and candid, and I doubt if any protectionist on this floor will make the same confession or attempt its defense. What is this? The law made to raise revenue so framed as to raise one million of revenue, and in doing so give as a subsidy, as a benefit, a gift, a bonus, one hundred millions to some other citizens. This is the logic, this the confession. Whence, I ask again, comes the authority to Congress to lay any duty which does not look simply to raising revenue? Congress has no more authority under the Constitution to take money from me which it does not need for the Government, under the guise of a revenue law, with the view of aiding or benefiting some other citizen or class of citizens, than it has to take my horses, mules, sheep, or other property for a like purpose. [Applause.]

According to the logic of the argument I have quoted from the protection organ, Congress can levy a tax upon the people to raise $101,000,000, of which one million will go into the Treasury as taxes and the remaining one hundred millions will go into the pockets of a benefited class. Such a proposition, I submit, is monstrous. Who contends that the tariff is not a tax? I have heard that there are some who make this contention. Hear the great Western lawyer and orator, Mr. Storrs, on this point. He said:

Finally, what is a tariff? It is a tax. It is nothing less and nothing but a tax. It is a tax which we do not pay to the Government; for where protection begins revenue ceases. The consumer is impoverished, the Government is not aided.

This is an honest statement. A protective tariff laid upon four thousand articles of daily consumption by our people means a tax laid upon these articles, not for revenue, not for any purpose of government; for, as quoted above, "where protection begins revenue ceases." What does this phrase "protection to labor" as used mean? Does it mean that you must find employment for your neighbor, else he will go unemployed? Why not he find employment for you? Is it meant that you must find employment for yourself and neighbor also, while he must not find employment for himself? In this free country of ours it is best for every man to learn to take care of himself. No man should be expected to take care of himself and you, too; much less be made to do so by a tax law, so called. I have heard it gravely argued here and elsewhere that the high protective tariff reduced the price of every merchantable commodity, and that all profits are raised by this system. If this be true it opens up a new way for us all to get rich, and it is to be recommended as a popular panacea for poverty. [Laughter and applause.] We need only keep on piling up taxes, increase the protection, make the tariff altogether prohibitory, place restrictions upon trade until profits are carried up 300 or 400 per cent., and when all trade has ceased everybody's profits will be increased.

This again is absurd. Take the article of quinine which a few years ago was sold under a high duty. Our people paid $3.50 per ounce for it; the tariff was taken off, and did this "merchantable commodity" go higher as was predicted? On the other hand, it retails at 80 cents per ounce. When it was sold at $3.50 per ounce who paid it? The consumers among our people. Who got the benefit of the protection on it? Only two or three manufacturers in the United States. Who gets the benefits now of the reduction to 80 cents per ounce? The question answers itself.

Let us pursue this a little further. To the manufacturer the protectionist says, we give you a protective tariff, that you may get higher prices for your goods; that is the avowed object of it. To the consumer of these goods—the farmer, the lawyer, the mechanic, the doctor—he says, we will give you a protective tariff, that you may get goods you buy of the manufacturer cheaper. And to the labor he says, we give you protective tariff that you may get higher wages from the manufacturer. And the people believe him in each case. Let us suppose the object of the protective tariff was to enable lawyers to charge larger fees for their legal services, and as a lawyer I was to say to my clients, you ought to favor this law, for while it enables me to charge you larger fees it also enables you to get my services more cheaply. Let the miller say to his customers, you should favor this law, because it enables me to take more toll from you and at the same time give you more meal. So with the physician. So with the mechanic who builds your house. This argument would not work at all in any of these cases, but just apply it to the manufacturer and it acts like a charm. It is a wonderful antidote. [Laughter and applause.]

It seems to be a kind of medicine which stimulates the patient, yet reduces his fever; acts as a powerful laxative, yet produces constipation; feeds the system, yet depletes the patient; a fat, and yet an anti-fat [laughter]; a wine that may be taken for the stomach's sake when it is sick, yet a powerful emetic; it is a narcotic, and yet an atropine; it brings smiling happiness and solid comforts to those who toil in the workshops, and yet it is prolific of strikes and lock-outs; it richly rewards labor, yet fills the land with paupers and tramps. There is nothing in all nature like it. It is a centripetal, yet a centrifugal force. It contracts and expands under the same influence and condition. Administered to a Democrat in perfect health, in full doses, he begins forthwith to preach the gospel of Republicanism. It does these things, and is all this and more; it gives the men who make the goods higher prices, and the men who buy them cheaper goods. Surely there is nothing else like it on earth, or in the waters under the earth. Heaven alone, and I speak it not sacrilegiously, can produce such another panacea, a compound which will produce exactly the opposite effect upon similar subjects under like conditions. [Applause.]

This theory of raising the price of goods for the men who sell and lowering them for the men who buy, reverses every rule given us in nature by nature's God. With His rule in nature, we know how to apply remedies; the doctor can write his prescriptions; the farmer can sow his grain, and expect like to produce like; he can propagate his stock with intelligence; the mariner can guide his vessel; the astronomer can calculate the coming eclipse; and old Probabilities can himself guess at the weather, it may be wide of the mark, but this new gospel of protection reverses all laws, and bids farewell to all the rules where the principle is engrafted. Better stick to nature and nature's law. Say, if you wish, protection benefits the manufacturer for the time being, that is, it temporarily benefits him, and none will controvert it, and the contention ends. The logic, so called, of the protectionist is thus reduced to absurdity. But from this let us turn to the good sense and sound reasoning of the Committee of Ways and Means. In their report upon the pending bill they say:

Duties are imposed to raise revenue, and they should be so imposed as to obtain the revenue with as little burden as possible to the tax-payer and as little disturbance as possible to the business of the country. This is accomplished by imposing the duty on the finished goods alone, and in no tariff, from the first to the last, have woolens, cottons, silks, or linens been placed on the free-list. We say to the manufacturer we have put wool on the free-list to enable him to obtain foreign wools cheaper, make his goods cheaper, and send them into foreign markets and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturer. We say to the laborer in the factory we have put wool on the free-list so that it may be imported and he may be employed to make the goods that are now made by foreign labor and imported into the United States. We say to the consumer we have put wool on the free-list that he may have woolen goods cheaper. We say to the domestic wool-grower we have put wool on the free-list to enable the manufacturer to import foreign wool to mix with his and thus enlarge his market and quicken the demand for the consumption of home wool while it lightens the burden of the tax-payer.

So it is absurd to contend that every merchantable commodity is sold more cheaply to our people by reason of the system of protection, so called.

I have not intended to go very largely into detail in what I have to say on the pending bill. To answer, however, further the contention that this protective tariff lessens the cost of living and cheapens goods to our people, I will insert here a table which shows the rate of tax laid upon some of the necessaries of life which enter into daily consumption by every family in the land, I care not how rich or poor they may be:

If your woolen suit cost you $10, put it down that $4.80 of that cost is protective-tariff tax, and so with each article named in the table. So the laboring man, the farmer, the lawyer, the preacher, the physician, the mechanic, everybody, every day, everywhere in our land is paying this tribute under the present tariff laws. It is an insidious tax. It is an indirect tax. People pay it and imagine it is a part of the value of the goods bought, when if the proper modifications of the present law were made many of these goods could be bought for about one-half what they now cost, and still the Government would get all the revenue needed. If a tax-collector of the United States stood at the store door and levied and collected the tax upon every article set forth in the preceding table at the rate therein set forth, there would be an immediate outcry, and the gentlemen now on this floor who are defending with their might the present rate of taxation would change their position on this question or they would be retired by the people to the shades of private life. While this is true, the very people who would rather fight than pay such a tax as I have mentioned to a taxgatherer at the store door will uncomplainingly pay higher taxes when they are collected by the storekeeper in the shape of increased prices. I desire here to quote from the message of the President of the United States sent to us at the beginning of this Congress. The President said:

But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty.

So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people.

It is not proposed to entirely relieve the country of this taxation. It must be extensively continued as the source of the Government's income, and in a readjustment of our tariff the interests of American labor engaged in manufacture should be carefully considered, as well as the preservation of our manufacturers. It may be called protection, or any other name, but relief from the hardships and dangers of our present tariff laws should be devised with especial precaution against imperiling the existence of our manufacturing interests.

But this existence should not mean a condition which, without regard to the public welfare or a national exigency, must always insure the realization of immense profits instead of moderately profitable returns. As the volume and diversity of our national activities increase, new recruits are added to those who desire a continuation of the advantages which they conceive the present system of tariff taxation directly affords them. So stubbornly have all efforts to reform the present condition been resisted by those of our fellow-citizens thus engaged, that they can hardly complain of the suspicion, entertained to a certain extent, that there exists an organized combination all along the line to maintain their advantage.

The effect of the high protective tariff is to build up favored cities and sections at the expense of others less favored; to enrich one individual at the expense of another; to feed and foster monopolies and impoverish the agricultural districts. It is not diffusive in its blessings, if it blesses at all. Why, then, should we as law-makers enact such legislation? The end of government is the greatest good to the largest number; not special benefits and privileges to a class or section. Protection may make magnificent cities and stupendous fortunes for the few. It may make a section or even a country rich, and yet the masses be the poorer thereby. The advocates of protection should reflect upon the poetic truth in these lines:

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
Between a splendid and happy land.

A studied effort has been made on this floor and elsewhere, and is still being made to show that the President is a free-trader, and is unfriendly to the workingmen of this country. I will be pardoned therefore if I quote rather extensively from his message in this connection and upon this point. He says:

We are in the midst of centennial celebrations, and with becoming pride we rejoice in American skill and ingenuity, in American energy and enterprise, and in the wonderful natural advantages and resources developed by a century's national growth. Yet when an attempt is made to justify a scheme which permits a tax to be laid upon every consumer in the land for the benefit of our manufacturers, quite beyond a reasonable demand for governmental regard, it suits the purposes of advocacy to call our manufactures infant industries, still needing the highest and greatest degree of favor and fostering care that can be wrung from Federal legislation.

It is also said that the increase in the price of domestic manufactures resulting from the present tariff is necessary in order that higher wages may be paid to our workingmen employed in manufactories, than are paid for what is called the pauper labor of Europe. All will acknowledge the force of an argument which involves the welfare and liberal compensation of our laboring people. Our labor is honorable in the eyes of every American citizen; and as it lies at the foundation of our development and progress, it is entitled, without affectation or hypocrisy, to the utmost regard. The standard of our laborers' life should not be measured by that of any other country less favored, and they are entitled to their full share of all our advantages.

For present purposes, however, the last number given should be considerably reduced. Without attempting to enumerate all, it will be conceded that there should be deducted from those which it includes 375,143 carpenters and joiners, 285,401 milliners, dressmakers, and seamstresses, 172,726 blacksmiths, 133,756 tailors and tailoresses, 102,473 masons, 76,241 butchers, 41,309 bakers, 22,083 plasterers, and 4,891 engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, amounting in the aggregate to 1,214,023, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

To these the appeal is made to save their employment and maintain their wages by resisting a change. There should be no disposition to answer such suggestions by the allegation that they are in a minority among those who labor, and therefore should forego an advantage in the interest of low prices for the majority; their compensation, as it may be affected by the operation of tariff laws, should at all times be scrupulously kept in view; and yet with slight reflection they will not overlook the fact that they are consumers with the rest; that they, too, have their own wants and those of their families to supply from their earnings, and that the price of the necessaries of life as well as the amount of their wages will regulate the measure of their welfare and comfort.

But the reduction of taxation demanded should be so measured as not to necessitate or justify either the loss of employment by the workingman nor the lessening of his wages; and the profits still remaining to the manufacturer, after a necessary readjustment, should furnish no excuse for the sacrifice of the interests of his employés either in their opportunity to work or in the diminution of their compensation. Nor can the worker in manufactures fail to understand that while a high tariff is claimed to be necessary to allow the payment of remunerative wages, it certainly results in a very large increase in the price of nearly all sorts of manufactures, which, in almost countless forms, he needs for the use of himself and his family. He receives at the desk of his employer his wages, and perhaps before he reaches his home is obliged, in a purchase for family use of an article which embraces his own labor, to return in the payment of the increase in price which the tariff permits the hard-earned compensation of many days of toil.

Again, he uses the following patriotic words:

The plain and simple duty which we owe to the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers. These things can and should be done with safety to all our industries, without danger to the opportunity for remunerative labor which our workingmen need, and with benefit to them and all our people, by cheapening their means of subsistence and increasing the measure of their comforts.

Let us cease wrangling with the subject and immediately reduce taxation to the very lowest limit possible for the economical operation of the Government, and hereafter reductions should be made from year to year as it shall appear safe to do so.

We should not mistake that which makes a happy and contented people. It is not half a hundred millionaires, a full Treasury, rich banks, gilded palaces, mighty corporations, a few fabulous fortunes, and accumulated wealth, but it is a—

Bold peasantry, a country's pride,
Which when once destroyed can never be supplied.

Mr. Chairman, I prefer to see prosperity widespread, reaching out into every village, portion, and hamlet of our common country. I do not wish the times so altered that—

Trade's unfeeling train—shall—

Usurp the land and dispossess the swain.
Along the lawn, where scattered hamlets rose,
Unwieldly wealth and cumbrous pomp repose.
Those gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
Those calm desires that asked but little room,
Those healthful sports that graced the peaceful scene,
Lived in each look and brightened all the green;
These, far departing, seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.

The war afforded excuses for, indeed may have of necessity produced, vicious legislation; but now that peace reigns we should return to that policy which blesses most widely the country—a policy which builds up all sections and cities and does not produce two classes, the one millionaires, and the other paupers. The country needs a governmental policy which develops the well-to-do, contented man who realizes most fully that—

His best companions are innocence and health,
And his best riches ignorance of wealth.

I shall not detain the House with much speaking on the provisions of the bill which touch internal-revenue taxation. The internal-revenue law is a war measure. The inquiry is made, if this be true why not repeal it now that the war is over? While the war is over, its results abide with us. Its taxes are necessary to meet the expenses it brought about. We are paying $80,000,000 in pensions, and a very large amount of annual interest on the war debt, besides other expenses growing out of the war. If we had no such expenses upon us growing out of the war, I should say the internal-revenue tax might be repealed, though it is the easiest tax of all to pay. On this subject President Cleveland, in his annual message, says:

It must be conceded that none of the things subjected to internal-revenue taxation are, strictly speaking, necessaries; there appears to be no just complaint of this taxation by the consumers of these articles, and there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people.

Both parties are pledged to the continuance for the present of this tax. Senator SHERMAN, who has always been recognized as good authority for his party, has said, when speaking of the internal-revenue taxes:

These taxes ought to be left as a part of our permanent system of taxation as long as any other taxes, internal or external, more oppressive, remain on the statute-books.

No consumer complains of these taxes. They know that whisky and tobacco are luxuries, and no complaint is made by those who use the articles that they are taxed. Internal taxes are not taxes on food, clothing, wool, shelter, and other articles of necessity to the consumer. The consumer of articles taxed by the internal-revenue law consumes them not from necessity but from choice. It is a cheap tax to collect. For the fiscal year 1887 the receipts of the United States Treasury from all sources were $371,403,277.66.

The sum realized from tariff duty was $217,286,893.13, and the sum from internal-revenue taxes was $118,823,391.22, this tax being upon distilled spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco. The latter tax goes directly into the Treasury, less a small per cent. (about 3 per cent.), which covers the cost of collection. It is a voluntary contribution to the Treasury by the consumers of the articles taxed. I would not be willing to see this tax entirely repealed. The people do not demand this as a measure of relief. There is complaint, and just complaint, at the method of enforcement of these internal-revenue laws. It is believed the pending bill gives relief in this direction. The bill will repeal the internal-revenue law which requires special taxes and privilege of taxes on retail liquor dealers. As well stated by the Committee of Ways and Means in their report, these taxes have been a fruitful source of the petty prosecutions which have crowded the Federal courts in some portions of the country. The bill will repeal all restrictions on the sale of tobacco by the producer, and all taxes on tobacco except on cigars, cigarettes, cheroots, and all privilege taxes except those for manufacturing and selling cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots.

The whole amount of reduction in taxes under the bill as it now stands is $78,176,054.22. The total of tariff reduction is $53,720,447.22, and of internal-revenue reduction is $24,455,607. The largest items of tariff reductions are on wool and woolens, $12,330,581.20, and on sugar $11,292,087.94. Having then, as I have shown, a large and growing surplus in the Treasury, which threatens the paralysis of all business and widespread disaster to the whole country, let us, as wise and patriotic lawmakers, address ourselves to the imminent, the overwhelming danger which confronts us. Let us deal with the condition, not the theory. Let us stop the flow of money from the pockets of the people, from the legitimate channels of trade and commerce, where it is so much needed and where it of right belongs, into the Federal Treasury where it is not needed at all. This can be done without peril to the protective system, and to do it by the passage of this measure will not be to commit any member to the theory or policy of free trade.

Speaking for myself, sir, I would be very far from favoring a policy which would break down the industries of my country. Gentlemen on the other side pay glorious tributes to the section of the country I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor. They impute to us motives we have not and attribute results to our contemplated action which in my judgment can not follow. In the South we ask no special privileges not accorded to other sections and other States; all we want is to be let alone. Not by way of boasting, but as a matter of pride, I desire to submit some facts here which go to show the evidences of increasing prosperity in our section. These interesting facts I take from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, Md., recently published. I insert a table showing the assessed value of property in the Southern States in 1887 and 1880.

States.	1887.	1880.
Alabama	$124,925,869	$123,757,072
Arkansas	148,868,206	90,511,653
Florida	84,860,564	52,794,383
Georgia	341,504,921	251,424,651
Kentucky	482,491,690	350,563,971
Louisiana	211,925,741	177,096,459
Maryland	485,839,772	459,187,408
Mississippi	129,887,254	110,628,129
North Carolina	210,035,453	169,916,807
South Carolina	141,074,000	120,351,000
Tennessee	239,000,000	211,708,438
Texas	650,412,401	311,470,736
Virginia	339,342,723	324,955,980
West Virginia	177,341,263	146,991,740
Total	3,858,509,867	2,881,418,527

It is well known that assessments in the Southern States are far below the market value of property. This table shows an increase of $977,000,000 in seven years. Take the following table, which shows the comparative value of live-stock in the South in 1879 and in 1888:

Live-stock.	Value.
	1888.	1879.
Horses	$191,659,208	$127,502,759
Mules	113,908,770	65,059,675
Milch cows	68,187,682	47,630,999
Oxen, other cattle	130,741,481	87,010,999
Sheep	15,278,829	10,262,888
Hogs	53,919,580	44,935,943
Total	573,695,550	391,412,254
Increase	182,283,296

That is a pretty healthy increase in the value of live-stock between 1879 and 1888.

I also insert the following to show the total value of the chief agricultural products of the South (omitting sugar, rice, fruits, and vegetables, etc., the value of which is not given in the United States Agricultural Department's reports) for 1887 and 1879:

	1887.	1879.
Cotton	$310,000,000	$227,893,000
Corn	259,813,530	187,958,752
Wheat	42,297,810	65,573,276
Oats	34,955,720	20,193,011
Potatoes, barley, hay, tobacco, etc	95,000,000	69,478,315
Total	742,066,460	571,098,454
Increase	170,968,006

If to these figures we add the increase in fruits and vegetables (Florida alone having developed her great orange and trucking business mainly since 1879), sugar, etc., the total gain in the value of agricultural products of the South in 1887 over 1879 was upwards of $200,000,000, while during the same time the increase in the value of live-stock was, as we have already shown, $182,283,000.

One further extract from the same source and I end it. This Journal says:

Now while the South has made this wonderful gain in agriculture, what has been done in manufactures and railroads?

The construction of railroads is an exponent of a country's progress, and by it we may measure the growth made. What has been the railroad construction of the South since 1880? The following figures show:

Mileage.

States.	January 1, 1888.	June 1, 1890.
Alabama	2,801	1,780
Arkansas	2,361	822
Florida	2,132	529
Georgia	3,505	2,433
Kentucky	2,237	1,560
Louisiana	1,458	522
Maryland	1,268	931
Mississippi	2,169	1,119
North Carolina	2,371	1,440
South Carolina	1,906	1,393
Tennessee	2,252	1,816
Texas	8,289	2,697
Virginia	2,791	1,697
West Virginia	1,196	692
Total	36,736	19,431

Here is an increase in the South's railroad mileage since June 1, 1880, of 17,305 miles, or a gain of 89 per cent., while the rate of increase in all the rest of the country was but 69 per cent. Including the road constructed since January 1, the South now has over 37,000 miles of railroad. Let us sum up a few points to contrast the South of 1888 and the South of the census year 1879-'80 (June to June). Surely these figures tell a tale of progress never surpassed by any other country in the world, and yet the South is just barely getting under way in its development. Here are the figures:

*About.

These facts and statistics show what we can do and are doing in the South, in spite of a protective tariff; and they further show that all the ways of our people are ways of peace.

We can and will work out our own destiny, if left to depend alone upon the natural blessings Heaven has so munificently bestowed upon us, coupled with our efforts, and we prefer not to depend upon the fatherly hand of the Federal Government to boom us. The God of nature has given our land and people more protection than any high tariff will yield us. The star of empire which hitherto has steadily taken its course to the Westward has turned to the South. With our cheap coal, cheap iron, cheap land, cheap living, unsurpassed climate and workingmen, giving us a large per centum of advantage over all competitors, we are in the fight for prosperity, not for to-day or to-morrow, but for all future time. If we have a high tariff we will live and prosper. If the tariff is lowered we shall do the same. If it be taken off altogether, and we must enter the race in a field of fair trade or free trade, we will be found with quickened gait keeping step to the onward march, and, putting aside the load which doth so beset other peoples, sections, and communities, will deserve and reap the rich reward of a brave, industrious, and frugal people. All we ask is that you take the heavy hand of Federal taxation from us. With our unrivaled climate and soil, our inexhaustible mineral resources, our navigable streams, our railroads, the capital we have and that which will inevitably come because it is profitable, we can rebuild our waste places, restore our happy homes, and have smiling contentment resting like a sweet benediction upon our land. A future is surely opening up before us whose possibilities are boundless and whose ending no man is wise enough to predict. Such are our hopes, and such our expectations, in the glad fruition of which we will see extinguished the last vestiges of desolation produced by our late unhappy war, when our people can and will realize in perfect truth that they are citizens of the freest and best government the world ever saw. [Great applause.]

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Chairman, I propose, as fully as the time will permit, to state my views and convictions as to the reduction and revision of the existing revenue laws. Whether they be right or wrong they are the result of my best reason and observation. They have been strengthened by the arguments intended to refute them and are not to be changed by interest or clamor, but are at all times open to facts and reason.

I speak as a Democrat proud of the history, principles, and traditions of this wonderful organization. My first vote was given for Democratic candidates upon a Democratic platform, and at a time when the political soldiers of fortune who are now assuming the rôle of allies and dictators were among the bitterest of our opponents and slanderers. I believe that I shall, if spared life, be found continuing to vote for and upholding Democratic principles and candidates when the whim of the hour has ceased to charm, when the fashions in political novelties change, and these gentlemen have temporary service under some new banner to which their selfish interests may attract them. They labor who wait.

I should not hesitate for myself to make any personal sacrifice to preserve intact and victorious the legions of Democracy, and if disaster were as inevitable as victory is assured, having shared an unwonted and undeserved share of the common glory from my young manhood up, I would have no compunctions to go down in the common ruin.

We are confronted with such a situation as is novel to most nations. We have a large surplus in the Treasury, variously stated and misstated, but too large for our good. We have in times of profound peace a system of internal taxation under which we collect some $118,000,000 a year. At the same time we have our immense collection of import duties upon foreign wares and merchandise.

Of the evils of the surplus I join in all that has been and will be said. It takes the people's money from the channels of trade and business where it belongs. It robs labor of a share of its pittance that it may tempt fraud and waste to filch it from the public Treasury. It creates a rich government and makes the people poor; it dams the waters that turn the wheels of industry and trade; it corrupts the current of legislation, begetting jobs and dishonest laws; it paralyzes individual effort and tempts the people to lean on government instead of on themselves, thus threatening alike our liberties and our prosperity. How shall we rid ourselves of this burden?

I will not insult your sense of honesty by arguing for profligate expenditures, venturesome enterprises, and unnecessary appropriations, which arise only by contemplating the growing Treasury. Our legitimate expenses for government and the necessary public works, naval defense, and the like are, of course, proper, and will always merit and receive sufficient to maintain them.

From reduction of the revenue, then, must come our relief, as, even were it advisable, difficulties are in the way of an immediate and rapid payment of the public debt.

Our revenues as all know are from two sources, internal taxes upon articles grown and manufactured in our own country and duties levied at the borders upon articles grown, produced, or manufactured in foreign countries. From one or both of these must the reduction be made. If reduction of the surplus revenue is the sole object sought, then of course we should take it from that source of revenue that will most surely give the result. The mere reduction of the import duties on foreign goods may, and in all probability will, only serve to increase importations and thus increase instead of diminish the revenues from that source. Enlargement of the free-list and the reduction or abolition of the internal taxes will surely reduce your income.

If this is a question of mere surplus reduction, then, speaking for myself, and opposed as I am to collecting any revenue save through the custom-houses upon foreign goods, I should go immediately to the internal taxes—the taxes unsuited to our people and our institutions, and threatening, in their rigorous execution, the rights of the States as well as the liberty and freedom of a great people unused to government espionage in their business and homes. If tobacco and liquors must come under governmental control, let their taxation add to the bankrupt treasuries of our States and municipalities. Why should the Federal Government tax tobacco, one of our great staples, any more than tax wheat? Why not tax corn meal as well as corn in any other form?

Your taxation does not lessen their use; your control but helps the powerful rings and trusts which manipulate their production and sale. Because the whisky king grows rich and omnipotent on our weakness or our vices, is he any less obnoxious and dangerous to free government than the coal baron who thrives on our necessities?

So far I have been speaking of the situation as one demanding simply a reduction of our redundant revenues. It would, however, be merely fencing with words to refrain from admitting that the most active alarmists of surplus dangers have two objects in view. Mere reduction of the revenues they make secondary to reduction, or revision, or reform of the tariff—in the plenitude of terms you can easily make a choice. We are therefore confronted with propositions that embody reduction and revision of both sources of national income, and I shall therefore, in a general way, address myself to the tariff aspect of the case.

The resolutions of the recent convention of New Jersey Democrats state well the principles that should govern in a revision of the revenue and tariff laws. It reads as follows:

It readopts as its rule of political faith and practice, the resolutions of the last Democratic National Convention, promulgated by representatives from every section of the country, and affirmed by the people of the United States in the election of the Democratic candidates, as embodying all the doctrines and principles necessary for the proper conduct of national affairs demanded by the exigencies of the present time.

It urges upon representatives of the Democratic party in Congress the early fulfillment of the pledges and promises of those resolutions according to their letter and spirit, and more especially those wherein are demanded a reduction of the redundant revenues of the Government, and the revision of the tariff with due regard to the interests of the agricultural and manufacturing industries, and of labor and capital to be affected thereby.

This tariff so collected would have been limited in amount by the honest and necessary wants of the Government, or as the Democratic platform pertinently states, "the wants of the Government economically administered," and to be so levied and adjusted on foreign articles coming into competition with those made or produced here as to give to American labor the higher recompense it now obtains over that of other countries. Such a tariff is admirably suited to a country that has for empire nearly a continent, every variety of production, soil, and climate, battalions of skilled and intelligent artisans and workmen, millions of freehold farmers, and within whose own limits absolute free trade prevails as nowhere else on the earth.

For such a tariff, as against free trade of the Cobden school or the existing British tariff, I am here to witness. It is not only wise, but is constitutional and backed by unbroken precedent, and defended by such Democrats as Madison, Jefferson, and Jackson. In the field of theological controversy resource is had to the early fathers of the church as the correct interpreters of the sacred message, and across the field of contention pass the sacred shades of Jerome, Origen, Alexander, Augustine, and Clement. May I not, to correctly interpret the charter of our rights, the Constitution of our country, cite the evidences of the founders of our Government, the framers of the instrument?

Andrew Jackson was a grand, undeviating Democrat and a man of hard practical sense. In his second annual message to Congress, December 7, 1830, he said:

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely identical with that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely can not be the case; this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

In opposition to later-day lights listen to James Madison, President and sound Democrat:

The States that are most advanced in population, and ripe for manufactures, ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands. They must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.—Gales and Seaton's Debates, old series, vol. I, page 116.

Hear this address signed "Jerseyman" in November, 1787, to the citizens of New Jersey on the new Constitution. Hear him, one of the people, appealing to the people with the open book in his hand, speaking in the language of the people—hear him on the clause which you are attempting to interpret:

The great advantages (American Museum, volume 2, page 437) which would be the result of the adoption of the proposed Constitution, are almost innumerable. I will mention a few among the many. In the first place, the proper regulation of our commerce would be insured—the imposts on all foreign merchandise imported into America would still effectually aid our continental treasury. This power has been heretofore held back by some States on narrow and mistaken principles. The amount of the duties since the peace would probably, by this time, have nearly paid our national debt. By the proper regulation of our commerce our own manufactures would be also much promoted and encouraged. Heavy duties would discourage the consumption of articles of foreign growth. This would induce us more to work up our raw materials, and prevent European manufacturers from dragging them from us in order to bestow upon them their own labor and a high price before they are returned into our hands.

I might fill up my hour with citations from men whose Democracy was never questioned.

The First Congress affirmed it in the memorable preamble to the first tariff law, which read:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties shall be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported—

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of August next ensuing the several duties hereinafter mentioned shall be laid on the following goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, that is to say.

Then follows a schedule of articles with the respective amounts of duty imposed.

The tariff thus levied was indeed small, as has been said, but was really more protective than our existing tariff, because in that day of sails and months of voyaging to cross the Atlantic distance was of itself great protection.

For this declaration all hail to the wise and patriotic men of the First Congress. Their names may not be on the honor-roll of the Cobden Club or its Anglo-American allies, but they are imperishably engraven in the hearts of their countrymen. If they lived in our day Professor Wells and the free-trade Sanhedrim of Boston, New York, and Chicago would deride them, but posterity would cherish their names as wise men loving their country and their kind. [Applause.] We read with quickened pulse of how the English flag went down on Monmouth's field and Bunker Hill before the tempestuous sweep of our patriotic sires, but beats our heart as fast at this giant blow of the First Congress for American commercial freedom from enslavement to British trade and greed that feeds the beasts of prey with hecatombs of human victims on India's plains and Ireland's hills. [Applause.]

England has long since filled up the gaps in her decimated ranks made from Lexington to Yorktown, but she has never recovered from this staggering blow of the First Congress of the United States of America. [Applause.]

While I am happy to state that no proposition before the House makes a distinct issue between protection and free trade, I think it well to examine and meet some of the exuberant and hysterical statements of those who deride all tariffs. These gentlemen are probably elated by the proposition of the Ways and Means Committee to abolish the internal-revenue tax on tobacco. And right here let us remind the House and the country that we are going to vote on distinct propositions and not upon speeches and editorials in which free pinion is given to a fancy that loses itself in space. For myself, I do not propose by this horn-blowing around the walls of the tariff Jericho to be diverted from our pledged duty to reduce the surplus and revise the tariff in the interest of the whole people of our common country. To this end I shall facilitate by voice and vote all legitimate efforts in that direction.

We hear much in these days from free-traders about the brotherhood of man and universal peace, but I do not fail to notice that, lovable and much to be desired as are these things, the one is preached to us by evangelists of hate and the other by those most heavily armed. The autonomy, supremacy, and individuality of nations is as necessary to the welfare and civilization of the race as demonstrations for universal fraternity of peoples unequal in every respect. [Loud applause.]

The brotherhood of man—I glory in the sentiment, but I can not but reflect upon the words of the true French republican, who, passing in the death tumbrel on to the guillotine through the streets of Paris, chaffed with the legend "the brotherhood of man," exclaimed:

Alas! my friends is not this the brotherhood of Cain?

The brotherhood of man and free trade and universal peace and the millennium will come on this earth when each of us and all of us has for himself, without attempting to reform our neighbors, evicted from our own heart the brotherhood of Cain, and enthroned therein the spirit of peace, justice, and truth.

Against the transparent fallacies of free trade now so persistently and insidiously urged upon our country by organized foreign influence and native selfishness I might warn my countrymen at great length did time permit. Nothing so exposes the unreliability of its conclusion as the falsehood of its promises. Mr. Henry George, the most ardent and unequivocal free-trader, in a book which he presented me with through the generosity of a gentleman resident in England, opens his first chapter on "Protection vs. Free Trade" as follows:

Near the window by which I write a great bull is tethered by a ring in his nose. Grazing round and round, he has wound his rope about the stake until now he stands a close prisoner, tantalized by rich grass he can not reach, unable even to toss his head to rid him of the flies that cluster on his shoulders. Now and again he struggles vainly, and then, after pitiful bellowing, relapses into silent misery.

Pausing to say that a bigger fool bull I never read of, I deny the accuracy of the figure as applied to the United States. The very opposite is the situation. Our bull has the greatest area of the very best pasturage in the world, through which, fat, sleek, and contented, switching occasionally with his flowing muscular tail the miserable little free-trade gnats off his powerful, towering shoulders [applause], he goes free and untethered, his only annoyance the lean and hungry nomadic kine of Europe and Asia, cadaverous as those of Pharaoh's dream that come mooing and bellowing and trying to overturn the bars that they may come in and get a mouthful of our rich, sappy, home-market grass. [Laughter and applause.]

In connection with this great subject we have ever dinned in our ears the teachings of the British school of political economists. I know of no greater evil from which we suffer than the adoption by American schools of these theories. England, a small island, with a teeming population, was obliged to live at the expense of other people; and from Adam Smith to John Stuart Mill and Richard Cobden there arose for her apologists of her doctrine of international commerce. To my mind this political economy, so called, is nothing more than a defense of piracy, an attempt to make larceny respectable, a promulgation of the gospel of "freebootery" under the guise of cant and hypocrisy, and uttered with proverbial British assumption of superior wisdom and virtue.

Some of these writers have reduced all the relations of man to man to a savage and barbaric one, thus supplanting religion by a cold, unsympathetic chop logic materialism founded on selfishness and dirt. The divine injunction that says that he is worse than an infidel who does not provide for his own, and that we are to protect and succor the weak, they replace with cruel and un-Christian doctrines about the survival of the fittest. Their demands for free trade and cheap labor run parallel with the unholy teachings of Malthus that maternity is a crime and that infanticide is necessary to decrease population and beget prosperity. They reduce man to savagery here and to a nonentity hereafter, and all this in the name of Christianity and the Cobden Club. Their whole structure is a tower of Babel that must end in confusion and disaster. [Applause.]

We are told that free-trade England prospers more than protection Germany and France. I do not admit this in the light of her overcrowded poor-houses and emigrant ships hurrying their thousands to our tariff protected shores; but supposing it to be true for the sake of argument, then in reply, coupled with her less expensive armies, she has thriven upon the loot of her conquests, upon the blood of her victims in India, Ireland, and the wretched debtors to her financial schemes in Turkey and Egypt. England would never have adopted a purely revenue tariff if Cobden and his kind had not believed that we and others would have been deceived into giving free port to English goods. Fortunately the world saw through their hypocrisy, and to-day the protective system is well-nigh universal. Adam Smith and Cobden have piped but we have not danced.

How this unnatural free-trade mother treated her dependent colonies and conquested countries the story is almost trite from its repetition. Says a recent writer:

> The first attempt at manufacturing any species of cloth in the North American provinces produced a resolution on the part of the House of Commons (1710) that the erecting of manufactories in the colonies had a tendency to lessen their dependence on Great Britain. Soon afterward complaints were made to Parliament that the colonists were establishing manufactories for themselves, and the House of Commons ordered the Board of Trade to report on the subject, which was done at great length.
> In 1732 the exportation of hats from province to province was prohibited, and the number of apprentices to be taken by hatters was limited. In 1750 the erection of any mill or other engine for splitting or rolling iron was prohibited; but pig-iron was allowed to be imported into England duty free, that it might be there manufactured and sent back again. At a later period Lord Chatham declared that he would not permit the colonists to make even a hobnail for themselves; and his views were then and subsequently carried into effect by the absolute prohibition, in 1765, of the export of artisans; in 1781 of woolen machinery; in 1782 of cotton machinery and artificers in cotton; in 1785 of iron and steel making machinery and workmen in those departments of trade; and in 1799 by the prohibition of the export of colliers, lest other countries should acquire the art of mining coal.
> Thomas Jefferson, commenting on the parliamentary legislation repressive of colonial industry and intended to aggrandize Great Britain at the expense of her dependencies, expressed himself boldly and emphatically thus:
> "That to heighten still the idea of parliamentary justice, and to show with what moderation they are likely to exercise power where themselves are to feel no part of its weight, we take leave to mention to his Majesty certain other acts of the British Parliament by which we were prohibited from manufacturing for our own use the articles we raise on our own lands with our own labor. By an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George II, an American subject is forbidden to make a hat for himself of the fur which he has taken, perhaps, on his own soil, an instance of despotism to which no parallel can be produced in the most arbitrary ages of British history.
> By one other act, passed in the twenty-third year of the same reign, the iron which we make we are forbidden to manufacture; and heavy as that article is, and necessary in every branch of husbandry, besides commission and insurance, we are to pay freight for it to Great Britain and freight for it back again, for the purpose of supporting not men but machines in the island of Great Britain.

Under the black flag of her commercial supremacy the Indian victims, who fall annually under her famine-creating laws outnumber those, by far, who fell beneath the devastating sword of Hyder Ali, India's patriot defender. Her mock hosannah to free-trade can not drown the wail of the hunger-stricken Irish peasants on the bleak and wintry Connemah, where the wild surges of the North Atlantic break against the wilder hills, and mortal man makes superhuman struggles for a bare existence, only to see his wife and children yield the ghost to gaunt famine under the red folds of England's free-trade flag. But turn, ye preachers of her example, to a recent occurrence within the shadow of her Parliament House. Then you might have stood within the shadow of the open and welcome portals of the Cobden Club House and have seen before you, around the base of mighty Nelson's pillar, thousands of ragged, hungry, and, in part, homeless, desperate, and disinherited English artisans, mechanics, and laborers, clamoring for the opportunity to work. The outside free-traders who are presumed to be on good terms with her "most gracious majesty," should call his mother-in-law's attention to the Marquis of Lorne who some time ago in the North American Review defended protection in Canada.

These Campbells were always the shrewdest and most far-sighted of the Scottish clans. If free trade is a national blessing and a universal panacea for every ill, how is it that the colonizing Englishman invariably turns protectionist as soon as he gets out of sight of Land's End? Why is he not a free-trader in Canada? Why is that Englishmen have, and I am sorry to say it, gotten possession of probably 30,000,000 acres of land in this tariff-ridden and "blarsted" country? Why are all the people of the earth so blind? Why is it that England spends millions on her army and navy for no other purpose than to steal and possess great patches of the globe, and make compulsory customers of their inhabitants? If India were free, how long would the ryots of Hindostan work for 8 cents a day and open their ports to England? How long, under national freedom, would the wretched fellahs of Egypt be enslaved to her money power?

She makes foreign markets at the point of the bayonet, and holds them open with her guns. And the day our statute-book is desecrated with a free-trade enactment bonfires of rejoicing will light the darkness of the night on British hills from John O'Groats to the chalky cliffs of Dover, and its author will be received with open arms by the now distracted English nobility and manufacturers. But, aside from England, can our workmen compete with the landless, ambitionless, hopeless, and degraded laborers of Europe? I have said that free commercial intercourse can not exist between countries socially, politically, and physically different without bringing all to a common level. Can we compete with these people? Can we make them in our own market our commercial equals? Here is an official picture from the records of the workers in a part of Europe:

> WASHINGTON, January 9, 1886.
> Consul Dithmar, at Breslau, Germany, has made a report to the Department of State relative to agricultural labor. He states that the laborer usually lives upon the estate and is employed upon it the year round. The working hours are in summer from 6 a. m. to 7 p. m., and in winter from sunrise to sunset. He is given free lodging and free fuel, and it is customary also to allow his family the use of 100 square rods of land for raising vegetables. As direct wages he receives per annum $19 to $23.80 in cash and 24 bushels of rye, 3 bushels of peas, and 1½ bushels of wheat.
> THE LABORER'S WIFE
> is bound to work in the field whenever required, and receives for a day's work in summer 12 to 14 cents, and in winter 10 to 12 cents. Of tea, meat, tobacco, and schnapps the farm laborer gets but little. If he smokes a pipe it is but seldom, and his tobacco is unmanufactured leaf. In harvest time he is treated to schnapps to encourage him in his work. The government tax is no longer paid by farm laborers, but the commercial-income tax amounts to 50 or 75 cents a year. A writer on economic subjects figures that a laborer's family, consisting of himself, wife, and five children under twelve years of age, can subsist on $1.09½ a week, or
> SEVENTY-FIVE DOLLARS A YEAR.
> Consul Dithmar also gives a tabular statement of the wages paid to miners and mine laborers, showing that they receive daily 52½ cents (which is paid to foremen, engineers, and carpenters), to 18½ and 15 cents paid to women and minors. The average cost of the substance of a miner's family, including rent, clothing, and taxes, amounts to $122.80 per annum. The rents paid by the miners range from 36 cents to $1.19 per month.
> The rate of wages paid to agricultural labor depends upon the locality where such labor is employed, being considerably higher in the level than in the mountain districts. In the former the wages of a man and wife aggregate $194.25 per annum, while in the mountainous districts a man and his wife, assisted by a child, earns but $184.92. In the district of Wolfenbuttel the laborers receive a cash wage of 35 cents per day, summer and winter; working time, 5 to 11 a. m. and 1 to 6 p. m. Women are paid 19 cents for the same time. A man will earn from 59½ to 71 cents per diem mowing, and a woman from 29 to 35 cents for gathering behind the scythe. Men and women both earn from 35 to 47 cents hoeing, and from 47 to 59 cents gathering beets. In this latter work children are also employed to cut off the leaves, and a child from seven to twelve years old will earn in a period of three or four weeks 24 cents daily.

Why is England so anxious for free trade in America? I will tell you. Some time ago the home secretary for Great Britain sent out to all her manufacturers some questions, asking what in their opinion was the cause of the existing depression, and in nearly every instance, among other reasons given, was, "the American tariff system."

Is free trade a cardinal principle of the Democratic party? is a question to which there can be but one answer. While it is true that the Democratic party, being a strict guardian of the Constitution, has never advocated protection for the sake of protection, yet I might spend my hour reading Democratic authority for the incidentally protective features of the tariff.

If this claim is ever made there is certainly nothing in the whole history of the organization to sustain it. This historic and venerable party, the most vital and enduring organized defense of human rights and constitutional liberty yet devised by man, is coequal with the Government itself. To its storm and battle beaten but unsurrendered battlement, like the tenacious and evergreen ivy, cling the traditions of our past, and in the shelter of its stout walls flourish our hopes for the future. Its magnificent, enduring, and well-poised superstructure rests upon no narrow foundations of ill-developed theories or crumbling ledge of self or sectional issues. Protected from undue foreign influence or interference, it aims to develop the individuality of the citizen, preserve the autonomy and freedom of the community and the State, and watch zealously against the use of paternal government or centralized despotism. It came into being at the instance of the fathers to sentinel the temple they had reared. It is true that, like Augustine said of the early Christian church, with "unity in essentials, liberty in non-essentials, and toleration in all things," many men of many minds have worshiped at its altars, but with some few brilliant but erratic exceptions, its teachers in the study, its professors in the forum, and its great leaders in the field, from Jefferson the prophet to Jackson the partisan and soldier, all have upheld the doctrine of incidental protection to American labor against foreign wiles or open aggression.

It is an inspiring duty to battle steadfastly and at any amount of personal sacrifice against allowing this great organization to be prostituted to the aims of fanatical theorists or designing men for selfish and unpatriotic purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I am nerved to the contest; my heart expands to meet the issue. It is no crime to differ with men within my party on the questions of the hour. Better men and nobler souls have faced these fires in graver crises of our history. I am unworthy of the presence of these august shades. Stephen A. Douglas and Silas Wright have passed away, but their memory is green in the hearts of millions of freemen and true Democrats.

This great constitutional party has resumed the control of the Government it helped to form and preserve, and has, in my opinion, with wise direction entered upon a series of splendid victories that will benefit the whole people by giving them wise, honest, conservative, economic, constitutional home-rule government. The difference between it and its opponents will always remain, to its credit, plain and distinct, and that without regard to passing and ephemeral distractions. The Democratic party, having revised the tariff, will find its life-work but begun. Jefferson did not found a great party to split hairs with Adam Smith.

TARIFF REVISION.

I believe in revising the tariff law because it has need of revision in the interest of all the people, because we are pledged to such a course as a party, and because I think the preservation of the protective principle can only be served by denouncing and destroying the selfish schemes of those who have prostituted these laws for inordinate gain, to the injury of the people. The shield of tariff protection must not unduly cover those who have abused its principles.

The greedy schemers who imperil the safety of the whole structure must be unearthed and driven forth. Protection to honest labor is not a mask for dishonest monopolists. The incongruities and inequalities of the laws should be remedied. Administrative reform is a crying necessity. Duties too high and above a labor line should be reduced. Exotics must face the open air. Greed must stay its hand. [Applause.] But raise or lower, the dead-line must always be the difference in wages between this and other countries.

The protective effects of the tariff are intended for labor. A great and admitted difference in wages does exist between this and other countries. This fact cannot be, and is not, denied. I could take up many pages with tables, but I am merciful. Undue reduction of the tariff must lower the cost of the product to meet European competition. Home cost is in many articles over 80 per cent. wages, hence wages will first be reduced. Low tariffs in the United States—low wages. Fine spun theories are advanced against this statement, but they can not convince.

They say the cost of the unit of production has decreased and wages have increased; that one man on a machine can make many more cotton shirts than one man by hand, and get more wages for his time and skill. Granted. This will apply to all countries—Europe as well as America; but wages have in no wise advanced in Europe as they have in America for the same skill, with the same appliances, working the same time.

A great thread mill has just moved its whole establishment from Leeds, England, to a town in my Congressional district, but they pay here, using the same machine and in some instances the same skill, over two times more wages than they did in England. The cost of the unit of production has increased here because wages are higher; labor costs more. That tells the whole story. Cut down wages and I grant you the tariff is not needed. Increase the tariff beyond this wage difference, and you are robbing the consumer in the name of the artisan. Adjust it to the wage difference and you benefit all concerned. Well paid laborer is the best customer, client, or patient of the consumer.

It is a mere abuse of that father of his, the arithmetic, to say that labor bears a small proportion to the value of almost any selected article. A finished product represents almost entirely human labor and skill. The product of two guileless Texan Democratic sheep represents the raw material that, made into clothes, will annually well clothe a man. All the rest is labor and skill. Thousands of our fellow-citizens are engaged in making these clothes. We hear a great deal about sheep, whisky, and dear clothes.

This style of argument is supposed to be crushing. It takes its place among a collection of antique fables about the "poor man's blanket" and the "rich man's diamond," and means, when you come to analyze it, just as much as the cachinnation of the laughing jackasses of the Australian forests. [Laughter.] Editors who know less about the tariff than they do about the dodo, keep this as standing matter in their columns, and young debating clubs, dropping the conventional subject of controversy as to whether it is more conducive to virtue to live in the country than in the city, give forth oracular utterances to political parties as to this subject.

Now, let us see. You tax whisky and collect it with an armed battalion of officers and spies, and as a result you enrich its monopolistic manufacturers and do not, in my opinion, increase nor decrease, by what the late Artemus Ward would call "a grown man's dose," the consumption of the entire liquor output. You only lower the quality. You collect tariff duty on clothes, and thus give employment to hundreds of thousands of American men and women, beget home competition, and compel the foreigner to lower his price.

The very last public utterance of that great Englishman, Matthew Arnold, in the Nineteenth Century Magazine, in the course of a scathing review of our country and her people, April number, page 484, was to this effect:

Luxuries are, as I have said, very dear—above all, European luxuries; but a workingman's clothing is nearly as cheap as in England, and plain food is on the whole cheaper.

Mr. Arnold did not like us but he was candid. How amusing in the light of this statement—and it goes to the point—by this eminent Englishman is the cry of dear clothing. Dear clothing! Cheap whisky! Indeed!

It is said that wages have increased in England under free trade as in America under protection. If free trade is best, should they not increase more? If they have increased as much, why do English laborers and artisans flock to protection countries and colonies? And this emigration I admit will ultimately become a factor in the case. Now, in all this I want it understood that I am not claiming that the sun shines, the grass grows, and the water runs, and universal prosperity reigns, and everybody is prosperous and happy and contented because of protection, any more than I believe that poverty and original sin, headaches, corns, Congressional dead-locks, and farm mortgages will disappear under free trade or a strictly revenue tariff.

I join with the extremists of neither school. I know how selfish and false are the cries that surround this question. But I assert my belief that a judiciously levied tariff for revenue, with incidental protection to American labor, has done and will yet do much for our people and our country. It will diversify industry, make us independent of other countries, and to the great and rising Southern States, under non-sectional Democratic government, prove the source of manifold blessings. I do not believe the tariff question will settle the tremendous contest between labor and capital.

Labor is making an organized effort for its just share of the joint production, and that will go on regardless of tariffs or no tariffs. Of course, under free trade the employer would have the world open to him for a place for manufacture, and confronted with fair demands in America would move to a cheaper labor market. The contest might, indeed, then cease here, because there would be nothing left to contend about.

Radical changes in the tariff must always therefore fall first on labor. Capital can take care of itself. I am not concerned for it. It is noticeable in the United States that the leading free-trade advocates are men of wealth and settled income or those interested with them. As soon as a man becomes wealthy he looks for cheap labor. "The world's mine oyster," he says to himself. "If I can not make money manufacturing in America I can sell foreign-made goods, or invest in foreign manufactories, or speculate on the necessities of my countrymen."

It seems a cruel thing to say, but it is true, that there are men in this country to-day who for remorseless greed for their own profit would import to supplant their own race and kind in our labor market with the barbaric hordes of semi-civilized Asia. In what I have said about wages in America and other countries, I have gone into no statistics or offered, as I might, official statements, because the case is practically admitted.

It is a patent fact that in all branches of industry in America wages are higher than in Europe. Carpenters, masons, doctors, lawyers, and other callings not directly protected by tariff laws get the full benefit of these increased payments, and hence have higher remuneration than in competing countries. Raising the wages of a large portion of the labor and skill of the country raises all. For instance, the farm laborer will not work for proportionately less than the mill hand. Much is said about some local causes making differences in the rates of wages paid in different States of the Union. This may be so, but the differences are minor, and even where they reach the lowest they are still much higher than anywhere outside our own country, and the standard is very even and general, all things considered, throughout the United States.

THE TARIFF CONSIDERED SOLELY AS A TAX.

It has been alleged that the price of the imported article is in all cases increased the full amount of the duty levied. That is, if an article costs $1 in Europe and you pay 50 cents on it as duty at the New York custom-house, the consumer pays the 50 cents as tax over and above the value of the article. In other words, that its usual and ordinary price is increased 50 cents. I will not rest my denial of this sweeping assertion on anything that I might say myself, but will cite the great English free-trade writer, J. R. McCullough, in his work on Taxation, London, 1845, page 154. He says:

It is not, however, by any means, a necessary consequence that the prices of articles on which a duty has been laid will be raised proportionally to its amount, or, indeed, that they will be raised at all, and in the latter case the distribution of capital will not be affected.

Provided the duty be not oppressive, its influence in stimulating those engaged in the production of the taxed articles to new efforts of industry and economy may enable them to sell the commodities at their old price, or at one but little higher. And supposing it were otherwise, and that prices were raised proportionally to the tax, the effect would be confined to the home market, inasmuch as the granting of an equivalent drawback, or the remitting of the duties on the articles when exported, hinders the foreign market from being affected by the tax.

This plainly says that the European producer meets the 50 cents tariff tax by reducing his price that amount or more at home; and so the American consumer does not pay it, but the foreigner pays it directly into our Treasury and we gain the whole. This is demonstrated as to many articles in our market. When European pottery had no American rivals, and our tariff was very low, pottery was about twice as dear as it is to-day under the existing tariff with home potteries. Behind the tariff bar grew up our home industry; and the foreigner was compelled to lower his prices. It is the same with glass. One factory making a certain kind of glass here in the United States was burned down. This destroyed competition in this market against foreign goods of that kind. The price of the foreign article immediately advanced. It is a well-known fact that the export price of foreign goods is often lower than their home selling price.

When the tariff is wisely and honestly adjusted a healthy competition, both foreign and domestic, ensues. If you do away with home manufactures who will insure us against the foreign trust and combination? The modern trust is, in my eyes, just as far from being either honest or just as the ancient pirate or highwayman, and they should be sternly repressed; but I am not willing to admit that the protective features of the tariff are solely and wholly responsible for these latter-day developments. It is noticeable that the towering trust giants, oil, whisky, etc., do not defend nor are they affected by the tariff. We need not burn down the house to get a few rats out of the cellar; other remedies are at hand.

It seems to me the climax of brazen effrontery for these monstrous conspiracies against the welfare of the people to inveigh as they do against organized labor. It was the foul confederacy of soulless capital that compelled labor to organize in self-defense, and at its door should be laid the excesses, if any, that may ensue. Harmony between labor and capital will be restored when faith comes again to a forsaken earth and the golden rule again reigns.

CHEAP MARKETS.

How much we hear about cheap markets and the purchasing power of the dollar. Now, the purchasing power of the dollar is all important if you have the dollar. Of what use is the cheap market to the man who can not get his dollar? Suppose you close his workshops and send him out into the world, where will the workman get his dollar to go into your cheap markets? Suppose you reduce his dollar one-half, how will that raise the price of your wheat? India and Russia compete with us in breadstuffs in the British market, and will so continue until more diversified industry gets a foothold in those countries. Advancing civilization in Russia and freedom for India are to be desired. When India is free from British rule she will eat her own wheat, and the horrible annual famines amid plenty will cease. But as it is now the best market for Texan and Kentucky farmers is up in New York and New Jersey.

Close the industries now prevailing there and our great industrial army—their best customers—will, I suppose, join them in purely agricultural pursuits, and all enter competition in foreign markets against Russian serfs, Egyptian fellahs, and Indian ryots. The tariff will not trouble us then. We will all lie down in peace and kick our heels in the daisies, or join in chasing a lonely coyote for a winter overcoat in his skin. Our people thoroughly understand this. In no country are the workmen so intelligent and well organized. They have, besides, the quick, acute, sharp sense that is characteristic of those reared in our dry, stimulating air.

These people are not represented in the parlor conventions of free-traders, where cheap-labor millionaires, importers, selfish politicians, and speculative philosophers elbow each other in a singular jumble. These workmen have no affiliation with gentlemen of infinite leisure, unbounded wealth, and great admiration for all things foreign. No; they are rugged, whole-souled, unwavering Americans in principle and practice.

THE FOREIGN MARKET.

Universal depression in agriculture prevails. In Great Britain agricultural distress is terrible. In France the whole nation is troubled by seeing the very foundation of that country—the small landholder—suffering unwonted hardship. It is so throughout all Europe. Agricultural depression is felt here to some degree, but in no country in the world to-day so little as in the United States. The British, French, and German farmers would gladly exchange places with ours. In fact they do come here in multitudes every hour. Even as I speak they are crowding the steam-ship wharves in my Congressional district. Now this depression has given room for much talk of the foreign market.

We must, forsooth, get a great foreign market by act of Congress. I would like to have this wonderful foreign market more clearly defined. Is it in Europe? Europe is doing her own manufacturing and striving hard to raise her own bread for her own artisans. Scarcity in England. For myself I have great hopes of extending our market in the South Americas. English ports are now open to us, but unless we reduce wages we can not beard the lion in his den. She is our great and sleepless rival. But soon, very soon, we will take from her the commercial primacy of the world. Her own writers see this coming and are sounding alarms to their countrymen. A well-regulated American tariff will surely sap away her commercial supremacy and make us master in the newer countries where trade is yet to be won. This young Republic of unlimited possibilities and with its intelligent labor will eventually dominate trade and commerce in all American countries.

Let us proceed carefully and on true reciprocal grounds to extend our American market. When our people bend all their energies to it, when shipbuilding becomes as popular as railroad building, when our merchants and manufacturers train for it, then our laws will shape it, and our foreign market will be established. When the pressure for a foreign market becomes very great we can safely trust the genius, industry, and pluck of our people to find one. In the mean time let us remember that the home market first and last is our sheet-anchor.

In the mean time do not let us delude ourselves with vague talk about foreign markets that do not exist or are passing away. Let me read some extracts from a recent paper by Kropotkin in the London Nineteenth Century, April number. The writer has a wide reputation. He writes to prove that the home market is now the only market left for nearly all countries. He insists that each nation is rapidly approaching the point when it will raise its own bread, make its clothes, and build its own machines, and live within itself. The article is entitled "Our Industrial System." Hear this keen-eyed observer of universal events:

Each nation her own agriculturist and manufacturer; each individual working in the field and in some industrial art; each individual combining scientific knowledge with the knowledge of a handicraft—such is, we affirm, the present tendency of civilized nations. The following pages are intended to prove the first of these three assertions.

Gaze on this picture of the world's progress and see the changing conditions of nations and men.

Let us turn seventy years back. France lies bleeding at the end of the Napoleonic wars. Her young industry, which had begun to grow by the end of the last century, is crushed down. Germany, Italy, are powerless on the industrial field. The armies of the great Republic have struck a mortal blow to serfdom on the continent; but the return of reaction tries to revive the decaying institution, and serfdom means no industry worth speaking of. The terrible wars between France and this country, which wars are often explained by merely political causes, had a much deeper meaning—an economical meaning. They were wars for the supremacy on the world-market, wars against French commerce and industry; and Britain won the battle. She became supreme on the seas. Bordeaux was no more a rival to London, and the French industries seemed to be killed in the bud. And, favored by the powerful impulse given to natural sciences and technology by the great area of inventions; finding no serious competitors in Europe, Britain began to develop her manufactures. To produce on a large scale in immense quantities became the watchword. The necessary human forces were at hand in the peasantry, partly driven by force from the land, partly attracted to the cities by high wages. The necessary machinery was created, and the British production of manufactured goods went on at a gigantic pace. In the course of less than seventy years—from 1810 to 1878—the output of coal grew from ten to one hundred and thirty-three millions of tons; the imports of raw materials rose from thirty to three hundred and eighty millions of tons; and the exports of manufactured ware from forty-six to two hundred million pounds. The tonnage of the commercial fleet was nearly trebled. Fifteen thousand miles of railways were built.

It is useless to repeat at what a cost the above results were achieved. The terrible revelations of the parliamentary commissions of 1840-'42 as to the atrocious condition of the manufacturing classes; the tales of "cleared estates" and those of Indian "mutiny" are still fresh in the memory. They will remain standing monuments for showing by what means the great industry was implanted in this country. But the accumulation of wealth in the hands of the privileged classes was going on at a speed never dreamed of before. The incredible riches which now astonish the foreigner in the private houses of this country were accumulated during that period; the exceedingly expensive standard of life which makes a person considered rich on the continent appear as only of modest means in this country, was introduced during that time. The taxed property alone doubled during the last thirty years of the above period, while during the same years (1810 to 1878) no less than £1,112,000,000 was invested by English capitalists either in foreign industries or in foreign loans.

But the monopoly of industrial production could not remain with this country forever. Neither industrial knowledge nor enterprise could be kept forever as a privilege of these islands. Necessarily, fatally, they began to cross the channel and spread over the continent. The great revolution had created in France a numerous class of peasant proprietors who enjoyed nearly half a century of a comparative well-being, or, at least, of a guaranteed labor. The ranks of the town prolétariat—a necessary condition now for growing industries—were therefore increasing slowly. But the middle-class revolution of 1789–1793 had already made a distinction between the peasant householders and the village prolétaires, and, by favoring the former to the detriment of the latter, it compelled the laborers who had no household nor land to abandon their villages, and thus to form the first nucleus of working classes given up to the mercy of manufacturers. Moreover, the peasant-proprietors themselves, after having enjoyed a period of undeniable prosperity, began in their turn to feel the pressure of bad times, and were compelled to look for employment in manufactures. Wars and revolution had checked the growth of industry; but it began to grow again during the second half of our century; it developed, it improved; and now, notwithstanding the loss of Alsace, France is no longer the tributary to England for manufactured produce which she was thirty years ago. To-day her exports of manufactured ware are valued a nearly one-half of those of Great Britain, and two-thirds of them are textile goods.

Germany follows the same lines. During the last twenty-five years, and especially since the last war, her industry has undergone a thorough reorganization. Her machinery has been thoroughly improved, and her new-born manufactures are supplied with a machinery which mostly represents the last word of technical progress.

A superior technical and scientific education; and in her army of learned chemists, physicists, and engineers, who find no employment with the state, industry has a most powerfully intelligent aid. As a whole, Germany offers now the spectacle of a nation in a period of Aufschwung, with all the forces of a new start in every domain of life. Thirty years ago she was a customer to England. Now she is already a terrible competitor in the markets of the south and east, and at the present speedy rate of growth of her industries, her competition will be soon yet more terrible than it is.

The wave of industrial production, after having had its origin in the northwest of Europe, spreads towards the east and southeast, always covering a wider circle. And, in proportion as it advances east, and penetrates into younger countries, it implants there all the improvements due to a century of mechanical and chemical inventions; it borrows from science all the help it can give to industry; and it finds populations eager to grasp the last results of modern knowledge. The new manufactures of Germany begin where Manchester arrived after a century of experiments and gropings; and Russia begins where Manchester and Saxony have now reached. Russia, in her turn, tries to emancipate herself from her dependency upon Western Europe, and rapidly begins to manufacture all those goods she formerly used to import, either from Britain or from Germany. Protective duties may sometimes help the birth of new industries, and sometimes check the improvement of those which already exist; but the decentralization of manufactures goes on with or without protective duties—I should even say, notwithstanding the protective duties. Austria, Hungary, and Italy follow the same lines; they develop their home industries; and even Spain is going to join the family of manufacturing nations. Nay, even India, even Brazil and Mexico, supported by English and German capital and knowledge, begin to start home industries on their respective soils. Finally, a terrible competitor to all European manufacturing countries has grown up of late in the United States. In proportion as their immense territory is more and more appropriated by the few, and free land of any value becomes as difficult to get as it is in Europe, manufacturers must grow in the States; and they are growing at such a speed—an American speed—that in a very few years the now neutral markets will be invaded by American goods. The monopoly of the first-comers on the industrial field has ceased to exist. And it will exist no more, whatever may be the spasmodic efforts made to return to a state of things already belonging to the domain of history. New ways, new issues, must be searched: the past has lived, and it will live no more.

Before going further, let me illustrate the march of industries towards the east by a few figures. And, to begin with, let me take the example of Russia. Not because I know it better, or that our industrial statistics, although slow to appear, are fuller than those of Austria or of Italy, but because Russia is the latest comer on the industrial field. Thirty years ago she was considered as the ideal of an agricultural nation, doomed by nature itself to supply other nations with food, and to draw her manufactured goods from the west. So it was, indeed, thirty years ago; but it is so no more. Elisée Reclus has given, in his Géographie Universelle, a curve intended to show the growth of Russian industries since 1859, and this modest curve is worth whole pages, as it tells at once to the eye the sudden increase of Russian manufactures a few years after the emancipation of serfs. In 1861—the year of the emancipation—Russia, together with Poland, had only 14,060 manufactories, which produced every year the value of two hundred and ninety-six millions of rubles (about £36,000,000). Twenty years later the number of establishments rose to 35,160, and their yearly production became nearly four times the above—i. e., thirteen hundred and five millions (about £131,600,000); and in 1884, although the census left the smaller manufactures out of account, the aggregate production reached already fifteen hundred and fifty-six millions—i.e., £155,000,000. The most noteworthy feature of Russian industry is, that while the number of workmen employed in the manufactories has not even doubled since 1861 (it has remained almost stationary since 1879), the production per workman has more than doubled; it has trebled in the leading industries. The average was less than £70 per annum in 1861; it reaches now £163. The increase of production is thus chiefly due to the improvement of machinery, especially since 1870. If we take, however, separate branches, and especially the textile industries and the machinery works, the progress appears still more striking.

"If we consider only the years which preceded 1879—when the import duties were increased by nearly 30 per cent., and a protective policy was definitely adopted—we still find the following progress in the cotton industries: The number of workmen employed increases only by 25 per cent.; but the production increases by 300 per cent.; the yearly production per workman employed grows from £45 to £117. The unanimous opinion of the experts at the exhibition of 1882 was, that a considerable improvement had been realized of late in the Russian cotton manufactures; and everybody can confirm the accuracy of the statement by the cheapness and the good taste of the cottons now manufactured in Russia. The same is true, although to a smaller extent, with regard to the woolens industries, and fully with regard to the silks (compare Stieda's monographs in the Russische Revue). As to the machinery works, it would not be fair to make any comparison between 1884 and 1861, or even 1870; the whole has grown up during the last ten years; and Professor Kirpitcheff points out that the progress realized can be best judged by the high perfection attained in the building of the most perfect types of big steam-engines, locomotives, and in the manufacture of water-pipes, notwithstanding the competition of Glasgow. Russia needs no longer to import any part of her railway plant, thanks to the progress made under the leadership of English and partly German engineers. As to the home-made agricultural machinery, both the Times correspondent and Russian reports agree in recognizing that it successfully competes even with American machinery, although the latter is much cheaper and more appropriate to the Russian prairies than the English."

* * * * * * *

A country which manufactures chiefly for export, and therefore lives chiefly on the profits derived from her foreign trade, stands very much in the same position as Switzerland, which lives to a great extent on the profits derived from the foreigners who visit her lakes and glaciers. A good "season" means an influx of from £1,600,000 to £2,000,000 of money imported by the tourists, and a bad "season" has the effects of a bad crop in an agricultural country; a general impoverishment follows. So it is also with a country which manufactures for export. If the season is bad and the exported goods can not be sold abroad for twice their value at home, the country which lives chiefly on these bargains suffers. Low profits for the innkeepers of the Alps mean narrowed circumstances in large parts of Switzerland. Low profits for the Lancashire and Birmingham manufacturers mean narrowed circumstances in this country. The cause is the same in both cases.

For many decades past we have not seen such a cheapness of wheat and manufactured goods as we see now, and yet we are suffering from a crisis. People say its cause is overproduction. But overproduction is a word utterly devoid of sense if it does not mean that those who are in need of all kinds of produce have not the means for buying them with their low salaries. Nobody would dare to affirm that there is too much furniture in the crippled cottages, too many bedsteads and bed-clothes in the workmen's dwellings, too many lamps burning in the huts, and too much cloth on the shoulders not only of those who used to sleep in Trafalgar Square between two newspapers, but even in those households where a silk hat makes a part of the Sunday dress. And nobody will dare to affirm that there is too much food in the homes of those agricultural laborers who earn 10s. a week, and pay for their meat 9d. a pound, or of those who earn from 5d. to 6d. a day in the clothing trade or in the small industries which swarm in the outskirts of all great cities. Overproduction means merely and simply a want of purchasing power amidst the workers. With their wages they can not buy the goods they have produced themselves, because the prices of those goods, however low, include the profits of the employers and the middlemen.

The same want of purchasing powers of the workers is felt everywhere on the continent. But it is obvious that it must be felt more in this country, which has been accustomed to pump bargains out of her foreign customers and now sees her exterior trade decline. The exports of manufactured goods from this country have declined by one hundred and sixty-one millions in the three years ending 1880 when compared with the year 1872, said Mr. Gladstone at Leeds. Even those who will not admit that there is a notable decline in the exports willingly admit that the prices are so low in comparison with those of 1873 that in order to reach the same money value England ought to export four pieces of cotton cloth instead of three and eight or ten tons of metal instead of six. "The aggregate of our foreign trade in the year 1883, if valued at the prices of ten years previously, would have amounted to £861,000,000, instead of £667,000,000," we are told by the commission on trade depression.

The home markets are overstocked; the foreign markets are escaping; and in the neutral markets Britain is being undersold. Such is the conclusion which every observer must arrive at if he examines the development of manufactures all over the world. Great hopes are laid now in Australia; but Australia, with her ever-growing numbers of unemployed, will soon do what Canada does. She will manufacture; and the last colonial exhibition, by showing to the "colonists" what they are able to do, and how they must do, will only have accelerated the day when each colony farà da sè in her turn. Canada already imposes protective duties on British goods. New demands for a further increase of duties are continually being pressed on the Canadian government. As to the much-spoken-of markets on the Congo, and Mr. Stanley's calculations and promises of a trade amounting to £26,000,000 a year if the Lancashire people supply the Africans with loin-clothes, such promises belong to the same category of fancies as the famous nightcaps of the Chinese which were to enrich this country. The Chinese prefer their own home-made nightcaps; and, as to the Congo people, four countries at least are already competing for supplying them with their poor dress—Britain, Germany, the United States, and, last but not least, India.

There was a time when this country had almost the monopoly of the trade in manufactured ware. But now, if only the six chief manufacturing countries of Europe and the United States be taken into account, Britain, although still keeping the first rank, commands less than one-half of the aggregate exports of manufactured goods. Two-thirds of them are textiles and more than one-third are cottons. But while thirty years ago, Britain took the lead in the cotton industries, about 1880 she had only a little more than one-half the spindles at work in Europe, the United States, and India (40,000,000 out of 72,000,000), and a little more than one-half of the looms (550,000 out of 972,000). She was steadily losing ground, while the others were winning. And the fact is quite natural; it might have been foreseen. There is no reason why Britain should always be the great cotton manufactory of the world when raw cotton has to be imported. It was quite natural that France, Germany, Italy, Russia, India, and even Mexico and Brazil, should spin their own yarns and weave their own cotton-stuffs. But the appearance of the cotton-industry in a country, or, in fact, of any textile industry, unavoidably becomes the starting-point for the growth of a series of other industries. Chemical and mechanical works, metallurgy and mining, feel at once the impetus given by a new want. The whole of the home industries, as also technical education altogether, must improve in order to satisfy it as soon as it has been felt.

What has happened with regard to cottons is going on also with regard to other industries. Britain and Belgium have no longer the monopoly of the woolen manufacture. The immense factories at Verviers are silent; the Belgian weavers are misery-stricken, while Germany yearly increases her production of woolens and exports nine times more woolens than Belgium. Austria has her own woolens and exports them; Riga, Lodz, and Moscow supply Russia with finest woolen cloths, and the growth of the woolen industry in each of the last-named countries calls into existence hundreds of connected trades.

For many years France has had the monopoly of the silk trade. Silkworms being reared in Southern France, it was quite natural that Lyons should grow into a center for the manufacture of silks. Spinning, domestic weaving, and dyeing works developed to a great extent. But eventually the industry took such a development that home supplies of raw silk became insufficient, and raw silk was imported from Italy, Spain, and South Austria, Asia Minor, the Caucasus, and Japan, to the amount of from 9,000,000 to 11,000,000 pounds in 1875 and 1876, while France disposed only of 800,000 pounds of her own silk. Thousands of peasant boys and girls were attracted by high wages to Lyons and the neighboring district; the industry was prosperous. However, by and by new centers of silk trade grew up at Basel and in the peasant houses around Zurich. French emigrants imported the trade, and it developed, especially after the civil war of 1871. The Caucasus administration invited French workmen and women from Lyons and Marseilles to teach the Georgians and the Russians the best means of rearing the silkworm and the whole of the silk trade, and Stavropol became a new center for silk-weaving. Austria and the United States did the same; and what are now the results? During the years 1872 to 1881 Switzerland more than doubled the produce of her silk industry; Italy and Germany increased it by one-third; and the Lyons region, which formerly manufactured to the value of 454,000,000 francs a year, shows now a return of only 378,000,000. The exports of Lyons silks, which reached an average of 425,000,000 francs in 1855-'59, and 460,000,000 in 1870-'74, have fallen down to 233,000,000. And it is reckoned by French specialists that at present no less than one-third of the silk-stuffs used in France are imported from Zurich, Crefeld, and Barmen. Nay, even Italy, which had 2,000,000 spindles and 30,000 looms in 1880 (as against 14,000 in 1870), sends her silks to France (3,300,000 francs in 1881), and competes with Lyons. The French manufacturers may cry as loudly as they like for protection, or resort to the production of cheaper goods of lower quality; they may sell 3,250,000 kilograms of silk-stuffs at the same price as they sold 2,500,000 in 1855-'59. They will never regain the position they occupied before. Italy, Switzerland, Germany, the United States, and Russia have their own silk manufactories and will import from Lyons only the highest qualities of stuffs; as to the lower sorts a foulard has become a common attire with the St. Petersburg housemaids, because the North Caucasian domestic trades supply them at a price which would starve the Lyons weavers. And they do starve. The misery at Lyons was so great in 1884 that the poorly-fed soldiers of the Lyons garrison shared their food with the weavers and spared their coppers in order to alleviate the misery. But neither charities nor public works at the fortifications will help. The trade has irremediably gone away; it has been decentralized; and Lyons will never become again the center for silk trade it was thirty years ago.

Like examples could be produced by the score. Greenock no longer supplies Russia with sugar, because Russia has plenty of her own at the same price as it sells at in England. The watch trade is no more a specialty of Switzerland, and I saw skilled guillocheurs earning a miserable existence by carding wool and the like. India extracts from her ninety collieries two-thirds of her annual consumption of coal. The chemical trade which grew up on the banks of the Clyde and Tyne, owing to the special advantages offered for the import of Spanish pyrites, and the agglomeration of such a variety of industries along the two estuaries, is now in decay. Spain, with the help of English capital, is beginning to utilize her own pyrites for herself. Germany extracted them to the amount of 158,410 tons in 1882, and manufactured no less than 358,150 tons of sulphuric acid, and 115,000 tons of soda, as against 42,500 in 1877—nay, she already complains about over-production, and indeed the prices have fallen from 23 marks to 14 and 12 marks the hundred kilograms.

But enough. I have before me so many figures, all telling the same tale, that examples could be multiplied at will. It is time to conclude, and, for every unprejudiced mind, the conclusion is self-evident. Industries of all kinds are decentralized and scattered all over the globe, and everywhere a variety, an integrated variety, of trades grows, instead of specialization. Such are the prominent features of the times we live in. Each nation becomes in its turn a manufacturing nation: and the time is not far off when each nation of Europe, as well as the United States, and even the most backward nations of Asia and America, will themselves manufacture nearly everything they are in need of. Wars and several accidental causes may check for some time the scattering of industries; they will not stop it; it is unavoidable. For each new-comer the first steps only are difficult. But, as soon as any industry has taken firm root, it calls into existence hundreds of other trades; and as soon as the first steps have been made, and the first obstacles have been overcome, the growth of industries goes on at an accelerated rate.

The fact is so well felt, if not understood, that the race for colonies has become the distinctive feature of the last twenty years. Each nation will have her own colonies. But colonies will not help. There is not a second India in the world, and the old conditions will be repeated no more. Nay, some of the British colonies already threaten to become serious competitors with their mother country; others, like Australia, will not fail to follow the same lines. As to the yet neutral markets, China and Japan will never be serious customers to Europe—they can produce cheaper at home; and when they begin to feel a need for goods of European patterns, they will produce them themselves. Woe to Europe if, the day that the steam-engine invades China, she is still relying on foreign customers. As to the African half-savages, their misery is no foundation for the well being of a civilized nation.

Progress is in another direction. It is in producing for home use. The customers for the Lancashire cottons and the Sheffield cutlery, the Lyons silks, and the Hungarian flour-mills are not in India nor in Africa. They are amidst the home producers. No use to send floating shops to New Guinea with German or British millinery when there are plenty would-be customers for British millinery in these very islands, and for German ware in Germany. And instead of worrying our brains by schemes for getting customers abroad, it would be better to try to answer the following plain questions: Why the British worker, whose industrial capacities are so highly praised in political speeches; why the Scotch crofter and the Irish peasant, whose obstinate labors in creating new productive soil out of peat-bogs are so much spoken of now, are no customers to the Lancashire weavers, the Sheffield cutlers, and the Northumbrian and Welsh pitmen? Why the Lyons weavers not only do not wear silk, but have no food in their mansardes? Why the Russian peasants sell their corn, and for four, six, and sometimes eight months every year are compelled to mix bark and auroch-grass to a handfull of flour for baking their bread?

The Russian fabric inspectors' reports, the reports of the Planen Handelskammer, and the Italian inquiries are full of the same revelations as the reports of the Parliamentary commissions of 1840 to 1842, or the modern revelations with regard to the "sweating system" at Whitechapel and Glasgow, and London pauperism. The capital and labor problem is thus universalized; but, at the same time, it is also simplified. To return to a state of affairs where corn is grown and manufactured goods are fabricated for the use of those very people who grow and produce them—such will be, no doubt, the problem to be solved during the next-coming years of European history. Each region will become its own producer and its own consumer of manufactured goods. But that unavoidably implies that, at the same time, it will be its own producer and consumer of agricultural produce; and that is precisely what I shall discuss next.

P. KROPOTKIN.

Let me add to the picture drawn by this eminent student of economic facts by pointing to Ireland as the result of suppression by law of this diversified industry.

Mr. Chairman, it is possible that external circumstances may have influenced my opinion on this great question. I was born in a land that had that much lauded boon, commercial freedom. My infant eyes first saw the light of heaven under the sunshine and shadow of an Irish sky. In my better moods I hope I preserve the reflection. The haunts of poverty were more than filled; her custom-houses were almost tenantless.

I saw a brave, chivalrous, and generous people, with keen, acute intellects, bright and industrious, invaded by constantly recurring famines, driven to exile or death. In that "island of sorrows," that Niobe of nations, her magnificent natural harbors floated little or no commerce, and with idle hands and ingenious minds, under free-trade laws the smoke of the factory cast no shadows on the landscape. All this under free-trade laws. There the name of Peel was execrated, and the great Cobden had no place in her Pantheon.

RAW MATERIALS.

Much has been said about free raw materials. There is nothing made ready for use but has had some labor bestowed upon it; hence raw material, so called, represents more or less human labor. There are, however, natural products upon which little labor has been bestowed, but which are prime necessities of life or enter largely into the manufacture of other articles, and these should be as cheap as the labor engaged in making them ready for use can stand. Give abundant raw material to our factories and you will increase their number and output and make a market for our raw products, and thus increase them. Natural products which are not found, or which can not be readily raised in our own country, and which are of prime necessity to our industries may well be admitted free of duty so that we may have our full share of the world's product of such articles.

But the freeing of a natural product from duty should not be followed by a more than proportionate reduction of the tariff on the manufactured article. In some manufactured articles the raw material—full cost—is not over 1 per cent.

Speaking only for myself and on my own responsibility, as a guaranty of the good faith of my desire for full and fair revision of the tariff list in such a way as to secure benefit to the whole people and real reduction of the revenues, I append what I consider a fair and just basis for the passage of a bill:

Endless belts or felts for paper or printing machines, 15 cents per pound and 20 per cent. ad valorem.

This, of course, is not a full bill or complete revision, but is the basis of such a measure. The tobacco tax should be repealed. If this is done only in part it were better, in my opinion, to reduce the whole internal revenue by a cut of two-thirds or one-half. As to what I think of this tax, I have already stated. There is a difficulty about defining tin-plate so as to preserve our sheet-iron industry. If free, they should be confined to such plates as are used for domestic or canning purposes. This list can be amply defended. Carpet wools are nearly all foreign. Anthracite coal is already free. Salt employs but little labor and is a great human necessity. The exporters now have it free—why not the farmers and the people? On the proper occasion I will have more to say on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, it is well, in conclusion, for those who deride all tariffs and glorify free trade to remember that the logic of the situation is with Mr. Henry George, that clever writer, who rightfully argues that with the abolition of custom-houses the single land tax comes within the domain of practical politics. While giving no sanction to the radical features of his teachings concerning the law, I am in perfect accord with him when he contends that tariff agitation is but a ripple on the surface, an air-bubble on the stream of deep and powerful currents that now give direction to the great ocean of human thought.

Mr. Chairman, I claim to be an honest revenue reformer. I would carefully revise the present tariff, reduce the revenue, and abolish the surplus, for which revision both political parties have declared, and for practical and honest effort so to do both will have to account to a watchful and intelligent people. I am aware that the business of the country suffer greatly from the continuance of an agitation largely fostered for political advantage. I am willing to make all reasonable concessions to settle this disturbing question; but, sir, I am proud to say that I would scorn to sacrifice the labor and industries of the Republic to noisy declaration which mingles self-eulogy with threats against its opponents.

To this House has been committed a fearful responsibility to unburden the overladen Treasury, to reduce the revenues, and at the same time neither disturb nor injure the material welfare of the people. It is a task that calls for wisdom and prudence and high and unselfish aims. It is not a mere game to be played on the checker-board of infinitesimal politics, but an honorable and open contest on the higher plateau of supreme patriotism. As President Cleveland said in his last annual message, "The question thus imperatively presented for solution should be approached in a spirit higher than partisanship, and considered in the light of that regard for patriotic duty which should characterize the action of those intrusted with the weal of a confiding people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The time for quibble and dispute has passed, the time for action is imminent. Let us individually and collectively act wisely and well in the formulation and passage of a conservative and efficient measure, and the memory of the Fiftieth Congress will long survive in the annals of a grateful people, who, in the language of the motto of my State emblazoned in this Hall, are in the full enjoyment of "Liberty and Prosperity." [Great applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing speech the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BLAND. Does not the gentleman attribute the difficulties of Ireland to the tyrannical rule of England keeping her in political commotion so that she could not have the benefit of free trade, free agriculture, or free anything?

Mr. MCADOO. I will say this, that at the time of the passage of the free-trade laws in England the soul and life had been ground out of Ireland by penal laws and barbarous restricting acts, so that they were immaterial to her. They only aggravated her sufferings. That is England's policy. Having sucked the life-blood out of her victim, she then offers her the empty boon, if boon it be, of free trade. It is rank cant and hypocrisy for British authors to talk of Ireland being unable to get the benefits of Cobden's agitation.

Mr. BLAND. When it is too late.

[Mr. MORROW addressed the committee in remarks which will be published hereafter.]

Before he had concluded,

The CHAIRMAN said: Under the order of the House, the committee must rise at this time.

Mr. MORROW. It is understood that I retain my right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be entitled to the remainder of his time when this subject is resumed to-morrow morning.

The committee rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, under the order of the House (the hour of half past 5 o'clock having arrived), the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the Clerk to read the following:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1888.

Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House of Representatives this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House Representatives.

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of revenue bills.

The motion was agreed so.

TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I begin with the enunciation made by the President of an old economic truth, that the cost of any article subject to a tariff tax or duty is increased to the consumer by the amount of the duty. The tax paid by the importer is added to the cost of the article in his hands, and the man who buys the article for use repays the tax to the importer. There is, for example, both a specific and ad valorem tax on woolen hats. The ad valorem tax is 40 per cent., while the specific tax varies from 10 cents to 35 cents per pound. An importer who pays $1 for a hat in England, ships it to the United States, and at the port of entry pays to the collector of customs 60 cents as a tariff tax on that hat, and adds the tax to the cost of the hat, and so the man who buys the hat for use pays the tax. If instead of buying an imported hat the consumer should buy a hat of similar quality of domestic manufacture he would be compelled to pay the same price. The two hats compete in the same market and bring the same price.

If the tax on the imported hat had been 30 cents instead of 60 cents, the hat would have cost the importer 30 cents less, and he could have sold it to the consumer for that amount less. And if the imported hat decreases in price, the domestic hat must do likewise in order to compete. On the other hand, if the tax on the imported hat should be increased from 60 cents to 90 cents, it would cost the importer 30 cents more (without taking into consideration any account for interest on the larger investment), and the consumer would have to pay 30 cents more. And whenever the imported hat advances in price by reason of the higher tax, the price of the domestic hat will likewise increase in order to reap the benefit of a larger profit.

The difference is simple. If the hat is imported, the consumer, through the importer, pays the tax to the Government; if it is a domestic hat he pays an amount equal to the tax to the manufacturer. If this be true, as it surely is, it would seem to follow as a logical and inevitable conclusion that if the tax should be reduced or removed on a given article, the conditions remaining otherwise the same, the cost of that article ought to be reduced in an equal ratio to the consumer. Now, as nearly everything we use in this country—the cradle in which our babes are crooned to sleep; the lumber, nails, glass, and all materials out of which the houses sheltering us are constructed; the blankets upon our beds; every article of furniture, whether useful or ornamental, in our houses, including the Bible on the center stand; the clothing we wear; the salt and sugar on our tables; the implements of our industries; the coffins in which we bury our dead; the marble slab we raise to their memory; in short, as everything from the cradle to the grave is burdened with this species of taxation, it would seem also, to follow that it would advance the interests of the consumers, who comprise the bulk of our population, as contradistinguished from manufacturers and dealers, to reduce taxation, thereby reducing the cost of living.

I believe these postulates, like the great truths of the Declaration, are self-evident. It seems so to me. However, there are those who profess to believe and do maintain with great vigor that low taxation does not ultimately result in cheaper prices to the consumer, but quite the contrary. In support of that notion they point to the fact that most articles of commercial and domestic use in this country were higher before we adopted the protective theory than since, and insist that all staple articles have steadily declined under the tariff and as a result of the tariff. To illustrate: The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] said in his speech a few days ago:

> In the Saginaw Valley to-day a barrel of good salt, the barrel included, can be bought for 58 cents. Salt was never cheaper than now. I can buy this day at my Indiana home salt for less than it cost to carry it from the wholesale dealer to that place on the day it was first made subject to a protective duty.

Again he said:

> The currency price for a ton of steel rails in 1867 was $166; to-day it commands but $31.50.

On the day previous the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] gave this illustration, among many others. He said:

> Previous to 1884 there was not a pound of soda-ash manufactured in the United States. We consume annually 175,000 tons in the manufacture of glass and other American products. Previous to 1884 we imported every pound of it, at an average cost of $48 a ton. A duty of $5 was imposed and the Solvay Process Company was organized at Syracuse, the only one on this hemisphere, at a cost of $1,500,000, with a capacity of 50,000 tons annually. It commenced manufacturing soda-ash in January, 1884. How has it affected the price of this commodity? Was the duty of $5 added to the $48, so as to advance the cost to $53 a ton? On the contrary, it fell in the American market as low as $28 a ton in three years, a saving to the people annually of $20 a ton on the entire consumption, or $3,500,000.

These examples, quoted at random from these two distinguished advocates of protective taxation, are sufficient to illustrate their contention that the cost of an article to the consumer is not increased by the amount of the tax, but that the cost is greatly diminished as a result of the tax. Without stopping to discuss other causes not related to the tariff, which at least have contributed to a depression in the price of salt, and to a reduction of the price of steel rails from $166 in 1867 to $106.75 in 1870, when the duty of $28 per ton was imposed, and to a lower price since, I desire to meet the main question at once, and treat it candidly and fairly. It may stand admitted that prices, taken as a whole, have declined during the last twenty years, and during the supremacy of the protective policy; but it does not follow that the fall in prices is altogether, or largely, due to the fact of protection, nor that it is necessary to continue high taxation in order to maintain low prices; nor does it contravene that law in economics, as fixed as the law of gravitation, that the price of an article upon which a tariff tax has been imposed is increased by the sum of the tax.

I will take the soda-ash example furnished with so much detail by the gentleman from Michigan, without investigating the sources of his information or the accuracy of his statements, with which to illustrate my argument. When I say, or when the President said, that the price to the consumer is increased by the amount of the tax, I am, as he was, literally correct. By the statement it is not meant that any particular price at any particular time must be maintained and the increase be predicated on that; but, generally, that the current price, whatever it may be, at any time, is increased by the sum of the tax. If the market price of soda-ash was $48 per ton at the time the $5 tax was imposed, and there had been no reduction in the current price, brought about by any cause, then the $5 would have been added to the $48, and the price to the consumer would have been $53. If $48 had been the lowest price at which the English manufacturer could have sold soda-ash on our markets, he could not then have paid the $5 tax without advancing the price. The cost to the consumer, therefore, would have been inevitably increased, at least as to so much of the consumption as the home manufacturer could not supply; and he could supply only 50,000 tons out of 175,000 tons, according to the gentleman's own statement.

It may be said that there would not have been necessarily any advance in the price of the domestic product. But I think I am safe in saying if 125,000 tons had been imported and sold at $53, the Salvoy Process Company would not have gone on selling its annual output of 50,000 tons at $48 in the same market. But the price did not remain at $48, at which it was selling before the tariff was imposed. Why? Because the manufacturers, foreign and domestic, can afford to sell it for less, and competition in the same markets has forced the price down.

It is selling now at $28. The Syracuse concern is selling 50,000 tons, and 125,000 are being imported. On each of those 125,000 tons a tax of $5 is paid by the importer to the collector of customs, and goes into the Treasury of the United States. Is not that added to the price by the importer? If you subtract the $5 from the $28 the remaining $23 will be the net sum received by the importer. The $5 simply reimburses him on account of the tax paid by him in the first instance.

But the Syracuse manufacturer sells his 50,000 tons at $28 without having paid any tax, and hence he gets the benefit of it. If I should to-day buy 50,000 tons of imported soda-ash I would pay $250,000 in the way of taxes to the Government; and if I should at the same time buy 50,000 tons from the Syracuse concern I would pay into its private coffers an equal amount in the nature of a tax. If I buy the imported article I pay the tax to the Government; if I buy the domestic article I pay the tax to a private manufacturing corporation. I am not now discussing whether this is the wiser or better thing to do. I will come to that later on. I am now simply stating a fact and illustrating the truth of an economic principle—that the cost of any article is enhanced by the amount of the duty imposed upon it.

The decline in price was not the result of the tariff. That is to say, the mere fact that a tariff tax is imposed does not in and of itself occasion a fall in prices, but the contrary. It may be answered that if there had been no tax imposed there would have been no reduction in price. That may or may not be. As long as England had a monopoly of our soda-ash trade high prices prevailed, as they do always where a monopoly exists. Overproduction, financial disasters, and perhaps other accidental causes, may conspire to impair prices. But, generally speaking, exorbitant prices are reduced or prevented, and a healthful commerce is preserved by the leveling power of competition. If any establishment, or any combination of establishments, has an absolute monopoly of our market, prices are sure to be exorbitant. But if capable competition comes in and struggles for the mastery, prices will be forced down to a legitimate basis by the inevitable laws of trade. I repeat, prices have been reduced, not by reason of a tariff per se, but by reason of commercial competition. Now, whether competition is stimulated by the tariff, or whether there would be any competition at all, except for the tariff, is another question, to which I will address myself at the proper place in the course of my argument.

So far my purpose has been to develop and emphasize the one fact that the cost of any article in general use subject to a duty is enhanced thereby, and that taxation increases the expense of living. The average of the tariff duties now in force is over 47 per cent. The man, therefore, who spends $500 a year for the support of his family, and for machinery and implements to be used in his business, pays, approximately, 47 per cent. of the original cost, or $160, in the way of taxes. In other words, except for the duty paid by the importer, he could have sold the goods for less—for as much less as the tax amounted to; and if the tax paid on the goods purchased by the consumer at a cost of $500 amounts to $160, then the price at which the consumer could otherwise have purchased was increased by the sum of the tax. I say if there had been no tax on the goods the importer could have decreased the price to the consumer to an amount equal to the tax.

It may be answered that he could, but he would not. Of course I can not tell about that. It may be taken for granted that he would not reduce the price if he could pocket the tax himself in the way of increased profits. But if the tax was removed, and competition and all the conditions of trade remained the same, a reduction in price equal to the reduction in tax would certainly follow. Another thing is very sure: If imported goods are being now sold at the lowest prices compatible with reasonable profits, a reduction on that class of goods is impossible while the tax remains. And it may be safely assumed that goods of domestic manufacture will not be reduced in price as long as the prevailing price on the imported and competing product is maintained.

If, then, we are collecting from the people more taxes than the Government needs, thereby taking money from the pockets of labor and incurring all the evils flowing from an enormous idle surplus in the public Treasury, and if the necessaries of life and the cost of living are increased by that taxation for which there is no public or governmental need, we certainly ought not to hesitate to reduce taxation, unless thereby we incur the risk of results pregnant with other and greater evils and dangers than those incident to a State of redundant taxation. Would we run that risk by a reduction of the tariff tax? Would we run that risk by passing the Mills bill, which proposes to reduce the average tax from 47 to 40 per cent.? The protectionists say we would. They say that any substantial reduction of the tariff, or any material interference with existing conditions, would stop the wheels of progress in this country, and that one of two things would happen. First, that all our great manufacturing industries would be prostrated and destroyed, entailing widespread and irreparable disaster and ruin because of their inability, by reason of cheaper labor abroad, to compete on equal terms with foreign establishments; or, secondly, to avoid that result it would compel such a reduction in the wages paid for labor in this country as to impoverish and pauperize millions of brave and honest men who live by their daily earnings. As a consequence of these evil prognostications we are assured, with an air of authority, that competition would be destroyed and that Europe, or, more properly speaking, free-trade England, would soon plant the black standard of monopoly on the rhins of our now prosperous industries, and that salt would treble in price, and that soda-ash would go back to $48, and steel rails to $166 per ton, and that prices of all kinds would advance in like measure.

If these alarming prophecies are anything more than grim phantoms, invoked by selfish and ravenous fancy, with which to affright the souls of adversaries that greed may continue to thrive unmolested on the sweat of honest men; if there is a reasonable or logical probability that they are founded in fact, then it would be the part of wisdom to make haste slowly in this direction. Hamlet said we had—> rather bear those ills we have

> Than fly to others that we know not of.

I, at least, had rather bear the ills we have, however burdensome, than to attempt a new departure, if by so doing I incur the certainty of worse ones. I had rather bear the ills we have than the greater ones so darkly portrayed by the prophets of protection. That is but to play the stupid part of common prudence. But are these doleful prognostications worthy of belief? Ought they to excite any real, intelligent apprehension? Are they candid or honest or sensible? Are they justified by any known economic truths or principles? Is the threat of danger real?

What is the proposition? That our manufacturing industries can not compete with those of England without protection. Why? Let me put it differently. Why can not our people compete with the English people, not only for our home trade, but for the commerce of the world? It can not be, or ought not to be, in the cost of raw materials. American manufacturers ought to be able to buy raw materials as cheaply as the English manufacturer under the same commercial conditions. What is there produced in England that is not produced in this country in greater abundance? What comes from the farms, or the forests, or the mines of England that are not derived in larger quantities from our farms, and forests, and mines? What raw material is produced at the home of the English manufacturer, or any European manufacturer, that is not produced at the home of the American manufacturer? Certainly none of any great importance. On the contrary, we produce much in this country that is not produced in England or in Europe.

For instance, we are the great cotton-producing nation of the world. Our manufacturers of cotton fabrics have the raw material grown at their very doors, while England must send across the Atlantic to buy from us. So far as the home market for the purchase of raw material is concerned, the English manufacturer has no advantage in quality or quantity over the American. And if both are compelled to go abroad to buy, can not the American go into the same markets and buy as cheaply as his English competitor? Of course, under existing laws, the Englishman could lay his material down at his factory cheaper than the American, for, although they may have purchased in the same market at the same price, the American would have to pay a large tariff duty on his material when he landed at his home port, thereby greatly increasing the cost of his raw material over the cost of similar material to his English competitor. As a rule (to which, of course, there are some exceptions) the English manufacturer procures his raw material cheaper now than the American; but that is due almost solely to our high-tariff laws. If they were put upon equal terms and given equal opportunities there would then be no reason for any difference in that respect.

Our alleged inability, therefore, to contend against English competition can not be fairly or justly predicated on the higher cost of raw material to the American manufacturer, since whatever difference exists in that regard is the result of the very tariff laws which he insists on retaining and continuing—a difference which would disappear with a proper modification of the laws from which it springs.

I repeat, why is it that the American people can not compete with the English people upon equal terms? Not because of any inferiority in the character or capacity of our artisans. It has been our boast that the American workmen and operatives are the most intelligent, expert, and skillful in the world. It can not be because our manufacturing establishments are inferior to those of England or any country.

They are no longer puling infants in need of guardians or wet-nurses, but they stand erect, rich, athletic, powerful in all the conscious strength of fresh maturity—superior in wealth and productive capacity to any rivals in the world. We hold the first rank as a manufacturing people, our products in 1880 having exceeded even those of Great Britain by $650,000,000.

It can not be because our home market is in any possible respect inferior to that of England. Our population is vastly greater, our people are equally as intelligent, and the home demand to be supplied by the products of the shop and factory is larger here than there. This is the growing country of the world. Our population and wealth are increasing with marvelous rapidity and home consumption and home demand are multiplying in an equal ratio. Our inability to compete can not be attributed to anything of that sort.

Why, Mr. Chairman, reflect what a marvelous country we have and what extraordinary advantages we enjoy! Combine Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Denmark, and Greece, and they would equal but one-third of our territory west of the Hudson River. I wish in this connection to read some extracts from a recent work, entitled "Our Country; its Possible Future and its Present Crisis," by Josiah Strong, D. D., general secretary of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States, and carefully revised by Professor Austin Phelps, D. D. He says:

We are told that east of the Rocky Mountains we have a river-flow of more than 40,000 miles, counting no stream less than 100 miles in length; while Europe in a larger space has but 17,000 miles. It is estimated that the Mississippi, with its affluents, affords 35,000 miles of navigation. A steam-boat may pass up the Mississippi and Missouri 3,900 miles from the Gulf—"as far as from New York to Constantinople." Thus a vast system of natural canals carries our seaboard into the very heart of the continent. Excluding Alaska, which is capable of producing great wealth, the area of the United States, according to the census of 1880, is 2,970,000 square miles. According to the smallest estimate I have ever seen, and doubtless too small, we have 1,500,000 square miles of arable land.

China proper, which according to her last census, supports a population of 360,000,000, has an area of 1,348,870 square miles, or considerably less than one-half of ours, not including Alaska. The Chinese could hardly be called a manufacturing people; and when their last census was taken (1812,) their foreign commerce was inconsiderable. That vast population, therefore, drew its support from the soil. The mountains of China occupy an area of more than 300,000 square miles, and some of her plains are barren. It would seem, then, that our arable lands, taking the lowest estimate, are in excess of those of China, by some hundreds of thousands of square miles. The fact, therefore, that Chinese agriculture, with its rude implements, feeds hundreds of millions ought, certainly, to be suggestive to Americans.

The crops of 1879, after feeding our 50,000,000 inhabitants, furnished more than 283,000,000 bushels of grain for export. The corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, and potatoes—that is, the food crops—were that year produced on 105,097,750 acres, or 164,215 square miles. But that is less than one-ninth of the smallest estimate of our arable lands. If, therefore, it were all brought under the plow it would feed 450,000,000 and afford 2,554,000,000 bushels of grain for export. But this is not all. So excellent an authority as Mr. Edward Atkinson says that where we now support 50,000,000, "100,000,000 could be sustained without increasing the area of a single farm, or adding one to the number, by merely bringing our product up to an average standard of reasonably good agriculture; and then there might remain for export twice the quantity we now send abroad to feed the hungry in foreign lands. If this be true (and it will hardly be questioned by any one widely acquainted with our wasteful American farming), 1,500,000 square miles of cultivated land—less than one-half of our entire area this side of Alaska—are capable of feeding a population of 900,000,000, and of producing an excess of 5,100,000,000 bushels of grain for exportation; or, if the crops were all consumed at home, it would feed a population one-eighth larger, namely, 1,012,000,000. This corresponds very nearly with results obtained by an entirely different process from data afforded by the best scientific authority (Encyclopedia Britannica, volume I, page 717). It need not, therefore, make a severe draught on credulity to say that our agricultural resources, if fully developed, would sustain a thousand million souls.

But we have wonderful wealth under the soil as well as in it. From 1870 to 1880 we produced $732,000,000 of the precious metals. The United States now raises one-half the gold and silver of the world's supply. Iron ore is to-day mined in twenty-three of our States. A number of them could singly supply the world's demand. Our coal measures are simply inexhaustible. English coal pits, already deep, are being deepened, so that the cost of coal-mining in Great Britain is constantly increasing, while we have coal enough near the surface to supply us for centuries. When storing away the fuel for the ages God knew the place and work to do which he had appointed us, and gave us twenty times as much of this concrete power as to all the peoples of Europe. Our mineral products (of all kinds) are of equal richness and variety. The remarkable increase from 1870 to 1880 places us at the head of nations. Our mining industries exceed those of Great Britain 3 per cent., and are greater than those of all continental Europe, Asia, Africa, South America, Mexico, and the British colonies collectively, and as yet we have hardly begun to develop these resources.

Let us glance at our manufactures, present and prospective. Our first great advantage is found in our superabounding coal. The second lies in the fact that we have our raw material at hand. England must go at least 3,000 miles for every cotton ball she spins; we raise our own. We produce also the wool, the woods, the hides, the metals of every sort—all that is required for nearly every variety of manufacture. The remaining advantage which crowns our opportunity is the quality of our labor, American operatives being, as a class, the most ingenious and intelligent in the world. Inventiveness has come to be a national trait. The Mechanical World, of London, says that the United States has the best machinery and tools in the world; and Mr. Lourdelot, who was recently sent over here by the French minister of commerce, says that the superiority of tools used here, and the attention to details too often neglected in Europe, are elements of danger to European industries.

Herbert Spencer testified that "beyond question, in respect of mechanical appliances, the Americans are ahead of all nations." The fact of superior tools would alone give us no small advantage, but the possession of the best machinery implies much more; namely, that we have also the best mechanics in the world. In close competition any one of the three advantages enumerated ought to insure ultimate supremacy. Already our products in 1880 exceeded those of Great Britain by $650,000,000. * * * And it is interesting to note not only our position, but our rate of progress. While the manufactures of France, from 1870 to 1880, increased $250,000,000, those of Germany $450,000,000, and those of Great Britain $589,000,000, those of the United States increased $1,030,000,000. Moreover, the marked advantages which we now enjoy are to be enhanced. While England's coal is growing dearer, ours will be growing cheaper. The development of our vast resources will greatly increase, and hence cheapen raw materials.

The superior ingenuity and intelligence of our mechanics and operatives will continue to give us better machinery, while our rapidly-increasing population will cheapen labor. Even now, with cheap labor against us, we can lay down our steels in Sheffield, our lower grades of cotton in Manchester, our electroplate in Birmingham, and our watches in Geneva, and undersell European manufacturers on their own doorsills.

Again the same author says:

The wealth of the United States is phenomenal. In 1880 it was valued at $43,642,000,000; more than enough to buy the Russian and Turkish empires, the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, Denmark and Italy, together with Australia, South Africa, and all South America—lands, mines, cities, palaces, factories, ships, flocks, herds, jewels, moneys, thrones, scepters, diadems, and all—the entire possessions of 177,000,000 people. Great Britain is, by far, the richest nation of the Old World, and our wealth exceeds hers by $276,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, right in the midst of all this wealth and opportunity our manufacturers sit clamoring for a wall around them to protect them from the aggressions of weaker powers. Oh, Shame, where is thy blush! Oh, Self-abasement, where is thy sting!

Again, Mr. Chairman, I ask, why can not our American people compete with the English people upon equal terms? Driven by the pitiless logic of incontestable facts from every other reply with which they have been wont to fortify themselves the protectionists retreat to their final, and what has heretofore been considered their most formidable, stronghold, that is, the question of labor-wages. Here they take their stand and shout back their answer. They say: "It is true we have the advantage of cheaper fuel, and could have of cheaper raw material; we have the advantage of better machinery, of better mechanics and operatives; but labor costs so much more here than in England that open competition is impossible."

That is the reply, the one sole reply, which the protectionists make to my question. In that last ditch, heretofore a bulwark of safety, they take their stand, and shout back in chorus "How can we pay 40 or 50 per cent. more for labor here than England and compete in the same markets upon equal terms? How can we cross swords with England upon equal terms without reducing the price of our labor to an equality with the price of English labor?" That is the answer they make. This is the rock upon which they build their defense. These are the questions they put, and put them with such an air of foreboding evil as to alarm the workingman of the country. Here, Mr. Chairman, the issue is joined, and we should meet it face to face, fairly, frankly, and candidly.

There are some collateral, though important, views of this question which might be considered in this connection. For instance, less than 10 per cent. of our industrial population are engaged in industries which practically, or at least directly, receive any of the supposed benefits of the protective tariff. And, in any view of the question, it may be well doubted whether it is fair or just or wise to tax over 90 per cent. of our laboring people for the benefit of less than 10 per cent. It may be well doubted whether it is fair or just or wise to tax the farmer 47 per cent, on everything he buys in order that the wages of some other man, not a whit more deserving, may be increased; and it is poor consolation to the farmer whose house is mortgaged and whose wheat goes a-begging for a market at 50 cents per bushel, to be assured by that other man that he is indirectly benefited by the tariff affording him a better (?) home market than he would otherwise have.

But I do not propose to go into those phases of the question. I want to meet the issue point blank. I asked, Why can not we compete on equal terms with England? and I am answered, Because labor costs us more. Now, is that true? Does labor cost the American manufacturer more than it costs his English competitor? Unfortunately the statistics by which this question could be definitely settled are very incomplete and unsatisfactory. It is greatly to be hoped that the bill which recently passed the House to afford our accomplished Commissioner of Labor ample opportunities to extend his investigations at home and abroad and gather necessary data for the settlement of this question beyond dispute may become a law. As it now is, I say, the data is incomplete and unsatisfactory. Still, many material facts have been ascertained, and they justify me in saying that there is no truth in the claim of the American manufacturer that he pays more for labor than his English competitor.

There are two ways of stating the proposition. The protectionist's way of stating it is, that the American workman receives higher wages and gets more money during a week or a month or a year than the English workman. But my way of stating it is, that the American manufacturer does not pay more for his labor than the English manufacturer. I hope to make the distinction clear as I advance. I am not now inquiring whether the American or English workman is the better off. I am not now inquiring which receives the most money in a month or a year, nor as to the purchasing power of their wages in their respective countries. Those things belong to other phases of the question. The point I now make is that the cost of labor to the American manufacturer is less than to the English manufacturer, or, in other words, the labor cost to the American manufacturer on the products of his factories is less than the labor cost to the English manufacturer on similar products.

Every completed article which a manufacturer sends out from his shops or mills has cost him a certain sum. He paid so much for the raw material out of which the completed fabric was made. He has money invested in the machinery used in making the article, upon which he calculates interest, and for the wear and tear of his plant; and he pays so much for the labor employed in the work of construction. All these and other items of expense enter into the cost of production. A certain part of the cost of production is charged to labor. Now, is that labor cost on the manufactured products of America greater or less than the labor cost on similar products in England? That is the question. The American protectionist says he can not hold out against English competition, because wages are higher here than there.

But that is an evasion. It does not meet the real point at issue. I agree that ordinarily the American operative will earn more in a week or a month than the English operative in the same industry. I will admit that daily wages are higher here than there. The most reliable authorities agree that the average wages in America are about 50 per cent. higher than the average in England; that is, where an English operative would earn $8 in a week the American operative would earn $12. But how does that concern the manufacturer who employs this labor if, notwithstanding these larger earnings, he gets his fabrics made, completed, and ready for market at a less labor cost on the product itself than his English competitor? Naturally it may be asked how it is possible for the American manufacturer to obtain his goods at a less labor cost than his English competitor when the operative he employs to do the work receives $12 for a week's work—that is, from Monday morning to Saturday night—while the English operative receives but $8. Evidently to reach that result the American operative must work more hours during the week or turn out more or better work in the same period of time.

In point of fact he does all those things. He works more hours in the week, and does more work and better work in the same length of time. There is the key to this whole contention. First, I say, if the American operative earns more money in a week or a year than the English operative, he also works more hours; and secondly, he does more work, by reason of superior skill and ingenuity, in the same length of time.

In 1882, Mr. Carroll D. Wright, then chief of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics, made some comparisons between wages received by certain classes of wage-earners in Great Britain and in Massachusetts, and also as to the cost of living. Here is one case put by Mr. Wright. I quote from him:

Each family is supposed to consist of a four-loom cotton weaver, with wife and three children, two of the children working in the mill. In neither case is the wife supposed to work. The English weaver is a Lancashire operative, working fifty-six hours per week, and his two working children are half-timers. The Massachusetts weaver works sixty hours per week, and his two working children are employed thirty-two weeks in the year.

The Massachusetts weaver earns per week	$5.64
Two children in weave-room each average per week $2.33	4.66
Total income per week of the family		$10.30
The Lancashire weaver earns per week	5.28
Two children in weave-room, half-timers, each per week $0.84	1.68
Total income per week of the family		6.96
Excess of weekly income in Massachusetts		3.34

He also gives a comparison between cotton spinners in England and Massachusetts, from which it appears that the Massachusetts spinner and his two children earn per week $13.79, and the English spinner and his two children earn $9.72, or a difference of $4.07 per week in favor of the Massachusetts spinner. But it will be observed that the Massachusetts weaver and spinner each worked sixty hours, while the English weaver and spinner each worked only fifty-six hours, which is a difference of four hours per week in favor of the English operative. Four hours per week is equal to two hundred and eight hours per year, and two hundred and eight hours are equal to twenty-six working days of eight hours each, or a full month. The comparative difference in the time worked by the children is still more striking. The children are called half-timers; that is, work half the time. In England they worked two weeks over the half year, or twenty-eight weeks; but in Massachusetts the time they worked amounted to thirty-two weeks, or an excess over the English children of four weeks in a half year.

And so it runs through the whole list. The aggregate annual earnings of the American operatives are much larger than of the English operatives—the average being, as I have stated, about 50 per cent. larger; but the American operative invariably works longer in order to make a larger aggregate of earnings. I do not mean to say that American operatives do not absolutely receive more for the same length of time than English operatives, for they do receive more. For instance, in the case of a Massachusetts cotton spinner, given by Mr. Wright, he received $10.09 for sixty hours' work, or about 17 cents per hour; while the English spinner received $7.80 for 56 hours' work, or a little less than 14 cents per hour; and the difference in many lines of industry is still more marked. However, the difference in time does in part explain the difference in earnings. That is all I mean to say upon that point, and that much I do mean to say and insist upon.

Now, as to the second proposition. I affirm that the American operative, by reason of superior intelligence and skill, and by reason of the superior machinery he uses, does more work in the same length of time than the English operative. Man's productive capacity, on account of the improved machinery he uses, has multiplied to an almost incomprehensible extent. In a Report on the Factory System of the United States, issued in 1884, as a sort of appendix to the census, I find some interesting comparisons between what a man could do in the old days and now. For instance, a single average hand-loom weaver could weave from 42 to 48 yards of cotton shirting per week; while now the six power-looms which a single weaver in a factory can attend will produce 1,500 yards. On a hand-wheel a spinner could turn off 8 ounces of No. 10 cloth-yarn in ten hours, or 3 pounds per week, the mule spinner about 3,000 pounds in the same length of time. In the same connection it is stated that the machinery of 1884 had a productive power of at least 20 per cent. over the same class of machinery in use ten years before. This shows with what marvelous facility and rapidity our machinery is improved.

Now, this ought to be clear: that the price of labor may increase and at the same time the labor cost of the product decrease. If the hand-loom weaver who turned off 48 yards per week received $3 for his work, the 48 yards cost more for labor than the 1,500 yards turned off by machinery attended by a single weaver who received five times as much for his week's work. In this same census appendix of 1884 I find this statement: "The ratio of cost per pound for labor of common cotton cloth for the years 1828 and 1880 was as 6.77 to 3.31; wages being as 2.62 to 4.84."

In other words, while the labor cost of production decreased over 100 per cent. in fifty-two years, the wages of labor increased nearly 100 per cent.

Another thing ought to be clear, since it is the same thing differently stated: If the American manufacturer pays 50 per cent. more for labor than his English competitor, but at the same time gets 50 per cent. larger returns from that labor, then the labor cost of his production does not exceed that of his competitor. Now, what are the facts? In this connection I beg to quote somewhat extensively from the recent able speech of Mr. MILLS, who has utilized the available statistics upon this point, and has stated the case stronger than I would be able to do. He said:

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a statement found in the report of the United States Census. This is the report in reference to the wages in the manufacturing industries of the country, and I call special attention to a report of an ax-manufacturing establishment in Connecticut on page 158. This gentleman who makes the report compares the operations of his house from his books in 1840 with 1880. In steel fitting, in ax making, each operative turned out 600 pieces per day in 1840. In 1880 each operative turned out 1,250 pieces per day. Each operative received in 1840 24 cents per hundred pieces, and received in 1880 20 cents per hundred pieces. He earned in 1840 $1.44 a day, and in 1880, though he received less for each piece, he earned $2.50 per day.

Now, was the increase of the daily wages of these operatives due to the tariff? Let the manufacturer answer. He says: "The following table shows the results of labor-saving machinery, together with the increase in the efficiency of labor in the manufacture of axes, from 1840 to 1880." When I saw these tables, proving the principle so clearly presented and so strongly enforced by Mr. Atkinson, I went to our very able and efficient chief of labor, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, and asked him to have a table like this in the census report prepared, and to send an intelligent agent into some of the oldest houses in the country and get a statement from their books and send it to me, that I might see if there was a different result in other establishments. I now give you the testimony of those houses to add to the others.

There are here seven establishments. The first one is in Massachusetts. A comparison is instituted between 1849 and 1884, and the industry is cotton print cloth. Each operative made in 1849 in this factory 44¼ yards per day; in 1884 he made 98.2 yards, an increase of productive power of 120 per cent. What wages did he get? The average daily earnings of the laborer in 1849 were 65 cents, and in 1884 $1. His wages increased 50 per cent. The labor cost of the product decreased 32 per cent.

In that same establishment in 1849 the wages of weavers were 65 cents a day, and each man turned out 113 yards of cloth. In 1884 the wages had risen to $1.06, and each weaver turned out 273 yards of cloth.

In the second house, also in Massachusetts, manufacturing printed cloths, each laborer in 1850 produced 42 yards; in 1884 he produced 102 yards, an increase of 142 per cent. His earnings were 65 cents a day in 1850 and $1.05 in 1884. The increase in wages was 61 per cent. The decrease in the labor cost of the article was 33 per cent.

The third house, manufacturing sheeting, in Massachusetts, showed that each laborer in 1852 produced 41 yards, and in 1886 73 yards of cloth. His productive efficiency increased 77 per cent. His wages increased 49 per cent. The labor cost of the cloth decreased 15 per cent.

In the fourth house, in New Hampshire, manufacturing print cloth, each laborer in 1852 produced 42.5 yards, and in 1886 103 yards. The increase in productive capacity was 142 per cent. The increase in wages was 56.7 per cent., and the labor cost per yard decreased 35 per cent.

Without going all through these figures the facts as to each one of these houses show in every instance that the productive efficiency of the laborer had increased, and that corresponding with that the wages had increased and the cost of the product had decreased.

Now, then, the tariff had nothing to do with any of these results. During this time we had high tariffs and low tariffs, but whether high tariff or low tariff, or no tariff, the productive efficiency continued to increase, the multiplication of production by the power of machinery continued to increase, and wages rose with it, and the cost of the product sunk. So that the tariff conferred no benefit on the laborer; none whatever.

But now let us see what effect a reduction of the duties will have by letting in the goods of England and other foreign countries into our markets to compete with our people and to endanger the laborers of our country, as it is charged it will do. I say the same proposition for which I have been contending is demonstrated again when we compare the laborer of this country with the laborer of England. We produce cheaper than in England because a high rate of wages means low cost of product, and a higher rate of wages means lower cost of product, and the highest rate of wages means lowest cost of product.

Mr. Wright, Chief of the Labor Bureau, instituted a most painstaking examination into the rates of labor in England and Massachusetts a few years ago, and showed the rates of labor higher in this country than in England; 12 per cent. higher in cotton manufacture; 25 per cent. in the manufacture of woolens; 26 per cent. in iron and steel; 128 per cent. in boots and shoes. That would seem to indicate, according to the philosophy which has been taught in this country by protectionists for many years, that we are on the road to ruin because our rate of labor is higher than in England and other countries. But the reverse of that proposition is true, and the fact that the rate of wages is higher here than in England shows that England is distanced in the great industrial contest into which she has entered.

Now let me give you an instance here in boots and shoes. If we pay so much higher wages in producing boots and shoes, if the proposition we hear on the other side be true, we can not enter into any contest with Great Britain when we pay 128 per cent. higher wages than she does. Yet we import no boots and shoes at 30 per cent. duty from England. We make the cheapest boots and shoes and the finest made in the world. In that England can not contest with us; and the fact that the rate of wages is so much higher here than in England shows that she is far behind in the race.

Let us see. Here is a gentleman writing in Harper's Magazine in 1885, a very able article entitled "A pair of shoes." He takes the history of the hide from the cow and follows it through all its mutations into the finest products of manufacture.

Mr. Howard Newhall is the writer. He says:

"American ladies' shoes wholesaling at $1.50 per pair, cost for labor of making 25 cents. English ladies' shoes wholesaling at $1.50 per pair, cost for labor of making 34 cents. American men's shoes wholesaling at $2.60 per pair, cost for labor of making 33 cents. English men's shoes wholesaling at $2.60 per pair, cost for labor of making 50 cents. In the report of the Massachusetts bureau of statistics for 1884 the general average weekly wage in Massachusetts is given as 128.9 per cent. higher than in Great Britain. The general average weekly wage in Massachusetts is given as $11.63 per week, and in Great Britain $5.08."

Now, what is the solution of all this? What does it mean? In Massachusetts wages are 128.9 per cent. higher than they are in Great Britain, but the labor cost of a pair of ladies' shoes in Massachusetts is less than the labor cost of a like pair of shoes in Great Britain. The cost is 25 cents in Massachusetts against 34 cents in England. The labor cost of men's shoes in Massachusetts is 33 cents per pair; the labor cost of men's shoes in England is 50 cents. If our people are to be injured by the importation of English shoes into this country the English shoe must be produced at a lower cost than the American shoe; otherwise it can not take the market.

It is not the rates of wages in England and America respectively, $5.08 against $11.63, that we have to consider, but it is the labor cost of the pair of shoes. Now, the man holds the market who can sell his goods cheapest, and the man can sell cheapest who gets his goods at the lowest cost, and that is the man in Massachusetts. What, then, does this difference of wages mean, $11.63 per week in Massachusetts against $5.08 in England? It simply means increased productive efficiency; it means that the productive efficiency of the American workman engaged in this industry is greater than that of the British workman by 128.9 per cent.

A few years ago, in 1879, our English friends across the water took alarm about the growth and development of our cotton industry in the United States, and they sent an expert—a gentleman thoroughly conversant with the cotton business of England—to the United States to make a thorough and searching investigation into the whole business of cotton manufacture in this country, and to report to them whether their industry was imperiled by that of the United States. That gentleman went to New England, the seat of the cotton industry in this country. He made a thorough and searching investigation, and in every instance he showed that we could produce cotton goods at a lower labor cost than they could be produced at any point in Great Britain. I have here the tabular statement that he gave to his people when he returned.

The following are the rates of wages for weaving and spinning cloths in some of the principal districts of England and America, as shown by his report:

A piece 28 inches, 56 reeds, 14 picks (?), 60 by 56.58 yards, costs at Ashton-under Lyne, in England, 24.68 cents to weave; in Rhode Island it costs 16.82 cents. At Blackburn, in England, it costs 23.4 cents; at Providence, R. I., it costs 17.26 cents; at Stockport, England, 23.4 cents; at Fall River, 19.96 cents; at Hyde, England, 25.28 cents; at Lowell, 19.96 cents. In every instance the labor cost of the production of the cotton goods is lower here than in England. Now let us turn to the summary. At Fall River the wages in a pound of print cloth, about 7 yards, is 6.907 cents; at Lowell it is 6.882 cents; in Rhode Island it is 6.422; in Pennsylvania, 6.44; in England, 6.96 cents. In every place in the United States, in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, the labor cost of producing a pound of print cloth was lower than at any point in England.

I hope my distinguished friend from Texas will pardon me for reading so much of his speech. The point I want to make is so well elaborated by him that when I begin to read it I hardly know when to stop.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it be true that the labor cost of our manufactured products is less than the labor cost of similar products in England, notwithstanding higher wages here, why would a reduction in tariff taxation necessitate a reduction in wages? If English wages should continue the same, the labor cost of English manufactures would continue the same; and if American wages continued the same, the labor cost of American manufactures would continue the same. A reduction in the tariff would not affect the efficiency or productive capacity of our labor. We could go on paying the same wages and getting the same results. We could go on paying higher wages and getting our products at a less labor cost. There would be no absolutely necessary or probable reduction in anything, except in the cost of raw materials, and in the enormous profits which the protective tax enables the home manufacturer to squeeze out of the home consumer. That is the whole of it; that is the end of the chapter. If the protectionist can not make his labor argument good, if it is without foundation in fact, then he has no solid ground under his feet.

Mr. Chairman, how does the matter now stand? What are the relative advantages and disadvantages of the American and English manufacturers? Let us see. The American has cheaper fuel, better mechanics, better machinery, a better home market, and gets the products of his factories completed and prepared for market at a less labor cost. The Englishman has but one advantage, he gets cheaper raw material. But that advantage he has over us by reason of these very protective tariff laws. Modify your laws so as to equalize us in that respect, and every advantage would be upon our side.

Mr. Chairman, again, and for the last time, I ask, why can not we compete with England upon equal terms? Why not reduce taxation since, confessedly, the Government does not need the money, and thereby avert the manifold evils of a redundant Treasury, leave the surplus in the pockets of the people who earned it and who need it, and, at the same time, cheapen the cost of consumption and lessen the expense of living? Sir, I marvel why it is that all the world stands in awe of free-trade England. We build a wall around our land, professedly to protect us against the cheaper labor of England; while France and Germany build a similar wall to protect them from the dearer labor of England. England seems to be a sort of commercial monster—the Old Man of the Sea—in whose presence all the world trembles. Her European neighbors have thrown protective tariffs in her pathway; notwithstanding, it is everywhere admitted the English artisan and mechanic are the best paid of any in all the great commercial countries of Europe.

But why is it that the brave, enterprising, matchless people of this great Republic should tremble with servile fear and whine in the presence or shrink dwarfish before the haughty glance of England? The gentleman from Michigan unblushingly compares us to Holland and England to the mighty sea. He says we had as well say to the Hollander, "Why not take down the dikes, the sea has not come in for a hundred years," as to say to the American people, "Why not take off your tariff, England has not mastered you for thirty years?" He says the Hollander would reply, "The sea has not come in because of the dikes," and he answers that England has not come in because of the tariff.

It is pitiful that we have sunk to such depths of pusillanimity. Why should we, who are greater in all things, be afraid of England? Who has taught us this lesson in cowardice? The American manufacturers, who rob the American consumers under the false pretense of protecting labor, and cover us with this humiliation that thrift may follow shame.

Mr. Chairman, I am rejoiced that this agitation before the people has assumed a form so positive and aggressive. The eyes of the people are opening to the truth. The farmers are beginning to learn that they are paying enormous taxes not required for any public purpose, and bearing burdens that do not even inure to the benefit of that labor on whose account it is said to be imposed, but goes to swell the princely fortunes of manufacturers.

The laborers in the protected industries are also beginning to learn that the tariff is not the anchor of their hope, that it is not an unstinted blessing. A well-founded suspicion is beginning to creep in upon them that may be, after all the pretensions put forth from year to year by the protectionists with an ever-increasing grandiloquence of flourish, the tariff may be an unmitigated evil in cunning disguise. They are beginning to learn that wages do not depend upon the tariff, but upon other causes in no sense connected with the tariff—causes I hope to find an opportunity to discuss before the close of this session.

The tariff regulates wages! Why, sir, if that were true wages in the same industries ought to be relatively the same in all the States of the Union; but, as was shown the other day by the eloquent gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], who gave a large number of illustrations drawn from official sources, wages in exactly the same industries vary in adjoining States from 10 to 60 per cent. There is another significant fact that while the tendency of the tariff has been upward the tendency of wages has been downward. Since the war the tariff has advanced from 40 to over 47 per cent., but wages have not increased, although the tariff was raised ostensibly for the benefit of labor. On the contrary, I repeat, the wages of labor have depreciated. This fact will be made manifest by the most casual examination of the twentieth volume of the Tenth Census, where the wages paid the different classes of employés during each year from 1870 to 1880 are given. For instance, I find that a certain rolling-mill establishment in Pennsylvania, given at page 223, has furnished the following table:

This table might be repeated ad infinitum in regard to almost every class of manufactures. I give it as a fair sample of the whole. Compare the wages therein given between the years 1872 and 1880, and it will be found that there is a large decrease, no matter whether the wages are for the day or for the turn. You may run all through these census tables and you will find that it makes no difference whether the wages are given for the day, week, month, year, ton, piece, or job, the same prevailing rule of decrease obtains.

There is another thing that labor must learn. If it be true that the tariff, taken as a whole, increases the cost of raw material, then labor must bear the burden of that additional cost. Let me illustrate. A manufacturer in England and a manufacturer in Massachusetts are competitors in the same business. Let us suppose that fuel cost them the same, that they have the same amount invested in their plants, and that the labor cost of their productions are the same; but let us also suppose that raw material cost the Massachusetts manufacturer 50 per cent. or 100 per cent. more than the English manufacturer. Now, the Massachusetts manufacturer can not take his more costly product to South America, or elsewhere, and compete with the English manufacturer in the same market. To do that he must in some way reduce the cost of production to him. But he can not reduce the cost of fuel, because he does not control that; he buys that from the operator in coal-mines. He can not reduce the amount he has invested, nor the wear and tear of his machinery. There is but one other thing to do. He must reduce the price of labor so as to make good the difference in the higher cost of material. Again: Here is an article manufactured in Massachusetts. The raw material out of which it was made cost the manufacturer $2. He also paid $2 for the labor he employed in its construction. The combined cost to the manufacturer for labor and material was $4. Suppose the tariff on the material to be 100 per cent., then half the cost of material was paid in the way of taxes. Take the tax off, and the material could be laid down at the factory for $1 instead of $2. Let the same labor be employed at the same price in converting the material into the manufactured article, and it would cost completed $3 instead of $4. The extra dollar could be given to labor without increasing the total cost of production; or it could be divided between the laborer and consumer, thus increasing the wages of labor and reducing the cost of consumption; or, in this way, the Massachusetts manufacturer could meet the English manufacturer in foreign markets as an equal competitor without requiring labor to surrender any of its earnings.

There is another important lesson the laborers are beginning to learn, that the tariff increases the cost of living to them as well as to other people, and that if they earn more money in a week it costs them more to live. I have before me some illustrations furnished by Mr. Carroll D. Wright. I will take the example of the cotton-spinner, which I used some time ago, to illustrate the difference in wages received in England and Massachusetts. Mr. Wright also made a careful, though partial, estimate of the cost of living in the two countries. Here is his estimate:

Each family is supposed to consume the following, the same being the weekly subsistence of an English operative's family of the size under consideration, presented in the Progress of Manchester by D. Chadwick, of the British Association, revised by Dr. Watts, and quoted by Leone Levi in Work and Pay (London, 1877), page 129. The English prices are based upon rates current in Lancashire from the report of Consul Shaw, before alluded to, December, 1881, and from other official sources. The Massachusetts prices are average rates current in said State January 1, 1882.

Prices and quantities consumed per week.	Retail cost at Blackburn, England.	Retail cost in Massachusetts.
Bread, 8 four-pound loaves	$1.20	$1.28
Corn-meal, ¼ peck	.22	.22
Flour, 6 pounds	.26	.27
Fresh meat, 5 pounds	.95	.80
Bacon, 2 pounds	.36	.40
Potatoes, 40 pounds	.40	.84
Milk, 7 quarts	.42	.42
Vegetables	.12	.12
Coffee, Java, ¼ pound	.16	.16
Tea, ¼ pound	.12½	.15
Sugar, 3 pounds	.24	.30
Rice, 2 pounds	.08	.20
Butter, 1 pound	.30	.33
Molasses, 1 quart	.12	.16
Soap, 1¼ pounds	.10	.10
Coal	.36	.62½
Oil	.12	.10
Rent, five rooms	1.20	1.50
Total, per week	6.73½	7.99½

That is to say, it would cost the family in Blackburn to live, not including sundries and clothing, $6.73½; while the family in Massachusetts, consuming the same things and the same quantities, would expend $7.99½; extra expense in Massachusetts per week, $1.26. I have previously shown the excess of weekly income in Massachusetts to be $1.07; net excess after deducting $1.26, the extra weekly expenditure of the family in Massachusetts, $2.81. The family of the Blackburn spinner would have for sundries and clothing, after providing for the items specified in previous table, $2.98½, while the Massachusetts family would have for the same purpose, $5.79½. I believe this statement to be as fair and as just as it is possible to make it.

That is to say, at the end of a week, after paying rents and grocery-bills, the English operative would have $2.98½, and the Massachusetts operative $5.79½, with which to buy clothing and pay other expenses. The difference would be $2.81 per week, or $146.12 per year. That is a considerable item to the workingman. But then we know that all the medium and better grades of clothing are much higher here than in England. I have talked with many gentlemen who have had suits made in London for $25 that would cost them $45 here. Here are some comparative prices of goods marked "medium high," in Massachusetts and Great Britain:

Of course the difference in prices will vary according to the quality of the goods. The very cheapest qualities are frequently lower here than in England; but "medium," "medium high," and "high" are invariably much more expensive here than there.

In the fifteenth annual report of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics the total family expenses in Massachusetts are estimated to be 48.41 per cent. greater than in Great Britain. So that when we come to look at all the phases of this question, the workmen of America have no such advantages as need to excite them into a state of ecstasy. Somebody is growing rich, and is still growing richer, out of the tariff; but it is not the industrial classes. Sir, I have heard a great deal said about the prosperous and happy condition of our workmen under the protective tariff. Capital, I grant, has been prosperous; but has labor? A manufacturing enterprise is a joint undertaking, a sort of partnership between employer and employé. The employer puts in his capital, the employé his labor. How have the profits of the enterprise been divided?

Has labor or capital received the benefit of the tariff? Turn to page 15 of the second volume of the Census for 1880, and you will find this statement: "Number of manufacturing establishments, 251,104; capital invested, $2,775,412,345; number of hands employed, 2,718,805; total amount of wages paid, $941,325,925; value of all materials used, $3,381,701,277; value of the manufactured products, $5,341,838,890."

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us analyze this a little. The total value of the manufactured product was $5,341,838,890. The raw material cost $3,381,701,277. Subtract the raw material from the value of the manufactured product, and it will leave $1,960,137,613 to be divided between labor and capital. How was it divided? Labor got $941,325,925, and capital got $1,018,811,688, or $77,485,763 more than labor.

If you will divide the $941,325,925 among the 2,718,805 employés (which embraces all hands, men, women, and children) you will find that it will average $346.25. That is what labor received. But the $2,775,412,345 invested by the employers of that labor received $1,018,811,688, which is nearly 37 per cent. on the investment. What other legitimate investments in this country reap any such magnificent returns? And yet all this is done in the name of labor! What does the farmer think of it, whose land is depreciating in value, and whose investment, labor hard as he may with brawn and brain, will not pay him 6 per cent.?

What do the laborers in the shops think of it, whose names are used to bolster up this robbery? What do the operatives of Massachusetts and the artisans of Illinois think of it, who are compelled to take their children from the school-room and their wives from their homes to aid in earning a bare subsistence? If you will turn to the tables given on page 464 of the fifteenth annual report of the Massachusetts bureau of statistics, made in 1884, you will find that the average expenses of workingmen's families in that State were $754.42, while the earnings of workmen who were heads of families averaged $558.68, or nearly $200 less than their expenses. To make up the deficit the workman is compelled to take his wife from home and his children from school to aid in earning a meager support. Accordingly we find that at that time there were engaged in the manufactures and mechanical industries of that State 28,714 children under sixteen years of age, and that nearly 33 per cent. of the support of the workingman's family fell on the mother and children.

The census of 1880 discloses the fact that at that date there were 1,118,356 children, fifteen years of age and under, employed in various occupations in the United States. In a recent report of the Illinois commissioners of labor statistics they say that their table of wages and cost of living are representative only of intelligent workingmen who make the most of their advantages, and do not reach—> the confines of that world of helpless ignorance and destitution in which multitudes in all large cities continually live, and whose only statistics are those of epidemics, pauperism, and crime.

Nevertheless, they go on to say, an examination of these tables will demonstrate that one-half of these intelligent workingmen of Illinois—> are not even able to earn enough for their daily bread, and have to depend upon the labor of women and children to eke out their miserable existence.

Similar statistics exhibit similar conditions in other States. I was recently appointed by the Speaker as one of a committee sent up into the coal-mines of Pennsylvania to investigate the labor troubles there. Tens of thousands of men were out of employment because they could not get living wages. The coal barons have amassed enormous fortunes, some estimated as high as $50,000,000, while the fifty thousand men whose labor created those fortunes were pinched with hunger and shivering with cold. The general superintendent of one of the largest mining corporations operating there, employing ten thousand men, said under oath to the committee that the strike was about ended; that the men would be compelled to return to work in a short time. When asked what would compel them, he naively responded, "Their necessities."

Mr. Chairman, I hope to find an opportunity to tell the House and the country something about what I saw in Pennsylvania before this Congress adjourns, and to make some suggestions for the relief of those wretched and destitute people. The venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is perpetually and eternally harping about negro slavery in the South twenty-five years ago. Sir, that is ancient history. He had as well declaim against the butchery of the Roman amphitheater or the pompous brutality of the Roman conquerors in dragging their prisoners through the streets of their capital; he had as well inveigh against the coarse barbarity of the feudal system, or any other antiquated event. It does no good, and comes with ill grace from a man whose own State tolerates the most degrading and hopeless slavery known in this country.

Why, sir, to hear these advocates of protection one is almost persuaded that our laboring people are as prosperous and as happy as mortals need to be. But when I turn from their glowing pictures to the unadorned facts gathered by the patient industry of the statistician, and go personally from the farm to the mine, and from the mine to the shop, instead of finding light hearts and happy smiles, I find the lips drawn tight as if to suppress the storm whose coming is masked by the frown upon the brow; and instead of hearing the jocund song of prosperous content I hear the complaining voice of discontent and deep-breathed mutterings that menace the public peace.

Sir, while capital invested in manufactures is earning 37 per cent. under the tariff, labor is sinking lower and lower in want, wretchedness, degradation, and squalor. We have prospered, they say, under the tariff. Yes, in the aggregate we have grown dangerously rich. We are the youngest nation and the richest in the world. But our wealth has not been a blessing. Our whole economic system is wrong. We run wild over the amazing and bewildering figures which are given us as representing our national growth in the aggregate, without stopping to reflect that under the operation of our economic policies this new created wealth, instead of being scattered and disseminated among the millions who created it, is being concentrated in comparatively a few hands, thus building up thousands of the largest private fortunes ever known to the history of the world.

There is no lack of wealth, but there is a woful lack of just distribution. I saw a recent well-authenticated statement that in the city of New York there are thirty men whose aggregate annual income is estimated at $150,000,000. That is to say, of the wealth created in this Republic each year, thirty men in one city absorb $150,000,000. Now, there is a law of that State applicable to the city of New York, which requires that a man must be worth $250 in real or personal property before he is eligible to serve as a juror in that city. A recent report of the jury commissioner reveals the startling fact that there are seventy thousand voters in the city of New York ineligible for jury duty under the property qualification to which I have referred. If these voters are heads of families, then there are seventy thousand families averaging, say, five members, with less than $250 each, and that in a city where thirty other voters are receiving an annual income from the productive industries of the country of $150,000,000. One thousand dollars will support an ordinary family with tolerable comfort for a year. We have already seen that that is nearly twice the average earnings of workmen who are the heads of families in Massachusetts. One hundred and fifty million dollars would supply $1,000 to each of one hundred and fifty thousand families of five persons, and thus comfortably support seven hundred and fifty thousand people. Any industrial system which creates such conditions and makes such results as these possible, is radically and fatally defective.

Mr. Chairman, I fear I have already extended my observations beyond all reasonable limit, and certainly far beyond what I at first intended. I started out to show—

1. That the cost of any article upon which a tariff tax is levied is increased thereby to the consumer.

2. That under the present law we are annually collecting millions from the people which the Government does not need, thereby congesting the circulating medium in the Federal Treasury, bringing disorder into our whole commercial system, and inciting the public authorities to schemes of extravagance and corruption.

3. That the American manufacturers have no just reason to fear competition from the manufacturers of any other nation on earth.

4. That the tariff does not advance wages to our workmen, but on the contrary imposes burdens for which it affords no compensating advantage.

5. That the protective tariff, as the chief factor of a vicious economic system, results in concentrating the wealth of the nation in comparatively a few hands, thereby creating a merciless moneyed aristocracy with enormous and dangerous powers, while the masses of the people, poor and discontented, are compelled to wage a hard battle for shelter, food, and clothing, and to earn enough to pay their tribute to the privileged lords of the factory.

I believe, sir, I have accomplished my purpose, and now, with one additional observation, I will have concluded my contribution to this discussion.

Mr. Chairman, defeated on every fair field of argument, the protectionist invariably begs the question. He asserts, what everybody admits, that, taken as a whole, the Republic has prospered in a remarkable degree during the last twenty years and during the dominance of the protective policy—that is to say, the aggregate increase of wealth has been phenomenal. He points to the fact that in 1860 our total wealth was valued at $16,159,616,068, while in 1880 it had increased to $43,642,000,000. With great grandiloquence of assertion he claims all this as the natural and legitimate fruit of protection, and congratulates the country that while we were eighty years, up to 1860, accumulating $16,159,616,068, we added to that in twenty years, from 1860 to 1880, $27,482,383,932, making the total of $43,642,000,000, and thereupon he warns the country against new experiments. It is a sort of ad captandum argument, which is not true in its deductions, and would mean nothing if it was.

To say we would not have grown enormously in wealth in the same period under a purely revenue tariff would be foolish. No sensible man would say that. To say our growth would have been more or less under the one system or the other would be to say something which would rest entirely in mere assertion. The truth is, the per cent. of our increase was larger from 1850 to 1860 than during any other decade of our history. An examination of the census tables shows that the increase from 1850 to 1860 was 126 per cent.; from 1860 to 1870, 93 per cent.; from 1870 to 1880, 45 per cent. The aggregate increase from 1850 to 1860 was less, but the per cent. was greater.

This growth is not confined to the protected industries. Since 1860 our population has nearly doubled, although the per cent. of increase was no greater than from 1850 to 1860. The eyes of all mankind have been turned upon our country. Its wonderful natural advantages have become known. We have a free people and a stable government—a country blessed with individual liberty and immense opportunity. Millions have come to us from the crowded populations of the old world and brought with them their wealth and willing hands. Great cities have sprung up as if by magic. The spirit of enterprise has gone out in search of wealth, and mines of all kinds and of inestimable value have been discovered and developed in all sections of the country. Railroads and telegraph lines have been built in every neighborhood. Machinery has increased the productive capacity of agriculture, and the industry of agriculture itself has increased in volume, multiplying the number of farms and extending their area almost beyond conception.

New States have been born in the midst of barbarous solitudes and grown to great commonwealths since 1860. New industries, demanded by the necessities and exigencies of our social, commercial, and industrial conditions, have been founded and have added their contributions to the general wealth. Sir, we have grown with magical rapidity, and we will continue to grow for many years to come. According to recent figures there is in France a population of 180.88 to the square mile; in Germany 216.62; in England and Wales, 428.67; in Belgium, 481.71; in the United States, excluding Alaska, 16.88. Dr. Strong estimates that if our population were as dense as that of France we would have, this side of Alaska, 527,000,000; if as dense as Germany, 643,000,000; if as dense as that of England and Wales, 1,173,000,000; if as dense as that of Belgium, 1,430,000,000. We could put the 50,000,000 inhabitants we had according to the census of 1880 all in Texas and the population would not be as dense as that now in Germany. Put them in Dakota and the population would not be as dense as that of England and Wales. Place them in New Mexico and the density of population would not be as great as that of Belgium.

It is also calculated that those 50,000,000 might all be comfortably sustained in Texas. After allowing, say, 50,000 square miles for "desert," Texas could have produced all our food crops in 1879—grown, as we have seen, on 164,214 square miles of land—could have raised the world's supply of cotton, 12,000,000 bales, at 1 bale to the acre, on 19,000 square miles, and then have had remaining for a cattle range a territory larger than the State of New York. With such a startling array of known facts, and with such bewildering possibilities, who can say what we might have achieved except for the obstructing incubus of a protective tariff! Of one thing I do feel assured: that whether we had gathered more or less in the aggregate, our increase in wealth, whatever it may have been, would have been more universally distributed among the people except for the protective tariff and its associate economic evils, and the result would have been a greater diversification of prosperity and a larger number of happy homes.

Many plausible arguments can be urged in support of the notion that protection has really retarded our growth. But, however that may be, certain it is that no considerable proportion of it can be justly attributed to protection. The United States has not been the only prosperous nation during these same eventful years. Free-trade England, and all the world, for that matter, have kept step to the same music of industrial progress. Mr. Gladstone, the great English statesman, recently made this astounding declaration: That in the first fifty years of this century as much was added to the wealth of the world as was added to it in the whole of the Christian era preceding, covering eighteen centuries full of great events; and that an equal amount was produced in the twenty years from 1850 to 1870. He estimates that the manufacturing power of the world is doubled by reason of the increased productive capacity of machinery in every period of seven years. In Ralph Waldo Emerson's work entitled English Traits I find this statement:

> The power of machinery in Great Britain, in mills, has been computed to be equal to 600,000,000 of men, one man being able, by the aid of steam, to do the work which required 250 men to accomplish fifty years ago.

That is to say, the machinery of Great Britain alone has a productive capacity equal to that of the entire adult population of all the earth.

An English work by Dr. P. Gaskell, entitled "Artizans and Machinery," discussing the advance of physico-mechanical science in Great Britain, says:

> Machines have been invented which enable one man to produce as much yarn as 250, or 300 even, could have produced seventy years ago—which enables one man and one boy to print as many goods as a hundred men and a hundred boys could have printed formerly. The 150,000 in the spinning mills produce as much as could have been produced by 40,000,000 with the one-thread wheel.

According to the same basis of calculation the machinery of Massachusetts alone has a productive capacity equal to 100,000,000 of men, or twice as many men as we had of total population in 1880.

The ratio of consumption has kept pace with the increased power of production. Dr. Gaskell in his work says:

> When this new career (adaptation of mechanism) commenced, about the year 1770, the annual consumption of cotton in English manufactures was under 4,000,000 of pounds' weight, and that of the whole of Christendom was probably not more than 10,000,000. Last year the consumption in Great Britain and Ireland was about 270,000,000 pounds.

Mr. Chairman, the most casual examination into the line of thought which I have here suggested will expose the utter fallacy of the pretension that the marvelous expansion and development of our resources, and the consequent accumulation of wealth, are the result of a protective tariff; or that the same results would not have occurred if there had been no tariff. The pretense is too transparent. It is the poorest species of begging. It is utterly ridiculous.

We are upon the verge of the most important political contest of the century. The privileged classes will employ every possible artifice to mislead, and will strain every nerve to the utmost tension to wrest victory from the common people that they may continue to thrive at public expense and exact tribute from the hard hand of honest toil. What the result may be no man can tell.

The pending bill is a moderate measure. If it should pass the tax remaining would average 40 per cent. Violent or radical changes should not be suddenly made. For twenty-five years the business of the country has been adjusted on the basis of protection. The Democratic party does not propose any radical disturbance of existing conditions. There is no reason for any uneasiness. We simply propose to assert the right of the people who pay the taxes to levy them, and then gradually to make such modifications of the tariff as will be just to all interests and reduce the volume of taxation to the needs of the Government.

Against this reasonable demand the Republican party makes war in the interest of the manufacturer. The President, speaking for the taxpayers, has challenged the forces of monopoly and privilege to battle upon this issue. His message was the bravest bugle blast that has been blown for many years. It rang out like the inspiring call of a great chieftain when liberty is in peril. Already there is terrific thundering in the index. A month hence the storm will break and rage with increasing fury until truth and right shall triumph in November or be beaten down by the victorious arms of an aristocracy made omnipotent by the power of money.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to deliver a lecture on political economy.

Nor, sir, will I glorify the potency of free trade or of high protection. The man who makes an idol of either the one or the other falls into a mistake, as all men do who wander after strange gods.

There is only one true faith, and that is the happiness of the American people.

If the highest of tariffs will make them happier, I am for the highest tariffs. If the broadest free trade will make them happier, I am for the broadest free trade. I will vote for either one or the other, according to the exigency of the hour, when the hour comes. But this is not the hour of free trade. No man proposes free trade. No party will vote for it, no party desires it.

In my judgment the bill now under consideration is not a free-trade bill. I do not say it is the best bill which could be drawn. I do not pledge myself in advance to vote for it. I shall have some amendments to offer to it. I shall watch the stages of its perfection with proper interest and with proper conscientiousness. I admit that I shall watch them in a friendly spirit, because I believe the bill is an honest endeavor to meet a public necessity.

Sir, we are not here to legislate in the interest of fortunes, but in the interest of men. If annihilation of every millionaire in the land would save a workingman one drop of sweat or add one comfort to the farmer's hearth, I would vote for that annihilation. If their continued existence would make better wages, better homes, better citizens, I would vote against the annihilation.

Millionaires are the luxuries of society. We must not gorge the body-politic with them. A very few of them are enough. What a man produces should not be greater than the man himself; yet the precise danger in our modern civilization is that lands and machines, bonds and stocks, bank-bills and coin, instead of being servants, are the masters.

Now, sir, this is an occasion when the point is sharply raised, what shall we do for the labor of the country?

The great fortunes are in no danger. Even your wicked fortunes are safe. Your Goulds still scourge the world. Your anthracite miners still transmute their sweat-soaked grime into diamond drops for their masters. Every toiler in the workshop, every laborer on the street, in the sewers, on the railways, every son of honest toil who fights against poverty, is underpaid. The farmers North and South, with their wheat and their cotton, still supply the surplus in our foreign trade, and wait with a patience almost divine for the day when they shall cease to "hew wood and draw water" for the enrichment of men already too rich for the peace of their souls and the good of their country. Strike follows after strike, lockout after lockout, boycott after boycott, black-list after black-list. Sir, we have been in a sort of civil war; a battle between labor and capital; a war which may lull for a time, but its fires are only banked.

I do not exaggerate. I do not even draw the picture of social discontent in its naked proportions. I accuse no one of being the author of it. I only say it is here—a living, portentous fact. It bursts forth in riot. It evolves the shameful spectacle of military force arrayed against our own flesh and blood. It blossoms in the fruit of the gallows at Chicago. It cries aloud in the wreck and riot of Pittsburgh. It moans with covered head by the cold hearths of the anthracite miners.

It is all-pervading—a menace to peace, an apostle of anarchism, communism, and irreligion.

Sir, the labor of the country feels that it is in a death struggle. The laboring men know that they are losing caste socially, and they have organized for business and political protection.

Are they fools? Are they mere agitators? Is all the wisdom of the world in the heads of men who know the tricks of the stock market, or who have the uncanny gift of outwitting every man with whom they deal, the very gift of the devil?

The laboring people are sore pressed and the devil's dance of extravagance and fashion we see around us here daily; of imported airs, of "rings and things," of footmen and liveries, and of all of aristocracy which is mean, and of rank which is ridiculous, is filling their hearts with honest rage.

If fine paternal words could assuage their discontent we would soon have peace and slavery; but who are to speak those words? The rich men lately from the spade and pick, they and their women, do not appear to the poor folks as gods and goddesses. They throng every capital of Europe to be sneered at and plundered. They swarm in our own land like the rack-renters of Ireland. They enter these halls and their servants are ready to do their bidding.

I am not inveighing against wealth. I respect the enterprise and thrift which raise men to comfort. It may be that colossal fortunes are economic necessities, evils to be endured for the sake of some greater good, evils which may be curbed by wise legislation inimical to their perpetuity, or by the profligacy or inanity of heirs, who can neither make nor hold. That which a man hath honestly earned, let him honestly keep and honestly use, but let him earn, keep, and use it by his own force, his own goodness, and not by special legislation, by the highway robbery of the stock-exchange, by the grinding of the face of labor, by high tariffs for transportation on farmers' products, by trusts, combines, and forestalling, and by unearned profits.

I know, sir, there are too many millionaires in the land and too few men of modest competency. I know that the Chinaman, with his abomination, cheapens labor on the Pacific coast; that non-resident Canadian aliens swarm on our northern frontier and eat the bread of a country they will not defend in war; that the stripes of the convict, the social beast of prey, have become the passport to competition with honest labor. I know that corporations govern some States, are insolent in all States, and that nearly every industry, save that of the laborer and the farmer, assumes the form of corporate charters, the form which knows no comfort save dollars and cents; no sentiment save unconscionable interest.

I know that there is no longer the wheelwright, the blacksmith, and the cobbler on the four corners. I know that machinery is taking the place of handicraft; that cities, the ulcers of civilization, are increasing in size and number throughout the land; I know that we are breeding, by forced processes, a dangerous class, and that to-day, at the end of our first century, we are face to face with every problem which other nations have inherited as part of their decay.

I ask gentlemen on both sides of the House, how long can this last?

Remember, our workingmen are voting men. They are rulers in the land. The property of every Crœsus depends upon their intelligence. You can not strip them of the franchise and rule them with a standing army. That would be the end of free government, the outcome of a tempest, which would wither fortune and life, confiscate property, crush corporations, throttle all opposition, and spend itself in a slavery which would engulf all men in despotism.

Gentlemen who sneer at this mistake the age. It has been the misfortune, sometimes the vice, of rulers that they could not see. The profligacy, the poverty, the oppression which preceded the French Revolution only called forth from Sybarites the utterance that "it would last their time."

But the condition of affairs in this country would not last the time of any of us if the working people had not hope from the ballot.

Well, sir, have I exaggerated the condition of affairs? No man whose heart and eyes are open will say that I have. How are you to meet it? With long tables which an unlearned man can not calculate, proving that high tariff or free trade is the panacea?

You can not by sums in arithmetic make a man believe he is comfortable when he is starving. You may scatter these tables broadcast, but they will be ointment for no sore.

The voice of labor will still shout forth its complaint—still clamor its needs, still thunder that mathematics do not answer its demand. Something is wrong in this land of ours. The laboring men tell us so. They ought to know their own necessity.

Whether, sir, high tariff or free trade will be the corrective, is a problem, varying with the factors which enter it. It changes its aspects with the seasons. What may be beneficial in the spring may be hurtful in the fall. England founded her greatness in protection. She has maintained it by free trade. On every question, save one, she has been practical, wise, and that is her treatment of Ireland. For years she protected her industries by invidious restrictions on the industries of Ireland; but with Ireland free, with the United States mistress of the sea, when our factories shall run full time, she may again erect a wall around her coast.

Sir, the conditions under which our present system of tariff grew up do not exist to day. The South was then our customer; she is now our rival. She will demand a share of whatever prosperity may be derived from the system. How can you say no to her? Her industries will be largely like ours, and compared to ours they will be "infant industries." The emancipation of the slaves added millions to the ranks of labor. They must be cared for, protected, employed. The mass of them will join the ranks of discontent unless constant employment at decent wages is afforded them. Their very number forces them to be an important element in the labor question.

What are we to do with all these working people, white and black? They can not live on tariff speeches. They can not be independent, useful citizens if they do not earn a decent living.

Sir, we are not legislating for to-day. We are discounting the future. The centuries of a nation's history are only one life; our pride, our reason, our patriotism, the solicitude which flows from man even to his remote descendants, bid us to be wise and unselfish. I will receive no measure from any committee on faith. I am glad, very glad, that in the great freedom of the Democratic party no such faith is a partisan test.

What is proposed here is not free trade. It is reduction of taxation, but, sir, protection still remains. The free-list is enlarged, but duties enough are left on most other articles to protect them. If those duties are not high enough, if the free-list is too great or too small, we will ascertain it when we come to amend the bill.

The great benefit claimed from a high tariff is that it enhances wages. Have we not had such a tariff? Does it not exist now? Why is labor discontented; why is its chief complaint low wages? According to the protection theory our workingmen should be the happiest in the world, yet, sir, I observe that the best that can be said for them is that they are better paid than laborers in Europe—better paid than "pauper labor."

I observe, too, on all sides of this House, that the law of supply and demand is applied as ruthlessly to these beings with souls as to dumb brutes—as if the great necessity of men is not their manhood, as if that is not always a factor in the question of their earnings; but, sir, under this law of supply and demand, the voice of their manhood cries to us. "Supply and demand does not satisfy our needs; your supply and demand is bottomed on some false basis. It is not a supply and demand which gives us and our children the comforts of life. It is the sort of supply and demand which will do for people who go without meat or are content to live on black bread, or rats." If they are right, if this is so, what kind of a supply and demand have we? Do our mills run every working day in the year? Do our people produce all that they can produce—make all the money which full time represents?

What is the trouble? Is our tariff too high or too low? Frankly, it would seem to a common mind that we have had protection enough to bring about an industrial millennium, but I hardly think any millennium will be characterized by people crying for higher wages. Is it not barely possible that the day of high protection is gone and that the infant, grown to manhood, can walk alone?

But, sir, the bill of the committee does not break down protection. It essays to meet an abnormal condition of the national Treasury. We have too much money there; more than we need; more than is wholesome; so much that men are racking their brains what to spend it for. Will any one pretend that this is a desirable condition of affairs? Both the great political parties have said it is not desirable; both have pledged themselves to revenue reduction as the means of stopping this accretion of barren money in the Federal vaults.

And, sir, there is no other way of doing it. Taxes must be cut off in some direction. I know that this is a difficult thing to do. So many interests are involved that it is hard to say where to begin, where to end. Some gentlemen demand the repeal of internal taxation. Yet large classes who pay that tax object. Our people on the northern frontier want free lumber and building stone, free bituminous coal, free rice, free ship-building materials. The druggists wish the retail liquor-dealers' tax taken off. I speak now for the people of my own district. Some of them say that the bill lowers the duty on glass, on rails, and other articles too much; that it destroys the linseed-oil industry. It is plain that there is a great difference of opinion. The fine-cut tobacco men in my district deem the repeal of the tax on their production injurious; yet gentlemen from Kentucky think it right.

Our South Carolina friends wish to keep the duty on rice, but the brewers of the Northwest wish it taken off. I suppose my New England friends object to free building-stone; but the workingmen of my district demand it; and the dairymen instruct me to vote for free salt, yet there is great opposition to free salt. The great need, then, is to so reduce taxation that no industry shall be destroyed and no State or section be forced to bear too much of the burden of reduction.

Now, sir, what are we to do? We have no minority bill before us. The gentlemen on the other side from Minnesota and Pennsylvania have not come to an agreement. They leave us in the dark.

But, sir, the country demands action; both political parties have promised action, and the Democratic majority of the committee are trying to fulfill the promise their party made to the country. If they have made mistakes, let us correct them. I have no doubt that many a political sun will sink before this matter is determined; but what of that? There are old and young on this floor, but what are their lives compared to the life of the nation? I know how strong the zeal of party is, but I hope that every man here yearns to do his duty patriotically. I am not one of those who have no patience with their opponents. I would burn with shame if I believed that any gentleman is not conscientious. We love our common mother; her dignity, her strength, her prosperity, are the sacred objects of our endeavor. High, high, among the nations, beneficent, great, free, she stands, and our eyes kindle and hearts throb when we gaze on her serene majesty. Whatever the result of this day's doing we will be her true sons so long as our lives last, and so may our children and their children's children arise and call us blessed. [Applause.]

[Mr. MARTIN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, as no other gentleman present seems to wish to speak this evening, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no method under the rules by which a petition with an adverse report can be placed on the Calendar in the order of business. No action can be taken by the Senate on a petition without the report of a committee.

Mr. HARRIS. A bill may be introduced and that can be put on the Calendar.

Mr. VANCE. I ask, then, that the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

CONSIDERATION OF THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] relative to the consideration of the treaty with Great Britain, to report it back adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the resolution will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution by Mr. HOAR relative to the consideration of the treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the resolution be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report. There is another adverse report in regard to open sessions, which is also on the Calendar, and this question will come up at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. TURPIE. Does the resolution relate to the treaty itself or to its consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR April 19, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That when the proposed treaty with Great Britain shall be under consideration, the Stenographic Reporter shall be admitted and shall report the debates and proceedings, which may thereafter be made public if a majority of the Senate shall so order, except such portions thereof as it shall determine that the public interest requires shall be kept secret. So much of the third clause of Rule XXXVI as conflicts with the resolution is suspended so far as necessary in order that the same shall take effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the resolution which I offered and also one offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] providing that the debate on the treaty shall be conducted in open session are both now upon the Calendar, and I think it would be convenient for the Senate to have it understood that at some early day those resolutions will be acted upon by the Senate. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will fix a time and see that the matter is brought up and settled by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that as early as to-morrow the matter ought to be determined. The question as to whether the treaty shall be considered in open session will no doubt control to some extent the action of Senators in preparing themselves for the debate, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], having charge of the treaty, gave notice he would desire to call it up next Tuesday. I propose, therefore, that this resolution shall be called up to-morrow during the morning hour and determined one way or the other if possible.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if it is his purpose or if it is the understanding that the discussion upon this resolution shall be public or in executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is entirely a question for the Senate itself to determine. Both the resolutions were introduced in open session, but upon the suggestion of any Senator that it involves a matter that ought not to be debated openly, the Senate will resolve itself into close legislative session.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that the action of other Senators with reference to this same subject-matter has been guided by the understanding which has been quite rigidly insisted upon by the Committee on Foreign Relations hitherto, or those who have acted for it, that this matter was wholly one for consideration in executive session; and, for my own part, I wish to say that it was with a great deal of surprise that I heard these resolutions thus offered in public.

Mr. MORGAN. I have an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the hope that he will accept it after he looks it over.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Dennis F. Murphy, the Official Reporter of the Senate, and three assistants, to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, shall be, when duly sworn, executive officers of the Senate to take down the proceedings and debates upon the fisheries treaty with Great Britain now pending in the Senate. And when said treaty is under consideration they shall be admitted to the executive sessions of the Senate.

The debates on said treaty and the proceedings relating to the same shall be taken down by said reporters and printed in confidence for the use of the Senate from day to day during such discussion, and shall be filed in the secret archives of the Senate, subject to its order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be printed.

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE MOFFATT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Seth C. Moffatt, late a Representative in Congress, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARIA N. ABBEY.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yesterday I reported from the Committee on Pensions adversely a petition of citizens of Chicago, Ill., and Brooklyn, N. Y., praying that the name of Maria N. Abbey, a nurse during the war of the rebellion, be placed on the pension-roll, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration. On an examination of the record I find that a bill relating to the same subject is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs. The petition was undoubtedly presented with a view to a reference to that committee. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw the report of the Committee on Pensions, and that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the adverse report of the Committee on Pensions will be reconsidered, and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is so ordered.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2902) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1886; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 79) permitting the public building authorized by act of Congress approved May 8, 1882, at Denver, Colo., to be located not less than 16 feet from any other building, instead of 40 feet, as provided in said act; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Public Building and Grounds.

COLUMBIA RIVER BOAT-RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL. Last Wednesday I gave notice that this morning, immediately at the conclusion of the morning business, I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River. Inasmuch as the forfeiture bill has the right of way in the morning hour, and also other bills pending here have the right of way after that is disposed of, which I do not wish to interfere with, I will make the request, in the first instance, for the unanimous consent of the Senate that on Wednesday next, one week from to-day, the 16th instant, immediately at the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, the 16th instant, at the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no concurrent or other resolutions the order of morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate, pursuant to its order, Senate bill 1430.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOAR to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as section 9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the amendment, after the word "States," it is proposed to strike out the words "by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip," and in line 7, after the word "laws," to insert "or under State selections or confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

SEC. 9. That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, under color of the public-land laws or under State selections confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed: Provided, however, That where the original cash purchasers are the present owners this act shall be operative to confirm the title only of such cash purchasers as the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied have purchased without fraud and in the belief that they were thereby obtaining valid title from the United States.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in addition to what I have already said on the pending measure. I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr HOAR].

I was somewhat surprised on yesterday afternoon to find that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], as a last resort, appeared to depend entirely upon a report of a committee of the Forty-eighth Congress as his justification for opposing this legislation. I supposed that the act of Congress itself in 1865 and 1866, taken together with the act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, which made it incumbent upon the governor of that State to certify the completion of the canal, and upon that certification that certificates might be issued, when it was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and when it could be made apparent that the proceedings had been formal and regular on the part of all these officers, that that itself would be much better authority to go to than the report of a committee of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Let me review for a single moment the title, as I understand it, of this property. It appears by the act of the Michigan Legislature of March 18, 1865, that the governor of the State was to appoint an engineer to first describe the lines, to make the plans for the construction of the canal, to report proceedings during its construction, etc. It was further enacted in the law of March 18, 1865—I read now from the act itself—

Whenever the governor shall determine that the said canal and harbor has been constructed by the said company as required by said act of Congress, and in conformity with the said plan and specification, he shall certify the same to said company and deposit a copy therof in the office of the secretary of state, and another copy thereof in the said office of the register of deeds in and for said county of Houghton, and which certificate, as well as any certified copy thereof under the seal of the State or made by said register, shall be evidence of the facts therein set forth; and when the governor shall make such certificate and deliver the same to said company, the said company shall stand seized and possessed of the said lands as fully as the State can convey the same, and free of any tax for the term of four years, if so long held by said company; and the said company may, after having received said certificate, sell and dispose of said lands as the absolute owner thereof.

Now what was done? The engineer appointed by the then governor of the State of Michigan made the following report:

HOUGHTON, October 18, 1873.

I hereby certify that the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal is completed according to law; that the plans and specifications approved by Governor Crapo have been substantially complied with; that the modifications made by the State engineer in charge, and approved by Governor Baldwin and your Excellency, have been of great benefit to the works, and that the canal and breakwater, in extent and solidity, in depth of water, in width of channel-ways, in length of piles, and extent of sheet piling, are much in excess of the requirements of the official specifications. I therefore accept the canal.

Most respectfully,

JOHN H. FORSTER,
Engineer for State.

To his Excellency Governor JOHN J. BAGLEY,
Detroit, Mich.

Thereupon, as required by the same act, the governor made a personal examination, and that will be found in Executive Document of November 29, 1873, in which the governor states:

And whereas I have made a personal examination of said canal and harbor, and have found the same to be constructed and completed, so far as the building of said canal and harbor is concerned by said company, as required by said act of Congress and in conformity with said plans and specifications.

But the governor did find a defect in the title to the lands upon which the canal was built. Therefore he did not order the issuance of the certificate, but in a subsequent decree, of June 25, 1865, he ordered the certificate to be issued to the canal company that the canal had been completed in accordance with the contract and specifications, and as reported by the engineer, even in excess of the requirements of the act of Congress or the act of the Michigan Legislature.

That is the state of the case against which the honorable Senator from Michigan simply presents a report, whether a majority or a minority report I do not know, of a committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, denying in substance that the canal had been completed in accordance with the contract and specifications, when the certificates of the engineer and of the governor are here to contradict both statements.

What further was done? The lands were turned over to the canal company in accordance with the act by the certificate of the governor. The lands were selected and they went into the possession of the company engaged in the construction of the canal. The original canal company failed and a new company was organized to complete the work and make the canal what it was intended to be by the original act. A decree of foreclosure was entered by the United States court in Michigan, and all matters and things herein involved, even the land itself, the whole 400,000 acres, were disposed of by the decree of that court. Let me read from the decree of the court:

The said decree finds that full lists and descriptions of said 400,000 acres of lands were approved by the Secretary of the Interior and certified to said State according to law. That all of the mortgages hereinbefore mentioned, and all the receiver's certificates—

The canal company went into the hands of a receiver and the court ordered the receiver to issue certificates, which were made a prior lien, and of course they were protected in the decree.

And all the receiver's certificates are liens in the order of preferences hereinbefore set forth on said 400,000 acres of land. The court thereupon renders a decree of foreclosure, in the usual form, ordering that in default of payment the canal and said 400,000 acres of lands be sold to satisfy the decree.

This decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Jerome vs. McCarter (94 U. S., 734).

We have a report of the filing of articles of association of this company under the act of the Michigan Legislature. We have the certificate of the governor granting to the canal company the lands; we have the insolvency of the original canal company, the decree of foreclosure of the canal, with all the property owned by the canal company and the 400,000 acres of land expressly included in the decree. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decree. The new company was organized. They then took the effects of the old company, with the $3,000,000 of bonds issued, including the receiver's certificates. They assessed the bondholders to the extent of $1,000,000 more for the purpose of completing the canal. The canal has been completed and is in operation; and if there is any title in the world to public land, or private land, if you please, anywhere in this broad Republic that is perfect and complete, it seems to me that these lands are in that position.

Another question is raised by the honorable Senator from Michigan, that because of the fact that the canal company did not locate their lands nearest their canal—I speak now of the first 200,000 acres—it was a violation of the act of Congress, and therefore invalid. If the Senator from Michigan will look in the Land Office he will find large amounts of these lands classed as mineral lands; that there was a great deal of excitement in that part of the country in respect to copper mines. Large copper developments had been found; large amounts of the public lands were in market and were considered mineral lands. If they had been simply iron lands they would not be considered as mineral lands; but they were marked as "mineral lands," and many of them had been subject to private entry; and the canal company did, as I understand, locate the first 200,000 acres as near the line of the canal as was possible to avoid the mineral lands. So there is nothing in that.

Mr. PALMER. What was the last remark of the Senator—that they located the 200,000 acres as near as possible to the line of the canal?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am informed by responsible authority that as to the 200,000 acres of land—I speak now of the original 200,000, the first location—they could not locate them nearer the canal by reason of the fact that the lands near the canal had been marked as mineral lands, and they were supposed to be copper lands. Further than that, a great many of them had been subject to private entry, and therefore they could not take them for that reason. They were lands already sold by the Government; and as the canal lands could not be selected until the canal was finished, other parties came in and took the lands the canal would have chosen had they enjoyed such option.

Mr. PALMER. I will state, if the Senator will permit me, that the committee who had this in charge in the House of Representatives found that there were 100,000 acres subject to entry in that first grant nearer to the canal than the second 100,000 that they entered. But that is not so material.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the lands had been marked as supposed to be copper lands or mineral lands, and afterwards it was found that they were not mineral lands, I presume then the charge could easily be made that certain lands were so designated as mineral lands because of the excitement in that section of country. Copper was found all over that northern country. But in any event, let me say to the Senator from Michigan that the Secretary of the Interior did acknowledge the fact that these lands had been properly located by giving the certificate of his assent thereto, and it having become a matter of judicial investigation in which all the matters were brought up before the courts of Michigan, and afterwards argued before the Supreme Court of the United States, which affirmed the decision of the lower court, that these lands were held justly, legally, and properly, and that bonds for $3,000,000 and the receiver's certificates had a lien on the lands which were part of the consideration.

Mr. President, all I wished was simply to respond to the testimony presented by the Senator from Michigan with respect to that particular point, and it does seem to me that the Senator from Michigan himself should find this evidence to be conclusive.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, there is a new phase of this case this morning. The Senator from New Jersey seems to be talking as if he was on the defense. I supposed that they were making an attack. There is no proposition to invalidate the title to any of these lands by legislative action on this bill.

The Senator goes through with the long process by which these lands were gotten, leaving out those things that are to the discredit of the company, forgetting all the time that by coming in and asking for the validation of this title the case is reopened. The whole thing is reopened by that very request, and we can go back and look into the equities and the processes by which the company got hold of this land.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator speaks of the discredit that attaches to the company. Does he mean to convey the idea that any discredit attaches to the present company, who are simply the receivers, so to speak; in other words, they are the inheritors of a large number of bonds, a large amount of debt from the old company. They paid in their money. They are the innocent holders of these bonds and this property covering the land. Is there any discredit that attaches to them for trying to defend their own interests?

Mr. PALMER. I promised this morning to furnish some literature. I am going to do it, and I think it will appear that the stockholders at the present time are the stockholders who got hold of this stock by very questionable methods. That we shall come to later.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the construction of this canal, I send up a report which has been sneered at a good deal because of the fact that it has been used a good deal—a report made by Mr. Henley, of California. It seems to me he made some very good points. He declared, I think, in that report that the canal had not been constructed. He based that report upon this testimony. This was testimony taken in the Forty-eighth Congress before the House Committee on Public Lands. Charles D. Blanchard is inspector of hulls for the Superior district. This was April 2, 1884, when his examination took place.

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Marquette, Mich.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. Since 1874.
Q. Did you once live in Boston, Mass.?
A. Yes.
Q. Did you sail from there when a boy?
A. Yes.
Q. When did you commence a seafaring life?
A. In 1851 or 1852.
Q. Have you had experience as a sailor on the Great Lakes about Michigan and Wisconsin?
A. Yes.
Q. When did you commence your experience as a sailor upon those lakes?
A. In 1855.
Q. How long did you continue to sail on those lakes?
A. From 1855 to 1878, with the exception of one season.
Q. What position did you occupy when you commenced to sail on those lakes?
A. That of a sailor.

* * * * * * *

Q. What have you been doing since 1876 or 1877?
A. I have been in the Government employment.
Q. In what capacity?
A. As local inspector of steam-vessels for the district of Superior.
Q. With your home at Marquette?
A. Yes.
Q. Your headquarters are there?
A. Yes.
Q. What are your duties as such inspector?
A. To inspect the hulls and life-saving appliances of all steamers within that district, in conjunction with my associate in office, who is inspector of boilers.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you know anything about the canal in controversy—the Portage Lake Canal?
A. Yes.
Q. You know where it is located?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know about the Lake Superior mouth of it?
A. Yes.
Q. Is there a breakwater there.
A. Not within the proper meaning of the word as I would term a breakwater.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you know what depth the old Sault Ste. Marie Canal was?
A. The old Sault Ste. Marie Canal had 12 feet of water over the miter sill.

The Senate will remember that this canal was to be 13 feet deep. I am sorry the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has disappeared. This was for his information as much as that of any one.

Q. Do you know what depth the old Sault Ste. Marie Canal was?
A. The old Sault Ste. Marie Canal had 12 feet of water over the miter sill.
Q. Tell the committee what was the habit of deep-draught vessels when they loaded in Buffalo or Cleveland and for Lake Superior; how they were loaded and trimmed, and for what purpose.
A. This will be hearsay. I inquire, and do every spring, from the masters of vessels about how they get through the canal, and what draught of water there is in the canal, and they have informed me, I think, every season since I have been inspector, and probably prior to that, that they load their boats with a view of discharging some of the cargo at Sault Ste. Marie, Marquette, Houghton, and Hancock, in order to enable them to go out through the Portage Lake Canal.
Q. Was that true before the construction of the new Sault Ste. Marie Canal; was it true when they had to pass through the old canal?
A. Yes.
Q. When it had only 12 feet of water?
A. Yes.
Q. Tell the committee what that means, loading with respect to unloading at these ports.
A. It would be in this manner: If a vessel with a capacity of 1,200 tons had 1,100 or 1,200 tons of freight for Buffalo or for Duluth, and had also freight for these other points, the probability is that they would only put on 600 or 700 tons for Buffalo and Duluth, and would fill up with the freight for these other points so that they could land this freight at Houghton, Hancock, and Marquette, and be able to pass through the canal.

* * * * * * *

Q. Tell us what there is about vessels that come through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and make the trips to Houghton and Hancock, going back to Portage Entry and going round the point. Tell us whether they do that or not, and whether they have done it for years.
A. I know that some of them have been compelled to do so.
Q. For what reason?
A. Owing to lack of water in the canal to get through.
Q. After they had passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal?
A. Yes.
Q. And after they had lightened some at Houghton and Hancock?
A. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Q. Suppose a vessel is coming from Lake Superior bound east or south, and suppose she encounters a storm of some severity (a vessel drawing 11 or 12 feet of water), would it be possible for her to enter that canal?
A. It might be possible.
Q. Would it be probable that she could do it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Is not that the purpose of a harbor?
A. That would be my opinion of a harbor—yes.
Q. Tell the committee what the usual custom of vessels of this description, and of that draught, is when they encounter a storm of reasonable severity, as they approach the mouth of Portage Lake Canal—whether they attempt to enter the canal.
A. The general rule is to shun it.

That shows the way the canal was completed. Vessels drawing only 12 feet have to load and unload with reference to passing through the canal. It is probable that but for a very short time was there ever 13 feet there, although there might have been certificates to that effect from the governor or from the engineer. That was a State engineer. The Government engineer declared that the canal was never completed. Here is a little more of this testimony. Lyman Hunt, one of the oldest captains on the lakes:

Q. Where do you live?
A. Buffalo, N. Y.
Q. You are a lake captain, I believe?
A. Yes.
Q. How long have you been on the lakes?
A. Most of the time for the last thirty-two or thirty-three years.
Q. How long have you been engaged in the Lake Superior trade?
A. Seven to eight years—not successive years.
Q. When did you first commence the Lake Superior trade?
A. In 1871.

* * * * * * *

Q. State when you first went through this canal.
A. From my memory it was in July or August, 1874.
Q. How did you find it—what was its condition?
A. With a little trimming at that time we passed through without any particular difficulty.
Q. What was the draught of your vessel?
A. The trims that we ordinarily passed through with were at that time 9½ feet.
Q. Was she fully loaded?
A. No; I say with partial loads—trimmed.

They had to exercise great care when they loaded, drawing only nine and a half feet of water.

Q. When there was a sea on you had either to wait outside or to stay inside?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Why did you have to remain inside or to refrain from trying to get inside?
A. On account of the shoalness of the water between the piers.

* * * * * * *

Q. Has there ever been anything at the mouth of that canal which answers the purpose of a harbor of refuge?
A. There never has been anything of that kind. It is merely a thing of fancy.
Q. What is a harbor of refuge?
A. A place where we can approach and enter in any stress of weather (it matters not what it is) with perfect safety.
Q. And you could not do that in this canal, you say?
A. We can not. It would be like running a vessel ashore if she were loaded, or partially loaded.

* * * * * * *

Q. Has it ever happened, in your experience as a navigator, that you were compelled to go around Keweenaw Point on account of the condition of the canal?
A. Yes.
Q. How often has that happened to you?
A. I have not had much experience in that way for the reason that I wait for the weather to become proper to enable me to pass through there.

It is a very long detour to go around Keweenaw Point I will say, and on that account they would wait a day or two for the weather to abate.

A. I have not had much experience in that way for the reason that I wait for the weather to become proper to enable me to pass through there. There is some shelter ninety or a hundred miles to the west of that.
Q. At what place?
A. At Bayfield or some of the island shelters.
Q. Does it happen frequently that you stay there?
A. It is a very frequent occurrence in the general trade up there.
Q. That is if, you wish to undertake the passage of the canal, and if the water is rough you have to wait until the sea subsides?
A. Yes; very commonly.

Q. State whether or not it is customary and habitual for navigators to load their vessels and to trim their cargoes with special reference to getting through this canal.
A. Yes: that has been the history of the canal navigation ever since it has been opened. There is one thing that I wish to say here. Take the Transit Line from Buffalo. A certain portion of the boats is partitioned off to take a partial cargo and to run directly through from Duluth to Marquette on account of the inability of the boats to pass through this canal. Another portion of the boats takes a certain portion of cargo to Duluth and comes down into Portage Lake, Hancock, and Houghton (the copper district) to finish their cargo as much as possible with copper. So that the trade has to be adjusted according to these things. There are worlds of evidence of it. It is a living thing all through that trade and country—just what I speak.

By Mr. REDINGTON:

Q. Suppose you were to load a cargo for Duluth and propose to go through this canal, to what depth of water would you load your boat; that is, how much would you load her to draw?
A. That would depend upon the time of the year. It is almost invariably the case in the spring of the year that it is sometimes impossible to get in or out of the canal; and then, again, with trimming and at the risk of straining the vessel, and all that sort of thing, some of us manage to get through there, while some of us are not able to get through at all. That has been the experience of all of us mostly every spring of the year.
Q. Suppose at the opening of spring navigation your first load was a load of through freight to be carried through to Duluth, how deep would you load your boat with an expectation of getting through this canal?
A. Nine and a half feet I suppose would be the prudent thing, and it would be questionable whether we would get through then or not. Of course we could not know what the water would be until we took soundings. Sometimes the depth is 9½ feet and sometimes 10 feet.

So much for the construction of the canal. I now ask the Secretary to read what I have marked in brackets, being from the report of the Engineer of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

I do not think the entrance to the canal can be said to be completed until the piers are extended to a depth of water equal to that which is considered necessary at the harbors constructed directly by the United States. If this were done a great deal of the difficulty experienced in entering the canal would disappear. It is not to be expected that a vessel can be easily steered in rough water when its keel almost touches bottom. This lack of depth of water at the head of the canal is, in my judgment, the greatest difficulty at this point, and the remedy is for the canal company to complete the work, to aid which the United States donated 400,000 acres of land.

Mr. PALMER. Much has been said about the good faith with which all the affairs of this canal company have been conducted. I will now send up a part of the literature of which I spoke yesterday, and I ask the attention of Senators to it. It is dramatic and exceedingly good reading. It sounds to me a good deal like Rinaldo Rinaldino. It is the report of Mr. Buckner from the Committee on Banking and Currency in the Forty-sixth Congress, May 19, 1880, signed by eight out of ten members of the committee, and the two dissenting are Mr. William W. Crapo and Mr. S. B. Chittenden, who do not dissent as to the facts, but as to the imputation of bad faith and corrupt dealing. The Secretary will please read the part between brackets on page 2.

The Secretary read as follows:

It seems that the Ocean National was one of numerous State banks converted under the provisions of the national banking act into a national bank. Its management for some years prior to 1870 had not been successful, when it was robbed of a large amount of its assets and deposits, which affected its credit and resources to such an extent that a committee of the New York clearing-house, of which it was then a member, made an examination of its condition and pronounced it to be in "a perfectly insolvent and rotten condition." At that time it was owing the clearing-house a large amount, for which indebtedness it had deposited as security its bills receivable and other collaterals, and on the day after this report was made the doors of the bank were closed. Mr. Theodore

M. Davis had been engaged as an attorney of the bank in some of its legal business, and had some acquaintance with its affairs from this business connection, and early in December, 1871, he was appointed by the then Comptroller of the Currency (Mr. Hurlburd) receiver, and very soon entered upon the discharge of his duties.

* * * * * * *

Among the assets of the bank at the time of its failure, and which went into the hands of Receiver Davis, were sundry debts of stockholders and others secured by the bonds and stock of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Michigan.

It appears that the chief value of the Portage Lake and Superior Canal Company bonds consisted in its ownership of 400,000 acres of iron and pine lands in the upper peninsula of Michigan, granted by Congress to the State of Michigan to aid in constructing a canal between Portage Lake and Lake Superior, by two several acts of Congress of March 3, 1865, and July 3, 1866.

* * * * * * *

These lands (increased to 450,000 acres by a subsequent purchase) were variously estimated to be worth from three and a half to ten millions of dollars, with the completion of the canal and a good title, and when the receiver was appointed a competent engineer had reported that $150,000 would complete the canal, on which a large amount of work had been done, according to the requirements of the act of the Legislature of Michigan.

It will thus be seen that the absolute title to these lands was granted to this canal company, subject to be defeated by the failure to complete the canal within the time prescribed. The act of Michigan transferring its title to this corporation authorized the hypothecation of the lands conveyed, and the canal company had mortgaged both grants, as well as the canal franchise, and issued first, second, and third mortgage bonds, in order to complete the canal. Congress had not declared the lands forfeited or taken any action in that direction, but, on the contrary, had frequently extended the time for the completion of the canal; and in the mean time the first and second mortgage bonds had been disposed of to the banks and capitalists of the East at from 50 to 80 per cent. of their face value, and the canal company had obtained the opinion of eminent attorneys as to their title to the lands and the safety of the securities sold.

When Mr. Davis entered upon the receivership of the Ocean Bank he came to the conclusion that these bonds were absolutely worthless, because the canal company had failed to complete the canal, and finding that Ayer & Co., of Lowell, Mass., and J. Boorman, Johnston & Co., of New York, were large holders of these bonds, he lost no time in conferring with them, and greatly surprised them by the expression of his opinion as to the worthlessness of his and their security. And in order to satisfy them that the lawyers on whose opinions they had relied when they invested their money in these canal bonds were mistaken, he induced them to take the opinion of other eminent counsel, who confirmed his opinion that the bonds held by them were worth nothing, the canal not having been finished, or until the canal was finished.

Without expressing an opinion on this legal question at this time, but assuming that the receiver was thoroughly satisfied that the securities held by him belonging to the Ocean Bank were absolutely worthless and that the title to the lands would revert to the United States, the company having failed to complete the canal in the time prescribed, your committee can not approve the conduct of the receiver in thus depreciating the value of these bonds by proclaiming that they were worth nothing, and that the debt of the bank was wholly insecure.

* * * * * * *

But it appears to your committee that this obvious departure from a faithful discharge of his duties to the creditors and owners of the bank was the inception of a plan, well matured and skillfully executed, by which the receiver would ultimately obtain control and ownership of the property and franchises of the canal company for himself and his friends, under the false disguise of devotion to the interests of the bank and a desire to appreciate its assets. Within two or three months after his appointment (Judge Birdseye's testimony, 1874, page 162) the evidence shows that Mr. Davis said, in a conference with the witness, that he had made up "his party" to control the lands of the company; that the company and the members of the company were embarrassed; that the "Averys" (which was the general way he spoke of the members of the canal company) were all thoroughly bankrupt; that judgments were recovered or about being recovered against them for a large amount; that they could not carry the property of the company which they had; that it must go into other hands, and that he had made up his party to control that property; that he could carry out his plans against their opposition, but would prefer their co-operation to their opposition; and he said that the debts of himself and his party, or syndicate, amounted then to about $1,300,000, and that they wanted $1,000,000 for administering the property and paying the debts, making $2,300,000, and out of the balance the "Averys" should have $500,000, or an equal one-fourth of the surplus over $2,300,000, the other three-fourths to go to his friends, or the syndicate which he had formed, and a proposition to this effect this witness was authorized to make to the Averys.

This testimony, unlike much of the oral testimony given before the two committees, is not only not contradicted, or attempted to be contradicted, but is corroborated in many particulars by other facts and admissions of Mr. Davis. A syndicate, or combination, was formed at the instigation of the receiver early in the year 1872, composed of the Ocean Bank, J. C. Ayer & Co., J. Boorman Johnston & Co., and which was managed and controlled by Mr. Davis, and has resulted in the absolute control and ownership of the valuable property of the canal company by this syndicate and a few of their friends, as will be shown hereafter.

The exact terms of the agreement between these parties is not known to your committee, was not made known to the committee of 1874; and after the lapse of eight years, and this syndicate has obtained the control of the property of the canal company, we have not been able to learn the contents of this secret agreement between these parties from an inspection of it. All testimony concerning its contents was excluded from the Record of 1874, because it might affect pending litigation adverse to the interests of the bank; and now that the litigation has ended, the "Averys" and the company been put into bankruptcy, the property of the company sold, and a new company, with Mr. Davis as its president, has been organized, and is owner and in possession of the canal and the 450,000 acres of land, your committee has not been permitted to see this contract, because "there is a litigation going on now in Michigan about the canal company" (page 210, testimony, Forty-sixth Congress), a fact that it seems was unknown to the late secretary of the new company (Deveboise, page 42, testimony, Forty-sixth Congress).

This agreement, as stated by the receiver (page 209, testimony, Forty-sixth Congress), was that he (Davis) should take the laboring oar in the matter, select the proper counsel, take the general management of the business for them, provided they would agree that when we got the canal finished and the title perfected, and the mortgages foreclosed, when they bought the property in, if it did not sell for enough to pay our debts, they should after repaying themselves for legal expenses and for the certificates they might buy, or somebody else might buy, the other proceeds should be divided among Boorman Johnston & Co., Ayer & Co., and the Ocean Bank, in proportion to their several debts; and if there was any profit over and above that, it should belong to them, and not the Ocean Bank. Ayer & Co. and J. Boorman Johnston & Co. were to pay all expenses, and in consideration thereof Davis was to do all the work he could in the matter.

* * * * * * *

Your committee propose now to consider the question as to the authority of the receiver to make the stockholders and depositors of this unfortunate bank a party to an agreement to wreck the canal company.

* * * * * * *

We might dismiss this branch of the inquiry by the assertion that if the combination of the receiver with Ayer & Knox, even with the laudable purpose of saving a bad debt, finds no warrant in law, his conduct in this particular is without excuse or justification.

In thus commenting upon this latter transaction, modifying the original syndicate contract, we do not overlook the fact that the syndicate had procured a decree of foreclosure of the canal franchise and land grants, and that one of the syndicate (Isaac H. Knox, of J. Boorman Johnston & Co.) had been appointed receiver of the canal company, with authority to issue certificates, which were made a paramount lien on the lands and canal; and that Knox and his partners, J. Boorman Johnston & Co. and J. C. Ayer & Co., had furnished much the largest portion of the money with which to purchase these certificates, amounting to about $624,000.

* * * * * * *

At a sale of the mortgaged lands and franchise of the canal company under the decree of foreclosure of the Federal court of Michigan—the canal having been finished from the proceeds of the certificates issued under the order of the court—Messrs. Man, of New York, and Wilson, of Washington, became the purchasers, as trustees for the syndicate and others, at a price less than the amount of certificates and interest and expenses of sale. This result was no doubt foreseen from the time the secret syndicate agreement was entered into, the members of the syndicate having obtained a controlling interest both in the lien created by the order of the court as well as the first and second mortgage bonds issued by the canal company.

By the same agreement of the syndicate by which Man & Wilson purchased the property the lands, franchises, etc., sold by order of the court were capitalized at two and one-half times the assumed cost to the syndicate, and stock authorized to be issued to the amount of $4,000,000, after the trustees, Man & Wilson, had conveyed the property and franchise of the old canal company to a newly-organized corporation, of which Mr. Davis, receiver of the Ocean Bank, was chosen president, with a salary, after the first year, of $5,000 per annum.

The shares of stock assigned to the bank under the several modified agreements of the syndicate amounted to 5,315, which was sold to the Ayer estate at $20 per share at public auction in 1879, the Comptroller of the Currency being present at the sale at the request of the receiver. The property which was to realize to the bank $560,000, and which Ayer & Knox had agreed to pay, produces a net sum of less than $110,000 after years of "terrible" litigation in State and Federal courts and in Michigan and New York, coupled with the expenses of that litigation and large accumulations of interest on the balance of the debt due the depositors from 1872 to 1879.

Your committee are of the opinion that if the receiver had obeyed the plain injunctions of the law, and had not subordinated the interests of the bank to his own purposes, quite as much or more might have been realized on the bad and doubtful debts of the bank, much less interest would have accumulated against the bank, and the stockholders would have escaped with little or no assessment. Making proper allowance for the general depression of business and the shrinkage of value of all kinds of unproductive property, it should be borne in mind that the receiver had nearly two years from his appointment to the panic of 1873 within which to sell or compromise the bad and doubtful debts that came to his hands, and it was evidently the conviction of the owners of the canal company that it was the purpose of the receiver to use his position not only to crush them financially but to despoil them of their property for his individual gain that caused them to throw every obstacle that legal ingenuity and the desperation of their fortunes could invent in the way of a successful result to his schemes. Hence the "enormous net-work" of litigation, delay in closing out the assets, accumulation of interest, and assessments on the stockholders to pay the debts of the depositors.

* * * * * * *

In the organization of the company, of which the receiver is president, it had been agreed between the syndicate, when efforts were about being made to sell the property to an English party, that the stock of the new company should be issued in the name of Nathaniel Wilson (co-trustee of Mr. Man in the purchase under the decree of foreclosure); and after issuing to Mr. Davis, as receiver, 5,315 shares, the equivalent of $250,000—to Davis, in his own right, 265 shares, and to the other members of the syndicate their proportionate share of stock—3,950 shares were left in the hands of the trustee (Wilson), out of which Mr. Davis was to receive $100,000 in stock, and other parties smaller sums.

* * * * * * *

This matter is referred to as affording additional evidence that the members of the syndicate have made distribution of the property of the canal company, as represented by the stock in the new company, in total disregard of the original syndicate contract, and of the rights of the stockholders and creditors of the Ocean Bank, and that the receiver has been or will be amply compensated for the services, legal and otherwise, rendered to the syndicate.

The officer who violates the commands of the law, enacted to direct and control him and to protect the rights of others, can not complain that all reasonable and fair presumptions are made against his official acts. If he undertakes to discharge the duties imposed upon him by law, "in his own way," and not in the way pointed out by that law, he assumes responsibilities which are not to be evaded, although the motives of his action may appear to have been far more creditable than those which seem to have controlled the receiver of the Ocean National Bank.

Mr. PALMER. The former Secretary of the Interior, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], yesterday thought that there had been no departmental expression on this case. I will send the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the desk, and ask the Secretary to read what is there marked on page 35.

Mr. DOLPH. What year?

Mr. PALMER. The report for 1886.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Lands which had been designated by the United States as "mineral" prior to March 3, 1865, were excluded from the grant of lands made by act of Congress of that date for the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal. Notwithstanding this express exception in the granting act upward of 68,000 acres which had been designated by the United States as mineral before March 3, 1865, including some of the most valuable lands in the copper range of the upper peninsula of Michigan, were certified and approved by this department for the benefit of the ship-canal company. Suit was recommended by this office June 9, 1886, to recover said mineral lands to the United States.

Mr. TELLER. As the Senator says that I stated there had been no departmental action, I wish to say and the RECORD will show that I did not make any such statement at all.

Mr. PALMER. I withdraw it, if it is not in the RECORD. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. The RECORD is exactly what I said.

Mr. PALMER. Then I misunderstood the Senator yesterday.

On page 323 of the same volume I should like to have the Secretary read the selections within brackets from a letter addressed to Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, Secretary of the Interior, by Mr. Sparks, the Commissioner, as a report on Senate bill 1507, "to reclaim to the United States certain lands improperly and illegally listed to the State of Michigan for the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company."

Mr. BLAIR. Will it answer the Senator's purpose just as well to print these extracts without their being read?

Mr. PALMER. No, sir; because I wish to make my case and let the Senate—what there is of it here—vote understandingly. After they had voted if they should read the extracts to-morrow they might regret their action of to-day.

The Secretary read as follows:

The lands embraced in said offering are noted upon the tract-books of this office as "offered October 27, 1851," but no reference is made to the fact that they were offered as mineral.

The ship-canal company selected 68,647.47 acres which were embraced in said offering, and it not appearing from an examination of the tract-books that the same had been offered as mineral, they were approved to the State for its benefit.

Recapitulating the result of the adjustment of the grant of 1865, it appears:

First. That the company did not select any lands but such as were subject to private entry.

Second. That, taking all the lands selected and approved, it selected 93,712.77 acres which were not at date of selection the vacant lands nearest the location of the canal.

Third. That it selected 68,647.47 acres which had been proclaimed and offered as mineral prior to the passage of the granting act.

Fourth. That it selected 56,916.57 acres of non-mineral lands which were not at date of selection the vacant lands nearest the location of the canal.

In giving my views upon the bill under consideration I will first refer to the lands embraced in the offering of 1851.

The act of 1865 excluded from the grant made thereby all lands designated by the United States as "mineral" before the passage of said act.

Whether or not the lands selected under the grant actually contained mineral was not material. If they had been designated by the United States as mineral prior to the passage of the granting act they were not subject to selection.

After the passage of the act of 1847 this office, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, decided to treat as mineral the lands covered by leases, permits, or titles of occupancy—those which the legal officers should be satisfied from any source were of that character, and those which might be reported by the mineral agent or geologist.

The act of September 26, 1850, made the mineral lands subject to sale and entry in the same manner and at the same minimum price as other public lands, but the distinction between the mineral and non-mineral lands was maintained by this office. The lands supposed to contain mineral were offered as such in 1851. The unoffered non-mineral lands were offered in 1853. The letter transmitting to the local officers a list of the lands embraced in the offering of 1853 distinctly states that such lands were not offered in 1851 because they were not mineral lands according to the reports. The offering of 1851, according to the proclamation, embraced lands formerly covered by mineral leases and permits, and lands which had been reported as mineral by the geologist.

The proclaiming and offering of these lands at public sale as mineral lands, taken in connection with the instructions in the premises, was clearly a designation by the United States as mineral. Having been so designated, they were not subject to selection under the canal grant.

According to the sworn testimony of its president, the Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway, and Iron Company, successor to the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, does, or did in 1884, still own the lands in question, and, in my opinion, a suit should be instituted against said company to vacate and set aside the certification made to the State in 1868, so far as the same includes lands embraced in the offering of 1851, amounting to 68,647.47 acres.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday, when I said that this was tainted with fraud from beginning to end, unintentionally, I think, misexpressed my position when he said that when I was asked what the fraud was I declared that they had taken mineral lands when they were expressly excluded from doing so by the terms of the act. That is only one small portion.

Mr. TELLER. They did not take mineral lands.

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will permit me, I think I can make it plain. They did not take mineral lands according to subsequent developments, but the act excluded from the grant all lands designated as mineral lands—not mineral lands, but lands designated as mineral lands. That was in the act.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator misstates a fact unintentionally. It has been repeatedly held that those lands were not mineral lands, although they contained iron.

Mr. PALMER, I have not said that they were. I said lands "designated as mineral lands." Here is a very material point which the Senate should understand. These lands which they got in contravention of law were designated as mineral lands because they were known to contain copper, and, as I said in my remarks a few days ago, the Minnesota mine, one of the greatest mines in the world before the discovery of the Calumet and Hecla, was developed on the margin of this grant. I want to be exact. I am not speaking and stating facts that I can not prove by documents. I am confining myself to the current literature and the facts, and what I know. The great difficulty in this discussion is that gentlemen imagine a great many things, and they really believe they are facts.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator inform me what is his point about mineral lands? At first I understood him to say that there was a point about the iron.

Mr. PALMER. Not from me.

Mr. HOAR. When the Senator is brought to the point he says there are copper mines on the margin of these lands. They are not on the lands selected, but on the other side. What is that, however, more than a copper mine a thousand miles off?

Mr. PALMER. If the Senator will only listen I will make it perfectly plain. Right on to the west of this great copper mine is the Porcupine Mountain, and I hope it will prove true to name before they get through. They received lands there which had been designated as mineral lands. They were supposed to be copper lands. That is the point.

They violated the law in going on to these lands, but they went on intentionally because they supposed that there was copper there. I brought in that illustration of the Minnesota mine to show the animus of this company. They supposed there was great hidden mineral wealth in the Porcupine Mountain, and they went outside of their grant and violated the law on purpose to get control of these mineral rights. It afterwards turned out that with the copper there was an immense amount of iron, and they have got that in contravention of law.

I do not propose to assail the title of the Portage Lake Canal Company. They have got their swag, to speak vulgarly, and I suppose they will keep most of it; but I am decidedly opposed, now that the case is reopened, to making a new grant to them. They, as the evidence shows, procured the dismissal of an honest receiver because he would not be their tool, and put in a man who would do their behest, and right on that removal hangs all the trouble that comes in about the cash entries in the State of Michigan. After the procurement of these lands by this canal company it was known throughout the country that the cash entrymen supposed they could do it. They did do it, some honestly and some knowing that they were taking part in a gamble, and, as I showed by testimony yesterday, they were buying a chance, and they did not suppose they were getting a perfect title.

Now, in regard to the amount of money, the wealth—I believe the Senator from Massachusetts makes it "the men of wealth, property, and character." He puts "character" last, unintentionally, I have no doubt. But the difficulty is that the wealth, Plutus, stands out more in this discussion than anything else. When I came back to the Senator yesterday, when he accused me of being filled by an attorney in this city, and when I asked him who supplied him with material he very innocently says one member of Congress from Massachusetts or Boston, I do not know where, right in the vicinity of these stockholders, who had come over from the House of Representatives and talked to him. He then spoke of Mr. MacGowan, a very respectable gentleman, but he is an attorney for this canal company. He supplies the Senator with information, and he supplies him unintentionally, no doubt, or else the Senator misconceives him, with some information that is not very reliable.

For instance, the Senator said yesterday that a certain party (a Mr. Hill) had made an affidavit that he had dissolved partnership with Mr. Redington because he would not accede to a request of Mr. Redington to commit perjury, or substantially that. Is that so?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. After the first day's debate a Mr. Hill, mentioned in documents introduced by the Senator, met me and handed me a statement. I had no opportunity to converse with him, and I told him I had no time to converse with him, but he presented me the paper which I read before the Senate. That paper was Mr. Hill's affidavit in response to Redington's statement already made, that he had found on investigation that there was no controversy between the homesteaders and individuals interested.

Hill's statement was that Redington wanted him to make oath that there was not any such contract as was discovered, and he would not do it, because that would be perjury, and thereupon the partnership was dissolved.

Mr. PALMER. The Senator said that was an affidavit, did he not?

Mr. HOAR. A statement of Mr. Hill.

Mr. PALMER. An affidavit. I refer to this merely to clear the skirts of Mr. Redington. I do not know that I have anything further to say except to justify Mr. Redington. He says, and my friend from Massachusetts says now that it is a statement, although yesterday he declared in debate that it was an affidavit——

Mr. HOAR. It is on file.

Mr. PALMER. It is nothing but a letter. Mr. Hill dare not make an affidavit to the statements contained in that letter, and therefore it has no more validity than any other man's remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I should like to know whether it is undisputed that the lands selected by the canal company were designated at the time of the selection as mineral lands?

Mr. PALMER. A great many of them were—not those that are under discussion as to their title in this amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the lands that were concerned or involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts were those designated as mineral lands at the time of their selection?

Mr. PALMER. They were not, but they were taken in violation of law, and I say if they come here and ask for relief they reopen their case, and we have a right to go over the whole of it and to act according to the good faith that they have manifested in the whole transaction, and I think that the bad faith is manifest from beginning to end.

There was so much noise in the Chamber that I do not know whether gentlemen heard all the testimony taken before the Committee on Banking and Currency, but it was enough to cover with confusion every man whose name is mentioned as taking part in the transaction. I understand that the stockholders are the same substantially to-day that they were then, and my friend from Massachusetts makes a good point on the raising of a million of dollars to finish the canal, and you are asked here to validate as far as you can, subject to the amendments submitted by me, the title of the canal company to these lands.

They are covered with homesteaders who knew that the canal company had no right in law to those lands, and the canal company is a very rich corporation. Their property represents all the way from twenty to eighty million dollars. Those homesteaders can be harrassed, they can be dragged from their homes, they can be made to contribute to the last farthing to defend their little holdings, and all for the sake of confirming the property rights of this canal company, which never should be confirmed. In asking this they have reopened the whole case, and we are allowed to go into the equities of it, and they deserve no relief at the hands of Congress.

Mr. President, I have done.

Mr. BLAIR. But does not the subsequent part of the amendment save the pre-emptors and homesteaders from such controversy?

Mr. PALMER. I just said subject to that amendment. But it gives them a hold to worry with their immense capital these men of limited means and no means at all, men with very little money who have got to defend their cases in the Land Office or in the courts, and I say that as far as we can reach and protect those men, as long as the company has no equitable right to these lands, we ought not to confirm it under any circumstances.

Mr. HOAR. The proof of good faith is to be made to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. PALMER. The Secretary of the Interior will hear the case ex parte; these men will have the ablest lawyers in the country, they will be down here besieging the Department, the atmosphere around them will be all in favor of this wealthy corporation, and what can the poor homesteader up in Michigan do to defend himself against such a conglomeration?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the pending amendment involves some questions which are very foreign to the question of good faith on an innocent purchase by those who may be in the possession of the land. If we had the evidence before us as to who the people were who owned these lands, how they acquired an interest, and the full testimony, we might determine whether or not in individual cases there was a claim of good faith and equity arising from the circumstances. We have not, however, that testimony, and this amendment proposes to do—what? It proposes to give to the Secretary of the Interior the power vested in Congress of disposing of these lands. It is by that very fault in legislation, permitted by Congresses of the United States, that a vast empire of the public land has been disposed of in violation of the laws enacted by Congress.

It is the universal complaint all over this country that the people have been deprived of their heritage, of their rights in the public domain by the administration of the laws by the Interior Department of this Government, by the discretion vested in the executive officers not to dispose of the public domain but to execute the law; and we are now repeating this experience in the face of all the charges made by the Senator from Michigan in the evidence that he has read here of charges of fraud, flagrant fraud in the selection of these lands, in the approval of these lands, in the sale of these lands and the charge that the very officer who thus violated the law is now personally the recipient of the fraudulent and illegal title said to have been acquired.

Now, that is the point. Is it true, or is it not true? If it is true there is neither justice nor the shadow of law to sustain the proposition that equity to an innocent purchaser requires the confirmation of this fraudulent title. Why, what do we hear maintained by those who advocate this amendment? A selection of lands by a State as conferring the incipiency of a right, and an approval by an executive officer completing it! Is that the exercise of the power of legislation by Congress? Is that the execution of an act of Congress? The selection by a State the origin of a right to the land of the United States, of what significance is that? If that be true, and the selections were without the authority of Congress, the State might select the capital and the whole public domain, and acquire a title merely by selecting it.

But manifestly there is nothing in that, except the assumption that the selection was made by virtue of the authority conferred by Congress, and that is specifically denied; denied in the report of the Land Office, denied in the testimony which has been read, denied in the report made by the committees of Congress, and, on the contrary, facts are presented by a committee of the other House showing that not only were the selections made without authority of law, but in violation of law.

This may or may not be so. I should be very glad, if it is not true, to concur in the views of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and would with pleasure vote to confirm their title in every individual where he had been induced to expend his money without knowledge of fraud and without being put on his guard; but how shall I determine? Not because a State selection has been made, not because an approval has been had. I know some States in which a vast body of the public lands has been selected in express violation of the acts of Congress and approved without any authority of law whatevor.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] read the decree of a court to which the United States were not parties. Such a decree as that for the sale of whatever rights were in the defendant it is claimed decided the question of what those rights were as against other persons not parties to the suit. If the insolvency of a company, or of a defendant, could create title or remedy any defect in title, then the decree would be pertinent, but that decree is no foundation for any action by this Congress. It binds no one but those who were parties to it, and it is no affirmation of the validity of the original title. That could not be before the court in that case.

But it seems from the testimony presented here that the decree itself was obtained in fraud, and that the beneficiaries of the decree were parties to the fraud, and that it is a part of a vast system of fraud to which I have called the attention of the Senate in other cases in which the United States courts and United States judges seem to have participated. I have called attention to the statement of an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States of conspicuous ability, that the courts of the United States have been parties to and agents in the commission of this species of fraud, titles created by proceedings in court instituted for the purpose of vesting fraudulent titles by the decrees of courts curing all frauds.

Now, Mr. President, I am unwilling by my vote to delegate the power of this body to any Secretary, to any executive officer, to decide whether or not there has been good faith, and whether there has been a compliance with the act of Congress.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I am informed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], who is entitled to the floor at this hour on the bill just announced, that he is willing that the bill should be postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, with a view of getting the forfeiture bill out of the way. I hope that the Senate will continue the consideration of the bill which has been under consideration this morning until it is completed to-day.

Mr. COKE. If the Senate desires to continue the consideration of the forfeiture bill and have a final vote to-day, I am not willing to stand in the way, and I am perfectly willing that the animal industry bill shall be postponed until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that Senate bill 2083, the regular order, may be laid aside so that we may get through with this forfeiture bill. It is owing to these constant interruptions that legislation becomes interminable. I think if we keep postponing this bill day after day Senators will get refilled with fresh arguments and speeches that we shall never get through with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the understanding proposed that the consideration of Senate bill 1430 shall continue until disposed of, and that Senate bill 2083 shall then be taken up, or that Senate bill 2083 shall be postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, at which time the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] shall take the floor?

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that unanimous consent will be given that the Senate will remain here to-day until the bill which has been under consideration shall be finished.

Mr. BLAIR. I take occasion, being in charge of the bill, to say that I am obliged to the Senator from Illinois for making the suggestion, which is quite satisfactory to those who desire to go on and conclude the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to obtain the sense of the Senate whether Senate bill 2083 is to be resumed at the conclusion of Senate bill 1430, or is to be postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that the Senator from Texas prefers not to take the floor until to-morrow at 2 o'clock on that bill.

Mr. COKE. I consent to the postponement until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 2083 be postponed until 2 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7222) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish agricultural stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862," and of the acts supplementary thereto; and

A bill (H. R. 550) for the relief of William R. Blakeslee.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 70) appropriating $30,000 for the International Exhibition in Brussels, Belgium.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7936) to restore to the public domain a part of the Uintah Valley Indian reservation, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7348) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River.

The message further announced that the House requested the Senate to furnish that body with an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1198) for the relief of William H. Robertson and Edward L. Hedden, late collectors of customs for the district of the city of New York, the copy thereof heretofore sent to the House having been mislaid.

WEST POINT VISITORS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. A few days since I was appointed by the Presiding Officer a visitor to the West Point Academy. At that time I supposed my engagements would be of such a nature as to permit me to discharge the duties of that appointment. I find, however, that it will be utterly impossible for me to attend at that time, and I beg leave respectfully to decline the appointment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will be excused from further service upon the Board of Visitors, if there be no objection, and the Presiding Officer will designate the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to act in his place.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 7222) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish agricultural stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (H. R. 550) for the relief of William R. Blakeslee was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM H. ROBERTSON AND EDWARD L. HEDDEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives requesting the Senate to furnish the House with an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1198) for the relief of William H. Robertson and Edward L. Hedden, late collectors of customs for the district of the city of New York, the copy thereof sent to the House having been mislaid. The request of the House of Representatives will be complied with if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the amendment proposed is that the sales of lands with the allowance and approval of the officers of the United States, or the selection by any State approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior shall be confirmed where they are along the line of any grant for any public work. That is what we are affirming. If it is meant to say that these acts are in pursuance of the authority of Congress, of the law, then we must disprove the allegations which have been made, we must show that these selections were made in pursuance of the terms of the act. We must show that there has been a completion of this canal, not a certificate of its completion, which might under some circumstances be very serious reason for accrediting of that fact by the grantee and his assigns and might create an equity; but it is not conclusive on the Congress of the United States when there has been an unlawful selection by an executive officer, or by a State officer, and an unlawful approval by an executive officer of the United States. The fact of the certificate by the governor has no legal or logical significance for this purpose in such a case.

We are dealing here with the power of appropriating this land to the purposes described in that act or forfeiting it. You are inquiring as to a compliance with the requirements of the act. You are not asking whether some person has honestly invested his money upon a certificate given by an officer designated in that act, because the allegation here has been that this was a fraud; that the receiver who was appointed himself perpetrated this fraud; that it was a conspiracy to assert facts which did not exist, where no completion has ever been made, and no compliance with the act of Congress.

If these facts can be brought here in a proper form to prove a compliance with the donating act and to show clearly that this money was honestly invested (and I do not say it was not; I am only speaking of the case here presented), then I would vote to confirm the title of that purchaser or investor, be the consequences what they might to the people who may have located upon that land or who it is desirable should have the right now to locate there. If the good faith of the Government and sound policy of recognizing honest, equitable rights requires it, I should be disposed to follow out that idea.

But we are without the means to decide upon these facts, and therefore I have suggested, and for myself I should prefer that these grants were excepted out of this forfeiture bill, with a requirement that the Secretary of the Interior should investigate, take evidence in proper form, let the parties appear before some United States officer and let that testimony be reported to Congress that Congress may decide and not the Secretary of the Interior as to the rights in good faith and equity of these parties. I think a member of Congress, whether in the Senate or in the other House, ought to assert the jurisdiction of the legislative department. We seem to abdicate our own functions. We vest a discretion in Department officers to do what Congress should do. The power of Congress, and its rightful assertion of jurisdiction, is beginning to be a little felt and a little recognized throughout the country, especially in regard to this matter of the public lands.

Mr. President, I presented the other day a question similar to this. I presented an amendment for the protection of innocent purchasers and actual settlers under color of title where there was no question of the completion of a railroad and compliance with the terms of the grant within the period of time designated in the act; where there was no question of the recognition by the State who was the grantee of the rights of these people, and this was the extent to which the amendment went in that direction, and it was rejected, laid on the table without consideration; but I find here a case where the title is impeached, where two committees of the Senate and of the House have reported against it, where a charge is made of fraudulent practices in the officers of the Government and in the courts and in the parties claiming these lands, by committees of two Houses of Congress, and affirmed as being probably true by a Senator in this body, and this amendment confirming this title thus attacked and thus assailed will be adopted by this body.

An amendment protecting poor people who are innocent purchasers, and nobody alleges the contrary, who have been in possession for years under a grant which is not impeached and under color of title is rejected without consideration. Well, there is a difference. The one is composed of poor people who have no means of asserting their rights. They are not a great and wealthy body as the Senator from Michigan states the claimants to be who are to be benefited by this amendment, but they are poor and humble people. The difference between the cases: The only difference is that in their case there is no impeachment whatever, there is no charge of fraud, there is no question of compliance with the terms of the granting act literally, and within the period of time required by the act. But these people are to be set aside, left unprotected, while in this case the confirmation is insisted upon.

Mr. President, for these reasons I object to this amendment. While I am willing to vote for an amendment excepting the Portage Lake Canal Company from the operation of this act, and also the Ontonagon and Brulé River Railroad Company, and requiring the present status of the lands to remain unchanged until a full investigation and report of the facts can be made to Congress, and an intelligent and deliberate consideration had by this body—when that shall be done I shall vote to confirm every title in every individual who is not a party to nor charged with knowledge of a conspiracy to perpetrate a fraud upon the Government, every innocent purchaser whom the evidence shall show has invested his money without reasonable notice of the fraud that is charged to have been committed and without notice of the circumstances attending this case.

That is the full extent to which we ought to go. There can be no further step taken properly in a case of this kind until all the facts are presented to us, and presented to us in a form in which they can not be asserted on the one side and denied on the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have no feeling in this matter except to do exactly what is right. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to what I am about to say.

Under the explanation made by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday and the failure of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] to controvert or dispute in any way the explanation made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I am inclined to believe it my duty to vote for a confirmation of the land grant to the canal company, but with this reservation (and that is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts) that in doing that I think it is my duty to preserve the rights of pre-emption claimants and homestead claimants. If I am satisfied that those rights are sufficiently protected, then I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Unless I am so satisfied, I shall not be able to vote for it.

I therefore wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the point whether the language of the amendment is sufficient to protect the rights of pre-emptors and homesteaders on the land which his amendment proposes to confirm to the canal company.

Mr. HOAR. The language on that particular point was drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. No; the amendment was drawn by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. It was offered by him, and I accepted it.

Mr. HOAR. The language is this:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

I suppose that covers and protects that class of rights which the Senator from Mississippi refers to, and that the foregoing confirmation does not operate as against them. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. The trouble I have about it is that the confirmation to the canal company is neither a sale nor an entry, but it is a grant, and I fear that under the language used the claims of the homesteaders and pre-emption men will not be sustained.

I suggest, if the Senator from Massachusetts is in accord with me in the purpose to save the rights of the homesteaders and pre-emption claimants, that we add at the end of the clause which we are now considering, the proposition of the Senator from Michigan which has been adopted, the words:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

With that addition I should be willing to support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to me that the point made by the Senator from Mississippi is perhaps well taken. In other words, I think while the proviso as to the confirmations which would be brought about by my amendment, if adopted, is not so drawn as to embrace the case of bona fide homesteaders and settlers as against the State selections, I suggest to the Senator that if he would add the words "or State selections" after the words "entries of lands" he would cover the ground.

Mr. GEORGE. It would then read:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands or State selections.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the point made by the Senator from Mississippi is well taken.

Mr. HOAR. I will so modify my amendment, with the leave of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. Then what is the objection to adding the words I have suggested, to remove all doubt, that all such bona fide pre-emptions mentioned before, and homestead claims, are hereby confirmed? What is the objection to that? That removes all doubt.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that we do not confirm any of those titles. All we want to do is to leave the parties with the rights they now have and let the Department deal with them. There will be a contest between different entrymen, and if we should confirm one we might cut another one out. If we simply leave it so that the bill will have no effect whatever upon their claims, and they are bona fide settlers, then the Department will act.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think that is sufficient.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose there were three or four bona fide claimants to the same tract of land. Of course, their titles require confirmation to be effective, but they are bona fide claimants.

Mr. GEORGE. They can not all be bona fide.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; there can be half a dozen bona fide claimants to the same tract.

Mr. TELLER. Three or four settlers might be on the same quarter-section, having in good faith attempted to make an entry.

Mr. GEORGE. I will fix it now.

Mr. DOLPH. The first portion of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin confirms all the entries in general terms.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest to add to line 5 of the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] the words:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby exempted from the operations of this act.

What I want to do is to make it certain that the bona fide pre-emptors and settlers on this land shall not be deprived of their rights as they exist now.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me to make a suggestion to him, he will see that his amendment is in direct conflict with the other portion of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin reads:

That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, under color of the public-land laws, and where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed.

Everybody, pre-emption claimants, homestead entrymen, cash sales, all disposals are hereby confirmed. Then, in order that these confirmations of cash entries and of selections shall not cut out conflicting homestead and pre-emption entries, the last clause of the amendment comes in:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of land upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States.

The amendment, as it stands now, without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, would leave the claims of these pre-emption and homestead entrymen to be confirmed; but now comes in the Senator with an amendment which says that this proposed act shall not cover them; that whenever any of these lands are settled upon by homestead and pre-emption claims the act shall not cover them, and the claims of cash entrymen and others shall not be confirmed where there is no conflict. I think that is in contradiction with the first part of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Why not let it stand, then, as I originally drew it? I first proposed to add:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

Mr. DOLPH. Because they are confirmed, if the Senator will turn back to line 10 of the printed amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Then it is only an objection to the style. Certainly the idea is, and I understand that to be the sense of the Senate, that we ought to provide in this bill that the claims of bona fide homesteaders and pre-emptors shall be confirmed. That is all I want to have done.

Mr. DOLPH. The claim of a pre-emption claimant can not be confirmed until he has paid the money and it has been received by the Government.

Mr. GEORGE. A claim can be confirmed.

Mr. DOLPH. A homesteader must live five years on his land and conform to the requirement of the statute, and then he gets his title.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct. The claim is only confirmed; the claim is made good; that is all. The court will consider that; but I wish simply to provide that nothing herein shall prevent the claimant from going on regularly under the laws of the United States and perfecting his pre-emption or homestead claim.

Mr. DOLPH. By the first portion of the amendment it is proposed to confirm all dispositions of the land forfeited by this act, but for fear that the confirmation of cash entries and State selections will cut out certain homestead and pre-emption claimants, it is provided that—

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands.

That means cash entries; and now it has been amended so as to read:

Or State selections.

Mr. SPOONER. It has not been so amended yet.

Mr. DOLPH. I thought that was accepted by the Senator. It has not been amended, but is a part of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is pending.

Mr. DOLPH. It is a part of the pending amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. It will be the amendment, if that is adopted:

Upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888.

But any bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims are covered by the first portion of the amendment. You may insert the word "cash" before "entries."

Mr. GEORGE. I am afraid that will not answer; and therefore I shall insist, in order to remove all doubt on the subject, and it can do no harm, that the words be added:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

Mr. SPOONER. What would the Senator do in cases where there are contests between pre-emptors?

Mr. GEORGE. They must be decided according to the one who has the right to the land.

Mr. SPOONER. I would say to the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that is this: it is not the wrong claim that is confirmed. The one who has a superior claim will have his claim confirmed, and the one who has an inferior claim or a bad claim will not have it confirmed.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not the Senator think that the laws of the United States, as they now exist, are ample to protect bona fide homestead and pre-emption claimants, if it is clearly and expressly declared that nothing in the act shall operate to their prejudice?

Mr. GEORGE. It is not so declared.

Mr. SPOONER. It is so declared, I think; it was intended to be so declared. The main proposition was to confirm certain cash entries.

Mr. GEORGE. Point out in the bill where their claims are confirmed.

Mr. SPOONER. I will undertake to do it.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all I want to have done.

Mr. HOAR. While the Senator is looking for that, I should like to make a modification of my amendment by putting in, after the words "State selections," the words "in Michigan." I understand that to be the meaning of the amendment as it now stands; that it refers to grants heretofore made to the State of Michigan; but some question has been raised whether it would not extend to other States which have not been discussed. I therefore modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed modification.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 strike out the word "and" and insert the words "or under State selections in Michigan confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if the selection of these lands was made and approved to the canal company, how is it that a homestead settler or anybody else, not holding under that company, can rightfully have a title or an interest in the land confirmed to him; and upon what theory the amendment can be sustained, except that there is no title now existing in the canal company or persons holding under them, and that a title is now at this time created by Congress either under the homestead or pre-emption law?

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that is a very plain one, Mr. President. The explanation made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] yesterday showed this state of facts, that owing only to the circumstance that there had been an old grant which had never been complied with of these lands to a railroad company, the location of these lands by the canal company was not valid. I have made up my mind that in the interest of justice and fairness the old claim of the railroad company which is forfeited by this bill, which has nothing but an ideal and nebulous existence, should not stand in the way of the grant to the canal company upon conditions which I understand have been fully complied with.

I am willing to make that confirmation in general terms, but as we must have a confirming act, in the interest of the homesteaders and pre-emptors, I propose to withhold from the confirming act these claims, so that nothing will be done here which will prejudice in any way whatever the interest of that very meritorious class of our citizens.

I hope that is an answer to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SPOONER. I have from the outset stated that I had no desire whatever nor even a willingness to participate in the passage or favor the passage of any proposition which would confirm the title of any one to the detriment of a bona fide homestead or pre-emption claimant. If the language proposed by the Senator from Mississippi strengthens the protection, and I am inclined to think it does, which the original amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan throws around the homestead and pre-emption claimants, I am entirely willing, so far as I am concerned, to support it, and I shall vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is not now in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Are any of these lands in the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. Not one acre.

Mr. GEORGE. They are wholly in the State of Michigan?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I will be satisfied that any language shall be used to preserve the rights of these homesteaders which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], the State in which these claims exist, will declare is satisfactory to him.

Mr. SPOONER. I said what I did because it was an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I thought it was an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I had accepted the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, and it then became a part of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PALMER. It ask that it be read.

Mr. HOAR. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] if I am at liberty to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that that amendment comes in at a different point, and that it can not be accepted in that way.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I do not understand that there is any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. PALMER. I wish to hear it read first.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave, then, if there be no objection, that the vote be first taken on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. PALMER. Let it be read.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to accept my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is not now in order under the rules, because it is an amendment to another part of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. It is in order by unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent that the question be put upon that amendment first. It is not an amendment in the third degree. It is only an amendment in another place in the matter to be amended, so that it is just as much in order as my amendment is in order, except that ordinarily the question would be put on mine first, as I happened to offer it first. I merely ask unanimous consent that the question may be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi before it is taken on mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] has asked to have the amendment read. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 5 of the "amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. PALMER," after the word "States," add the words:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi before the vote is taken on the amendment offered by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the vote will be so taken.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to have the amendment read so as to show how the clause will appear consecutively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as requested.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 5, after the word "States," add the words:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

So as to read:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States; and all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi says that he is in favor of protecting and confirming the rights of persons who have gone upon this land and made application for homestead or pre-emption settlement, because it was within the limits of a railroad grant which, under the decision of the Supreme Court in Schulenberg vs. Harriman, was supposed to be alive at the time the selection was made; and that the granting act to the canal company having been complied with in all respects, this was a mere technical error. I do not think that fact would invalidate the title, for I have myself no doubt that a grant which Congress commands is to terminate by force of law at a particular time, if it be a law, must execute itself.

I have no doubt that if the Ontonagon and Brulé Railroad was not completed according to the requirements of the act of Congress, and the grant was made dependent by the law upon that completion, the selection was a good one. The proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is entirely correct that a valid grant complied with in its terms would give an equitable right to the thing granted, although there was some mere technical error, and that this amendment gives it validity as a matter of law; but that reason is just as good for the whole as for any part of the grant. It is just as obligatory upon the conscience of the Senator from Mississippi to vote the land occupied by the homesteader or any other intruder upon a valid grant as it is upon that unoccupied, and the right of the man who wishes to homestead, who now desires to go upon the land, is just as great, so far as the right is concerned, as the man who is upon it, except that in the latter case he has expended time and effort in his improvement.

But as I understand the case here, there is on one side a certificate of the governor showing compliance with the terms, and on the other there is a declaration of the receiver of the court that there had been no compliance. There is an acquisition of the property by a fraudulent declaration that this grant had not been complied with, and that these lands were not the property of the company. I understand the allegation to be that the present claim of right or title rests upon that fact, and that the same parties are now the owners who were the owners then.

I do not undertake to say that this is true. I say that is the allegation here, and it is made by two committees of Congress, and against it only is the single fact of a certificate by a governor of a compliance with the terms. That I understand to be the case here, so that it can not be put upon the ground that there has been proved here a compliance with the terms of the grant. The Senator from Michigan has had read this morning document after document, the statements of witness after witness, and the report of two committees of Congress, in express denial of that allegation.

I say that notwithstanding that statement, if it be evidenced here that there has been any honest investment in good faith by an innocent purchaser of his money without reasonable notice, and the facts should be proved, I should vote for it; but that fact is not proved. It is not made clear. It may be true. I do not undertake to say that it is not true, but the evidence is to the contrary; but I say that there is no proof at this time as against the evidence of non-compliance to establish the fact of compliance with this grant.

Therefore the proper course for us to pursue would be to instruct the Secretary of the Interior, after excepting this grant from the operation of this act, to take testimony upon that subject, and when it shall come here to protect by positive legislation every man who is an investor, without notice making his investment by either the permissive neglect of the Government in asserting its right or otherwise; and that we should protect him in his rights. Then, if there is a remainder not covered by such cases, let us open the land to settlement by the people of the country.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope we may now have a vote.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts. His amendment is to confirm, I understand, if adopted, all State selections approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOAR. In Michigan.

Mr. SPOONER. Has it been so amended?

Mr. BLAIR. It has been so amended, and besides it is not the question before the Senate. I ask for a vote on the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 5, after the word "States," it is proposed to add the words:

And all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the question on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is laid aside for the consideration of the amendment just reported, proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. Is the Senate ready for the question?

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. It will be again read if desired.

Mr. PALMER. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of the proposed amendment, after the word "States," strike out the words "by sales or entries, by cash warrants or scrip;" and in line 7, after the word "laws," strike out the word "and" and insert "or under State selections in Michigan confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

That in all cases when any of the lands forfeited by the first section of this act, or when any lands relinquished to, or for any cause resumed by, the United States from grants for railroad purposes, heretofore made to the State of Michigan, have heretofore been disposed of by the proper officers of the United States, under color of the public-land laws or under State selections in Michigan confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, where the consideration received therefor is still retained by the Government, the right and title of all persons holding or claiming under such disposals shall be, and is hereby, confirmed.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that amendment will not prevail. As is very evident from what I said this morning it proposes to confirm a grant that is invalid and which the equities of the case, in my opinion, demand should not be confirmed. I shall not weary the Senate any further with any remarks, but it confirms the canal grant, which is the thing about which we have had the contest.

Mr. HOAR. It will be observed that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin does not confirm the grant unless the Secretary of the Interior finds that the title was acquired in good faith for a valuable consideration, which consideration has been received and retained by the Government. All the matters which the Senator has debated have to be passed on by the officers of the Government.

Mr. PALMER. I will say that I should hate to delegate that power to any Secretary of the Interior. I prefer to have it decided here, and I know, if the Senate understood the amendment thoroughly, it would not get ten votes in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PALMER. Yes, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I am not advised as to how he would vote if present. If I were not paired, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but as this is not a party question I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GRAY. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] are paired.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. VANCE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BLODGETT. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHACE. I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] to my colleague [Mr. ALDRICH], and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is necessarily detained from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I am not advised how he would vote. I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended?

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to submit an amendment to section 2, by adding thereto the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands situate in the State of Iowa on which any person in good faith has made or asserted the right to make a pre-emption or homestead settlement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, I am not disposed to interfere with this section of the bill, or with the bill itself, in respect of the interests of other States; but in order to avoid a great deal of confusion and contention in the State of Iowa I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment. I have expressly confined it in its operation to the State of Iowa, and unless it shall be adopted by the Senate all that has been done toward the settlement of the controversies growing out of land grants that were made for the purpose of railroads which have not been completed will be undone. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] shakes his head and announces a negative thereby, but I am not mistaken in my opinion of the effect of the second section of the bill so far as it relates to Iowa.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him as the best way I have to get to an understanding of the matter?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. I suppose the Senator from Iowa must understand that this section would prevent persons in possession from taking the lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will confirm rights in persons who have not now completed rights, and who are in antagonism with others, if the other parties are permitted to take their own course, and will not be able to hold the right that this section would confer upon them without an opportunity to appear in court.

I am not endeavoring to establish any new condition in the State of Iowa. I am simply asking that we shall not have new conditions forced on us, and in order to avoid any conflict with the interests in other States, I have confined the amendment in terms to the State of Iowa.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand the section as the Senator from Iowa understands it. The only object of the section is to provide for a class of persons who are in possession of railroad lands which are forfeited by the first section of the bill, who are not entitled to take the lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, and who must therefore lose their lands or be permitted to purchase them from the United States. As to such persons it is provided that they may purchase them for two dollars and a half an acre.

The necessity for such a provision in the bill grows out of the fact that under the decisions of the courts a grant of lands to a State or to a railroad company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad is held to be a grant in præsenti. The title is in the company. It is upon condition-subsequent that the road shall be completed. The United States is proposing to take advantage of the condition to do what is equivalent to an entry at common law for a breach of condition, and to resume title to the land. Certain of these companies, notably the Northern Pacific (I do not know so well about others), have passed resolutions of their boards to the effect that when they had earned the lands they would recognize the persons in possession of them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DOLPH. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. The company stated that they would recognize persons in possession of the land as having the first right to purchase, and they advertised to that effect. They sent their circulars out and invited settlement upon the lands in advance of the construction of the road. People went upon those lands and made improvements. They are now farmed, and valuable. This provision is intended to enable them to procure title in cases where they can not obtain title to their lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws. It is not intended to cut off the right of parties in possession of those lands under the railroad company to take them now under the homestead and pre-emption laws, if they have not exhausted their right to such claims; but if they have it is intended to secure to them their possession by allowing them to purchase directly from the United States, upon making the proper proof, at two dollars and a half an acre.

If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa proceeds upon the idea that persons who have gone into possession of railroad lands under the railroad company by deed or license, would be compelled to purchase of the United States at two dollars and a half an acre, and could not enter their lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws, then I think it is proceeding under a mistaken construction of the section; but if there is any other condition of facts that requires such an amendment I should be very glad to know it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As I have already stated, I am not undertaking to determine, and I do not ask the Senate to determine, any rule for Oregon, or for Dakota, or Montana, or Washington, or any State or Territory except the State of Iowa.

Mr. DOLPH. I know; but if the rule is necessary for Iowa it may be necessary for some other section of the country, and I want to know what the occasion for the amendment is.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand there are conflicts in the State of Iowa of this character. On some of the land not covered by completed road there are homestead settlers, there are pre-emptors. The same is also the case in some disputed tracts within indemnity limits, which is a question affected by the seventh section of the bill. The lands on which these homesteaders are located are covered in some instances by conveyances from the railroad company of lands within the indemnity limits, in which there have been selections by the State. I want to save to these pre-emptors and homesteaders the rights which they have now, without any interference by the second section of the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know whether there are any other such cases in other States and Territories. I leave that for Senators representing such States and those who may have knowledge of the Territories to determine their own action in regard to the facts; but for the State of Iowa, understanding the conditions there existing, I want no such disturbance cast upon the people of that State as would come from the adoption of the second section of the bill without this amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator assumes that the section would be a disturbance to these titles. If I understand it, it would not. The parties who are entitled to purchase of the United States are parties in possession, who are claiming under deeds or contracts from railroad companies and who have made improvements upon their lands. It does not cut off their right to enter the lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws, if they are entitled to do so, if they have not exhausted their right; but if they have exhausted their right to take a homestead or pre-emption claim, then they must lose their claims which they have made valuable by improvements, or there must be some provision made for their purchasing the lands. If that is the contention made in regard to this section I am not willing to admit it, because I am just as anxious to preserve the rights of these people to enter their lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws as the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am quite content that the Senator from Oregon shall have his own opinion concerning the character of the second section and the effect which would spring from it. I am not asking him to surrender that; but I say there is a condition of affairs existing in Iowa under which persons would be injured, and unjustly so, by the second section of the bill without this amendment. All I ask is that he may entertain his opinion concerning the bill, and let me put in this safeguard with respect to those people in Iowa who have made or attempted to make their pre-emption entries and their homestead claims.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 add the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any lands situate in the State of Iowa on which any person in good faith has made or asserted the right to make a pre-emption or homestead settlement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed as it has passed before it leaves the possession of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

BRIDGES IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 61 of said amendment strike out the word "thereof" and insert the words "of the approval of this act;" and the House agree to the same.

M. W. RANSOM,
G. G. VEST,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
A. R. ANDERSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GEORGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Improvement of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order, which has been heretofore partially considered, is Senate bill 554. Does the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] desire to have the Senate proceed with that bill?

Mr. CHACE. I think we had better do so.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will not that disturb the pleuro-pneumonia bill, which is the unfinished business?

Mr. SAWYER. That is to be taken up to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 544) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, to strike out from the beginning of line 22 of section 2 to the end of the section, as follows:

During the existence of such copyright the importation into the United States of any book or other article so copyrighted shall be, and it hereby is, prohibited, except in the cases specified in section 2505 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and except in the case of persons purchasing for use and not for sale, who import not more than two copies at any one time, in each of which cases the written consent of the proprietor of the copyright, signed in the presence of two witnesses, shall be furnished with each importation: And provided, That any publisher of a newspaper or magazine may, without such consent, import for his own use, but not for sale, not more than two copies of any newspaper or magazine published in a foreign country. All officers of customs and postmasters are hereby required to seize and destroy all copies of such prohibited articles as shall be entered at the custom-house or otherwise brought into the United States, or transmitted to the mails of the United States. In the case of books in foreign languages, of which only translations in English are copyrighted, the prohibition of importation shall apply only to the translation of the same, and the importation of the books in the original language shall be permitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays were ordered on the pending amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and having been taken on a previous occasion the want of a quorum was developed.

Mr. CHACE. As I understand, the Senate was in the midst of a roll-call on the amendment at the time of adjournment when the bill was last under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calling of the roll disclosed the absence of a quorum. The roll-call will proceed on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] on most questions, but not on this bill.

If I may be permitted, as there seem to be several Senators who either were not present or who do not understand the scope of this proposed amendment, I ask unanimous consent to simply make a statement, without any argument, as to the effect of it.

Mr. FRYE and others. It will be replied to.

Mr. CHACE. Very well; I will let the roll-call proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very much obliged to the Senator from Rhode Island, so far as I am concerned, if unanimous consent would be given for that purpose. I really do not understand the amendment, and I trust he will be allowed to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the calling of the roll will be considered as not having commenced.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. CHACE. I do not desire to speak if it is going to precipitate any discussion. I would rather take the question and let the vote go on.

Mr. BROWN (to Mr. CHACE). You had better explain the amendment.

Mr. CHACE. I will simply say for the information of the Senate that this is the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], striking out a certain portion of section 2 of the bill. It is intended to affect, and it will affect, what is called the manufacturing clause, also the right of translation, and also the power of the Government through the collectors and postmasters to prevent the importation of copyrighted books.

I simply wish to make the statement that if the clause is stricken out it takes away from the customs officers and postmasters the right to prevent the importation of any imported books; that it changes the entire operation both of the domestic copyright law as it now exists and of this proposed alteration of the law.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to be permitted to respond to the explanation.

The part of section 2 of the bill which is proposed to be stricken out upon my motion provides simply that, after a foreign author has been permitted to come to the United States and copyright a book, no American shall thereafter import an edition of that book printed abroad, not even by paying the ordinary tariff duties which are now imposed upon books. I propose to strike out that feature and leave the law stand exactly as it is on that question, and not to extend the right of foreigners to prevent the importation of books by securing copyrights in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were here, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE (having voted in the affirmative)——

Mr. CHACE. I understood that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] was paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] on this bill. Am I mistaken? I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he is paired with the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I agreed to pair with him when he should be absent. I saw him here this morning. I shall not vote if the Senator from Rhode Island understands me to be paired with the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CHACE. I so understood.

Mr. GEORGE. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his vote.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to have it recorded, however, that I am in favor of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. BATE (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. I am not advised as to how he would vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota that the Senator from West Virginia, with whom he is paired, would vote "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. SABIN. Then I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES].

Mr. CHACE. I can inform the Senator from Maryland that if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] were here he would vote "nay" on the pending amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is necessarily absent. He would vote "nay" if he were here. He is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Bate,	Gray,	Pugh,	Vance,
Berry,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,	Walthall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Coke,	Hiscock,	Saulsbury,
Bate,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Sawyer,
Berry,	Davis,	Ingalls,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	Dolph,	Jones of Arkansas,	Spooner,

Chace,	Gray,	Quay,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chandler,	Hampton,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Sabin,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators are present—a quorum.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As it is clear that the difficulty about this vote is owing to the fact that a large number of Senators are paired, though a quorum of Senators is present, and I have no desire to obstruct the business of the Senate, I will withdraw the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. It can only be done by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn. A quorum of the Senate have answered to their names.

Mr. CHACE. I move that the vote be taken now on all the amendments adopted as in Committee of the Whole. They are all pro forma amendments, merely verbal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. VANCE. The last vote taken on an amendment showing that there was not a quorum present, I wish to inquire what becomes of the vote on that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The want of a quorum being disclosed, by calling the yeas and nays pursuant to the rule, the Chair ordered the Secretary to call the roll of the Senate, which was done, and 47 Senators answered to their names, showing that a quorum was present. Thereupon the Senator from Arkansas asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, which was given, and the bill is now open to amendment in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VANCE. I have been absent during some of the proceedings, but before I left the city, when this bill was last under discussion preceding my departure, I offered an amendment. I ask leave now to call up that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina was not in order at the time when it was suggested. It is now in order if the Senator desires to submit it.

Mr. VANCE. Then I now offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, in section 4, line 4, after the word "effect," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "and," in line 6, as follows:

And each number of a periodical shall be considered an independent publication, subject to the form of copyrighting as above; and.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That newspapers, magazines, and periodicals shall not be entitled to copyright as herein provided.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the proposed measure of copyright is intended to create a monopoly and enhance the price of the product, making literature and knowledge dear to the people. Almost all nations, I believe, grant a national copyright on the supposition that the disadvantage of monopoly, bad as it is, would be compensated to some extent by the benefit arising from the encouragement of literature and the stimulation of those who write for the people. An international copyright is simply a monopoly. It is a monopoly between America and the chief nations of civilization and the principal authors and sources of knowledge, and as such it becomes doubly objectionable. It will enhance the price of knowledge to all people in this country, as it will to all people in Great Britain. Yielding as far as may be to the necessity or supposed necessity of an international copyright on books proper, I desire to contend as far as I can for cheap literature in the simpler forms of newspapers, magazines, and periodicals, which are most conveniently and cheaply used for the information of the great mass of the people.

Of course we have the ancient and venerable chestnut brought up, which is always made to do duty in behalf of any proposition to put money into individuals' pockets, that this copyright law would operate to cheapen literature. Life is too short to waste time in arguing that as an abstract proposition. If it did not increase the price of literature there would be no demand for it here. It could not possibly stimulate the genius of a man to write and publish books and matter in magazines unless the price of that matter was increased to him. The inclusion of the kind of literature of which I am speaking by this bill will operate, I think, not only to the damage of our own people, but equally to the damage of the reading portion of the civilized world, at least that portion of it which does read literature in the English language.

I wish to read to the Senate the opinion of one of the principal publishers of London, and that we know is the headquarters of the literature of this age and this world. The publication called The Publishers' Circular, a general record of British and foreign literature, is issued bi-monthly in London, and one of the leading publishers expresses his opinion as follows in that publication:

To the Editor of the Publishers' Circular:

SIR: The more one considers the various effects of such a copyright bill as that now before the American Legislature the more obvious it appears that it is not a copyright bill in an international sense at all. It is a bill calculated wholly and solely to throw additional business into the hands of American printers and paper-makers. It should be entitled "A bill to increase the business of printers and paper-makers." It is dead against the interests alike of English and American authors and the American public. On the whole it may be considered to leave American publishers and English publishers in much the same place as they are now. American authors and publishers, anxious for a real copyright, have been obliged to yield, step by step, to more powerful influences till, in despair, they have been compelled to accept a thing which has nothing of copyright in it but the name.

1. It is against the interests of the American public, because it will necessarily make English reprints much dearer than they would be if only once set up instead of twice.

2. It is against the interests of American authors, because it will call for reciprocal treatment of them on this side.

3. It is practically useless for English authors (nine-tenths of them), whose interest is the sole reason for its existence, because it insists on regulations impossible for them to perform.

4. English and American publishers may derive some benefit from it, because both can make such arrangements as will enable them to set up all English books and print them in America for America, and have plates sent to England to print English editions from. The competition between English and American publishers will probably neutralize the decided advantage which either one might derive from this American type-setting clause.

5. The drift of the bill is, therefore, clearly to send all type-setting, English and American, to America. English printers will have to content themselves with presswork from American-made electrotypes. They will clearly be the main sufferers.

6. It seems to me that remonstrance to the American promoters of this bill would only provoke its certain passage in its present form or its total rejection.

7. The only thing to be done is to let it alone. Let the Americans pass it and call it an American international copyright act. Then, in the interests of British manufacturers it will be absolutely necessary that steps should be taken to make this valuable act reciprocal, which would simply mean to prohibit absolutely the importation of American-made stereotype or electrotype plates, and compel the type-setting here of both English and American copyrights.

AN ENGLISH PUBLISHER.

This I give as the opinion of a practical publisher in the city of London, who knows more about it than I do, and the effect, he says, will be clearly to make the British law reciprocal or conform to the American law, and therefore no American author can publish and copyright his productions in Great Britain without having the type set up and the copyrighted book in whole published in London or everywhere else on the day it is copyrighted.

The whole scheme is evidently one whose basis is what is known as protection, or taxing the people to make a few persons rich. That is the object of the whole thing and that underlies it. It is an effort to extend monopoly extra-territorially beyond the jurisdiction of the laws of our country by a grand international conspiracy between publishers, printers, and book-makers everywhere in the civilized world to make literature and knowledge for the people dear.

It is not worth while for any Senator, as I have known some to do in the course of this debate, to go off into grand heroic and literary eloquence about the glories and blessings of literature and the importance of encouraging that divine afflatus which we call genius, for the benefit of mankind, etc., for no odds how high they soar they become much like Mr. Boffin's secretary with the wooden leg, who professionally "rose and fell," and as a friend "dropped into poetry."

However high they soar in the grand heroics of literary eloquence, professionally, as thrifty protectionists, they drop into filthy lucre. That is at the bottom of it as sure as we live, and in opposing the extension of this interdiction on the acquisition of knowledge by the common people by means of the newspapers, the periodicals, and the magazines of the day, I claim to be a better friend to the grand things which emanate from the human mind and a greater admirer of them than those who undertake to make money out of them by placing them out of the reach of the poor.

Why, sir, how long would it be until the commonest newspaper would be copyrighted? How long would it be until every daily edition by which we are informed of the events of the past twenty-four hours would be copyrighted and the price increased to the people if we do not make some exception?

It seems to me that there can be no excuse for carrying this restriction upon human knowledge so far as this bill would carry it. It seems to me that there is no reason assignable why the source of all our knowledge, why the very fountain of all our civilization and advancement, should be made more costly and more inaccessible to the great mass of our people; and I do trust that there is enough sense of justice left in the Senate to vote for this amendment; and if we are determined to extend the copyright monopoly to all literature in book form proper, to extend at least as cheap a literature as possible to the great mass of our people who have not the means to supply themselves with the more costly books.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. VANCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). On this bill I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. He is in favor of the bill, and I presume would vote against this amendment if he were present. I should vote for the amendment if he were present.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bate,	Edmunds,	Pugh,	Turpie,
Berry,	Mitchell,	Reagan,	Vance,
Call,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,	Walthall.

NAYS—28.

Butler,	Farwell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chace,	Faulkner,	Pasco,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Beck,	George,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sabin,

Coke,	Hale,	Paddock,	Stanford,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Palmer,	Teller,
Daniel,	Hearst,	Payne,	Vest,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Voorhees.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. I move to add the following as a new section:

This act shall continue in force for the period of five years, and no longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

This act shall continue in force for the period of five years, and no longer.

Mr. CHACE. This bill is an amendment to the present copyright law, as I understand it, and the effect of the amendment would be to shorten all copyrights, both domestic and foreign, to five years. I may be mistaken, but that is the effect of it, as I understand.

Mr. TELLER. This bill, it is true, is an amendment to the Revised Statutes. If the amendment were adopted as it is, the original law would be in force thereafter, after the five years, without this bill.

I am not myself in favor of this bill, though I do not find the objections to it that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] does. If foreign authors were to have the benefit of American copyright and the American market, I do not myself think it is any hardship on them to say that they shall come here and publish their works here.

I have other objections to this measure. I do not care at this time, after the lengthy discussion of the bill, when the Senate is somewhat tired of it, to enter into a general discussion of the question of international copyright. I believe, however, it will have a tendency, not injurious to American literature particularly, but to increase the price of all literature in this country; and, not believing there is any commensurate benefit for the injury the reading public will receive, I am opposed to the bill. I am in favor of limiting it to a short time, if it is to become a law, until we can see what its practical effect will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to say a word before the question is taken on the passage of the bill. I expect to vote for the passage of this bill, but I desire to say that, as far as I am able to understand the subject, it is not such a bill as I believe should be provided for the exigencies of the case. I think that a simple bill, providing a percentage or a royalty upon the sales of books of foreign authors that may be published or circulated in our country, with suitable restraints and provisions for the protection of the interests of the author in his work, would be much better than the present, as I think, complicated measure. But as this has been a matter of controversy for so many years, and it is exceedingly desirable that there should be some legislation on the subject, and as any legislation which is obtained must necessarily be somewhat tentative and dependent upon experiments in the future as to whether it be really remedial and reaching the purpose or not, I am disposed to vote for this bill as probably the only bill that is likely to be enacted at all.

I rose simply to say this, and to indicate the line of legislation that I think should be pursued to protect the only interest that ought to be protected; that is to give a fair compensation to the author for the production of his mind, for his intellectual work, without at the same time tending to jeopardize the interests of the general public in the direction of cheap knowledge, by building up other interests of a purely material nature—those of the publishers and those interested in the mechanical prosecution of the work.

As I stated before, the bill is not framed on that theory. Some legislation, as I think, is required by justice, and we have before us the whole future wherein to perfect this and any other legislation, so that ultimately we may have legislation which, while it shall protect and do justice to authors, will not at the same time tend in the direction of increasing the expense of ordinary and useful knowledge.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am constrained to vote against this bill, and I desire to state briefly the reasons.

The power given by the Constitution is "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." I do not believe this bill promotes science. I believe it obstructs science. I believe it is unjust to a large number of American citizens who have a taste for reading and who have a desire for improvement. I believe that as to them it will do a great injury by raising the price of good books and good literature.

I am opposed to it for other reasons. The foreign author, as the law now exists in this country, has no right to the exclusive printing and publishing of his work here. This bill grants him a right that he has not got, grants a right to a foreigner at the expense of the rights and of the interests of the great mass of the American people.

For these reasons, sir, I would cast my vote, if I were not paired, against the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill, because I believe it will tend to increase the price of works by which knowledge is acquired by the mass of the people. Not only does the bill apply to books, but it includes newspapers, periodicals, magazines. Now our papers may copy valuable articles from foreign magazines, conveying desirable knowledge and information.

We have carried our own domestic copyright law to a very great extent. Now an article is copyrighted and no newspaper has a right, without the consent of its author, to make any quotations from it. Recently a member of this body published a pamphlet containing a bill introduced by him and the reports upon it and the debates upon it, and copyrighted that, as if to prevent any one using any part of the matter there contained.

Mr. BLAIR. I assure the Senator that I have paid out thousands of dollars to get this country informed in regard to the matters contained in that publication, and never received one single cent in return. I desire to put that on record for the satisfaction of the Senator and any other Senator who may be curious in this matter. I had it copyrighted for this reason: I made myself poor in the effort to give information on this subject to the people of the country who called for it, and I published a large edition of that document, hoping to sell enough so that I might pay for it with a portion and circulate the rest gratuitously. I found the result to be this: The moment I did that I was accused of endeavoring to make gain out of the matter, and as a final result of the whole I paid my bills and gave away the whole edition.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt that is so.

Mr. BLAIR. I only object to the insult. That is all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only referred to this to illustrate the fact that we are carrying our own copyright to a very great extent. I certainly meant no offense to the Senator.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator understand that that was carried to any unusual or improper extent? Let him learn that there is any impropriety before he alludes to it or charges it, and let other Senators do the same.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only referred to that as an illustration of the extent to which our copyright law is carried.

Mr. BLAIR. It is singular no other illustration could be cited.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no desire to question the copyright of that book. Would the Senator desire to prevent its publication by any person who wished to quote from that book? It illustrates the extent to which we are carrying our copyright system. My idea is that any information that a newspaper publisher or a periodical publisher might desire to lay before his patrons would, under the operations of this bill, be entirely protected. A very large portion of the people of this country are people of not very great means; they can not have select libraries, and they are dependent for their information largely upon periodicals and newspapers. If these periodicals and newspapers shall, after the passage of this bill, publish extracts from any English work or periodical, they will be held liable to prosecution for it, and the people will be necessarily cut off from obtaining that information. The remarks of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] on that subject were very pertinent in my opinion.

I shall vote against the bill because I think it is a limitation on the information which the people of this country ought to be allowed to possess.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I rise for two reasons: first to call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, so as to have them spread upon the record, and the other is simply to make a philosophical observation as to the queer constitution of human nature. There has been sent over from the House of Representatives a biennial appropriation bill, appropriating about $22,000,000 for the purpose of opening our harbors and their approaches to foreign commerce, whilst we have standing on the statute-book, with a desperate determination to resist any change therein, tariff duties that prohibit the coming of that foreign commerce for which we are preparing the way at so much expense.

It was but a few short and momentous weeks since that this Senate, with my help, under the lead of the gallant and philanthropic and benevolent Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], passed a bill appropriating $78,000,000 to educate the poor and ignorant children of this country and teach them how to read; and now this same Senate, under the lead of the same benevolent Senator, has just passed a bill increasing the price of books to those poor people and placing reading matter out of their reach. And so we go: a bundle of contradictions, with nothing but the natural and inherent and instinctive greatness of our people and of our country to prevent us from becoming supremely ridiculous in the eyes of the civilized world; and that remark is not copyrighted. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to correct the Senator from North Carolina in one of his remarks. He speaks of the passage of the bill increasing the price of books. Does he refer to the copyright bill?

Mr. VANCE. That is the benevolence of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. VANCE. I have asked for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On the passage of this bill I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BATE (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. I understand from his colleague that if he were here he would vote for this bill. So I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, he would vote for the bill and I should vote against it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is absent, paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Kentucky, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were present, the Senator from Virginia would vote "nay" on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] is paired with me on the passage of this bill. If present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. HOAR. My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has voted.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague, if present, would vote the same way as the Senator from Maryland.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 10; as follows:

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to add:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish additional life-saving stations upon the seacoast of the United States as follows: One near the entrance to Yaquina Bay, Oregon; one at or near the mouth of the Umpqua River, Oregon; one between McKenzie's Head and Peterson's Point, near Loomis Place onto the Head, Washington Territory; one on Peterson's Point, at the entrance to Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a life-saving station on the coast of Delaware or Maryland, at such point between Indian River Inlet, Delaware, and Ocean City, Maryland, as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary for the Senator from Wisconsin to prepare an amendment to the title, unless he adds "and at other places herein named."

Mr. SPOONER. I move that amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The title as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FARWELL, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate allow me to make a motion for the reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the land-forfeiture bill, and I desire to state that I merely wish to offer an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and which passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is not required. The Senator has a right to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. The Chair understands the motion to reconsider to be entered.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Illinois to allow me to make the motion to reconsider the vote by which the forfeiture bill was passed.

Mr. FARWELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion has been entered.

Mr. CALL. I would like to have the question submitted to the Senate and the amendment offered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the vote by which the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. DOLPH. I move that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the motion to reconsider do lie on the table.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire, for information, whether, if the motion to reconsider is laid on the table, that disposes of the motion without affecting the passage of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a final disposition of the motion.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand the amendment to be the one that was discussed in Committee of the Whole and laid upon the table, and I can not yield.

Mr. CALL. Will not the Senator allow me to make a remark? I merely desire to say that my amendment is precisely similar to the text placed in the bill on motion of the Senator from Iowa, in regard to Iowa. It is necessary to qualify and explain clearly, beyond mistake, an amendment already in the bill, relating to grants in the State of Florida. It is to confirm the settlers in possession. I hope the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table will not prevail.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the question is put, I ask unanimous consent to say that the Senator from Florida stated to me his desire to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. I inquired of him what was the amendment he desired to move, and he said it was substantially the same amendment that he moved yesterday, and which was discussed, and by a vote of the Senate laid on the table; and under the circumstances I do not think the Senator is entitled to make this motion. The bill has to go to the other House and be amended there and perhaps go to a committee of conference. I think, under the circumstances, I can not assent to a motion to reconsider. The Senate can take the responsibility, however.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say that there can be no reason why the State of Florida shall be discriminated against when the same amendment substantially has been put on for other States. It is no objection to say that the other House may or may not put on the amendment. I only ask it because since my amendment was voted upon the Senator from Iowa has had an amendment put on the bill effecting substantially the same object.

Mr. DOLPH. I take issue with the Senator there. It is not the same amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed be laid on the table.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EUSTIS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. TELLER. Fearing there may not be a quorum, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Blair,	Cullom,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Stewart,
Chace,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chandler,	Frye,	Palmer,

NAYS—26.

Allison,	Evarts,	Pasco,	Teller,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Pugh,	Turpie,
Berry,	George,	Quay,	Vance,
Brown,	Gray,	Ransom,	Walthall,
Butler,	Hampton,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Morgan,	Spooner,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

Cockrell,	Hale,	Morrill,	Stockbridge,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Paddock,	Vest,
Daniel,	Hawley,	Payne,	Voorhees.
Davis,	Hearst,	Platt,

So the Senate refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOLPH. Is that motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is debatable.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. As I am occupying the floor by consent of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], who asked for the consideration of a bill, I do not feel at liberty, if this motion is to be discussed, to displace him.

Mr. DOLPH. I will inform the Senator that I am not occupying his time, and I am not asking any concession from him in regard to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the position of the question. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] made his motion, as he had a right to do, and it is now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Florida to state that his object in making this motion was in order that he might offer in the Senate an amendment which he offered in Committee of the Whole, which was laid upon the table. That amendment is found printed on pages 4021 and 4022 of to-day's RECORD, and is as follows:

Provided, That the title to the land described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856, which lies adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited in the granting act, and which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida, and are held by purchase from said companies made before the year 1866, are hereby confirmed to such purchasers: Provided further, That all the public lands within the State of Florida are hereby withdrawn from all entries except homestead entries until the pending legislation on the subject shall be disposed of, or until the present Congress shall terminate, and also accept any sales of a quantity not more than 160 acres to one person, the head of a family; and the register and receiver shall have power to sell isolated tracts of land, whether offered or unoffered, when, in their discretion, it shall be thought best.

It will be seen that there are several propositions involved in this amendment. One proposition is to make a different rule for Florida in regard to lands which have been settled upon and sold by the railroad companies than that which is made for every other State and Territory in the Union. By section 2 of the bill which we have passed it is provided—

That in all cases where persons are in possession of any of the lands affected by any such grant and hereby resumed by and restored to the United States, under deed, written contract with, or license from, the State or corporation to which such grant was made, or its assignees, executed in good faith prior to January 1, 1886, they shall be entitled to purchase the same from the United States, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to any one such person, at the rate of $2.50 per acre.

What does the Senator from Florida propose by the amendment which he offered in Committee of the Whole? He gets up in the Senate and states that these lands have not been earned, that they are lands which will be forfeited by this act, and then he proposes by the first clause of his amendment to give to the purchasers from the railroad company—and the term "purchasers" includes mortgagees, because that is a qualified purchase—title without payment, while every person in possession of such land in any other of the States or Territories of the Union must pay two dollars and a half an acre.

Besides, it is not safe for the Senate of the United States to legislate on a single statement of a Senator, made in the Senate upon the passage of a bill, that the lands referred to will be forfeited. I know what the Senator's statement is in regard to those lands.

By the act of 1856 there was granted to the State of Florida land for the purpose of constructing three different lines of railroad. By an act of the same year the State of Florida granted all those lands to three trustees for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and provided that any railroad company chartered under the laws of Florida which should construct a railroad on any of those lines should be entitled to the grant for the road they constructed, and the Senator stated recently, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands, that there was a controversy whether these lands had been earned or not, that certain railroad companies are claiming these lands, while, according to his theory of the case, they have not been earned.

Mr. CALL. Let me interrupt the Senator. The Senator is entirely mistaken. There is not a human being on the face of the earth that denies the right of the settlers covered by the amendment. The only question is that they can not, in the opinion of many lawyers, myself among them, go into the courts because of a technical defect in the title, which I have explained.

It refers only to the completed parts of the line, completed within the time limited in the original granting act.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator was before a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands only Friday last, and in answer to a question put by me as to whether these lands were claimed by railroad companies as earned lands he said of course they were claimed.

So I say, not only does the Senator from Florida propose a different rule in regard to the persons who have purchased of the railroad companies in Florida from that which this bill adopts as to other States of the Union, but he wants us to legislate in regard to lands the title to which is controverted and which are claimed by the railroad companies to have been earned. What reason is there why the citizens of Oregon should pay $2.50 an acre and every person who has purchased of railroad companies the unearned land now, according to the theory of the Senator from Florida, shall get his land free in Florida? Why should the man who has gone upon 320 acres in Eastern Oregon, of the Northern Pacific grant, and made it valuable, pay $2.50 an acre for his land to the General Government, while the mortgagees of the railroads in Florida shall have their titles confirmed by the amendment of the Senator from Florida? That is the effect of it.

Mr. CALL. I will say to the Senator that there is no corporation on the face of the earth in Florida that would derive any title or interest under this amendment. It refers to settlers and purchasers from the railroad companies where the road was completed within the time required by the granting act.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well. I do not myself place much importance upon the question as to whether the road was completed within a certain time——

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the words of the amendment. He seems to misconstrue the whole effect of it.

Mr. DOLPH. I think not.

Mr. GEORGE. It only applies to lands opposite the finished portion of the road when the road was finished within the time fixed in the act of Congress granting the land. That is all. It applies to no other land.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Florida has stood up in his place on more than one occasion here and insisted that these lands were not earned, and on that proposition and on that statement of fact he secured an amendment to the bill as it has passed, authorizing pre-emption and homestead entrymen who had gone on these lands before a certain date to perfect their titles, stating in open Senate that the land had not been earned. Now I understand the Senator from Florida to still take that position that while a road was completed adjacent to these lands the State had never made any designation to the company to receive the grant, the grant had never been transferred to the company; and it is a similar case exactly if he is correct to that in Michigan which we had under consideration yesterday where the Senate adopted an amendment to the bill which undertook to forfeit only lands adjacent to uncompleted road, the amendment saying that it should not prevent the forfeiture of lands in Michigan lying west of a certain point, and the reason given for it by the Senator from Michigan was that another company had built a line within the limits of the indemnity lands of the grant which might claim the land, and he was fearful that under the act as it stood the lands would not be forfeited, but could be claimed by that other company.

That is a similar case exactly to the case of Florida if it is true that the railroad company who built the road were not authorized to build it, were not authorized to earn the grant, had never been designated to receive the grant. I think myself that these lands adjacent to completed road have been earned. I think it will turn out so, and that the Senator from Florida is mistaken. But are we going, where there is a disputed question of fact, where the title to the lands is disputed, and when we have heard upon every bill that has been discussed in the Senate the Senator from Florida declaiming on what he called a confirmation of lands which had not been earned by the construction of the roads—are we going to turn around now and adopt an amendment offered by the Senator to confirm all the sales (and I say a mortgage is a sale) made by these companies of these lands?

This amendment goes further, and proposes to amend the general land laws and withdraw in the State of Florida all public lands—from all entries except homestead entries until the pending legislation on the subject shall be disposed of, or until the present Congress shall terminate, and also except any sales of a quantity not more than 160 acres to one person, the head of a family—

And here is a general provision regulating the duties of the register and receiver of the land office—and the register and receiver shall have power to sell isolated tracts of land, whether offered to unoffered, when, in their discretion, it shall be thought best.

It seems to me that the Senator's two amendments, the one which has been adopted in the bill and the amendment now proposed, do not harmonize. If I understand what he believes he has accomplished by his amendments, in the one he proposes to go back of the question whether these lands were earned and forfeit them to the extent that there are homestead and pre-emption claims upon them. That has been adopted by the Senate and is part of the bill. Now, he comes in and proposes a wholesale confirmation of all persons claiming land under the railroad companies, admitting himself in the Senate that the lands have not been earned. The Senator from Florida shakes his head. Do I understand him now to state that these lands have been earned?

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the purpose is a clear one. The granting act of May 17, 1856, required the entire line of road to be completed within ten years. The entire line of road was not completed within ten years. If, therefore, that technical construction is to be had, as some persons and some courts affirm, then no part of the land was earned, but I certainly have never claimed that where the roads were built, or any portion of them, within the ten years, that substantially, if not technically, they were not earned, and those who bought from the companies ought to have their title confirmed. That is all there is in it.

Mr. DOLPH. Then I ask the Senator what earthly use there is of his amendment, if the road was constructed within the time limited and this act does not undertake to forfeit lands except adjacent to uncompleted road? What is the object of his amendment except to do that which he has denounced in every other bill that has been before the Senate, to go back and by an affirmative act of Congress confirm the title of the railroad company and the grantees of the railroad company to lands adjacent to uncompleted road?

Mr. CALL. I will answer the Senator. The act required a disposal by the Legislature of the State. The Legislature of the State of Florida never made any disposal of this grant, but in the internal-improvement act of the State they did declare that they would give the land which the United States might thereafter grant to the State in aid of these roads to such railroad companies authorized under the internal-improvement act as should construct any part of the line.

It has been held very properly that the State of Florida could not and did not give lands which she had no title or right to, but the Legislature of the State after the expiration of this grant to these railroad companies while under the internal-improvement act had built parts of the lines in conformity with that act, gave to them the land for each 10 miles. Long after the grant expired the Legislature of the State granted to the purchasers from the railroad companies whatever rights the State might have. Therefore, while you have no strict legal title which these persons can enforce in the courts, you have all the substantial rights that the law intended to confer, you have the building of the road by the company designated in the internal-improvement act, you have the recognition by the State of the right of these companies to the land and of the purchasers from them so far as the completed lines are concerned, but you have no legal title which can be enforced in an action of ejectment in the opinion of many good lawyers and the courts.

Mr. DOLPH. The grant of 1856 to the State of Florida was a grant in præsenti. The title is in the State and will remain there until a forfeiture is had by this bill or by some other act of Congress so far as a forfeiture can be had. It is entirely competent for the State of Florida to-day to make a disposition of these lands for the purpose for which the grant was made, and it is immaterial whether it made it in 1856 or made it afterwards. So far as the road has been built and the State has disposed of the land, there is no necessity whatever for the amendment.

Mr. CALL. What harm is there in it?

Mr. DOLPH. Because it involves a question of fact. It does not leave the railroad companies in Florida to contend for their rights under the act like every other railroad company affected by this bill. We assume that the facts as stated are correct; there is no dispute about them. If the road has been built and the State has designated the company to receive the lands and has transferred the lands to it, that is the end of the matter and the conveyances by the railroad company are good.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator, does he say that all the lawyers accept his opinion on that subject? Does he mean to say that because he entertains one opinion of the law it is impossible that the courts and other lawyers may entertain a different one, and that that being the case, legislation shall not be had to make that clear which may be doubtful?

Mr. DOLPH. No; I mean to say that some attention ought to be paid to the report of the Committee on Public Lands in regard to such a bill as this, and that such an amendment as this proposed by the Senator from Florida, which was not considered by the Committee on Public Lands, which was laid upon the table by the Senate in Committee of the Whole, should not now be offered, or at least the vote on the passage of the bill ought not now to be reconsidered to bring the bill back from the House in order that it may be still open for amendment and that we shall renew the discussion upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from Oregon if the proposed amendment is the one laid on the table?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Wisconsin inquires if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is the amendment on which the Senate has already acted. I say to him that I understand it to be the amendment which was laid upon the table by the Senate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. But I will say to the Senator that that was done before the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, by which the bill was amended in substantially the same respect.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator has repeated that over and over again. There is no more similarity between the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida than there is between a mouse and an elephant, only they are both amendments and so a mouse and an elephant are both animals. What was the amendment of the Senator from Iowa? It was an amendment to section 2, which provides that persons in possession of lands under a railroad company under deed or contract from the railroad company shall be entitled to purchase from the United States. The Senator from Iowa, supposing that there might be a contest about lands in the State of Iowa between persons claiming under the railroad companies and persons in possession of the lands under the pre-emption and homestead laws, simply provided that this section 2 should not apply to lands in the State of Iowa upon which there were settlements under the homestead and pre-emption laws.

Mr. CALL. Now let me ask the Senator a question. What was the object of that amendment? What was the purpose, what effect did it have? To protect settlers; to protect occupants on the lands of the railroad companies? Answer me that question, and then tell me what this amendment is for.

Mr. DOLPH. Section 2 of this bill as it passed applies to the forfeited lands of every railroaad company in the United States that comes within the purview of this bill.

Mr. CALL. I ask whether the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa was not to protect actual settlers upon the granted lands under color of purchase or otherwise from the railroad companies?

Mr. DOLPH. It was not. It was to prefer persons who were on these lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws as against persons who were on them under the corporations. So it was an amendment dissimilar from that offered by the Senator from Florida in that respect. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is to confirm all sales in Florida made by the railroad companies. Now, if they are earned lands it is not necessary, because they are not disturbed by this bill. If they are unearned lands that this amendment refers to, then the Senator proposes a different rule for Florida from that which exists for Oregon and the other States of the Union.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. DOLPH. No; I think we had better settle this.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to know exactly what there is before the Senate. Is there a motion to reconsider pending, or is the bill itself under discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1430 was passed.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill has been passed, and I do not see how it can be discussed after it has been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will yield, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope, before the Senator presses that motion——

Mr. BUTLER. I will not press it unless the Senator from Oregon yields.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know where the bill is.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senate adjourns with this motion pending it will be here for the next three days.

Mr. BUTLER. I would rather be here for three days than be here at this time of the evening. Of course, I will not press the motion if the Senator from Oregon does not yield.

Mr. DOLPH. I am through. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that the pending motion be taken up and disposed of to-morrow morning, immediately on the termination of morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at the close of morning business to-morrow the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. I will not interpose an objection if we can have a vote by 2 o'clock; if not, I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that motion the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 10, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, by unanimous consent, the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as relates to the reports of committees was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of an appropriation to supply deficiencies for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. GREEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 67) to perfect the military record of John C. Green, of Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM H. ROBERTSON AND E. L. HEDDEN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], chairman of the Committee on Claims, asks to have an order entered, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to request the Senate to furnish the House with an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1198) for the relief of William H. Robertson and Edward L. Hedden, late collectors of customs for the district of the city of New York, the copy thereof heretofore sent to the House having been mislaid.

The order was made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BLANCHARD, for ten days from May 9, on account of important business.

To Mr. BUTLER, for eight days, commencing with to-day.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, BRUSSELS.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 70) appropriating $30,000 for the international exhibition at Brussels, Belgium.

The joint resolution was read.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION OF THE OHIO VALLEY.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888, and that the same be put on its passage.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I can state in a moment what the bill contains, and with the consent of the House I will do so. The States of the Northwest and of the Mississippi Valley have arranged for an exposition in commemoration of the formation of civil government in the Northwest Territory. For that purpose they have already provided buildings, which they have paid for, costing over a million dollars, and have provided a fund beyond that of over a million dollars more. They ask no aid whatever. They simply ask that the Executive Departments may participate in the exposition. The request is made by every State west of the Alleghanies and assented to by the States east of the Alleghanies, and those States have all taken part in the preparations for the exposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have an amendment which should be added to this bill before it is passed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. An amendment has been prepared to which there is no objection, providing that certain historical archives may, at the discretion of the committee, be taken to Marietta and remain there during three days on the occasion of the celebration of the early settlement at that place and the establishment of civil government in the Northwest Territory.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume the amendment need not be read. The statement of my colleague [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] covers the substance of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 22 insert the following:

"Provided, That said committee may, in the exercise of its discretion, allow such documents and exhibits as relate to the early settlement at Marietta, Ohio, and the establishment of civil government in the territory northwest of the Ohio River, to be taken to Marietta and exhibited during the time from July 15 to 19, 1888, inclusive, under such restrictions and custody as said committee may provide."

Mr. BLAND. Who is to pay the expense of transportation?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The Government pays the expense of its own participation; that is all. No Government aid is asked.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the bill is now before the House for consideration, I think it should be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the States which comprise the Northwest Territory and the adjacent States will hold at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888, a centennial exposition commemorative of the organization of the Northwest Territory, under the ordinance of 1787, in which exposition all the States and Territories of the United States and the General Government have been invited to participate, the object being in said exposition to present a panorama of the nation's resources and present state of progressive development by an exhibition of the products of agriculture, of the various industries, and fine arts; also the results of advancement made in the sciences; the whole illustrating the opportunities secured to and the possibilities which wait upon the citizens of this Republic; and

Whereas the citizens of the Ohio Valley and the several States adjacent thereto have made suitable and adequate preparation and arrangements for holding said exposition, and are desirous—and it being fit and proper—that the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Department of Agriculture, the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, should participate in said exhibition: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the head of each of the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Commissioner of Agriculture, and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to prepare and make suitable exhibits at the said Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, beginning on the 4th of July and closing October 27, 1888.

That there shall be appointed a committee of Congress composed of nine members, three to be appointed by the President of the Senate and six by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Said committee shall constitute an advisory board to confer with the managers of said exposition and the heads of the several Executive Departments and bureaus in reference to the character, extent, and conduct of the Governmental exhibits provided for herein. Said advisory board is authorized and directed to visit said exposition and make such report to Congress in that behalf as they may deem needful and proper.

That to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Department of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in said exposition, to be held as aforesaid, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $150,250, apportioned as follows:

For the War Department, $7,150.
For the Navy Department, $15,000.
For the State Department, $2,500.
For the Treasury Department, $7,500.
For the Interior Department, $36,100.
For the Department of Agriculture, $20,000.
For the Post-Office Department, $5,000.
For the Department of Justice, $2,000.
For the Smithsonian Institution, including the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, $50,000.
For expenses of advisory board, $5,000.

That the said advisory board may, if in their judgment it shall be deemed necessary and expedient in order to secure the best results with greatest economy, transfer a part of the fund hereby apportioned to one Department or bureau to another Department or bureau. The term bureau wherever used herein shall be construed to include the Agricultural Department and the Smithsonian Institution.

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to detail an officer of the Pay Department of the Army or Navy to disburse the fund appropriated by this act.

That payments on account of expenses incurred in the carrying out and into effect of the provisions hereof shall be made on itemized vouchers approved by the representative of the Department incurring the liability, and a board of audit composed of not less than three persons, one of whom shall be appointed by the committee of Congress: Provided, however, That payment of the expenses incurred by the advisory board shall be made on vouchers approved by the president of said board.

That the head of each of said Executive Departments and of the Department of Agriculture and Smithsonian Institution shall, from among the officers or employés thereof, appoint a suitable person to act as representative of such Department or bureau, and said representative shall, under the direction and control of the head of the Department or bureau, supervise the preparation and conduct of the exhibits herein provided for.

That no officer or employé appointed as aforesaid shall be paid extra or additional compensation by reason of services rendered in virtue of such employment; but nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent the payment of the just and reasonable expenses of any committee, officer, or employé appointed or employed under and by virtue of the provisions of this act.

That all articles imported from the Republic of Mexico or the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of being exhibited at said exposition shall be admitted free of duty, subject, however, to such conditions and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may impose and prescribe.

Mr. BLAND rose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I call for the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the previous question will not be ordered. This bill seems to carry an appropriation of about $200,000, and I think it ought not to be run through in this way.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. After the previous question has been ordered I will yield to my friend from Missouri whatever time he may want.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be ordered, as there has been thus far no debate on the bill, there would be thirty minutes allowed for debate under the rules.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLAND rose.

The SPEAKER. There are now thirty minutes for debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not occupy all that time.

Mr. BLAND. I do not desire to occupy any considerable time in discussing the bill; but it is before the House by unanimous consent, and I do not think members have been paying much attention to it. Yet it is a bill which, if I understand, carries an appropriation of some one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] will explain the bill briefly, and let us vote upon it.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think the Government ought to go into this exhibition business at its own expense, transporting the exhibits of these Departments in this way.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. On that question I call for a division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 76, noes 14.

Mr. BLAND. I will not take up the time of the House by calling for a quorum; but it does seem to me that a measure of this kind ought to receive more deliberate consideration.

The SPEAKER. On the question, Shall the bill pass, the ayes are 76, the noes 14. [A pause.] The bill is passed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Calendar and passed House bill 7222. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that if the measure elicits any debate I will withdraw it.

The bill with the amendments of the Committee on Agriculture was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7222) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish agricultural stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the grant of money authorized by the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto," are subject as therein provided to the legislative assent of the States or Territories to be effected thereby; and that such installments of the appropriations as may be now due or may hereafter become due, and the Legislature may not be in session, the governor of said State or Territory may make the assent therein provided, and upon a duly certified copy thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury he will cause the same to be paid in the manner provided in the act of which this is amendatory, until the termination of the next regular session of the Legislature of such State or Territory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MILLS. Does the bill make any appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. None whatever. It simply provides that when the Legislature of any State or Territory is not in session the governor may, on behalf of the State, accept the appropriations under the act of Congress to which the bill is amendatory. The passage of the bill is made necessary by a ruling which has been made on the subject by the Comptroller, and will remove a difference of construction which has arisen.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Agriculture were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLS. I object, and call for the regular order.

CONVICT LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman from Texas insists upon the regular order, I wish he would permit me to present, in compliance with a request of the officers of the Pennsylvania Prison Society, their memorial against the anti-convict-labor bill. They have asked that their memorial be read to the House; but in order to save time I will merely request that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. The request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] having been refused, I must object to any further request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the regular order.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COGSWELL. I desire to correct a statement which I find in the RECORD; I shall not occupy more than a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] asks unanimous consent to occupy a moment in correcting a statement in the RECORD.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose it is the gentleman's right to make the correction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what is the nature of the correction which the gentleman desires to make.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] the other day made a statement in regard to the Secretary of War, which will take me about a minute to correct. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in the absence of objection.

Mr. COGSWELL. The gentleman from Nevada in his remarks on the tariff bill said, as I find his language reported in the RECORD of the 8th instant, on page 4001:

William Endicott, jr., of Boston, Mass., a Cabinet officer of this Republic, its Secretary of War, was admitted in 1877—meaning admitted to membership in the Cobden Club. William Endicott, jr., of Boston, a gentleman well known to me, is not a Cabinet officer in this Republic; is not its Secretary of War. He is a gentleman of prominence, and is, or has been, a member of a large importing firm, and an occasional writer upon economic questions. He may possibly be a member of the Cobden Club——

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COGSWELL. But William C. Endicott, the Secretary of War——

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, if this is to take up any further time I shall be compelled to interpose an objection.

Mr. COGSWELL. I had nearly finished my statement. [Cries of "Regular order!"] It was in regard to the gentleman's own Secretary of War that I desired to make a correction.

Mr. BLAND. If we are to have tariff speeches let them come in in the regular way. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COGSWELL. You allowed a statement in the case of Mr. Hewitt. This refers to a statement made in reference to your own Secretary of War, which I desired to correct.

The SPEAKER. But the regular order is demanded.

BRIDGES, GRAND FORKS, DAK.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7348) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges at said city across the Red River, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend as follows: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

JAMES PHELAN,
CHAS. F. CRISP,
Managers on the part of the House.
G. G. VEST,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
C. K. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The conference committee submit the following statement in explanation of the amendment:

Report of managers on the part of the House upon the disagreement between the two Houses concerning Senate amendment to House bill No. 7348.

The managers appointed on the part of the House upon the disagreement between the two Houses concerning Senate amendment to House bill No. 7348 respectfully report:

That the only effect of the Senate amendment is to authorize the city of Grand Forks, Dak., to issue bonds in the sum of $50,000, to construct the two free bridges authorized in the bill.

The act approved July 30, 1886, restricting special legislation in the Territories, prevents the city from bonding itself for the purpose of constructing these bridges without authority from Congress. The bridges connecting Grand Forks with East Grand Forks have been swept away, and the people are very anxious to reconstruct them, and for the authority to do so. This legislation is necessary to enable the people to reconstruct the bridges, and your committee recommend concurrence in the Senate amendment.

CHAS. F. CRISP,
JAMES PHELAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. With the understanding that reports may be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees be permitted to file them for proper reference with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry in this connection. I desire to submit an adverse report and ask to have the matter reported upon placed upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can send the report to the desk, and the reference will be made accordingly. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was then agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

BUSINESS ENVELOPE.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely the petition and resolution in relation to a business envelope; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MONUMENT AT NEWBURGH, N. Y.

Mr. STAHLNECKER, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably the following resolution which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to this House copies of all reports made to him by the engineers of the War Department or others relating to the present condition of the work on the monument at Washington's headquarters, in the city of Newburgh, State of New York, and any other information relating to the same in possession of his Department, together with any recommendation he may deem proper to make in relation to the completeness thereof, according to the plans adopted therefor by the joint committee of the Senate of the United States and this House.

ANCIENT AND HONORABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL CORPS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 9907) to make enlisted men of the signal corps responsible for public property; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAY OF DISTRICT ATTORNEYS, DEPUTY MARSHALS, ETC.

Mr. COWLES, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 4308) to abolish fees and perquisites of United States district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, and deputy marshals, and provide salaries for the same;

A bill (H. R. 3270) to regulate the payment of compensation due to deputy marshals;

A bill (H. R. 1174) relating to the compensation and duties of the United States attorneys;

A bill (H. R. 7844) to fix a salary in lieu of fees for the clerks of the circuit and district courts at Paduca, Ky.; and

A bill (H. R. 1278) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and other court officers, and for other purposes.

He also, from the same committee, reported, in lieu of the foregoing bills, a bill (H. R. 9908) relating to the compensation of United States district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals, circuit and district court clerks, and commissioners; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS IN SEVERALTY.

Mr. HUDD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported in the nature of a substitute for the bill H. R. 6695 a bill (H. R. 9909) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians upon the Oneida Reservation in Wisconsin, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 6695) of the same title was ordered to be laid upon the table.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows.

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, the revenue received into the national Treasury has been in excess of the ordinary expenses of the Government for every year since the year 1865.

This excess has varied, from time to time, as the expenses were increased or decreased, or as the rate of internal-revenue taxes or customs duties have fluctuated in a descending scale.

For the year 1874 the excess was only $2,344,882.30.

In the year 1882 it reached the large sum of $145,543,810.71.

For the year ending June 30, 1887, it was $55,567,849.54, not including the amount appropriated to the sinking fund.

For the twenty-two years ending June 30, 1887, the total excess was $1,491,845,953.12, or an average of nearly sixty-eight millions, annually. This excess is what is known as the surplus revenues of the Government. There is, therefore, nothing new or strange in the fact that there is a surplus of revenue coming into the Treasury.

But the people of this country having determined that a national debt is not desirable, and that our obligations should be promptly met at maturity, have directed that this constantly accruing surplus should be applied to the payment of the national indebtedness.

The result is that the principal of the interest-bearing public debt has been reduced from $2,381,530,294.96 on the 31st day of August, 1865, to $1,038,199,762 on the 1st day of May, 1888.

During this time the annual interest charge has been reduced from $4.29 per capita of population to 67 cents.

The wisdom of a policy that has produced such splendid results is not now a matter of discussion.

It is conceded on all sides that next to the victories that made us a nation was the success of that financial policy that made us independent and respected among the nations of the earth.

That we should continue in this course and discharge every farthing of our indebtedness requires no argument; but we are told that we have reached a point where the funded debt of the Government is not subject to payment on call, and that if the surplus continues to flow into the Treasury, it can not now flow out. I do not think we are confronted with any such condition of affairs.

In the debate had not long ago on the bill providing for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury, I thought it was very clearly shown by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] that the Secretary of the Treasury has had, and now has, full power and authority under the provisions of section 2 of the act of March 3, 1881, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government, to apply the surplus money in the Treasury to the purchase and redemption of United States bonds, and the recent action of both Houses of Congress on a similar measure amounts to a legislative declaration that this view of the Secretary's authority is correct.

It may not be wise, however, that the Secretary should be restricted to this course only. But Congress should not be driven into any hasty or ill-considered legislation respecting the tariff while the Secretary has this authority to dispose of the surplus in a legitimate and proper way.

We are not going far wrong when we are paying our debts. Many business men have anticipated their notes at bank and paid their debts before they came due.

The only difficulty in the matter is that the Government of the United States has become so good a creditor under twenty-four years of Republican administration that its bonds drawing 4 and 4½ per cent. interest per annum are at a considerable premium.

If our credit were not so good and these bonds were down to par, there would be no difficulty whatever in the situation.

When the Democratic party went out of power in 1861, leaving an empty Treasury, and 6 per cent. Government bonds at 12 per cent. below par, there was no such problem as this presented for solution. The question now is, what better course can be pursued with reference to this surplus than applying it to the purchase of United States bonds?

I am in favor of an economical administration of the affairs of the Government. I do not think we should indulge in any extravagant expenditures simply because we have the money, but I do think that Congress should observe the requirements of the Constitution, and "provide," as directed, "for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

I hope we may never have another war. I look forward to the time when national differences may be settled by arbitration; but that time has not yet come, and a defenseless condition will not hasten it.

The coast-line of the United States is absolutely unprotected against foreign assault, and nearly all our large cities are so exposed as to be at the mercy of the first invader.

The city of San Francisco alone has two hundred and fifty millions of property exposed to destruction if, unhappily, we should have trouble with any foreign power.

I think the part of wisdom requires that we should provide for the proper defense of our large cities on the seaboard, and a small part of the surplus might with propriety be applied in this direction.

An economical administration of public affairs requires also that we should provide suitable accommodations for the convenient transaction of public business.

What economy, I would like to know, is there in refusing appropriations for the construction of proper buildings for Government purposes? No business enterprise in the country, of any value or permanence, is so poorly provided with accommodations in this respect as the General Government is in many places.

There has been some talk about the farmers of the country and the necessity for providing for their interests. I hope we may turn our attention in that direction and give their claims careful consideration. And particularly should we listen to the appeals of those hardy pioneers who, facing dangers and trials, have conquered the territory of an immense empire for American civilization.

The men who go into the far West, and, blazing their way into a great wilderness, build up homes and establish States, are entitled to be heard.

What do they say? They have presented numerous petitions here and at the General Land Office showing that there are thousands of people seeking homes in the West who can not obtain them because the lands have not been surveyed by the Government.

Read the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and learn how widespread this complaint has become.

In California alone these unsurveyed lands amount to about 33,000,000 acres. Thousands of settlers have already gone upon these lands, expecting that the Government would perform its duty in making surveys so that they might obtain their homes; but Congress, under a mistaken policy of economy, refuses to make the necessary appropriation. Here is a practical way of serving some of the farmers, where every dollar expended will be for their benefit.

I might go on and multiply illustrations showing how, in our domestic postal and foreign mail service; in extending our foreign commerce; in creating a merchant marine service; in increasing the efficiency of our consular service, and in building a navy, the Government could with propriety discharge its duty to the people by applying some of the surplus revenue in performing its legitimate and necessary functions as a government. As was said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], "It costs something to maintain a Government for sixty millions of people."

The bill under consideration has no such liberal purpose in view. Instead of building up the country it will restrict its legitimate operations and retard its growth.

The new industries in process of development are to be destroyed, our home market handed over to the foreign importer, and a new and important mercantile marine service on the Pacific coast strangled in its infancy.

How is this to be done? By so reducing the revenue as to destroy the protective features of the present tariff with respect to many industries.

It is proposed by this bill to reduce the revenues of the Government in the estimated sum of $78,176,054.22, as follows:

Internal revenue	$24,455,607.00
Free-list (customs)	22,189,505.48
Reduction on dutiable articles (customs)	31,530,941.74
Total	78,176,054.22

A reduction of the internnal-revenue taxes is proper, but if it shall be determined to discontinue for the present the payment of the national debt and continue the policy of restricting the expenditures of the Government to objects of absolute necessity, then the proposed reduction of internal-revenue taxes is not sufficient.

The whole reduction, whatever it may be, should be taken from the internal revenue, and the customs duties so adjusted as to afford a fair and reasonable protection to our own industries.

The remission or reduction of customs duties without regard to the question of protection is vicious in the extreme, but such an unwise and unpatriotic course would be particularly destructive on the Pacific coast, where we have some knowledge of the effect of cheap labor and its products, and the necessity for protection to our own labor.

The Chinaman is the best example of cheap labor in the world, but we know from actual experience that his labor does not contribute to the general prosperity of the country; and we have been compelled in self-defense to seek protection against his invasion of our territory by treaty stipulations and Congressional legislation.

We have asked that this Chinese labor be excluded from the country, because we know that its continuance would degrade our own labor and be destructive of the best interests of the whole people.

There is a reciprocity in the affairs of civilized men that suffers when you introduce the element of cheapness as the objective point in the employment of labor.

Cheap labor anywhere means a lower scale of existence for the majority of the people where it prevails. It means more than that; it means a lowering of the scale wherever the product of cheap labor is carried into competition with that which is better paid.

Hence it is that the exclusion of the Chinaman from this country will be of little value as a measure of protection to our laboring classes if the product of Chinese labor is to be admitted through the custom-house free of duty to compete with our own productions.

We have just negotiated a new treaty with China, the purpose of which is to protect American labor by absolutely excluding Chinese laborers from the country, but can any one tell me the value of such a treaty if we are going to have free trade with China and no protection against her productions?

But the friends of the bill under consideration deny that it is a free-trade measure, because it does not abolish the custom-houses altogether. This is simply an evasion. It is not necessary that the bill should go that far to cease to be a measure of protection.

The question is, what is the purpose of this bill? To reduce taxation? Not entirely, for if this had been its sole purpose a better method could have been devised. It has another and more serious object in view, which is to open the markets of this country, where labor is the best paid in the world, to the foreign importer, that he may sell the products of cheap labor in competition with our own. Indeed, this appears to be the main object of the bill as declared by some of its friends.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], in his speech the other day in support of this bill, stated the proposition candidly and pointedly.

I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 27, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. Our friend from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] seems to be good natured about submitting to interrogatories.
Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.
Mr. PERKINS. Then I will ask the gentleman a question. Do you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.
Mr. PERKINS. Then you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Who said so?
Mr. PERKINS. Does it not necessarily follow?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I think so.
Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly. I think that is right.

Subsequently, in referring to the importation of contract labor, the gentleman adhered to the logic of his position as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina is in favor of prohibiting the immigration of contract labor?
Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; I believe in freedom all around.

The gentleman from South Carolina is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and, by virtue of his ability and position, one of the leaders on the Democratic side of this House. His declarations are therefore important as indicating the views of the majority.

The purpose of this bill, then, is the inauguration of a policy that will enable us to buy where we can buy the cheapest, hire where we can hire the cheapest, and with such general "freedom all around" as to admit the contract laborer from China, Canada, Mexico, or Europe. Against any such doctrine as this I desire to enter my solemn protest.

Located midway between Europe and Asia, we have but to open our ports to these two immense reservoirs of cheap labor to have our laboring people overwhelmed and swept out of existence. This danger is nearer and more clearly defined to the people of the Pacific coast than elsewhere, because we are confronting a nation of nearly four hundred millions of people, where the compensation of labor has been reduced to the very lowest point. We have, therefore, considered this question in all its bearings and in all its relations to our industrial system, and while we have had and now have but one opinion upon the subject our earnest demand for protection against the evils of cheap labor has often been treated with indifference, because it was looked upon as merely the cry of the "Sand Lot." But gradually the country is becoming aware of the dangers of the situation and thoughtful people have come to appreciate the correctness of our position. As evidence of this better information upon this important subject I shall read a portion of an article on the Chinese question by the Rev. J. H. Allen, published in the Unitarian Review of Boston, in December, 1885, as follows:

The Chinese laborer—absolutely destitute at home, born very possibly on a raft and having never set foot on shore—is imported by contract, like cattle, at a rate of fifteen or twenty dollars a head, by some one of the six companies to which all Chinese in this country are amenable. (It is needless to say that this does not include those few who may come over independently, or those who may work themselves free afterwards.) The company provides the cost of his passage and outfit, and he remains the company's bondman till that debt is paid. He can not escape it, as an Irish servant most likely will if you try the rash experiment of advancing her passage money from the old country; for there is an invisible tribunal he must respect, with the alternative of a knife-blow in the dark or some other penalty equally sharp and cogent. It is the company's interest that he shall keep his share of the bargain with his employer, and it may be taken for granted that he will fairly do it. To do him justice, he will be equally faithful when he works on his own account; what we may call the industrial morale of the Chinaman is admirable. All transactions on a larger scale between employer and employed are made through the agents of the company.

A gang of fifteen or fifty or a thousand men can be ordered like so much machinery or so many cattle to be delivered on such a spot at such an hour. There are no disputes about the terms, which have been settled beforehand with the company. There are no misunderstandings with the men, since a foreman, with sufficient knowledge of English, representing the company, settles the wages of each man by a method of their own, receives the pay in a lump at the end of the week, gives each laborer his "penny a day" to live on, paying over the rest till his account with the company is settled, and is the general interpreter, arbiter, and umpire of the contract (so far as his men are concerned) in all of its details. What could be more blissfully complete in the view of the economist? Yet, strange to say, this serene and utopian view does not in the least propitiate the Knight of Labor, or go ever so little way to soothe his animosity, representing, as he does, a more formidable element in the situation. For he sees with a vague and unreasoning terror, the more clearly in proportion to his intelligence, that the hundred and fifty thousand, more or less, already here are only the first driblets of a flood, immeasurable and irresistible, that is held in check just now by dikes of law and general opinion, which certain idealists and economists are doing their best to undermine. There is no extravagance in saying that there are at any given time, among the hundreds of millions of the Chinese Empire, as many as fifty millions of the male working class, of emigrating age, to whom it would be vast gain to come to America for such poor chances as Chinamen here enjoy; and there is no obvious difficulty, granting time and motive for preparation, why a million a year should not be landed in this paradise of their hope, without in the least relieving the misery at home or diminishing the pressure of the supply. This thing, it is true, looms vaguely like a cloud, of which we are not bound to calculate the bulk and density very closely. The dread of it is felt, not reasoned.

But we need not wonder very much at the rage and despair that impel the laboring class blindly against the possibilities of this monstrous invasion. Not that a sudden avalanche of Asiatic hordes is any way likely; not that the acts of blind wrath that have been perpetrated are not shocking, unpardonable, to be energetically put down. Such acts are inexcusable, mainly because (as I said at first) the problem in its present stage is not at all a formidable one, and we are in an experimental or waiting period. Still if all repressive legislation should be abolished and if the floodgates should be thrown wide open, we may take it as the challenge to a conflict in the not very far-off future, which will as much outrun the restraints of our placid every-day ethics as the abnormal, demonic, yet historically justifiable passion of the Crusades or of the French revolution.

This humanitarian and believer in the great principles of the moral law points significantly to this practical issue in the impending controversy, which he says can not be disposed of by resorting to any stale maxims about the right of every man to get a living where he can or hire his labor in the cheapest market.

To invite China and Europe to meet in free competition in this country in the sale of cheap labor or its products is to set in operation forces that would destroy American industries and undermine the very foundations of our social and industrial system.

But let me say to you gentlemen on the other side of the House that no fine-spun theories concerning the advantages of free trade, disguised in the form of a tariff for revenue only, can prevail against the great practical fact that this country has been dedicated by the people to American enterprise and the maintenance of American institutions.

The supposed tax on the poor man's blanket, introduced so vehemently into this debate, is a false issue, both theoretically and practically.

The real laboring men of this country know the difference and value of the physical protection afforded by a cheap foreign-made blanket as compared with the substantial economical protection of the American flag under our present system.

This not an appeal to sentiment, but to the symbol of a living fact.

It is not cheap labor, or cheap blankets, or cheap things generally that our people so much require as good wages and the simple protection that will enable them to develop the resources within their reach, and through home demand and fair competition have a home market better and more certain than all the other markets of the world.

If Great Britain, with free trade, has the market of the world for her manufactures, and is therefore prosperous, as you gentlemen claim, why is this prosperity not general among the laboring classes, and why are they coming to this country by thousands, where their blankets, according to the statement of the revenue reformers, will be taxed in such an outrageous manner?

During the year ending June 30, 1887, the immigration into the United States from Great Britain reached the large number of 161,748, and for the ten years ending on that date the immigration from the same source was 1,237,256.

These people certainly came here to better their condition. Had the advantages in favor of labor been greater there than here, the immigration would have been the other way.

The fact is, as every one knows, that labor is better paid and wage-workers better fed here than elsewhere.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], in his able speech delivered in Boston on the 25th of March last, before the Tariff Reform League and the Home Market Club, in favor of protection, furnished interesting statistics concerning wages here and in Europe. The statement showing the rate of wages paid in certain industries in England and in the United States, which he says was carefully prepared from reliable information and authority, is worthy of careful study at this time. The statement shows the rate of wages paid weekly, unless it is otherwise stated. It is as follows:

Mr. Mulhall, whose statistics are regarded as authority by some free-traders, furnishes a table of average wages paid in various countries, together with the relation between wages and cost of food.

From this table I obtain the following comparative statement for the United States and Great Britain:

Country.	Average per week.			Ratio.
	Wages.	Food.	Surplus.	Wages.	Food.	Surplus.
United States	$11.66	$3.88	$7.78	100	33	67
Great Britain	7.53	3.40	4.13	100	45	55

It will be seen that while the American workingman pays more for his food he gets far better wages than his brother across the sea, and at the end of the day comes out ahead, not only with a much larger surplus than the Englishman, but with 22 per cent. more of his own higher wages saved than the other has of his lower wages.

It is also a fact that our laboring classes consume a larger quantity and a better quality of food than the laboring people of any other country, and in any view the protective system secures to our laboring men more ease and comfort than they can possibly obtain elsewhere.

But it is said that the protective tariff is the cause of pauperism, and the poor "tramp" is pointed out as one of the products of the "robber system."

Let us examine the official statistics and see what information we obtain of this point. We will take the year 1880 for comparison, so that we may have the census of that year for authority. The returns are as follows:

Country.	Population.	Whole number of persons relieved.	Ratio of paupers to population.
United Kingdom	34,622,930	1,037,404	1 to 33
United States	50,155,783	88,665	1 to 565

It must be remembered, in this connection, that by the poor law of Great Britain, 4 and 5 William IV, chapter 76, as amended by act of 12 and 13 Victoria, chapter 103, it is provided that the guardians of the English parishes may expend money to assist poor people in their emigration out of the country to the extent of £10, or $50 to each person so assisted.

This large bounty has necessarily resulted in the deportation of a large number of worthless people to our shores since the cost of transportation from Liverpool to New York has been reduced to less than one-sixth of that sum.

This plan of assisting paupers to leave the country has been found a cheap and effective way of transferring the burden of supporting these people from the tax-payers of England to the tax-payers of the United States, and our customs and consular reports show that the plan has been adopted and carried out with success. It will be found, therefore, on careful investigation that a large number of our tramps and paupers are alien immigrants and the products of foreign industrial systems, and not our own.

As long as humanity continues imperfect there will always be poor and dependent people under the most favorable circumstances.

There is no evidence, however, that a protective tariff is responsible for the presence of these unfortunate people in this country, while, on the other hand, the fact that there are so many more paupers in Great Britain than there are in the United States, according to the population, indicates that the industrial system of that country is responsible for the excess.

In further support of this view, I beg leave to call your attention to the following extract from a letter of Mr. Howard Vincint, M. P., to the London Times, concerning the condition of industrial affairs in Great Britain at this time, under the free-trade system prevailing there. He says:

No national party could possibly ignore the serious state of affairs now prevailing. It is detailed from day to day in your columns. Land worth from 25 to 75 per cent. less than forty years ago and almost unsalable; arable land thrown into pasture, yet fewer animals in the fields; agricultural distress very similar to that described by Lord Shaftesbury as prevailing about 1814; in the towns hundreds starving, owing to the factories being closed or working only half time; deputations to local authorities praying for relief works; in the metropolis hungry men at every corner; pauperism increasing; discontent rising; employment everywhere scarcer, while the population is rapidly multiplying.

There is no class, no profession, no avocation, no calling unaffected in some degree. Distress must always be felt more in some places and in some communities than in others. But the general fact is undeniable. The commissioner of police of the metropolis, the vestries, the guardians of the poor, as well as philanthropic societies and statesmen, may open registers for the unemployed, but that will not provide the employment, for little or none is to be found in town or country. Temporary remedies may be applied, but they will not be more effectual than palliatives to a malignant cancer.

Fifty-two chambers of commerce have officially declared that "foreign tariffs and bounties and foreign competition" are "most injurious to British trade," and "at the bottom of all our troubles." The royal commission on the depression of trade and industry indorsed this declaration. Take the bills of lading at any port in the kingdom, stand with the unemployed at the gates of any railway station, and the fact is apparent.

In view of these facts, Mr. Chairman, I submit that any disturbance of the protective features of our tariff will immediately be followed by distress and disaster.

I am in favor of reducing taxes where we can with safety and without destroying our present industries, but, in my judgment, the present bill will not accomplish that purpose.

I would vote to modify the tariff so as to relieve the poor man of his taxes, wherever such a reduction would be a benefit to him, but I do not propose to favor any measure that will deprive him of a fair reward for his labor in competition with the underpaid labor of other countries.

The injustice of this bill in its effect upon the various industries of the country will be disclosed when we come to consider it in detail; but I deem it appropriate at this time to refer to an incident connected with the consideration of this bill by the Committee on Ways and Means, which has been made the subject of comment by a member of the committee [Mr. BYNUM].

In his speech the other day the gentleman, in defending the committee against the charge that it had refused a hearing to representatives of industries affected by the proposed tariff revision, said:

Amongst the number that came arrogantly knocking at the doors of the committee demanding to be heard were the pine lumber dealers of the Pacific Slope. In the New York Tribune of March 18 last, on page 3, is contained a copy of a petition which, it was said, was to be presented to the Committee on Ways and Means by some of the representatives of California, protesting against the destruction of the lumber and shipping industries of the Pacific coast, and denouncing the committee for having refused a hearing to the parties. The destruction of these interests which is to follow the passage of this bill is graphically described in this memorial. I quote the following:

"British Columbia would have more saw-mills than are now in California, Oregon, and Washington Territory, supplying lumber to our people. Foreign houses will establish branches at each coast port, and the entire manufacturing and hauling trade will be in alien hands, leaving the American citizens who pay taxes nothing but the privilege of paying cost and profit to the alien who does not. In other words the Mills tariff bill gives to foreigners, without cost, the markets which our own people have created and our own people are able to supply, to the utter destruction on this coast of American interests in lumber, coal, and especially in shipping."

What a picture of destruction! What an appeal to our patriotism! The hypocrisy of this claim and pretext, however, is found in the very same issue of the paper. Turning over to page 11, I find, in a dispatch from San Francisco dated March 17, the following:

"The pine lumber pool has succeeded during the past year in advancing the prices of lumber $12 to $15 per thousand, on the ground of high shipping rates and increased wages. The grounds for the advance are trivial, as the wages of the men are only $5 more per month and the running expenses of the vessels are no greater. The pool, which has adopted all the methods of newly-invented trusts, has simply made the people of California pay about one and a half millions into its pocket. It controls ships and mills, and regulates the prices of pine lumber to suit itself."

It is remarkable that with this condition of affairs no representative of the people came rapping at the door of the committee. The only demand to be heard was in behalf of the trust which had plundered them of a million and a half of dollars and was anxious to retain its grasp.

Mr. Chairman, the lumber interest on the Pacific coast is important, not only by reason of the fact that it supplies the building material required by a rapidly increasing population, but it furnishes employment for over four hundred American vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 175,000 tons, and employs over thirty-five thousand people in remunerative labor.

The Representatives in Congress from the Pacific coast have received numerous petitions during the present session, asking that no change be made in the tariff on lumber. These petitions were signed by the citizens, generally, in the communities from which they came, and set forth briefly but forcibly the reasons why the duty should not be removed.

These petitions were presented to the House in the usual way, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

I find that I presented, and had so referred, a petition signed by 189 citizens of Port Townsend and Jefferson County, Washington Territory.

A petition signed by 613 citizens of Tacoma, Wash.

A petition signed by 98 citizens of Gray's Harbor and Sheal-Water Bay, Washington Territory.

A petition signed by 198 mill-owners and citizens of Oregon and Washington Territory.

A petition signed by 179 citizens of Seattle, Wash.

A petition signed by 1,037 citizens of Port Gamble and Port Ludlow, Wash.

On the 14th of March the delegation received a telegram, signed by the leading business men of San Francisco, upon the subject. It was understood that this bill was then under consideration by the committee. We thought the character and standing of the people who signed the telegram, the urgency of the appeal, and the importance of the subject warranted us in presenting the matter to the Committee on Ways and Means. There was no lobby here to "log-roll" with the members of the majority of the committee in even so appropriate a business as lumber. In fact, no one representing or claiming to represent the lumber interest of the Pacific coast had been in Washington during the session. Whether wisely or not, the whole matter had been left to such action as might be taken by the Delegate from Washington Territory and the Representatives from Oregon and California.

We accordingly addressed a communication to the chairman of the committee [Mr. MILLS], setting forth in respectful language our desire to appear before the committee and present the petition, with an explanation of the character and importance of the industries represented and the value of the lumber trade of California, Oregon, and Washington Territory in the growing commerce of the Pacific.

It must be remembered that no representative from the Pacific coast is a member of that committee. The nearest approach we make in that direction is in the person of either the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] or the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and I apprehend that neither of these gentlemen claim any personal knowledge of the trade and commerce of the Pacific coast.

Our application to be heard was refused. It was not the application of the pine-lumber dealers, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], but the application of the Delegate from Washington Territory, Mr. VOORHEES; the Representative from Oregon, Mr. HERMANN, and my colleagues, Mr. MCKENNA, Mr. FELTON, and Mr. VANDEVER, and myself, from California, asking to present to the committee, not a petition from the lumber-dealers, but a petition from the business men of San Francisco, with such other facts as might be deemed appropriate for the consideration of the committee in dealing with this subject.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there was no arrogance in this appeal. We were but performing our duty as Representatives, and I ask now that this petition may be read, that the House may be informed as to the value and importance of an industry which the bill under consideration would injure if not destroy.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 12, 1888.

To Hon. W. W. MORROW, M. C., and PACIFIC COAST DELEGATION,
Washington, D. C.:

The attention of the undersigned ship-owners and merchants on the Pacific coast and all persons engaged in and dependent upon our commercial marine for a livelihood, regardless of party affiliation, has been rudely called to a sense of imminent danger impending from one feature of the so-called Mills tariff bill about to be submitted for the consideration of Congress.

At the present time, of ships flying the American flag there are engaged in the carrying trade of American ports on this coast over four hundred vessels, with a gross tonnage of, say, 175,000 tons. Most of these are sailing-vessels, although within the last two years a new class of vessels, using steam as an auxiliary power, has been built in the harbor of San Francisco. Thirty of these vessels have been recently constructed and others now building, giving work to our foundries and skilled workmen and sale for great quantities of material used in such construction.

If this new and promising branch of ship-building is not stranded by adverse legislation, it is safe to predict that within five years over two hundred of such vessels will ply in waters of the Pacific, and create on this side of the continent, at least, a beginning to the rebuilding of our lost mercantile marine.

Added to this, a large number of sailing vessels have been built within the past year, and others are now building; while many ships, driven from the Atlantic by foreign competition, have sought and found sale on this coast; all of which, new and old, find remunerative employment.

What is the trade and what is the interest that has called into existence and supports this large number of vessels flying the American flag and owned on this coast, that has led to this recent and rapid building of vessels, and reviving on this coast, at least, the fast waning industry of ship-building?

To this there is but one answer: These vessels are for the most part engaged in carrying lumber from our northern ports to ports in the State of California; a trade in which, under existing conditions, foreign vessels can not engage.

Now, the Mills tariff bill proposes to place lumber on the free-list, and thus throw wide open all our ports to the manufacturers of lumber in British Columbia. What would be the immediate effect of this? Great injury, it is true, to the manufacturers of lumber within our own borders; but the great, the vital injury would be the blow it would give to our shipping interest. At once British and other foreign vessels would enter into the trade and bring lumber from British Columbia in competition with our American vessels to ports in California.

With lower rates of interest, with ships built by low-priced labor and cheaper material—hence costing much less than our home-built vessels—and with ships manned by sailors content to receive much lower wages than are paid to our own seamen, who can doubt the result of such a competition? In fact, the result would be the same as heretofore on the Atlantic under similar circumstances, namely, the stagnation of the carrying trade and the absolute stoppage of further ship-building for years.

British Columbia would have more saw-mills than are now in California, Oregon and Washington Territory, supplying lumber to our own people. Mills owned by foreign capitalists and producing lumber freighted in foreign ships, thus destroying the present prosperous coasting trade in American bottoms. Foreign houses will establish branches at each coast port, and the entire manufacturing, carrying, and handling of the trade will be in alien hands, leaving to the American citizens who pay taxes nothing but the privilege of paying cost and profit to the alien who does not.

In other words, the Mills tariff bill gives to foreigners without cost the markets our own people have created and our own people are able to supply, to the utter destruction on this coast of American interests in lumber and coal, and especially in shipping.

Other nations are doing what they can to build up a mercantile marine, even paying premiums and subsidies to accomplish this result. Is our folly so great that we even legislate to break down and destroy the most promising effort now being made in this country to build up such a marine without Government aid or subsidy?

This petition is signed by eighty-six of the leading citizens of San Francisco. It represents the employment of thousands of people, and a commerce extending to all parts of the world.

In addition to the facts presented in the petition, it was our purpose to present to the committee, as I do now to the House, the further facts that the labor engaged in the manufacture of lumber on the Pacific coast, and kindred employments, the outgrowth of that industry, is exclusively the well-paid labor of our own people; that the placing of lumber on the free-list will open our market to the ruinous competition of manufacturers in British Columbia, where the business is largely carried on by Chinese labor; that the destruction of our own industry will build up a British monopoly, free from competition and able to hold the market and increase the price of lumber to all consumers.

I am reminded, however, in this connection, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], on the authority of a dispatch which he found in the New York Tribune, charges that the pine-lumber dealers of the Pacific Slope have formed a pool and advanced the price of lumber.

In reply to that charge I desire to read two telegrams on the subject received from the Pacific Pine Lumber Company of San Francisco. This company is one of the largest manufacturers of lumber on the coast, and is in a position to know whether any pool or trust exists in this business there or not.

The first telegram which I shall read was doubtless sent under the impression that the gentleman from Indiana in his remarks referred particularly to this company, which it appears he did not; but the statements contained in the telegram are pertinent to the general charge as well.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25, 1888.

Hon WM. W. MORROW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Pacific Pine Lumber Company distinctly and specifically denies that it is a pool, a trust, a combination, or any other than a private corporation engaged in the legitimate business of manufacturing and selling lumber. It distinctly and specifically denies that it is a monopoly in any sense, and cites the fact that there are more mills independent of it than connected with it.

It distinctly and specifically denies that it has illegitimately advanced the price of lumber; that to do so is simply impossible, with the present competition. Its opposition to free lumber is because of the close proximity of English forests, with palpable English advantages, and the consequent virtual diversion of our coasting trade to English bottoms, all of which would be inimical to the American lumber trade on this coast, and result in the withdrawal of all investments in that connection.

The charge that these views are opposed by the people of this coast is best met by the petitions signed by the many widely known mercantile houses, whose absolute disconnection with the lumber trade is known to none better than yourself.

PACIFIC PINE LUMBER COMPANY.

The second telegram is as follows, and refers particularly to the charge that the price of lumber had been advanced and the people plundered of a million and a half of dollars:

SAN FRANCISCO, April 26, 1888.

Hon. WM. W. MORROW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The cargo price of pine lumber two years ago was $14 per thousand, now $17.

The comparison of cost is as follows: Logs, then five to five fifty, now seven to seven fifty. Freights, then four fifty to five, now five fifty to six. Labor, then eleven and one half hours per day, now ten hours per day at same daily wages.

Position of the Pacific Pine Lumber Company voices simply the entire lumber and shipping interests of the coast, and it is not a special pleader in its own behalf.

PACIFIC PINE LUMBER COMPANY.

It will be observed that there has been an increase in two years of $2 per thousand in logs, and $1 per thousand in freights, which accounts for the increase of $3 per thousand in the price of pine lumber. The mill-owners have not been benefited by this advance, but on the contrary they have lost something in the increased cost of labor, by reason of the reduction of the hours of labor from eleven hours and one-half per day to ten hours per day.

It must be remembered also that there has been a rapid increase in population on the Pacific Slope, and a corresponding increase in the demand for building material. The presence of an active competition is therefore apparent.

I think, Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts, instead of being denied a hearing by the Committee on Ways and Means, and afterwards criticised for asking to appear before it, the committee should have carefully investigated the situation and considered all the facts bearing upon the subject.

There is already a free-wood schedule that includes logs and round unmanufactured timber.

What may be termed raw material in timber is therefore admitted free, under the present law, but it is proposed by this bill to go a step further and remove the duty from the manufactured article; that is to say, from sawed boards, planks, deals, and all other articles of sawed lumber. This proposition is clearly not in the interest of the consumer in this country, but for the benefit of the English manufacturer, English vessels, and cheap labor.

The necessity for diversified industry in every community is nowhere better illustrated than in California. The discovery of gold there in 1849 was the opening of a new era of prosperity in the history of the world; but while the new State poured forth her marvelous wealth to enrich mankind, her single stream of fortune was first distributed in fruitful fields elsewhere. It was not until we began the development of our other resources that we were able to retain our gold at home and lay the foundations of a prosperous community.

Even our early agriculture was too restricted, and our immense wheat fields failed to furnish a sufficient distribution of the industry of the people. It was required that we should engage in the cereal productions generally; plant vineyards and fruit orchards, raise wool, develop our mineral resources, build ships and railroads, engage in commerce, and establish manufacturing industries. These things we have done, because we saw that our permanent prosperity lay in that direction; but some of our industries are in competition with foreign products and are only profitable, with our higher priced labor, under the moderate protection of the present tariff.

Our fruit industry may be said to be in its infancy, yet the product of last year was sufficiently large to indicate its future importance. The raisin crop was 16,000,000 pounds, or 800,000 twenty-pound boxes. It was sold in competition with a foreign importation of about 40,000,000 pounds, which paid a duty of 2 cents per pound, or 40 cents per box; but the foreign article had the advantage in a freight charge of only 8 cents per box from Malaga, Spain, to New York, while the California product was compelled to pay a freight charge of 35 cents per box from California to the Eastern market. In this industry we also encounter the competition of cheap labor. In Spain the cost of preparing a box of raisins for the market is but a fraction of the cost in California; but notwithstanding these reasonable grounds for protection, it is proposed in this bill to reduce the tariff duty on raisins one-half cent per pound, or 10 cents per box. That such a reduction will seriously cripple if not destroy this new and growing industry must be apparent from the facts stated.

The following report of raisins produced in California from 1873 to 1888 will show the beneficial effect of the protective feature of the present tariff on this industry:

RAISIN PRODUCT OF CALIFORNIA FROM 1873 TO 1888.

	Boxes.		Boxes.
1873	6,000	1881	90,000
1874	9,000	1882	115,000
1875	11,000	1883	140,000
1876	19,000	1884	175,000
1877	32,000	1885	500,000
1878	48,000	1886	703,000
1879	65,000	1887	800,000
1880	75,000	1888 (estimated)	1,000,000

The estimated amount of capital invested in the raisin vineyards of California is now about $6,000,000, to be increased largely every year, unless this bill should unfortunately become a law.

The production of French prunes in California last year amounted to 1,750,000 pounds. This year the product is estimated at 3,500,000 pounds.

The present duty on prunes is 1 cent per pound; but it is proposed to place this fruit on the free-list and hand the market over to the foreign importer.

If it be true, as has been recently stated on this floor, that the Western farms are heavily mortgaged, let me say to the advocates of this bill that this condition of affairs, so far as it exists in California, has grown out of the necessities incident to the establishment of these new industries I have mentioned, and that this bill, instead of relieving the difficulty will serve rather as a notice to the banks to foreclose their mortgages and turn adrift the industrious and enterprising people who have given years of toil and the accumulations of other pursuits to the development of the resources of a new country.

Perhaps one of the best illustrations of the beneficial effect of a protective tariff will be found in the development of the borax industry of California and Nevada.

For many years the market for this salt was entirely in the hands of the foreign importers, when the price ranged from 28 to 50 cents per pound.

In 1872 important discoveries were made of borax deposits on the Pacific coast. For ten years prior to that time the duty had been as follows:

	Cents.
Borate of lime, per pound	5
Borax, crude or tincal, do	5
Borax, refined, do	10
Boracic acid, do	5

These duties encouraged the development of these discoveries, and in 1873 our producers placed on the market 2,000,000 pounds of borax; but the foreign importers did not desire this competition, and Congress was asked then, as now, to relieve the poor man of the burden of "war taxes." Accordingly we find that, in 1874 Congress, doubtless not knowing of the Pacific coast industry, placed borate of lime, crude borax, and boracic acid on the free-list.

It was feared that this favor to the importers would dispose of the domestic producers, and it came very nearly accomplishing that purpose, but our people struggled along as best they could until 1883, when Congress, being informed of the situation, imposed the following duties by the Act of March 3, of that year:

	Cents.
Boracic acid (pure), per pound	5
Boracic acid (commercial), do	4
Borate of lime, do	3
Borax, crude, do	3
Borax, refined, do	5

Now, what was the result? The domestic product for 1883 was 5,600,000 pounds, and for 1887 it was 10,182,000 pounds. In 1872, when our producers came into the market, the price of borax was 35 cents per pound. It is now reduced to 6½ cents per pound, and as a consequence its uses have been multiplied and made cheap enough for all the purposes for which it is adapted.

This bill proposes to place borax, in all its forms, on the free-list. For what purpose; to cheapen the price? No; for if you crush out the domestic producer the importer will raise the price. It can only be for the benefit of the foreign importer.

I will let General Rosecrans, who is thoroughly familiar with this subject, explain the situation, and I quote from a letter addressed by him on April 14, 1888, to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 14, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I see that the committee's tariff bill proposes to put all borax products on the free-list. It involves no great sum of money, and I believe that if the committee had been as familiar with the subject as circumstances have compelled me to be, they would have refrained from putting these products on the free-list.

The production of borax from the desert alkali lands of California, Nevada, and Colorado has become quite an industry, and employs a good many people, scattered all over the country. Only in the new States and Territories, however, can the raw material be found. It seems desirable, therefore, to show as much favor as possible to this industry. It is especially incumbent upon the Democratic party.

But that is the least of the reasons why the business should not be meddled with. The history of the importation of borax into the United States, and of the various tariffs thereon, shows that legislation in favor of a single person or single house has been the constant rule since 1842, or at the latest since 1845. I had occasion to thoroughly examine and verify the accuracy of this statement, and in 1882 I earnestly urged on the members of the House Committee on Ways and Means, whose attention I could get, at least to do something for our own home industries, instead of building up the wealthy monopoly to which I have alluded, and which slyly procured legislation in its favor all these past years. This combination had placed and kept boracic acid on the free-list, until in 1882, when the tariff discussion revealed the game, and then only the inadequate tariff of 4 cents was imposed. The last change procured was to have boracic acid put on the free-list.

* * * * * * *

We had no relief until our borax producers began to compete with them. If this combination be permitted to do as it has been doing in the past since the tariff of 1882 it will destroy competition, and then go back to its old ways, our own producers will be ruined, and our consumers will then be worse off than under the present tariff.

W. S. ROSECRANS.

Hon. CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the effect of this bill on the borax industry of the Pacific coast is already apparent. I hold in my hand a press dispatch from San Francisco, announcing the failure of the large and enterprising firm of William T. Coleman & Co. because a considerable part of the property of the firm had come under the shadow of this proposed revision of the tariff. The firm owns extensive borax fields in the desert regions of California and Nevada. This barren country, worthless except for the borax deposits, was bought from the Government at the rate paid for mineral lands containing gold and silver, and the money thus paid has gone into the Treasury and become a part of the surplus about which we are so much troubled. This bill would destroy this property and bankrupt those who have purchased these lands in good faith.

I must not trespass further upon the time of the committee in discussing the details of this bill. I thought, however, that the vice of the proposed revision might be made to appear if, in the course of this general discussion, we would consider the effect of the measure on particular industries, as I have done.

I do not think a careful examination has been made of all the facts connected with this subject. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], in discussing the merits of this bill the other day, claimed that the protective tariff had injured our foreign commerce, and cited our trade with Australasia as an example of the ruinous traffic in which we are engaged with foreign countries. His statement of the condition of this trade illustrates the character of the examination given to the business of the country by the Committee on Ways and Means. He said:

Here we find a country with an annual trade of about $500,000,000. During the last ten years this country has imported products to the value of $2,643,850,151, and of this sum we only supplied $27,224,067, a fraction over 1 per cent. While we sold to her people only about twenty-seven millions' worth of our products, we purchased of them directly over eighty millions. Instead of exchanging our machines, furniture, and agricultural implements for wool, we paid over money to the extent of $50,000,000.

Now, I suppose if the gentleman should be convinced that if, instead of supplying Australasia with our productions to the extent of $27,224,067 in ten years, we in fact supplied that country to the extent of $81,381,045 during that period, and if, instead of paying over $50,000,000 to the people of Australasia in balance of that trade, that sum was in fact paid to us, he will admit, I take it, that the illustration is favorable to the principle of protection and against his theory of free trade.

Well, the fact is as I have indicated. The gentleman has reversed his statistics, and it makes all the difference in the world. What he takes for exports to Australasia are imports from that country into the United States, and what he takes for imports into the United States are exports to Australasia.

We do send our machines, furniture, and agricultural implements to Australasia, and while we imported from that country last year wool to the value of $931,630, we exported in return woolen manufactures to the value of $1,440,596, leaving a balance in our favor of $508,966 in this exchange, and a total balance of $4,235,547 on the whole trade for the year.

The following statement of our commerce with Australasia during the last year, from the Bureau of Statistics, will prove interesting in this connection:

Balance of trade in favor of the United States since 1870, $69,237,425.

I commend these interesting statistics to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means for consideration when it comes to the preparation of the second revised edition of the tariff bill.

Mr. FELTON. In this connection will my colleague also state that this profitable trade between the United States and Australia has been developed and maintained by a line of American steamers subsidized by Australia?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; subsidized by New Zealand.

Mr. FELTON. By New Zealand and New South Wales paying $150,000 per annum.

Mr. MORROW. That is so.

The principle of protection to our home industries does not depend, however, for its success upon a foreign market. What we seek is first to build up a home market.

The foreign is, of course, desirable for our surplus productions, but it should not be the sole aim of our industrial effort.

The proposition is a simple one. Is it not better to have a consumer for a product at our own door rather than be compelled to send it several thousands of miles at a heavy expense for insurance and transportation to find one?

And again, is it not better to save the cost of insurance and transportation of our products to a foreign market and divide that sum between the producer and consumer of our own country, and to that extent increase the wealth of the community?

The answer must be obvious to any one who will give the question a fair consideration. I could show by statistics, if time permitted, that our farmers derive more profit as a rule from the production of such articles as are entirely consumed at home than they do from those articles they are compelled to send abroad for a market.

The protective tariff may not be the only cause of our prosperity for the last twenty years, but it has certainly contributed much in that direction.

Mulhall estimates the annual accumulation of wealth of the four great nations as follows:

United States	$825,000,000
France	375,000,000
Great Britain	325,000,000
Germany	200,000,000

He then says:

Every day that the sun rises upon the American people it sees an addition of two and one-half million dollars to the accumulated wealth of the Republic, which is equal to one-third of the daily accumulations of mankind.

But the revenue reformer will probably claim that this enormous annual increase of wealth in the United States is in great part the profits of capital invested in railroads, banks, telegraphs, and like property, and that the farmers and wage-workers do not share in this wonderful prosperity.

The comparison of wages paid to mechanics and other laborers in the United States with the wages paid to persons engaged in like pursuits in Great Britain, France, and Germany ought to satisfy any one that the wage-workers of this country do participate in this accumulation of wealth; but if further evidence is required on this point, it will be found in the reports of the savings-banks of the country. It is the habit of the laboring classes in many cities of the United States to deposit their surplus earnings in the savings-banks. It is a convenient and safe accumulation for persons of small incomes; hence the business of these banks is a fair indication of the condition of this class of people.

In the last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency is a statement embracing returns from six hundred and eighty-four savings-banks in nineteen States of the Union, from which it appears that in 1885–'86 these banks had 3,158,950 depositors and had deposits amounting to $1,141,530,578. In 1886–'87 there were 3,418,013 depositors and the deposits amounted to $1,235,247,371. Here is an increase in one year of 259,063 depositors and an increase of deposits of $93,716,793. What a splendid showing this is for the workingmen of this country!

There is undoubtedly poverty and distress in many places. As I said before, there are poor people everywhere. The laws are not all that they should be with respect to the rights of the laboring classes. The corporations are insolent and overbearing and capital exacting and tyrannical; but where in this wide world do the working people make such a showing of their accumulations as we find here in the return of six hundred and eighty-four savings-banks located in probably not more than five hundred communities.

What these small savings amount to in the thousands of other communities throughout the United States where there are no savings-banks or where savings are otherwise invested can of course only be a matter of conjecture. But this evidence, as far as it goes, tends to show that the laboring classes are sharing the benefits of the protective system, and that our prosperity is the splendid growth and development of the whole country.

I have not the time to consider the position of the farmer or discuss the advantages derived by him from the protective system, except to say that here, as everywhere else, the prosperity of the farmer is to be found in the value and extent of his home market, always developed and enlarged by manufacturing industries under the protective system.

With this evidence before me I can not vote for a measure that would imperil these conditions and destroy the most productive industries of this country.

The wisdom of those who laid the foundations of the Republic has secured to us the wealth of marvelous resources in the independence we gained as a people. Let us preserve that independence, and walking in the light of our own history, push forward in the way we were going as the first among the nations of the world.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. FELTON. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended for a few minutes longer.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. FELTON. It has been the usual course during the whole of this tariff discussion.

Mr. MORROW. I shall not ask more than five minutes.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I have objected in other cases, and there are a great many gentlemen desiring to speak on this question.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I shall not feel bad if the gentleman withdraws his objection.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the time will be extended.

Mr. FELTON. It has been almost invariably the practice.

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is only a simple act of justice to others who can not be recognized at all, or, if at all, for a very few minutes, and I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. HOOKER was recognized.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a correction of a statement which appears in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The correction the gentleman refers to is in the nature of debate, and some time during the progress of the discussion the Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, the power of taxation is the most tyrannical power of all those granted in the Constitution to the legislative department of the Government, and in the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in that memorable case decided early in the history of the country (of McCullough vs. State of Maryland, 4 Wheaton, Supreme Court Reports) "it may be used to destroy." The odious and oppressive navigation laws of the mother country, which forbade the colonies to import a pound of tea to America from China unless it was first carried into British ports and reshipped in British vessels and brought to the American colonies, and that tax imposed upon it, led to the assembling of that band of patriots in Boston harbor who threw the tea overboard. It was the first act of rebellion, Mr. Chairman, against the unjust laws of taxation which lost to the mother country that magnificent domain, the American colonies.

Our fathers assembled in the Hall of Independence in Philadelphia and made that memorable declaration that these colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States. The Declaration thundered over the continent, was caught up by the long swell of the Atlatic and wafted to the ears of the crowned monarch of the then mother country. Men sprang to arms to maintain the Declaration, and they made it good through the trials and the hardships and the bloodshed of the seven years of the war of the Revolution.

Our great historian, Mr. Bancroft, whom I am glad to see still spared in his green old age and his honored manhood to breathe the fresh air and to enjoy the bright sunshine of that country whose history he has written with an immortal pen—Mr. Bancroft, in speaking of the causes of that revolution, says:

> That American independence, like the great rivers of the continent, had many sources, but the head spring which colored all the stream was the navigation act of the mother country.

It was then emphatically, Mr. Chairman, a war for the purpose of ridding our ancestors of unjust and iniquitous taxation. Emerging from the Revolution with fresh and vivid memories of the tyranny of unjust and odious tax laws, it is not a cause of wonder that when the representatives of the original thirteen States met to adopt a government of their own, they should have denied to that very government of their own creation the power "to levy taxes" and the power "to regulate commerce." That first government, known as the Government of the Confederation, existed from 1781 to 1789. They found that thirteen different legislatures passing upon questions of taxation could not make them uniform, and they found that thirteen different legislatures could not pass laws which would operate equally to regulate commerce between themselves. And the result was the meeting first at Annapolis of Alexander Hamilton, the representative from the great State of New York, and others. Finding that no quorum had assembled and that the resolution under which they met of the Confederate Congress did not clothe them with the power to make a new Constitution, but simply clothed them with the power to amend the old, and finding that they would have to go back to Congress for a new grant of power, they did so, and the resolution passed the Confederate Congress which called the convention which assembled in 1787 in Philadelphia, and which led to the formation of the existing Constitution.

After prolonged deliberation in the convention of 1787, and still more prolonged and anxious discussion in the conventions of the several States on the question of considering and adopting or rejecting that Constitution, our fathers reluctantly parted with the power to the Federal Government to tax, and also parted with the power to the Federal Government to regulate commerce, coupling it with such restrictions as they thought would forever prevent the abuse of that power on the part of the Government to whom it was granted. And especially apprehensive that a domestic government established by their own consent might resort to a system of taxation as oppressive as that for which they fought the Revolution to free the country from, they provided safeguards, as they imagined, a protection against the abuses of this taxing power.

They enacted in section 8, Article I of the Constitution of the United States, that—

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

They provide further, in section 9, paragraph 4, first article of the Constitution, that—

> No capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

Paragraph 5, section 9, Article I, provides—

> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

And paragraph 6, section 9 of the same first article of the Constitution, provided that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce—

I call attention to the language of this provision—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels, bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

These were the safeguards which the framers of the Constitution imagined they had thrown around this extraordinary power granted to the Federal Government, for the first time under this Constitution, to lay taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and under the powers thus carefully guarded granted to the Federal Government. The first tariff or tax-law was enacted in 1789. Alexander Hamilton was the then Secretary of the Treasury; and this first tariff or tax-law bears the impress of his great mind. The rates of duties so fixed had for their object the equal distribution of taxes throughout the thirteen original States, and the people thereof looking to the production of the needed revenue for the support of the Government, and carrying along with them whatever incident of protection they might to like articles produced and manufactured in our own country.

This tariff lasted for twenty-five years, with here and there slight modifications. In the original bill framed in this first tariff act it will be remarked how low were the rates imposed immediately after the war of the Revolution when its debt had to be met and liquidated. Cotton goods were charged only 5 per cent., iron goods 7½ per cent., and woolen goods 5 per cent., and as at that time the great cormorant of "pig-iron" had not come into existence there was no duty at all on that. Under this tariff act, this first tax act—for, as was well remarked by my distinguished friend from Kentucky who sits immediately on my left [Mr. CABELL], the word "tariff" means a tax, and derives its name from the little town, Tarifa, on the southern coast of Spain, where was first established a custom-house to collect taxes. It is only another name for a tax. This first tax act, then, how did it operate, Mr. Chairman? From 1790 to 1808 it was in operation, and from 1791, when it yielded $4,000,000 of revenue, the amount increased until in 1808 the yield of revenue was sixteen millions. The embargo was laid in 1808, which, of course, stopped all revenue from that source. Until 1808, under the tariff law of 1789, the rates of duty averaged 11$\frac{17}{88}$ per cent. This was the first tariff law enacted under the Constitution, and, as I have said, it continued in existence for twenty-four years. The second tariff act was passed in 1816, immediately after we had fought the war of 1812, a war which also, it will be remembered, grew out of the exactions imposed on our commerce and our seamen by the no longer mother country, transformed now into a bitter and hostile enemy.

We emerged from that conflict with the then greatest land and naval power on the globe covered with the garlands of victory won by the valor of our tars on the ocean and of our soldiers on the land. It is memorable, therefore, that this "second war of independence," as it has been termed, was also designed and intended to protect us from the odious navigation acts and commercial restrictions imposed by those who were opposed to the interests and the welfare and the development of our country. The tariff tax of 1816 had at least this excuse for protection: that then our industries were indeed in their infancy, and by that tariff act the duties were increased on an average 42 per cent. The articles of import on which the law operated were divided into three classes:

1. Those of which a full domestic supply could be produced;
2. Those of which a domestic supply could be but partially produced; and
3. Articles only slightly or not at all produced in this country.

On articles of the first class there was a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem; on articles of the second class, 25 per cent., to be reduced to 20 per cent. after three years. On articles of the third class duties were imposed with a view to revenue. The average duties under this tariff of 1816, which operated until 1824, were 24½ per cent.

The third tariff act was that of 1824, of which Mr. Clay was the eloquent advocate, and it is a singular fact in the history of the country that Mr. Webster opposed the tariff of 1816 and also the tariff of 1824. The grounds of his opposition to it have never been answered even by himself, for it has been well said, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest rival of a great man is himself or his own former utterances. In 1820, in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Mr. Webster made a speech in opposition to the policy which is vaunted here by gentlemen on the other side, and especially by my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], the principle of protection for protection's sake. Mr. Webster made that speech in Faneuil Hall in Boston on the then pending tariff question, and the meeting adopted a series of resolutions expressive of the sentiments which Mr. Webster had just uttered. Those resolutions I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read in order that the views entertained by the men of Massachuetts of that day and its great leading intellect may be made known to this House and to the country.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue necessary for the support of the Government; but that taxes imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any class of men are equally inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution and with sound judgment.

Resolved, That the supposition that until the supposed tariff, or some similar measure, be adopted, we are and shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defense is, in our opinion, altogether fallacious, fanciful, and derogatory to the character of the nation.

Resolved, That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefited by that tariff favor great capitalists rather than personal industries or the owners of small capital, and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industries.

Resolved, That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would be that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys and receive less for all he sells.

Resolved, That in our opinion the proposed tariff and the principles on which it is avowedly formed would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people.

Mr. HOOKER. It will thus be seen that at that time the great leading mind of the State of Massachusetts and the people of that State did not give their assent to the doctrine which has been uttered by my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] with so much eloquence, and reiterated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], that in laying a tariff we must lay it not for the purposes of revenue; that this extraordinary taxing power of the Government must be laid not for the purpose of raising revenue to defray the expenses of the Government, but with the primary object of protecting some particular industry. At that day the argument was made, as we have heard it reiterated by these distinguished gentleman now, that to oppose the doctrine of protection was to be in favor of foreign governments rather than our own; that if you did not assent to the doctrine of protection you were in favor of the maintenance and support of foreign industries rather than our own. Two giant minds of this country exploded that idea nearly half a century ago; and they were the intellect of Webster, with his wonderful power of argument, and the sharp, keen, incisive logic of Mr. Calhoun, who never touched any subject that he did not cut to the kernel, and who spoke for the truth in every speech that he made while he ornamented this House or the Senate with his presence. Those master intellects united in showing that in demanding an extended market there was no opposition in the American mind to the encouragement of legitimate commerce, manufactures, agriculture, and navigation of our own country. It has been asserted, Mr. Chairman, by these gentlemen, who hold this doctrine of protection for protection's sake (and I know no man on this side of the Chamber claiming to be a Democrat who holds that doctrine) that they are American in their ideas and conceptions. I deny it; I take issue with the gentlemen on that point.

I have said there is no gentleman on this side of the House who holds to the doctrine of protection for protection's sake under the taxing power of this Government. If there is such a one, I have yet to hear him speak on this question. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], whom I regret I do not see in his seat, and who is supposed to have gone further than any other man on the Democratic side in favor of high protective tariffs, stands committed by the solemn record of two speeches made on this floor, in which he says, in distinct terms, "I am opposed to the doctrine of protection for protection's sake."

This doctrine is of modern growth. It was never asserted in the adoption of the original tariff act of 1789 or that of 1816. It had its origin in the passage of what Mr. Calhoun appropriately denominated the "tariff act of abominations," the act of 1828. Then it was that the doctrine was first proclaimed that there existed somewhere in this Government under the forms of the Constitution a power to lay taxation not for the purpose of collecting revenue to defray the expenses of the Government, but to protect one or two particular classes of industries. And I want to refer very briefly to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by one of the present learned justices, and having reference to this question of taxation. I refer to the case of the Loan Association vs. Topeka, 20 Wallace. Speaking of the power of Government to tax, that most momentous of all powers, Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

> The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.

Again he says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

Mr. BRUMM. What was the issue involved in that case?

Mr. HOOKER. The question was, as appears by the terms of this decision, the power to lay taxes. If the gentleman listens to the language of the court he can not fail to understand.

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms. Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by Government for the use of the nation or State." Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the Legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes.
> * * * * * * * *
>
> We have established, we think, beyond cavil that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose.
>
> If it be said that a benefit results to the local public of a town by establishing manufactures, the same may be said of any other business or pursuit which employs capital or labor. The merchant, the mechanic, the inn-keeper, the banker, the builder, the steam-boat owner, are equally promoters of the public good, and equally deserving the aid of the citizens by forced contributions. No line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open the coffers of the public treasury to the importunities of two-thirds of the business men of the city or town.

This is the opinion of the Supreme Court upon this subject of the power of taxation. Now, allow me to say a word to honorable gentlemen on the other side. I want to ask my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who have announced as the doctrine of their party protection for protection's sake, whether they would dare to get up in the Legislatures of their own States and propose that as a principle of taxation for State legislation? If not, why not?

Mr. DINGLEY. What did I understand the gentleman to say?

Mr. HOOKER. I ask whether you would apply to the imposition of taxes in your own State the principle you seek to apply in the tariff legislation of the General Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman say that I asserted I would use the taxing power of the Government for protection's sake alone?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, I so understood you.

Mr. DINGLEY. I asserted nothing of the kind.

Mr. HOOKER. I so understood you, and also the gentleman from Michigan. Your platform certainly takes that position.

Mr. DINGLEY and others. Not at all.

Mr. HOOKER. It does. I will read the language in a moment if gentlemen will be quiet. Your platform asserts that you do not lay taxes for revenue only, but lay them for another purpose. Now, I am asking the question whether you would apply that principle in State legislation, and if not, why not? Would my distinguished friend from Michigan, who spoke so eloquently the other day, or would the gentleman from Maine apply in State legislation the principle that taxes shall be laid so as to operate upon the farming interests for the benefit of the manufacturing interests, or operate upon the manufacturing interests for the benefit of the farming interests? If you should announce such a doctrine you would hear from every one of the thirty-eight States of this Union a voice of condemnation declaring that such a method of taxation, intended to benefit one citizen at the expense of another, is unjust and oppressive.

But how is that principle any better when applied to the tariff legislation of the General Government? Under the Constitution you are denied the power of laying a tariff on exports. My honorable friend from Michigan when stating the other day the amount of the commerce of this country was very careful to eliminate from consideration the cotton and the tobacco raised here, cotton being the largest exportation that we make and the great agricultural products of the West being the next. As has been well stated long ago, and I but repeat an argument founded upon the rock of ages so far as its truth is concerned, when you impose unjust taxes upon imports you, by construction, impose unjust taxes upon the exports which bring in the imports.

You evade the Constitution when you enact this law by which the superabundant products of your country are subjected to this high rate of taxation upon imports, because there can be no imports unless there are exports. I say, therefore, if the principle be a just one why not apply it to the States? Would you apply it to the people of the States? No. Why? Because there is no reason why it should be applied to one and not to the other.

The argument is made by gentlemen that the rate of tariff taxation should not be diminished as proposed in the bill of the Committee on Ways and Means, now pending, although that bill levies an enormous taxation for the purpose of providing revenue for the support of the Government. They say, however, that the present tariff taxation should not be diminished because they wish to protect the labor of the laboring man and keep his wages up to the high standard they are now. That is the reason they say to the committee you must not touch the existing tariff at all. Why? Is it not enough? You yourselves have said it is high enough. Your own Tariff Commission, sent by a Republican Congress throughout the country, recommended a diminution of 20 per cent., but when a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives for that purpose you struck out the enacting clause and defeated it. So you stand committed to the doctrine of reduction of tariff taxation just as much as the Democratic party is, although I do not think you were as sincere in your professions in that regard as the Democratic party. [Applause.]

My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] said in his remarks, with something of a sneer of sarcasm, "I remind the President it is a condition we confront, and not a theory." Yet the gentleman's own party was in power for twenty-five years, and during all that time you left the tariff at the war standard. There was no amendment proposed for the reduction of those war taxes either then or now, when, for the first time, an effort is being made in Congress under the recommendation of President Cleveland to enact into law the bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means proposing to diminish the present rate of tariff taxation. Yet you say on the other side of this House that this rate of taxation shall not be touched at all; that if it is it will destroy the great industries of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I deny the proposition. The bubble of protection for protection's sake when touched by the spear of Ithuriel will expose its vagaries to the light of day and they disappear into thin air. [Applause.]

If my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] or my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] should go into their own or my district and come upon the humblest boy plowing and tell him that the plow-handles which he held and everything in the nature of steel and iron about that plow were not taxed for the purpose of protecting the manufacturers engaged in the iron and steel trade the boy would immediately ask: "Why, then, should I be compelled to pay a duty upon iron and steel? Why not let me have it at a cheaper rate if the taxation is not necessary for the protection of the iron and steel trade?" And that is the complete answer to the argument in favor of protection for protection's sake.

The exercise of this power of taxation is fully illustrated in the tariff acts of 1816, 1820, the compromise tariff of 1833, and the tariff of 1846.

I wish to say one word in reference to that revenue tariff of 1846. It was laid when Robert J. Walker was at the head of the Treasury Department, and his report in maintenance of that tariff act has never been answered and never can be answered. I will embody in my remarks what he has said on that subject, but I have not time now to refer to the particular passages and have them read at the Clerk's desk.

What was the result? You received such an enormous amount of revenue under the tariff of 1846 you had to pass the tariff of 1857, because you then had a redundant and overflowing Treasury.

It was said by the gentleman from Michigan, and by the gentleman from Maine, and those who have been contending that high duties are necessary in order to protect the labor of the country, that these high rates of duties do protect the labor of the country.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman from Mississippi say that any man on this side of the House would levy duties for protection for protection's sake alone?

Mr. HOOKER. No, sir; but for revenue with something more than revenue attached. Now, I deny that you have the power under the Constitution to do that.

Mr. KERR. Does not the gentleman understand that we favor the apportionment of the duties so as to afford incidental protection, and that——

Mr. HOOKER. I can not yield further time. I understand the position of the gentleman and that of his party. I understand thoroughly the argument you make. But what right have you to protect labor? Who are you that undertakes to say that you have that right? Where do you get the money from to protect it? Mr. Chairman, it came from the tax-payers of this land. It has been wrung from them by onerous taxes, and has gone into the overflowing vaults of your Treasury, already gorged with a hundred millions surplus every year, gathered from the laborers of the country. And yet you undertake to say that you have the right to protect that labor! Sir the laborers of the country scorn your protection. The laborer is no mendicant. I deny in his name and manhood that he is a mendicant. He is a free, independent American citizen, who made you and made the Government, and gave you all that money that now lies bursting the coffers of your Treasury. Where do you get the money from with which you propose to grant your protection, as well as the money which now overflows the Treasury? It comes from the laborer. I repeat he is no mendicant. He does not want your protection. He is a proud American citizen, and, Mr. Chairman, the assertions that you are going to "protect American labor" is something extraordinary to me.

Gentlemen talk of protecting the laborer. How? What from? From unjust taxes? I want to protect him from that. But how are you going to protect him? Is his wealth and property threatened? Ah, gentlemen, your protection is for the manufacturers, and how do you propose to get it? You can only get it by making the laborer and all of us pay higher taxes. There is no other way.

Now, sir, we are a very great people. We have a very large area of territory, stretching from where the swell of the Atlantic breaks upon the rock-bound coast of our eastern shore to where the softer waves of the Pacific roll upon the golden shores of California. We have a country not only vast in area, but with 60,000,000 of population.

We have vast wealth in mines and minerals, and in our soil; and yet gentlemen point you to these various tariffs and say, "Behold; high tariff did all this!" I deny it. I say no, it did not; I say that neither a high tariff nor a low tariff did it. You can not make money by the legerdemain of legislation. You can not pay taxes by the cunning devices of the law. [Applause.]

It is labor that makes money. It is the thews, and the muscles, and the sinews, and the blood, and the bone, and brain of the laboring man, whether it be labor of the head or hand that does it and makes money.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not yield to the gentleman; I can not be interrupted. I know the shoe pinches whenever we touch upon this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the laborer of this country is no mendicant. He is a strong, sturdy American citizen, a man of muscle, thews, sinew, and brains, developed in the factory or in the field or in the mine, able to protect himself. The humblest laborer in the land, if you go to him and say "I am going to protect you," will turn with amazement and ask you how? If you reply, "I am going to protect you by taking money from the pockets of some other laborer and put it into yours by the cunning device known as the tariff law," you would find that, though poor, he is proud. His spirit would revolt at such indignity. He would repel with scorn your protection. No, he would say, "I am poor; my home is not luxurious; I have many wants; but I am independent, and I am an American citizen; I receive protection from the country, the protection which the Constitution guaranties me of life, liberty, and property. Beyond that I do not ask any protection." That would be the answer of a laboring man. He is not, I repeat, a mendicant.

But the idea that gentlemen have developed in their argument during the progress of this discussion is that by some peculiar machinery, some extraordinary operation of the law, some mysterious device of legislation, you are going to give protection to labor. Are you going to give it all over the land? Is it to be uniform in its operation and its results, and are its fruits to fall benevolently upon all alike? Mr. Chairman, I want to illustrate the character of your proposed protection by taking a single article, salt.

Many years ago Mr. Jefferson said it ought to have been placed upon the free-list. It is an article in so general use that you can not make a meal, a breakfast, dinner, or supper without it; so common, that you can not cure a ham or a side of bacon without it; so common that no citizen can be without it in his humble home; and long ago Jefferson said of the Government tax that it ought to be taken off salt.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why not off of sugar, too?

Mr. HOOKER. Robert J. Walker, in his report on the tariff, said, in that magnificent document which has never been answered, "Salt ought to be as free from taxation as air and water."

Sir, the power of taxation is an onerous and tyrannical one. It is something that has a species of terror to the citizen where it is invoked directly. He dreads it in his own town, in his own municipality, in his own county, when he sees it in the shape of a tax-collector, who hands out his tax-list and says: "Here, pay it, or I will sell you out." Taxes come to all. They are like death in the illustration of the old Latin poet when speaking of death:

Pallida mors æquo pulsat pede, pauperum tabernas
Regumque turres.

There is no man who can escape from death or taxes. With impartial foot they knock at the cottage of the poor and the palace of the rich.

I say, therefore, that when you profess that you are going to protect the laborer his response will be, "I am able to protect myself if you will take off your taxes. All I ask is that you keep your hands out of my pocket and let me enjoy what I have earned by the fruits of my labor." That is all the protection labor wants.

My honorable friend from Michigan said the other day, sneeringly, that he would remind the President it was a condition that we confronted, and not a theory. But what is your condition? For what are you accountable? Let us see.

You have been in possession of the Government since the war closed. You had it during all the period of the civil war. You imposed tariff and internal taxes until your laws are now piling up useless revenue at the rate of over a hundred millions each year, and when we met at Chicago we made a declaration in the name of the Democratic party that we intended to afford the people relief by a reduction of taxation. We charged that you had accumulated over a hundred millions, had crippled the industries of the country, had paralyzed its business, and denied to the laboring people the just reward for their labor by taking from the circulation of the country these millions of money and locking them up in the Treasury.

These things we charged upon you. We made an issue before the grand tribune of the people, before the tribunal of the American Republic. We went before it and convicted you and elected Grover Cleveland and his Cabinet to the exalted positions which they now adorn and where they stand pledged to reform the laws and to reduce taxation. And yet whenever a measure has been brought forward by this Administration which looked to reducing the duty on protected articles, we were met by the proposition, "You must not do this or you will destroy the laborers of America."

The judgment of the people pronounced against you. And I say now that the Democratic party in serried column—he who stands at its head down to the humblest soldier in its ranks—will march in November next to the accomplishment of their purpose and to the fulfillment of the pledges they have made to the people, and no power can stop them. Neither the man who holds to the impracticable doctrine of free trade nor the man who holds to the unconstitutional doctrine of protection for protection's sake can be permitted to stand in the way of the march of the grand army of the people in demanding a reduction of taxation and a diminution of the surplus in the vaults of the Treasury. [Applause.]

I have said, sir, I would illustrate by one single article which the Committee on Ways and Means have ventured to put at last on the free-list. It is the article of salt, so essential, as I have said, in all the departments of industry, on the farm and in the curing of everything. On that article you have permitted a tax to be levied from the time salt first became an object of taxation to secure a revenue. Now it bears a duty of 12 per cent. on salt imported in bags and packages and 8 per cent. on salt bought in bulk, except that you took the precaution to exempt from taxation the fish-curer on the coast of New England, which is the home of the protective tariff system. To him you give a rebate of duty on this great necessity which should have been as free as the air or the water.

I took occasion to consult recent statistics in regard to this article, and addressed a letter to Mr. Switzler, the present intelligent Statistician of the Treasury Department, asking him to give me the statistics. I will publish his letter with my remarks. It shows that the capital invested in the manufacture of salt is $8,225,740; that the number of the people employed in the manufacture are as follows: Males, 4,125; females, 20; children, 144; total, 4,289. In all there are produced of salt in the United States 29,805,298 bushels. The product of the capital invested amounts to $4,829,566—about one-half of the capital invested.

I will print also with my remarks a table showing the amount that is paid for salt, made, as I have said, by 4,289 persons engaged in the manufacture of an article so absolutely necessary. The poorest as well as the richest citizen of this land can not make a meal without it. And yet you make the sixty millions of people of this country pay tribute to the 4,289 people who are engaged in this pursuit.

What justice is there in that, any more than if you were by an enactment to say, "We will impose a tax on houses, so much tax on each house without reference to the question of its value?" You have sixty millions of people who are required to pay a tribute to 4,289 people engaged in the manufacture of this article. As was well said by the distinguished South Carolinian while discussing this subject, "You do not dare to say you want it as a tribute; you will put it on a tariff act but it will come to be seen that it is a tribute."

So this is a tribute on the part of the whole population of this country to the 4,000 people who are engaged in that manufacture.

So it is with regard to every other thing that is taxed. The principle of taxation contended for on the other side is that they possess the power to levy a tax for revenue so as also to give protection. They say they do not lay it for that purpose directly, but for another. Some time ago gentlemen were disposed to question a little what their own platform said. I will read it to see how far they are committed to the doctrine which they now advocate. But before I do that I should be permitted to remark that this Hall was flooded and every desk was covered by appeals from persons to put on more taxes and to increase taxation. Can you convince the American people that you can add to their prosperity by laying on them an additional burden? No, sir. The man who has to pay that tax can not be deceived. Who is he? Not the man who signs his name to the thousand and one petitions which come to Congress requesting it not to touch this tariff, because it is a tariff to protect American labor. You have received thousands of such petitions declaring that you must not touch this tariff because it protects American labor.

Now, I want to say that you must not so revise the revenue laws that the tax shall be paid by one class and not by another; you must not so revise the laws that one class shall pay tribute to another. What power under the Constitution or in accordance with the principles of equity and justice have you to do that?

The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] this morning read an appeal from the people of California that Congress should not take the tax off lumber; because they were entitled to so much stumpage, $2 a thousand, and so much on the boards; and he said it would be the grossest act of injustice to those people, to the employés and to the men who owned the lumber, to take the tax off.

Now, I want to say that that is strikingly illustrated in a little production which I chanced to find the other day in a Philadelphia paper, and another in an Eastern Maryland paper. One of the gentlemen whose views are set forth here is talking on the subject of the tax on lumber, and I may remark in passing that no people in the country are more interested in that question than the people of Mississippi, because we have in that State the grandest pineries in the world. While those in Michigan and the other Northwestern States have been used up by manufacture and destroyed by prairie fires, we have in Mississippi pine forests almost inexhaustible in quantity and in a virgin state, yet we are not going to quarrel with the bill of the Committee on Ways and Means because it happens to touch upon that industry of our people. That, however, is the ground upon which the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] opposes the bill—that it would take off a portion of the tax on lumber.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The people of Michigan are buying up those Mississippi timber lands.

Mr. HOOKER. I know it, but we have just stopped you by resolution. You have got enough of the public lands. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOOKER. I have not the time now. I have read the views of this gentleman who is named here as Mr. Blanchard, of Chicago.

THE TARIFF IN A NUTSHELL.

Mr. Blanchard, of Chicago, in a short speech a few days ago, said more to show up the evils of a high-tariff system than others have done in labored speeches and ponderous volumes. Mr. Blanchard is a refreshing sample of a protected operator who is willing to tell the truth and shame his demoniac majesty, and furnishes a beautiful illustration of the utter selfishness that governs the beneficiaries of a high protective tariff. He says: "I am high tariff on lumber, but low tariff on copper, iron, wool, cotton, leather, glass, etc. I will tell you why. I own timber lands and sell stumpage; besides, I operate largely myself, and this tariff puts money into my pocket. I get $2 per 1,000 feet for my stumpage, and $2 per 1,000 for my boards. I have just sold 5,000,000 feet of lumber. Now, $2 per 1,000 on 5,000,000 feet is just $10,000. That is the difference to me between high tariff and free lumber. I am high tariff on lumber, I am. The blessed tariff, they tell us, is all for the benefit of the American laborer. What do you suppose I did with the $10,000? Divide it among my workmen? Not a bit of it. I put it right into this calfskin wallet, I did.

[Laughter.]

Of all my workmen I am the only protected American laborer. Wages depend upon supply and demand, my friends, and not upon taxes.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

When you see two men after one boss wages are low; when you see two bosses after one man wages are high; and that is the whole of it—the theory, principle and practice."—From the Easton (Md.) Ledger.

I read now an extract from the Philadelphia Telegraph, entitled—

THE TRUTH ON THE QUININE TARIFF.

To those who think that whatever is is right, and therefore should not be disturbed, and that the tariff is a thing existent and therefore not to be altered in any manner whatsoever, we heartily commend the history of the duty on quinine, which six years ago was virtually prohibitory. It will be remembered that a hard fight had to be fought to secure the repeal of the duty upon this important medicinal agent. At the time of the repeal of the duty there were five firms manufacturing quinine in this country. Three of them were in this city, and all declared through the columns of the Evening Telegraph, either by their own letters or in interviews with reporters, that if the bill of repeal passed they would be compelled to discontinue the manufacture of quinine. The price of the article was then $3.50 per ounce, or $2 95 less than when the duty was on.

Neither of the five great firms which previously manufactured quinine has since discontinued its manufacture, and all are, it is fairly to be assumed, making satisfactory profits from its manufacture under the reduced price. The making of quinine in this country six years ago was a monopoly, from which individual fortunes represented by millions of dollars were realized. It is but just to say, however, that there has been a large increase in the growth in the cinchona bark from which the medicine is made, and the added supply of raw material has helped to lessen the price of the product.

There are other great monopolies to-day in the country which could and should be destroyed by the reduction of the excessive duties on their manufactures. The worst of them all is the sugar trust, a monopoly which oppresses every consumer in the land. The quinine experiment should be tried upon it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am advised that my time is very short.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HOOKER. I have not time.

Mr. MORROW. I want to say only a word.

Mr. HOOKER. Please say it in your own time, then, for mine is nearly exhausted.

Mr. MORROW. Mine is all exhausted. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, when the Democratic party is insisting on the reduction of taxation; now, when we have gone farther even than the President has recommended—for we have not only gone in the direction of his recommendations as to the tariff, but we have undertaken to reduce the internal-revenue taxes—now, I say, when the Democratic party insists upon reducing taxation the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] tells us that the internal-revenue tax ought never to have existed a year beyond the time when the necessity for it ceased. Such a tax was laid during the war of the Revolution and was swept away in 1801 by Jefferson. Again in 1812 an internal-revenue tax was imposed, and again it was repealed. But the gentleman's party was in power here from the close of the civil war until 1875; why, then, did they not take off these internal-revenue taxes? They cherished them carefully, and now they hold them up as a bar against touching the sacred principle of protection for protection's sake, and refuse to comply with the pledges which they made to the people and upon which they profess to stand. What were those pledges? I read from the Republican platform of 1884:

We therefore demand [you speak like masters, but you are talking to your masters] that the imposition of duties on foreign imports shall be made not for "revenue only," but that, in raising the requisite revenues for the Government, such duties shall be so levied as to afford security to our diversified industries and protection to the rights and wages of the laborer; to the end that active and intelligent labor, as well as capital, may have its just reward, and the laboring man his full share in the national prosperity.

* * * * * * *

The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus, not by the vicious and indiscriminate process of horizontal reduction, but by such methods as will relieve the tax-payer without injuring the laborer or the great productive interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am gratified to know that there is at least one distinguished gentleman on the other side of the House who breaks down the barrier behind which the Republican party have solidly arrayed themselves. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

This bill does not go as far as I would have it go, but shall I, therefore, quarrel with it? It affects seriously my own constituents in one direction—the tax on lumber; but shall I, therefore, quarrel with it? No, sir. We have in Mississippi, 60 miles below our State capital, a manufactory of cotton and woolen goods, where they are now erecting another building, so as to employ a double number of hands, and the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of that establishment says that he wants no tariff tax to enable him to go into the markets of Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York and compete there with better goods than any that can be made elsewhere in the country. And, sir, we are not confined to cotton, although that is our great staple.

I speak, Mr. Chairman, a word in behalf of the humble laboring class from the midst of whom I come, and of whom I am the representative here. I speak in behalf of the farmer who has borne for years and years, from the establishment of the tariff of abominations in 1828 all along the line down to the present time (except during the tariff of 1846, which was a tariff for revenue)—I speak, I say, for the farmer who has borne the brunt of the taxation of this Government uncomplainingly; I speak for the farmer who goes out in the morning and holds the plow handles until dewy eve; I speak for the women who in my part of the country attend to the matters of the farm. I ask in the name of the people, not of any one section alone, but of every section of our common country, that we shall go back to the primitive principle of our fathers and lay a tariff (which means only a tax) for revenue, letting it carry with it such incidental protection as it may. I stand where the party stood when they elected Buchanan. I stand where they stood when they elected Pierce and Polk. I stand, I say, where the party stood, on the firm middle ground of a tariff for revenue, carrying with it whatever incidental protection it may—when Jackson, iron-handed and iron-hearted Jackson, was nominated and elected President of the United States. [Applause.] There is where I stand. There is where we must stand, if we are to redeem the pledges which we made at Chicago. To reduce taxation and diminish the surplus is the duty which now rests upon the legislative department of the Government, and if there is any failure the responsibility will rest there, too.

Sir, I would have every laborer in this land prosperous. We have brought into this country thirteen millions of laborers from 1820 up to 1887, and we have incorporated them into the great body of our American people. They go out all over this country, on the farms, in the forests, in the factories, in the mines, and under the influence of the very soil which they tread and the air which they breathe they lose their distinct nationalities and become Americans.

DUTIES ON COTTON GOODS.

NEW YORK, January 17, 1888.

Hon. CHARLES E. HOOKER, M. C.:

As there seems to be a possibility that some action will be taken by Congress this session looking to a revision of our tariff laws, we desire to call attention to some provisions contained in the present cotton schedule which certainly would seem to call for changes that will make the duty on these goods approach in a measure what is just and fair. We inclose you herewith sample cuttings of some of the main lines that we import, and below we give you a table showing, first, description of goods and their uses; second, width; third, value in American money; fourth, duty per yard; and, fifth, equivalent of same in ad valorem duty.

From an examination of this table you will see that all inferior grades of cotton pay a duty equal to an ad valorem duty of from 93 to 65 per cent. In all these different kinds of cotton goods the duty runs on through a series of qualities and values until it reaches in the better and best goods its minimum of 40 per cent. In other words, the laboring man who uses the lowest grades of goods, pays a duty or protection of 93 to 65 per cent., whilst his employer, using the better grades, pays only 40 per cent. Further than this, these high rates of duty are wholly unnecessary for the protection of the home manufacturer, as is evidenced by the fact that amongst the most successful imitators of foreign cotton goods that we find are the cotton-quilt manufacturers, who are and have been protected by a duty of only 35 per cent.

In fact, these inconsistencies of the last tariff are the result of error on the part of the lawmakers more than intention, and the law should have been freed from them long since, entirely independent of the question as to the relative advantages of a high or low tariff. Hoping that you may find it possible to make some changes that will correct the errors of the present schedule, and assuring you of our willingness to supply you at any time with any information we may possess,

We remain, yours, very respectfully,

SHERMAN, CECIL & CO.

EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

While the expedients thus employed, to release to the people the money lying idle in the Treasury, served to avert immediate danger, our surplus revenues have continued to accumulate, the excess for the present year amounting on the 1st day of December to $55,258,701.19, and estimated to reach the sum of $113,000,000 on the 30th of June next, at which date it is expected that this sum, added to prior accumulations, will swell the surplus in the Treasury to $140,000,000. * * *

And while the functions of our national Treasury should be few and simple, and while its best condition would be reached, I believe, by its entire disconnection with private business interests, yet when, by a perversion of its purposes, it idly holds money uselessly subtracted from the channels of trade, there seems to be reason for the claim that some legitimate means should be devised by the Government to restore in an emergency, without waste or extravagance, such money to its place among the people.

* * * * * * *

The proposition to deposit the money held by the Government in banks throughout the country, for use by the people, is, it seems to me, exceedingly objectionable in principle, as establishing too close a relationship between the operations of the Government Treasury and the business of the country, and too extensive a commingling of their money, thus fostering an unnatural reliance in private business upon public funds. If this scheme should be adopted it should only be done as a temporary expedient to meet an urgent necessity. Legislative and executive effort should generally be in the opposite direction, and should have a tendency to divorce, as much and as fast as can safely be done, the Treasury Department from private enterprise.

* * * * * * *

So stubbornly have all efforts to reform the present condition been resisted by those of our fellow-citizens thus engaged that they can hardly complain of the suspicion, entertained to a certain extent, that there exists an organized combination all along the line to maintain their advantage.

* * * * * * *

By the last census it is made to appear that of the 17,392,099 of our population engaged in all kinds of industries 7,670,493 are employed in agriculture, 4,074,238 in professional and personal service (2,934,876 of whom are domestic servants and laborers), while 1,810,256 are employed in trade and transportation, and 3,857,112 are classed as employed in manufacturing and mining.

For present purposes, however, the last number given should be considerably reduced. Without attempting to enumerate all, it will be conceded that there should be deducted from those which it includes 375,143 carpenters and joiners, 285,401 milliners, dressmakers, and seamstresses, 172,726 blacksmiths, 133,756 tailors and tailoresses, 102,473 masons, 76,241 butchers, 41,309 bakers, 22,083 plasterers, and 4,891 engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, amounting in the aggregate to 1,214,023, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

EXHIBIT C.

[Excerpts from Mr. Walker's report on the tariff of 1846.]

In suggesting improvements in the revenue laws the following principles have been adopted:

1. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.
2. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.
3. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties; or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.
4. That the maximum rate of duty should be imposed on luxuries.
5. That all minimums, and all specific duties, should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place. Care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.
6. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

* * * * * * *

In one of his annual messages Mr. Jefferson recommended to Congress "the suppression of the duties on salt." A large portion of this duty is exhausted in heavy expenses of measuring salt, and in large sums paid for fishing bounties and allowances in lieu of the drawback of the duty, both which expenditures would fall with a repeal of the duty; which repeal, therefore, can cause no considerable reduction of the revenue. Salt is a necessary of life, and should be as free from tax as air and water. It is used in large quantities by the farmer and planter; and to the poor this tax operates most oppressively not only in the use of the article itself, but as combined with salted provisions. The salt made abroad by solar evaporation is also most pure and wholesome, and, as conservative of health, should be exempt from taxation.

* * * * * * *

The whole power to collect taxes, whether direct or indirect, is conferred by the same clause of the Constitution. The words are: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." A direct tax or excise, not for revenue but for protection, clearly would not be within the legitimate object of taxation, and yet it would be as much so as a duty imposed for a similar purpose. The power is "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." A duty must be laid only that it may be collected; and if it is so imposed that it can not be collected in whole or in part it violates the declared object of the granted power. To lay all duties so high that none of them could be collected would be a prohibitory tariff. To lay a duty on any one article so high that it could not be collected would be a prohibitory tariff upon that article.

If a duty of 100 per cent. were imposed upon all or upon a number of articles, so as to diminish the revenue upon all or any of them it would operate as a partial prohibition. A partial and a total prohibition are alike in violation of the true object of the taxing power. They only differ in degree, and not in principle. If the revenue limit may be exceeded by 1 per cent., it may be exceeded by 100. If it may be exceeded upon any one article, it may be exceeded on all; and there is no escape from this conclusion, but in contending that Congress may lay duties on all articles so high as to collect no revenue and operate as a total prohibition. The Constitution declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." A tariff bill, it is conceded, can only originate in the House, because it is a bill for raising revenue. That is the only proper object of such a bill. A tariff is a bill to "lay and collect taxes." It is a bill for "raising revenue;" and whenever it departs from that object, in whole or in part, either by total or partial prohibition, it violates the purpose of the granted power.

* * * * * * *

A protective tariff is a question regarding the enhancement of the profits of capital. That is its object, and not to augment the wages of labor, which would reduce those profits. It is a question of percentage, and is to decide whether money invested in our manufactures shall, by special legislation, yield a profit of 10, 20, or 30 per cent., or whether it shall remain satisfied with a dividend equal to that accruing from the same capital invested in agriculture, commerce, or navigation.

The present tariff is unjust, and unequal as well in its details as in the principles upon which it is founded. On some articles the duties are entirely prohibitory, and on others there is a partial prohibition. It discriminates in favor of manufactures, and against agriculture, by imposing many higher duties upon the manufactured fabric than upon the agricultural product out of which it is made. It discriminates in favor of the manufacturer, and against the merchant, by injurious restrictions upon trade and commerce, and against the ship-building and navigating interest by heavy duties on almost every article used in building or navigating vessels. It discriminates in favor of manufactures, and against exports, which are as truly the product of American industry as manufactures. It discriminates in favor of the rich and against the poor, by high duties upon nearly all the necessaries of life, and by minimum and specific duties, rendering the tax upon the real value much higher on the cheaper than upon the finer article.

* * * * * * *

If the marshal were sent by the Federal Government to collect a direct tax from the whole people, to be paid over to manufacturing capitalists to enable them to sustain their business or realize a larger profit, it would be the same in effect as the protective duty, which, when analyzed in its simplest elements and reduced to actual results, is a mere substraction of so much money from the people to increase the resources of the protected classes. Legislation for classes is against the doctrine of equal rights, repugnant to the spirit of our free institutions, and, it is apprehended by many, may become but another form for privileged orders under the name of protection, instead of privilege—indicated here not by rank or title, but by profits and dividends extracted from the many, by taxes upon them, for the benefit of the few.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, by participating in this debate I do not expect to contribute anything new or anything calculated particularly to enlighten this House or the country upon the question of the tariff. But representing the constituency I do, I feel it my duty to enter and emphasize the solemn protest of my people against the wreck of the material prosperity proposed by this bill which is now just beginning to dawn upon the "new South."

I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are those who disclaim that there is any such thing as the "new South;" perhaps in the cotton belt that is true; but with that I do not propose to deal. In the central Southern States there is a "new South;" there is there the beginning, absolutely amazing in character, of the development of the resources of our belt of country. The city of Knoxville, in which I reside, lingering along under a Democratic policy for a hundred years, had in 1880 a few more than 9,000 people. But under the impetus of the Republican policy of protection, the policy of developing and building up the resources of the country, that town to-day numbers more than 43,000 people; and in the name of the industries and the interests of the people I represent I desire to enter a solemn protest against perpetrating this monstrosity of free trade by enacting the President's message into law.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the bill under consideration is very much in the nature of a plea of confession on the part of the Democratic party that they are incapable of reducing the surplus in the Treasury except by destroying the material prosperity of the people. This country has had two periods, two experiences, two occasions, when the English policy, in contradistinction to the American policy, has been triumphant.

I desire to call attention very briefly, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has done, to some of the historical incidents connected with the tariff legislation of this country; but going back beyond that, I am for a protective tariff on the same principle on which the English Government enacted laws previous to the Revolution to inhibit manufacturing in this country. All of us who have read the history of our country know that while the colonies were dependencies of Great Britain, Parliament, by enactment and by resolution, adopted measures forbidding the colonies to manufacture the simplest article of commerce. As Mr. Jefferson said (and I suppose his statement will be good authority on the other side of the House), our fathers were forbidden even to manufacture into a hat the fur of animals captured on their own soil.

Every manufactured article that was in use among the colonies was by force of the laws of Great Britain required to be manufactured in England and brought to this country—why? For the purpose of giving employment to the English laborers, building up English manufactures, giving prosperity to the people of England by enabling them to manufacture for this country, and abstracting our money and withdrawing it from among our people and taking it there to build up the interests of England as against the people of America.

These are historical facts. Why, sir, under the English laws just previous to the Revolution and the Declaration of Independence, a man in Virginia could not have tanned a coon-skin to make himself a pair of boots without being indicted and punished under English law. This condition of things, as every reader of our history knows, had reduced the colonies to an extreme condition of destitution. It was not that little tea episode at Boston that brought on the Revolution; it was this repressive and oppressive legislation of Great Britain against the interests of the colonies that caused our fathers to rebel. And when they did so, what was the effect? What results followed? We will see in a moment.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has recited several historical incidents, but he drew no inference from them. I propose to take the same historical incidents and draw an inference founded upon the history of the country, and to inquire whether that inference does not support the Republican theory on this question of a protective tariff.

When our fathers rebelled because of the oppression of the mother country the mere fact of organizing armies and placing them in the field operated, how?

It not only stopped, but finally repealed this oppressive legislation of the English Government and made our colonies free, and enabled our people to establish for themselves manufactories in their midst, which relieved them from the necessity of depending upon the importation of the cheap products of pauper labor in Europe.

What was the result? Why, Mr. Chairman, even during the Revolution the armies of George Washington, composed of our forefathers, operated as a protective tariff to this country. The people of the colonies, as I have already said, established manufactories for themselves. Every reader of history knows that at the close of the war manufacturing establishments had sprung up to such an extent that labor had been given employment, that the farmer had found a market at his doors, and that the people were in fact more prosperous than when the war begun, notwithstanding it had lasted seven years. That is a historical fact to which I invite the attention of my friends on the other side of the House.

But, sir, when the war ended and peace was declared, our fathers, either unwittingly or otherwise, did just what the Democrats insist we have now under the Constitution. They organized the old confederate government under the Articles of Confederation, and they made it a States rights government. There is no doubt about that. It was not a union; it was a States rights government. A sort of joint-snake confederacy.

But we had not progressed very far under that new government, upon which the hopes and fears and aspirations of our fathers were fixed, when it was realized that instead of going upward and onward we were lapsing rapidly into our old position of dependence upon England and her cheap products. There was no power under the old confederation whereby Congress could control the commerce between the States and foreign countries. Some States had no law on the subject, and other States adopted free trade, while still others enacted oppressive navigation laws.

From 1783 to 1787 we had free trade. What was the result? We had a constant influx of pauper products, and the manufactures and commerce of the United States went down before the cheap labor which was brought into competition with the free labor of our own country. Our Government was reduced to even a worse condition than before the Revolutionary war.

And here is a fact I wish to call particular attention to, and I want you to mark it: Under that condition of affairs, beginning with Virginia and followed up by Massachusetts and the other States, the people of our country made an earnest appeal to Congress—for what? Did they ask for a tariff for revenue only? No, sir; not a bit of it. Did they ask to have a tariff for free trade? Not a word of it. Did they ask to have a tariff only for the purpose of paying the running expenses of the Government? No, sir. But the resolutions of 1786 of Virginia and Massachusetts and Maryland and the petitions sent up to Congress were to the effect that some action should be taken whereby an end should be put to the influx of the pauper products of Europe. And for what purpose? Why, sir, for the purpose of affording protection to our own labor and industries.

When the new Constitution was framed a clause was inserted in it whereby Congress was authorized to regulate trade and commerce between the States and with foreign countries. All the debates of that convention show conclusively and overwhelmingly that there was not a man in that body, not a single man in the convention of 1787, who did not insist that section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, giving Congress the power to regulate trade with foreign countries, should be placed there upon the distinct understanding that it was to enable Congress to pass a protective-tariff law. What for? Why, sir, for the purpose of excluding the cheap products of the pauper labor of the Old World. It was for the purpose of giving American labor a chance against foreign labor.

Now, the first law passed under the Constitution of 1789 was a protective-tariff law, which was signed by George Washington. What was the result of the united and universal demand of the people of the several States? It saved our people from the further influx of the products of cheap labor of the Old World. It stopped the importation of foreign goods and gave home manufactures a chance. And, sir, from the passage of that tariff act, from 1789 down to 1816, this country bounded forward, upward, and onward in material prosperity. But in 1816 tariff-tinkering began, and that tariff-tinkering, Mr. Chairman, has been disastrous to the country every time it has been attempted. We begin to hear the rumbling of bankruptcy even now because of the tariff-tinkering which has been going on for the last few years.

But, as I have said, this tariff-tinkering began in 1816, and in that year the protective idea was somewhat modified; but from that year down to 1824 we went down rapidly in finances and in manufacturing industry, and in everything which makes a country great. In the year 1824, however, the protective idea became dominant again in Congress, and it was strengthened in the tariff of 1828.

From 1824, moving on down under the protective tariffs of 1824 and 1828, this country was prosperous until 1832, when John C. Calhoun, an original protectionist—talk about Daniel Webster being a free-trader!—John C. Calhoun, an original protectionist, only changed front on the subject in the interest of slavery and the production of cotton. And right here, Mr. Chairman, let me say that he was right from his standpoint. I say here that if slavery was in existence and I could believe it to be right I would be in favor of free trade myself. Why do I say this? Simply because it was a beautiful system—the English and foreign aristocracy maintained by pauper and cheap labor of the Old World, manufacturing their articles for consumption in this country, shiping them here, and exchanging them for cotton produced by the slave labor of the South. A beautiful system; the negro aristocracy of the South and the pauper aristocracy of the Old World, the two dovetailing precisely together. And Mr. Calhoun understood this condition of things. He foresaw that if he could destroy the protective system and produce cotton by the cheap labor of the South—the labor extorted from the slave—and exchange it for the products of the cheap labor of Europe, he would have two aristocracies, one abroad and one here. But in that controversy in 1832 Mr. Clay, the great champion of American interests, simply and purely to avert war, consented to a reduction, not of 20 per cent., but to a reduction of 10 per cent.; and what was the result?

Who that has studied the history of this country but knows that from 1833, when the Calhoun tariff went into operation, this country simply stumbled along? Industries languished, the furnace-fires had begun to die out, the laboring man ceased to find employment, the American farmer took whatever he could get for his produce, and the flood-tide of disaster went on until 1837, when the full fruition all of the Democratic free-traders could possibly have desired was realized in the climax that came in the collapse of all the business interests of the country, from one end of the Union to the other. And it is an historical fact that under the free-trade tariff of 1832 three-fourths of the manufacturing establishments in this country not only closed out, but two-thirds of them were actually sold out under the sheriff's hammer; and yet they tell us free-trade is a good thing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But the whirligig of politics in 1842 placed the protectionists in power again, and what is the result? They reincorporated the protective ideas in the laws of this country, and from 1842 onward the country commenced going up on the pathway of prosperity. The condition of the people was improved everywhere. Labor found employment. The farmer again had a market, and the manufacturing industries revived and competition was again beginning to give cheap manufactured fabrics.

There are abundant statistics to demonstrate these facts, but a single fact will suffice to show it. The tariff of 1842 became so popular with the people; it accomplished so much in every workshop in the land, every farmer prospered, every man engaged in commerce and business throughout the country was prosperous, until it had become so universally popular that James K. Polk, the Tennesseian, and the best Democrat I ever read of in my life, was compelled in his celebrated Kane letter to declare in favor of the tariff of 1842, and pledged himself, if elected, to carry out and maintain intact its provisions.

That same year, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party carried Pennsylvania, a protective State, by inscribing upon their banners, incorporating in their speeches, adopting as their watchword, and proclaiming in their public utterances, "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842." And yet free-trade Democracy, the synonym of all that is evil and vicious in politics—free-trade Democracy is so uncertain that notwithstanding its promises and pledges, no sooner was the Democratic party inaugurated in power than the Walker tariff of 1846 was formulated and pushed through Congress. George M. Dallas, the Democratic Vice-President, disregarding the pledges of his principal to maintain the tariff of 1842, gave the casting vote in the United States Senate to inaugurate free trade. The Senate being otherwise equally divided, he disregarded the pledges of Mr. Polk and the Democratic party and voted for the repeal of the tariff of 1842.

Mr. DARLINGTON. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. HOUK. I know I am correct. That is history.

What was the effect of the tariff of 1846? We hear gentlemen talking of prosperous times under the tariff of 1846. Ah, gentlemen, they were comparatively so; but how? Every student of history knows that under the tariff of 1846 this country had started down hill, but through the providential discovery of gold in California, by which more than a billion and one hundred millions of dollars in gold coin was added to the currency of the country, the great tide of industrial depression and commercial disaster was averted, and the country was freed from the evils that threatened under that tariff.

I said that was a providential discovery—gold in California. That is true. Providence came to the rescue of the country then to relieve it from the Democracy. If it had not been for the discovery of gold the country would have been financially ruined under the tariff of 1846. And so it is to-day. It takes Providence and the Republican party, or rather, it takes the Republican party, as an instrument in the hands of Divine Providence, all it can do to keep the free-trade Democracy from ruining the country in 1888. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What else? The war then came. The present rascally Republican protective policy was inaugurated and what is the result? I have not time to talk at length about it, as I see my hour is passing very rapidly. But behold the wonders, the magic, the absolute and seemingly miraculous, the upbuilding, the developments that have gone on under this Republican protective policy since 1861, notwithstanding the calamities of the war.

Why, some gentleman the other day obtruded into this debate something about land grants. He said the Republican party had given away so much land, and delivered quite a lamentation over it. It is true the Republicans enacted several land grants, but did the gentleman forget that the land-grant system began with the Democratic party? They gave 46,000,000 acres of more valuable land than the Republicans ever gave away in all their land-grant gifts. But yet, suppose we had no precedent for it whatever? The land grants of the Republican party have converted a wilderness into an empire.

There was all this vast territory in the West, with the Indian and the buffalo in possession, comprising what under the rule of the great Democracy was the great American desert. There was no development; there were no towns, no cities, no railroads. That vast territory was a great Democratic briar-patch. But the Republican party coming on and supplementing this grand policy of protection with internal improvements built these railroads. Cities and towns were built. The result is that all that Western country is to-day the pride of every American citizen, whereas if the Democracy had remained in power it would be known still as the Great American Desert.

But now I want to call attention to another fact in this connection very briefly. Every time we have had a protective policy in this country without one single exception the manufactured article has gone down in price and the farm product and the laborer's wages have gone up in price. No, sir; there is not a single exception to the rule anywhere, if the history of the country is correctly written, and every time we have approached free trade the manufactured article has gone up in price and the product of the farm and the laborer's wages have gone down in price.

In a speech I made in 1884 at London, Tenn., in my district—my friend from the Chattanooga district will know the gentleman I am going to refer to—I was trying to argue this question of protection. I looked over to one side of the room and discovered in the crowd Capt. Jack Hall, a prominent Democrat, who owned a good river farm, raised splendid crops, and kept fine horses, sheep, cattle, and everything else that goes to the adornment of a modern farm. What I said to him was taken down in short-hand at the time and was published in the Philadelphia Press and other papers; and I want to read as part of my remarks that dialogue between me and Jack. I said:

Q. 1. How much did you get for your corn under the Walker tariff of 1846?
A. From 10 to 12½ cents per bushel.
2. How much do you get for the same kind of corn, raised on the same farm and delivered at the same place, under the present Republican protective policy?
A. Sixty cents per bushel at the heap.
3. How much did you get for an average pony horse in those days?
A. From $40 to $60.
4. How much do you get now under the present policy for the same kind of a horse?
A. From $100 to $125.
5. How much did you get under the Walker tariff for your wheat per bushel?
A. From 25 cents to 35 cents.
6. How much do you get for the same kind of wheat under this present Republican policy?
A. From 80 cents to $1.25 per bushel, owing to the demand.
7. How much did you get in those days for a good cow?
A. From $8 to $12.
8. How much do you get for the same kind of a cow now under the present policy?
A. From $25 to $45.
9. How much did you get per hundred for flour under the Walker tariff of 1846?
A. From $1 to $1.50.
10. How much do you get for the same kind of flour now?
A. From $4 to $6 per hundred.
11. How much did you get for a good sheep in those days, Jack?
A. Fifty cents for a good one.
12. How much do you get for the same kind of a sheep now, under this Republican policy?
A. From $1.50 to $2 (a voice in the crowd, "Yes, $2.50 for a good one").
13. How much did you get per hundred for your hogs under the Walker tariff of 1846?
A. From $2.50 to $3.
14. How much do you get under the present "rascally Republican protective policy?"
A. From $5 to $7 per hundred.
15. Jack, did you make butter for sale in those days?
A. We made butter, but there was little sale, for there was nobody to buy.
16. Well, when you sold any what did you get for it?
17. Sometimes as high as 6 pence per pound.
A. Do you make and sell much butter now, Jack?
A. Yes; a good deal.
18. How much do you get per pound now, under this rascally Republican protective policy?
A. I have a standing contract now in London, with the employés engaged in the manufacturing establishments here, at 25 cents per pound the year round.
19. Jack, you raise a great many chickens on your farm, don't you?
A. Yes; a great many.
20. Well, if you sold any under the Walker tariff of '46, how much did you get for them?
A. There was not much of a market, and but few sales, but occasionally we could sell a real good fat chicken for as much as a sixpence.
21. How is it now, Jack, about the price of chickens, under this Republican protective policy?
A. We can sell all the chickens we raise at from 20 cents to 30 cents apiece.
22. Well, Jack, did you sell any eggs under the Walker tariff of '46?
A. Yes; occasionally we sold a few dozen.
23. How much did you get for them, Jack?
A. From 2 cents to 3 cents per dozen.
24. Do you sell any eggs now, Jack?
A. Yes; the old woman sells a great many.
25. What does she get for them, Jack?
A. Never less than 25 cents per dozen.
26. Jack, how do you account for the difference in prices under the Walker tariff of 1846 and the present Republican protective policy?
A. We had no manufacturing establishments here at London then, and there were but few people, but now you see there are a great many laborers employed in these establishments here, and they give us a market for all our surplus truck, and we sell a great deal of stuff and get the money for it that we use to throw away, because there was nobody to consume it.
27. Well, Jack, what did you have to pay under the Walker tariff per yard for calico to dress up the "old woman" for Sunday?
A. From a shilling to 25 cents per yard.
28. What can you get the same kind of calico for now, Jack?
A. From 4½ cents to 8 cents per yard.
29. What did you have to pay for a good Sunday wool hat in those days, Jack?
A. From $2.50 to $4.
30. What do you have to pay for the same kind of a hat now, Jack?
A. From 50 cents to $1.25.
31. What did farmers have to pay for trace-chains in those days?
A. Two dollars for anything like good ones.
32. What do you pay for the same kind of chains now?
A. For real good ones 60 cents per pair.
33. What about boots and shoes in those days, Jack?
A. An ordinary pair of rough shoes cost $3, while the most common pair of brogan boots cost not less than $5.
34. What will the same kind of goods cost now, Jack?
A. About two-thirds of the old price.
34½. What about a suit of store clothes in those days, Jack?
A. Well, they were so very costly that the common people never bought any.

Every one knows that this is the truth—that under the free-trade Walker tariff "store clothes" were so costly that the common people did not pretend to buy them.

35. How is it now under this Republican protective policy?
A. Well, a few dollars will neatly clothe a whole family.

I was making a speech soon after that time in another part of the country to an immense crowd of farmers. I was making about the same sort of a speech that I am making to-day. I happened to refer, as I well remember, to the time when corn sold at 10 cents a bushel. At that point a prominent old farmer in the crowd whom I had known all my life—he was much older than myself, but we had been in the army together and I knew him very well—called out, "Hold on a moment! Under the Democratic tariff of 1846 I hauled 50 bushels of corn right across the river there and put it in Emmet Munday's corn-crib for one pair of boots, the price being $5 for the boots and 10 cents a bushel for the corn." I then said, "Jake"—for down in my country I call people by their first names—"how many people will 50 bushels of corn shoe now under this rascally Republican policy of protection?" "By George! it would shoe a family of a dozen for at least two years." [Laughter and applause.] That is a fair illustration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as bearing on this question of tariff and protection, I wish to have read at the Clerk's desk certain paragraphs which I have marked in a speech which I had the honor to make in the capitol of my native State a few years age. These paragraphs have a direct bearing upon the present subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

This brings us up to the war and the protective policy it forced upon the country, and croakers and would-be prophets have never ceased to predict ruin from the effects of high tariff, or, in other words, "protective-tariff laws." They have denounced a protective tariff as heaping burdens upon and weighing the people down with poverty and want. Free-traders have depicted the glories and blessings of their policy, and predicted the ruinous effects of the "policy of protection;" they have assumed to speak for labor, and, as it were, have wept tears of sorrow over the distress to befall the laboring and producing classes, while under the policy of protection these people have moved forward accumulating and to accumulate property and homes, and even wealth, by increased prices for labor and its products.

Free-traders have kept on prophesying evil from protection, while the people on whom these evils were to fall have been improving in all the elements of a real prosperity.

Statistics are abundant with which to illustrate and enforce the beneficial effects of the "protective policy" of the Republican party. Nowhere are the evidences of the good results of wholesome protection laws more plainly to be seen and felt than right here in Tennessee, where, in spite of the repressive and obstructive policy of your Democratic State government, the people are reasonably prosperous, and, with anything like wise home management, ready to bound onward to even greatness itself. I would here remind you that Tennessee is being made a great State by the sound national policy of the Republican party, in spite of her own narrow-minded policy as a State, in point of wealth and material development.

And here I would ask the middle-aged and older men present to go back to their earliest recollection and contrast the then condition of the country and people with the present prosperity by which they are surrounded. Then we had no railroads, no manufacturing establishments; none of our coal banks were opened, no iron mills had been built, and in fact we had scarcely entered upon a career of self-support, except after the most rugged order, and that only made possible through constant struggle and toil.

Go back in your recollection and call to mind the then condition of your markets for labor and products, and contrast prices then and now, and seek a reason for the great change? Then, as I have said, we had no manufacturing establishments. Our coal fields had not been opened up, and our coal banks had not commenced to supply the demand; indeed, the demand itself had not been created. We had no market for any surplus convenient to the place of production. We had no establishments demanding labor and paying wages. And if the free-trade doctrine of "tariff for revenue only" of the Democratic party had continued to prevail, we never would have had our coal, iron, copper, zinc, and other resources developed.

The Democratic party had governed the country three-fourths of its existence before the outbreak of the war, and while it had failed to establish its free trade, "tariff for revenue only" policy permanently in the administration of the Government, it had been so constantly in power that it was able to prevent the friends of protection from establishing a stable and reliable protective system. As we have seen, every time it had the opportunity it began to force the country in the direction of free trade.

Being generally the successful party at the polls, and always arraying itself as a party against the policy of protection, it intimidated capital, prevented investments, and retarded the development of the country until, as I have already stated, the necessities of the war forced the adoption of such a rate of tariff duties as amounted to protection and proved the wisdom of the policy. And now that it has been established, we are beginning to reap some of its beneficial effects. We have seen our coal fields opened up and our iron banks dug down. We have seen manufacturing establishments springing up and iron mills erected all around us. And, as we have witnessed all this, we have seen immigrants coming in and capital making itself felt for good in turning our whole land into the channels of trade and commerce, based upon the mining and manufacturing resources which we so abundantly possess.

We have seen Nashville, your beautiful and rapidly growing capital; Chattanooga, with its push and struggle, and Knoxville, with its vast resources, wealth, and enterprise, and other great manufacturing centers, blooming and "booming" with their thousands of rat- ating towns clothed in prosperity by the busy pick and shove the blazing furnace and whizzing spindle. We see these cities and towns to-day all life and bustle. We see every class of labor and every phase of enterprise. We see all manner of manufactured products being turned out, and a ready market for them all. And while wages have been increased, and labor dignified and made honorable, by reason of better pay and more work for all, both skilled and unskilled, the farmer and his interests have not been forgotten nor neglected.

And just here I wish to combat the idea of free-traders, who, while they concede that the manufacturer and mechanic is greatly benefited by protection, insist that the farmer and unskilled laborer, on whose products all real prosperity must depend, is as greatly injured by the increased price on those articles which they are compelled to buy, caused by what they are pleased to call a high protective tax or tariff.

You will observe that I put their statement fairly and strongly, so as to do entire justice to the free-trade argument. And I say now, that I am a Republican, among other things, because, as I understand the party creed, Republicanism is for "protection because it protects." And in this connection I want to talk a little for the consideration of the farmers of the country. In my opinion they receive the first fruits and greatest blessing—the highest reward from a protective tariff. And I can not better illustrate this fact than by calling attention to my own personal observations and experience, and I apprehend these will be corroborated by the experience and observations of most intelligent lookers-on at passing events.

Remember the condition of your country under the administration of the free-trade ("for revenue only") Democracy. Remember, you had no coal fields opened, no iron furnaces built, no manufacturing establishments, no rapid influx of population, no rapidly growing cities, no new towns springing up as at present. Whatever of these you then had were by gradual and slow secretions.

Then in the absence of these elements of prosperity you had no markets for surplus products and no stimulus to induce you to the effort to make a surplus for trade and commerce.

Now, as I have said, your State has cities as centers of manufacturing and other business enterprises, with their young and prosperous towns revolving around them with industrious and busy inhabitants making the world better and richer.

These populations have to be supplied, and as a consequence a market is furnished for every surplus product which the farmer may have plucked from the soil.

Before protection had induced the investment of capital in manufacturing and other kindred employments here in Tennessee you might have traveled for a whole week through some portions of the State without seeing a wagon, and a covered wagon was as great a sight then, in some localities, as a railroad train is now to the most remote backwoodsman. But how changed the condition of affairs! How different are things to-day from what they were in yesterday of the past! And how different they are destined to be in the to-morrow of the future to what they are in the to-day of the present!

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I wish to call attention to another argument used in connection with this bill, which seems to me to be entirely fallacious. There is no man on this floor, of any party, who is not ready at all times and under all circumstances to use his vote, and voice, and influence against the importation of pauper labor. Now I want to put the question, why exclude the pauper laborer and yet enact here a bill which allows him, while staying on the other side, to send his manufactured product here to compete with the labor of the men with whom he would come into competition if permitted to come here.

Every man everywhere is ready to use his influence to exclude pauper laborers from this country; yet we have the great Democratic party coming here with a bill which proposes to house those foreign laborers on foreign soil and admit their fabrics into this country free. Would it not be better to let the pauper laborer come here and do his work in this country? We would gain at least this much good out of him; he would be fed by us, and we would dispose of that much of our surplus products by reason of the greater demand in the home market.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not in favor of the importation of pauper labor or contract labor, but here is the Democratic party which undertakes to oppose the importation of pauper labor and yet proposes to admit, in competition with American products, the products of foreign pauper labor. I say there is neither logic nor statesmanship nor sound policy at the bottom of any scheme which permits the products of pauper labor to be shipped to this country free, while refusing to admit the pauper laborer himself upon our soil. The Democratic policy is to let the pauper remain abroad and consume English supplies in his living, but to admit free all the products he can manufacture under the shadow of the English flag.

What good does it do to exclude the pauper and still let his handiwork blot the prosperity of American industry by coming in competition with our laboring class.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal said about "war taxes." Now, the Democratic party in my part of the country—and my friends on the other side know that I tell the truth—have screamed themselves hoarse in opposing the internal-revenue laws. There was not a Democratic member on this floor for ten years from our section of country who was not elected by making speeches against the internal-revenue system.

Gentlemen from my part of the Union know this to be the truth, and will not deny it. Every Democratic member of Congress from Tennessee for ten years came here pledged to do all he could to secure the repeal of the internal-revenue laws. But now Grover Cleveland has cracked his whip; and here they come skedaddling behind the curtain and saying: "Oh, it is the best thing in the world to retain internal-revenue taxes." I will except the gentleman from the Chattanooga district from this inconsistency, as he still has the courage of his convictions and will vote to repeal the internal-revenue laws.

But gentlemen speak of "war taxes." Why, Mr. Chairman, let us talk sensibly about this thing. Duties on imports are not in the nature of "war taxes." They are the common taxes of the Constitution—the taxes which have existed since 1789. But the internal-revenue taxes are "war taxes." Every man on this floor knows that but for the war the internal-revenue laws never would have been passed. Yet you come here demanding the repeal of "war taxes" while you dodge the real question of war taxation, and propose to lay your hands injuriously on the industries of the country.

This is the first time I ever knew the Democratic party to be troubled about reducing the surplus. They have been adepts at that business. Every time that party has had to deal with a surplus it soon dissipated it. But now, as the result of Republican administration and legislation, we have so great a surplus that even the Democratic party does not know what to do with it. Well now, we are not going to help you to dispose of it. If you will turn things over to us we can dispose of this whole question in a week. We will repeal the tobacco tax; that will be a considerable reduction. We will repeal the internal revenue on all spirits used in the arts; that will add something more to the reduction. We will pass the Blair bill, carrying the bread of life to the hungering and thirsting souls of the children of the South. We will pass the dependent pension bill, doing justice to the brave men who upheld the flag during all the struggles of the war, and who revere it still.

But my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], on the other side of the House, said that we had been tried and convicted. Perhaps that was so. But, thank God, sir, under the rules of the court, we have entered a motion for a new trial. [Laughter and applause.] We are just now impaneling a jury, summoning witnesses, putting in the argument, calling the attention of the country, and it will not be our side the next time that will be convicted, but it will be yours on account of your fraudulent conduct and unparalleled duplicity in the administration of our national affairs. It is so, gentlemen, in my country, and I suppose it is so everywhere. [Laughter and applause.]

But I must hurry on, as I have but little time and must use it as well as I can. Now, you know the Democratic platform has two ends to it; one the protection end and the other the free-trade end. [Laughter.] Heretofore the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has ridden safely on the protection end of that platform, while Morrison, CARLISLE, and all the rest have ridden on the free-trade end of it. [Laughter and applause.] So they have gone up and down like a see-saw plank through a farm fence, the protection end up one day and down the next, and the free-trade end now down and then up. [Laughter and applause.]

But it seems that they have cut off or propose to cut off the protection end this time at the instigation of the President. Well, let them do it. Heretofore in protection States they have said, "Here is our platform in favor of protection," showing them the protection end; but when they came to the cotton belt they said, "Here is the Democratic platform in favor of free trade," showing them the free-trade end. But if they cut off the protection end and nothing is left but the free-trade end we will have a very easy time during the election down in my State. They will be no longer dodging the issue, but they will have to stand right square up to the free-trade platform. They can no longer sing the old song, and they can no longer follow the action indicated, of double-dealing, professing one thing here and another there. They have

> Wired in and wired out,
> And left the nation still in doubt
> Whether the snake that made the track
> Was going south or coming back.

[Laughter and applause.]

As I have said, if they go before the people during the coming election with nothing but the free-trade end of their platform, with the protection end cut off, it will make it very easy sailing for us in Tennessee. There is not a single Congressional district in my State, not one, sir, if the pure and simple and naked question of free trade or protection is presented between the Republican and Democratic parties, but would give a majority for protection. But you, gentlemen, know how you put it. You obscure the issue in every possible way. When we come to a Confederate soldier and ask him to vote as he shot during the war; that is, for himself and his own interest; that is, for the interest of himself, his family, and his country, gentlemen on the other side raise the cry of bloody-shirt, and, like the cuttle-fish, they darken the water and hide themselves from view and conceal their purposes.

Now, in conclusion let me say, Mr. Chairman, if this Mills tariff bill be passed it will put out the fires in every furnace in the State of Tennessee and it will close every marble quarry—and there are forty of them alone in my county—while it will ultimately destroy the coal and timber interest, and to-day lumber is shipped from my district direct to Liverpool. It will, in a word, destroy the most vital interests of the Middle and Central Southern States, which to-day constitute the "new South." Its blighting and disastrous effects will fall with most killing effect upon the interests of those States which to-day are the hope and the glory of the Southwest. God grant that a result so ruinous and unfortunate may be averted not only from the Southwest but from the South and from the North. [Great applause.]

[Mr. WISE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. MCADOO having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore,

A message from the President, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message further announced the approval of the bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of Horatio R. Maryman.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, furnished to the House, in compliance with its request, an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 1198) for the relief of William H. Robertson and Edward L. Hedden, late collectors of customs for the city of New York.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2365) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, the Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Seth C. Moffatt, late a Representative in Congress.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7319) for the relief of Emory R. Seward.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my remarks, I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL].

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, this morning, before the House proceeded to the consideration of the tariff bill, I sought the floor for the purpose of making a correction in the remarks of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], as published in the RECORD of yesterday; but before concluding the explanation which I thought proper to make objection was made from the other side. The gentleman from Ohio now kindly yields me a portion of his time to make this correction.

The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], in his remarks the other day on this bill, as appears by the RECORD of yesterday, page 4001, said:

William Endicott, jr., of Boston, Mass., a Cabinet officer of this Republic, its Secretary of War, was admitted in 1877—meaning admitted to the Cobden Club.

Now I desire to correct this statement by saying that William Endicott, jr., of Boston, a gentleman I know well, is not "a Cabinet officer of this Republic," is not "its Secretary of War." He is a gentleman of prominence, is or was a member of a large importing firm, and an occasional writer on economic questions, and may be, possibly, a member of the Cobden Club. I do not know, however. While William C. Endicott, of Salem, Mass., is "a Cabinet officer of this Republic," is "its Secretary of War," and is not and never has been a member of the Cobden Club. And it looks as if my friend from Nevada had, in the language of Pinafore, "mixed those children up." I have waited for the other side or the gentleman himself to make this correction, but it has not been done—the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] even refusing me unanimous consent so to do this morning, though I had granted him a similar request the moment before.

And the Secretary of War, being not only a constituent but a townsman and neighbor of mine, and knowing the facts myself, it seemed to me to be my privilege and my duty to make the correction which I have. And now the statement of the gentleman from Nevada falling, it would seem that his personal comments immediately following ought to fall with it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, the organization of this House was evidently with a purpose. That purpose was the presentation to the people through this organization of a system of tariff legislation which should approach as nearly as possible to free trade. The President of the United States, an open and avowed free-trader; the Speaker of this assembly, elected to preside over its deliberations because of his well-known predilections in favor of free trade; the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, selected for that most important and responsible position, not for any special fitness, but because he was an open, avowed, and notorious free-trader; the Committee on Ways and Means itself packed in the interest of that principle which these leading lights of the Democratic party had determined should prevail in the deliberations of this House. Is it wonderful, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Ways and Means should have presented to this House a bill for the destruction of the protective interests of the country, and should have not only attempted to assail them but to destroy them?

I said, sir, that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was an open and avowed free-trader, and he asks us to join with him in his passage, to get in his boat without rudder, without compass, and without sail. And not only the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, but the members of the Democratic side of this House have almost without exception placed themselves upon the Democratic platform of free trade.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY FREE-TRADERS.

The history of the Democratic party has been a history of free trade. Their organization has been pledged to the principles of free trade for half a century. Whenever they came into power they assailed the doctrines of protection in America. When they had possession of this Government or its organization, they made war upon the protected interests of the country. Whenever they had the opportunity they struck down the protection system of this great country of ours. The Republican party, upon the other hand, is a protection party. It has stood side by side with the protection principles of this country. Whenever it has been in power it has defended and upheld them. It maintained them and, if possible, so arranged and modified them that they should protect every interest throughout the length and breadth of the land.

DEMOCRATS SELFISH PROTECTIONISTS.

Now, sir, I said that the Democratic party was a free-trade party, but I qualify it by saying this: There is scarcely a Democrat on that side of the Chamber, avowed free-trader though he may be, who is not a selfish protectionist—from Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, who demands that the hemp and cement of Kentucky shall be defended against foreign invasion, and that whisky shall be protected; from the gentlemen who come from Louisiana asking for free wool in Ohio, but protected sugar and rice in Louisiana; from the gentlemen from Mississippi who ask for the freedom of commerce, but want the rice and cotton of their own State protected. So I say, sir, they are not only free-traders but they are selfish protectionists. The Republican party on the contrary is a party of protection from principle.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. KENNEDY. Not a half minute.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. It is not the fact that Mississippians are asking to have rice and cotton protected.

REPUBLICANS PROTECTIONISTS FROM PRINCIPLE.

Mr. KENNEDY. I repeat the Republican party is a party of protection from principle. It sees no State lines. It asks that Mississippi's cotton shall be protected; it asks that the interest of the people of every portion of this country shall be protected in whatever section of this land they may be situated. It strikes at no man's interest. It does not seek to destroy any man's producing system in this country, but desires to uphold and defend it.

HOW SHALL REVENUE BE COLLECTED.

Now, sir, we must have a revenue. If it does not come from a tariff it must come from a direct tax from the people. The tariff system of this country has not only produced the necessary revenues of the country, but it has performed the other important duty of protecting our industries. It lays the burden upon such commodities as enter into competition with home manufactures, and thus not only gives us the means for paying the just debts of the Government and the well-earned bounties and pensions to our soldiers, their widows, and orphans, but it so guards the manufacturing and producing interests of the land that labor obtains the highest possible reward, and the country has become powerful and independent.

The only question, therefore, is how that revenue shall be collected; how it shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States. I have said that if it is not collected by tariff then it must be collected by tax—a tax levied upon the property and homes of the people and collected directly from them as revenue or as the taxes of the county and State are now collected. I venture the assertion that of $300,000,000 collected annually and paid into the Treasury of the United States scarcely a man or woman in all America can tell how much of this vast sum they contribute towards the public revenue.

Nearly every civilized nation upon the face of the earth has a tariff. In Russia there is practical prohibition. Austria has duties of from 24 to 67 per cent. Germany has thrown around her the wall of national protection. Sweden has caught the inspiration of the hour, and Switzerland is growing stronger and more independent of the outside world because of the protection she gives to her industries. But while nearly every nation upon the face of the earth is building around the borders of her dominions the walls of national protection, we are asked by the free-traders to open ours in order that other nations may pour into our glutted markets the products of the world.

MONOPOLIES.

But the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber tell us that we are building up monopolies. M. Thiers, the great Frenchman, once said to the Chamber of Deputies when he was accused of building up a monopoly, "ay; it is true;" he answered—

There is a monopoly, but it is not in France; it is abroad; and the monopoly you accord to French industries destroys the monopoly of foreign industries.

So I say, sir, while we have monopoly, in the language of the Frenchman, it is the monopoly that protects the labor and the industry of every American throughout the length and breadth of this land.

COMPETITION WILL REGULATE PRICES.

Alexander Hamilton said, nearly one hundred years ago, that if you would protect the industries of this country until they were on a firm basis, then competition at home would regulate the price of every commodity and you would buy cheaper under the system of American protection than you could possibly buy under any free trade in the world. The philosophy of Alexander Hamilton has become an established fact. And I ask my Democratic friends what single article is there they buy, what one do they purchase, from the hat on their heads to the shoes on their feet, that they do not buy cheaper under the protective system of America than they ever bought under any free trade in the world? I might stop to tell you what America has done in the one hundred years of its progress if every school-boy was not familiar with it. We bought our iron from England at $100 a ton. The first railway in Ohio was built through my town; and every ton of the iron used came from England and cost $100 a ton.

Now you are buying better iron, made in America, regulated in price by American competition, and selling at from $20 to $25 a ton. Under the tariff of 1846 they brought iron from England and destroyed the iron industry of America. What was the result? We had no longer English cheap iron, for after they had destroyed the American iron manufactures they put the price of their English iron up and sold it, not at $40 and $50 a ton, but at $75 a ton, took sixty millions of American gold to Europe, and pocketed twenty millions of American money in profits. We learned the lesson of Democratic free trade under the tariff of 1846.

Before 1867 we made no steel rails in America. We paid $167 a ton in gold for them, equal to $200 in currency. To-day you can buy steel rails at $37.13 a ton, rails made in America, from American ores, by American labor, and the price regulated by home competition.

Before 1860 we made no plate-glass worth speaking of in America, and we paid the Englishman and the Frenchman and the German $2.50 a square foot for it. Then the plate-glass industry sprang up in America, and now we buy American plate-glass, 10 square feet, at 75 cents per square foot, and the price is regulated down for smaller glass until it reaches 31 cents per square foot; $2.50 under Democratic free trade; 75 cents under American protection! And, Mr. Chairman, I wish to pause long enough upon this point to say that almost every particle of the cost of a piece of plate-glass consists in labor, the labor of the mines, the labor that loads, transports, unloads, and uses the coal, and the lime, and the lime-stone, and the fire-clay that are used in the manufacture. Nearly every penny that goes into that product is labor, the labor of American workingmen.

We used to buy calicos at 25 cents a yard—"English prints" as they were called. Now you can buy American calico in any market in this country for 5 cents a yard. We bought English hoes, pot-metal hoes at that, and paid $9 a dozen for them. Now you can buy hoes made of American steel at $4 a dozen.

We used to buy foreign-made saws and we paid $15, $19, and even $20 a dozen for them. Now you can buy American saws, better than any ever made before on the face of the earth, at $8 and $9 a dozen.

We bought foreign axes and the forests in my State and in the other Western States were felled with English axes which cost from $2 to $4 a piece. Now we buy the axes of Mr. Collins, made from American steel, from American ores, with American labor, at from $8 to $9 a dozen, or 75 cents each.

We bought salt at $5 a barrel, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] told us the other day that the price of salt now is 59 cents a barrel.

We bought nails in 1828 at from 7 to 9 cents a pound, in 1850 at from 6 to 7 cents a pound, in 1865 at 6 cents a pound, in 1887 at from 2½ to 3 cents a pound, or by the keg at 2 cents a pound.

So I might go on, Mr. Chairman, and speak of almost every other industry in the country. I repeat, therefore, that there is not an article of trade or commerce manufactured in this country that can not be bought cheaper to-day under the system of American protection than it ever could be bought under the system of Democratic free trade.

WOOL INDUSTRY.

Now, I want to speak of another industry, and I speak of it because the people of my part of the United States are peculiarly interested in it. I mean the wool industry. And first I desire to say that it has no war to make upon any other industry in this country. It believes in protection, but it believes in protecting all other industries as well as itself, and the men who are standing here to defend that industry believe in defending all the other industries of America. We have 1,150,000 flock-masters in America. We have invested in the United States $119,000,000 in sheep. That is the amount invested in sheep alone. In the land used for the sustenance and care of the flocks we have $408,000,000 invested, making $527,000,000 invested in the wool industry in this country. The value of the wool and the sheep sold last year was $95,000,000; the amount paid for labor was $79,000,000; the amount of profit was $16,000,000, a little less than 3 per cent. on the total amount invested in the industry. And let me say, here, Mr. Chairman, that there is no "water" in this great stock industry of ours.

We raise about one-half the wool that is consumed in America—260,000,000 pounds last year. We buy of imported wool and woolen goods 264,000,000 pounds. In short, we raise one-half and import one-half of what we consume. I would have the American hills covered with flocks until that industry of ours should supply the people of America entirely, and make them independent of all other portions of the world. In 1862 we had 22,000,000 sheep; in 1870 we had 31,000,000; in 1880 we had 41,000,000; in 1883 we had 50,627,000. Then came the low tariff of 1883, which almost destroyed the wool industry of this country; and from that time until this we have lost nearly 6,000,000 of sheep. Had they gone on increasing up to this time in the ratio of the increase between 1860 and 1880, before the year 1900 there would have been 120,000,000 of sheep in this country, and we would be producing the entire wool supply of the United States of America. But our Democratic friends tell us that we must have free trade in wool. I say to them that by such legislation they can build up the empire of Australia, but they will destroy the empire of America. They have put back the wool industry already more than a quarter of a century by the legislation of 1883 on this question.

Another thing. We lowered the tariff in 1883, and instead of cutting down revenue we increased it; and I say to my Democratic friends that if they really desire to cut down the revenue from this source they must do it as Mr. MILLS proposes to do it, strike off the duty on wool altogether, because a low tariff on wool simply increases the revenue.

RAW MATERIAL.

They tell us that it should come in free because it is raw material. What is raw material? Is wool raw material? No more than the cloth is raw material before it is manufactured into clothes. Wool is what my friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] the other day called the finished product of the farmer. It has cost him a year of toil, the investment in his farm, his barns, his crops. He has given a year of his labor, he has tilled his fields to produce food for his flocks during the storms and snows of winter. He has sheltered them and cared for them and fed them, and when the spring comes he has washed them and sheared them, and finally he has prepared his crop for market—the fleece of wool which has required a year of toil and labor, and the investment in lands and buildings; and then the Democratic free-trader calls it raw material. Everything he had has been invested, and after a year of toil he produces the finished product of his farm—the wool crop—and offers it for sale. So the cloth-maker finishes his product and presents it for sale. It is the finished product; it is no longer raw material.

I can not understand how the people shall continue to be deceived by this special plea for raw material. Raw material is something to which labor has not been attached. So soon as labor is added to it, it is no longer raw material, but it is the material with the value of the labor attached thereto, and every stroke of the pick, every blow of the hammer, and every newly-added form given it, removes it that much farther from raw material.

Nor is iron ore raw material. A short time ago I stood at the foot of a mine and I said to one of the workmen, "What is that red stuff?" He said, "That is iron ore." I said, "Where does it come from?" "From the hillside." "What is it worth?" "About $2.40 a ton." I said, "I do not understand how it can be worth $2.40 a ton, because I have been in the mine and seen them digging it out, hauling it down here and dumping it; that is all you have got to do to get it here, and how can it be worth $2.40 a ton?" He said to me, "Sir, if you will take off your coat, go into that mine, dig the ore out and haul it down here, you will find out exactly how that ore comes to be worth $2.40 a ton; it is the labor that has gone into it." This workman sounded the key-note of the whole protective system. It is simply the labor that has gone into it. So when the ore through one process and another has advanced to the steel, when it has been manufactured into articles of trade or commerce, when, for instance, it has become a screw in your watch, so fine that it can scarcely be seen without the aid of a powerful glass, and worth more than its weight in gold, it is nothing but the iron ore to which the labor of the American workman has been added, making it costly and valuable. It is not raw material.

AMERICA AND AUSTRALIA.

Now, I am for America rather than for Australia in this great question. Australia pays no taxes in America, builds no school-houses, dedicates no churches, constructs no railways or public roads; in short, has no interest in America except to unload upon us its productions. I say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], and to others on his side of the Chamber, that if his idea should prevail his State of Texas will become a waste place, her fields will be barren, her people in want.

Australia has 100,000,000 sheep; she is ready to increase her flocks to 150,000,000 so soon as the door-ways of America are opened to wools of her production free of duty.

South America produces 300,000,000 pounds of wool, and can add to them almost without limit so soon as the market can be found. Against these flood-tides of destruction stand alone the barriers of protection.

If the farmer is driven from the wool industry he must of necessity turn his fields and his farm into other channels of production. Instead of raising wool he begins raising wheat and corn in competition with his neighbor, and thus crowds and clogs the very industry he should assist.

If you remove the tariff from wool and permit the wools of Australia and South America to come in duty free it requires no great amount of wisdom to know that the American wool-growers must sell in competition with these countries or not sell at all. His price in competition will be regulated by the price of the Australasian and the South American production as valued at home with the price of a cheap water transportation added. That price, by the fair rules of deduction, will not much exceed one-half the price now controlling the American market.

No American wool-grower can raise and sell wool at one-half of its present price, and the natural consequence follows that buyers and manufacturers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and the foreign wools drive the home wools from the market and destroy the industry. Once destroyed, and without American competition, the price of the foreign producer is advanced and Americans pay, not their own prices, but the prices demanded by the foreign producer.

Can it be possible our people will be so short-sighted as to open the gateways for such a destruction and permit this worse than Trojan horse to enter without question and without our determined and persistent objection?

I would see the flocks increased, not destroyed. I would have them grazing on every hillside until America produced its entire supply of wools and was independent of the outside world. Such a course alone will give us the surest and the safest protection and bring to the producer and the consumer the greatest prosperity and security.

DIVERSIFY OUR INDUSTRIES.

I would diversify the industries of this country. Beside the smoking furnaces, I would have the farms producing for consumption all that they may require; beside the teeming factories, the wool and the cattle industries to feed and clothe them; beside the mills, the products of our people, to give in barter and exchange for their manufactures. Otherwise, destroyed by the competition of foreign products and manufactures, our people will be overcrowded competitors with each other, and thus destroy themselves. Free trade brings competition with pauper labor; it brings necessarily reduction of wages; it brings disaster and closed shops. You do not make an article which you can buy cheaper from an importer. He does not continue to sell to you cheaper after he has destroyed your competition. Experience teaches us that all protected industries thrive, and that all industries which are not protected are destroyed and driven from the face of the earth. One prosperous manufacturer means prosperous workmen; one successful establishment means a hundred successful laborers. Agriculture and manufacture are twin sisters; they should stand side by side with each other, one producing and the other consuming. He who would antagonize them is therefore the enemy of both.

WHY ENGLAND IS FOR FREE TRADE.

England is a free-trade country; and why? Simply because she consumes only 37 per cent. of what she produces or manufactures, and is compelled to find a market for the remaining 63 per cent. of all her productions. In other words, when a British manufacturer makes three articles, he can sell only one of them at home, and is compelled to find a foreign market for the other two; otherwise his factory must close.

What is the result? England is for free trade. She would send her manufactured commodities abroad so that her manufacturing establishments can keep their doors open and their men at work.

When an English manufacturer no longer finds sale abroad for two out of three of his products he must of necessity produce only one or close his doors, and his workmen are thrown out of employment; hence we have the London labor riots and the labor troubles of Birmingham, Sheffield, and of Manchester. Hence we have the meetings in Trafalgar Square, and people demanding bread, not stones.

America consumes 92 per cent. of what she produces, and sends only 8 per cent. abroad. Therefore, if America should sell nothing abroad, only one man out of every twelve would be thrown out of employment. We would not have a repetition of the mobs of London, Sheffield, Birmingham, and Manchester.

But we are told the cost of living in England is cheaper than it is in America. I have here a statement of Mr. Carroll Wright, who has been quoted considerably by the other side of the House. Here is the table he prepared, stating that the cost of living one week in Lancashire, England, is $6.73 for a family, while in America it is $7.90. In other words, there is but a difference of $1.26, equal to 18 cents a day, in favor of the English family and against the American family.

But in England the laborer gets only one-half of the wages of the American laborer, while in Germany the laborer only gets one-fourth. Yet these gentlemen would strike off the higher wages of the American laborer in order to save this 18 cents a day.

You tell me the wages will go down with equal conditions in America, and stand upon the same level of the wages in England; then I would put off the day to the last generation when the labor of our manufacturing establishments will be brought down to the same level with the pauper labor of England. [Applause.]

England waits with undisguised impatience for the adoption of free trade in this country.

Joseph Hume said:

If England would maintain her supremacy, she must throttle the manufacturers of the world in their cradles.

And from that hour to this that same England has been endeavoring to throttle the manufactures of America so that the open doorways and the markets of the American people would give her the prosperity and the wealth which should be evidenced by the smoking chimneys and the busy marts of trade and commerce and the whitened sails that should command the empire of the seas.

But America has moved steadily forward from weakness to strength, and bearing the hopes of a great people and mindful of her destiny, has preserved the institutions of our fathers and added to the greatness and the grandeur of the Republic.

CANADA AND AUSTRALIA PROTECTIONISTS.

We may learn from our adversary a lesson—England preaches to us free trade; but just across our border we have the Canadian provinces, a part of the British Empire. But a short time since they were neither prosperous nor independent.

They saw their wharves rotting down, their cities and villages going to decay; there was neither evidence of prosperity nor hope for future greatness. The same sun shone down upon them as upon the other side the great St. Lawrence, and the same rains and dews descended, and yet they saw on our side wealth and independence, on theirs poverty and want; on our side hundreds of smoking chimneys sent up their blackened incense to heaven, on theirs the silence of their sleeping cities and the quiet of their villages' undisturbed repose.

They asked themselves the question, why all this prosperity and wealth to them and all this poverty and want to us, and some one suggested that the protective system was building up America and adding to its growth and greatness; and they asked again, if good for them why not good for us?

They demanded of the home government parliamentary powers and independence, and secured them; and then, following in the footsteps of the Americans, adopted their protective system, and put up the barriers against British free trade. They copied almost entire the protective schedule of the Americans. Now a British vessel coming into Canadian waters is met at the wharf by an officer of customs and pays the same duty substantially as if she came into American waters and to an American wharf. As a consequence Canada is growing great and strong, manufacturing establishments are springing up all over the land, no longer rotting wharves, no longer dying cities and villages, but thrift and independence, and strength, and the promise of future great advancement.

Australia has followed the lead of the protective system, and another English province has closed its doors and guarded its wharves against English free trade.

Shall Americans be less wise than these dependencies? Shall it be said of them that they were not able to preserve the rich inheritance and the patrimony of their fathers?

England waits with undisguised impatience the adoption of free trade in America.

After the defeat of the Morrison tariff bill, in the Forty-ninth Congress, the London Daily Telegraph, an ultra Crown paper, had the following:

"A bill to establish in America what the English call free trade has just been defeated in the House by the narrow majority of four. The measure was of enormous importance for English manufacturers, as it would have enabled them to export goods to the States without the crushing tariff now imposed, and its fate was watched with intense interest by Englishmen. Were it passed it would have been worth $100,000,000 per annum to British manufacturers."

Of whom would the British manufacturers make $100,000,000 but from the Americans?

I do not doubt they are waiting now, for England depends upon outside markets for life.

If I was an Englishman I would be a free-trader, and would labor with all earnestness for the opening of the markets of the world to the wares and the products of British manufactures, so that the smoke might go up from all her chimneys and the fires be kept burning in all her furnaces, so that employment might be found for all her workmen, and the wolf be driven from the doors of her starving poor; but I can not comprehend the reason, nor can I commend the judgment of the American who is not able to read these lessons of the hour, and who, without the bitter experiences of the English people, is ready to open the doorways of his country to this great flood-tide of the world's products, and permit them to sweep like the waves of a storm-tossed ocean over the industries and above the hearth-stones of his people.

A QUESTION OF PROTECTING LABOR.

Aside from the question of raising the necessary revenue for the Government, there is nothing in this question but a question of labor and the protection of the industry and the just reward of the laborer.

Whenever the American mechanic, the farmer, the producer, and the workman, in whatever department of labor, is ready and willing to live as this same class lives in Europe, and is ready and willing to work for the same wages commanded and received for a like production on the other side, then there will be no further trouble about this question of the tariff. With labor correspondingly cheap, the American with his genius, his skill, his improved and marvelous machinery can make and undersell in every market of the world.

But we are not yet ready to drag our laborers down to the level of the pauper wages of Europe; we are not yet ready to rob our people of the rich inheritance which has been given us beyond the other peoples of the earth, with a people better clothed, better fed, with schoolhouses upon every hand, the church door standing open, and the road to advancement neither blocked nor obstructed, there is no height to which he can not aspire, and no place to which his children can not ascend.

There is no conflict in America between capital and labor, and there should be none: they must go hand in hand. Without capital the laborer obtains no reward for his toil. When capital is abundant and secure then labor gathers the richest rewards.

The prosperous employer means prosperous workmen, the abundance of capital meaning abundance of labor. The prudent and skillful workman of to-day becomes the employer of to-morrow.

MR. MILLS AND HIS ERRORS.

It is the purpose of the Democratic party to destroy the tariff.

Mr. HEMPHILL, of South Carolina, the other day avowed himself an open free-trader.

Mr. MILLS is an open, outspoken, and notorious free-trader. Nearly every member who has spoken upon that side of the House has indorsed the President and his free-trade message and committed himself to this doctrine of Democratic free trade.

Mr. MILLS, the leader of that side of the House, says:

We must make a departure. Instead of laying on the burdens of taxation upon the necessaries of life, instead of destroying our foreign commerce, we should encourage it as we would encourage our home commerce. We should remove every unnecessary burden. We should lay taxes to obtain revenue, but not restrict importation. We should place every material of manufacture on the free-list, start up our fires, put our wheels in motion, and put all our people to work at good wages.

But, sir, for whom would we work? From whom would we obtain good wages?

You take away his substance and bid him rejoice. You cut off one leg and bid him thank God you did not cut off two. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, sir, we have constantly heard on this floor encomiums as to the honesty of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, but I can not reconcile such statements as these with the oft-repeated declarations of honesty, save by a presumption of an ignorance that is neither complimentary nor charitable, and the further expectation of ignorance on behalf of his readers that is preposterous and presumptuous.

Mr. MILLS says again, with additional emphasis:

None of these tariff rates go to the laborer. The road is blocked up. They can not pass the pocket of the manufacturer. This "great American system" that is intended to secure high wages for our laborers is so perverted that all its beneficence intended for the poor workman stops in the pocket of his employer, and the laborer only gets what he can command in the open market for his work.

Could a statement be farther from the truth?

Again, and finally, he says:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have gone through with a number of articles taken from these official reports made by the manufacturers themselves, and I have shown that the tariff was not framed for the benefit of the laborer, or that if it was so intended by those who framed it the benefit never reaches the laborer, not a dollar of it. The working people are hired in the market at the lowest rates at which their services can be had, and all the "boodle" that has been granted by these tariff bills goes into the pockets of the manufacturers. It builds up palaces; it concentrates wealth; it makes great and powerful magnates; but it distributes none of its beneficence in the homes of our laboring poor.

Is it not humiliating to know that the person who makes these reckless and unfounded statements is the so-called leader of this House and the chairman of its most important committee—Ways and Means?

Mr. MILLS says again:

This will show, and I ask your attention to it, that the tariff is not intended to and does not benefit labor. It will show that the benefit of the tariff never passes beyond the pocket of the manufacturer, and to the pockets of his workmen.

I permit him to stand beside his record, and I invite the attention of the people of America to the statements he has made, and ask them in all candor will they follow the leadership of one whose assurance is only equaled by his presumption and ignorance?

I commend to him and to his followers this clipping from the London (England) Morning Post, the leading conservative paper of Great Britain. It says:

For years past the whole orthodox school of free-traders have been denouncing the blindness of America. Some times the accent was that of reproach, some times of pathetic regret, some times of scornful jeer; but America meanwhile paid off the national debt and built up manufacturing industries which for the excellence of their goods are renowned throughout the world.

Mr. MILLS gave us some free-trade statistics the other day, very evidently compiled for the purpose of deceiving either himself or the readers of his address.

Now, sir, I desire to take up briefly Mr. MILLS's statistics and show you not only their fallacy, but their falseness.

Mr. MILLS gives us this example of the operation of the tariff. He says:

I find in this report one pair of 5-pound blankets. The whole cost as stated by the manufacturer is $2.51. The labor cost he paid for making them is 35 cents. The present tariff is $1.90. Now, here is $1.55 in this tariff over and above the entire labor cost of these blankets.

If such a statement means anything, it means that the cost of labor, 35 cents only, goes to the workman, and that the $1.55 is a clear profit to be put into the pocket of the manufacturer by reason of the tariff, but, as if to relieve us of any doubt as to his meaning, he says:

Why did not that manufacturer go and give that money to the laborer? He is able to do it. Here is a tariff that gives him $1.90 on that pair of blankets for the benefit of his laborer, but notwithstanding that the tariff was imposed for the benefit of American labor and to preserve high wages, every dollar of that tariff went into the manufacturer's pocket. The poor fellow who made the blankets got 35 cents and the manufacturer kept the $1.90.

Such a statement will admit of but one construction.

But as if to emphasize and to make it so plain that no mistake can be made, he again says:

Take another pair of 5-pound blankets. The total cost is $2.70. The labor cost is 70 cents. The tariff is $1.98. Now, how strange it is that none of these sums that were intended for the laborer ever get beyond the pocket of the manufacturer. Why is it, when the American Congress enacted this legislation for the benefit of our labor, that every dollar of this aid intended for labor stops in the pockets of the manufacturer, who goes into the highways and hedges and hires his laborer at the lowest price for which he can get him in the market and then pockets the tariff benefits that we are told every day is intended for the laborer alone—for the benefit of labor?

In other words he would tell us that the 70-cent labor alone goes into the pockets of the laborers, and the $1.98 tariff goes into the pockets of the manufacturer.

I have a statement here from a woolen manufacturer, which I will append to my remarks. It shows that 50 per cent. of the whole cost goes to the workmen engaged in this branch of manufacture, and 50 per cent. for materials.

He says:

Mr. MILLS is undoubtedly in error, for as nearly as I can calculate it costs in labor about 25 cents a pound on the finished goods, which would make at least $1.25 a pair for labor cost, and the labor cost is about one-half the whole cost, the other 50 per cent. being for materials.

Again he says:

There is another answer to Mr. MILLS, if the manufacturers put in their pocket such large profits on their blankets, how is it that so many of the blanket mills have failed, and all that can have gone out of the business into something else.

One-half of it for labor and one-half of it for material. Now, what is the material? The wool, etc., which enters into the blankets; and every penny of this wool and material is nothing but labor; it is simply the labor of the producer of the material, and it represents his toil and his product.

There is not a penny that enters into a pair of blankets that is not labor; and the profit to the manufacturer has been so small that bankruptcy and ruin has been his, driving him from the trade.

Again Mr. MILLS says:

One yard of cassimere weighing 16 ounces costs $1.38; the labor cost is 29 cents; the tariff duty is 80 cents.

He implies that 80 cents is clear profit to the manufacturer, while only 29 cents goes to laborers.

I have a statement of the cost of 1 yard of cassimere prepared for me by a manufacturer, every item of which shows Mr. MILLS's ignorance of the matter he was attempting to discuss. It is as follows:

One yard of cassimere, 16 ounces to the yard; 2½ pounds Ohio wool, 20 cents. Wool will shrink in scouring, etc., 50 per cent.; in working, 15 per cent.

	Cents.
Two and eighty-three one-hundredths pounds of wool to make 1 yard, costs	75.32
Mr. MILLS's cost of labor	29.00
Color, supplies, coal, etc	8.00
	112.32
3 per cent. commission, 3 per cent. guaranty, 1 per cent. insurance, 3 per cent. for four and six months' time, 5 per cent. off for cash, in all 15 per cent	20.70
Total cost	133.02
MILLS's cost	138.00
Cost of manufacture and sale	133.02
Leaving a profit to manufacturer of	4.98

Mr. Chairman, this shows conclusively the ignorance of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means with the subject with which he wishes to deal; because there must also be added to this total cost the boxing, drayage, warehouse transportation, office expenses, pay of engineer, firemen, and the thousand and one expenses incident to a factory that will carry the total cost beyond the figures given, and the nominal profit of the manufacturer is correspondingly reduced.

Mr. MILLS says further, in reference to pig-iron:

One ton of foundry pig-iron costs $11; the labor costs $1.64; the tariff is $6.72.

I want to give the wages of laborers and cost of a ton of pig-iron, compiled by Mr. John Griffin, formerly of Phœnix (Pa.) Iron-Works, now deceased, one of the most capable and painstaking iron-masters, it is said, in America:

Wages earned in mining enough ore for 1 ton pig-iron	$5.13
Wages earned in mining enough limestone for 1 ton pig-iron	.53
Wages earned in mining enough coal for 1 ton pig-iron	1.71
Wages earned in mining enough coke for 1 ton pig-iron	.28
Wages earned in transporting ore	.56
Wages earned in transporting limestone	.06
Wages earned in transporting coal	.45
Wages earned in transporting coke	.22
Wages earned by furnace-hands making 1 ton pig-iron	2.75
	11.54
Add taxes, insurance, interest, freight, etc	5.20
Total	16.74

Here is a total of $16.74 for a ton, as against Mr. MILLS's assertion that it costs but $11, and sells in the markets at from $17.50 to $20 per ton.

I have here a table showing the prices of pig-iron from 1842 to 1887, and I find the lowest price was $16.50 per ton in November, 1878. Now the price ranges from $17.50 to $20 per ton, according to standard and quality. Where, then, is the $6.72 profit that Mr. MILLS says goes into the pockets of the manufacturer because of this infamous tariff?

But I have another statement here. He gives an instance of the cost of a car-wheel, and uses the following language:

Here is a car-wheel weighing 500 pounds; cost, $13; labor cost, 85 cents; tariff rate is 2½ cents per pound, equivalent to $12.50, to cover a labor cost of 85 cents! [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, these laborers of ours ought to get immensely rich if they could get all that Congress votes to them, if the manufacturers did not stop the bounties intended by the Government to reach the pockets of the workingmen.

Now here is not only an implication from him, but a direct statement that the balance of the cost, over and above 85 cents for the labor, goes into the manufacturers' pockets. There could not be a statement more preposterous, and when you think that such a statement as that comes from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the head of the Democratic party on that side of the House, it is beyond credence. I have three statements here made by manufacturers of cast-iron car-wheels in America, and I find here that the cost, instead of being $13, as Mr. MILLS says, ranges from $7.50 to $8.25. One manufacturer says:

THE JACKSON & WOODIN MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Berwick, Columbia County, Pennsylvania, May 4, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 28th ultimo received. We regret the delay in answering. We notice Mr. MILLS's extravagant statement and are glad to give you the information you desire.

The cost of car-wheels is nearly all made up of labor, as follows: Cutting wood, burning charcoal, and furnace labor on iron sufficient to make one wheel, $6.25; digging coal to melt iron in cupola, 10 cents; labor getting sand for molding, 10 cents; molding and handling the wheel in foundry, 95 cents; total, $7.40. This, of course, allows nothing for the interest, insurance, and office labor, which would be fully 40 cents, or a total of $7.80. The only item in the wheel cost that is not labor would be the royalty on the ore of 25 cents on a wheel. A 500-pound wheel to-day is freely offered for from $7.50 to $8.25, according to quality. We should like to have an order for a very large number of wheels at the latter price, and will agree to make as good a wheel as can be made in this or any other country, and we think our reputation in this line is equal to the best. It might be well for you to suggest to friend MILLS that we should like to have some of his orders at $13.50 apiece, and we would be glad to pay him a commission. He could probably make more money this way than he could in the House. Shall be glad to give you any further information you want.

Yours, truly,

C. H. ZEHNDER,
Secretary.

ROBERT P. KENNEDY, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I have a statement from another car-wheel manufacturer who puts the price at $7.50, and says the cost is made up entirely of labor and iron. He says:

A. WHITNEY & SONS' CAR-WHEEL WORKS,
Philadelphia, May 1, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Our neighbors, Messrs. Burnham, Parry, Williams & Co., and Messrs. William Sellers & Co., have referred to us your letters of inquiry of 28th ultimo.

In reply, we have to say that the cost of labor on a car-wheel weighing 500 pounds, from the time the pig-metal reaches the foundery until the wheel is finished and ready for use, is about $1.35.

The average selling price of such wheels would be about $7.50. The difference between $7.50 and $1.35, $6.15, represents the cost of the pig-iron (which is several dollars per ton more than ordinary irons), coal, sand, and other materials, tools, power, superintendence, interest on equipment, and, last and least, profit.

You can use this statement as coming from practical authority, but we prefer not to have our names used unless necessary.

Cast-iron car-wheels, which are those in question, are not made abroad for importation into this country, nor is the kind of pig-iron of which they are made imported.

Yours truly,

A. WHITNEY & SONS.

Hon. ROBERT P. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Another letter is as follows:

Mr. JAMES M. SWANK,
General Manager American Iron and Steel Association, 261 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of this date, we have to say that the cost of labor on a car-wheel weighing 500 pounds, "from the time the pig-metal reaches the foundery until the wheel is finished and ready for use," is about $1.35.

We beg to add that Mr. MILLS's statement of the selling price of the wheel is somewhat idealistic. Instead of being $13, the average price is about $7.50. The difference between $7.50 and $1.35, $6.15, represents the cost of the pig-iron (which is several dollars per ton more than ordinary iron), coal, sand, and other materials, tools, power, superintendence, interest on equipment, and, last and least, profit. Cast-iron car-wheels are not made abroad for importation into this country, nor is the kind of pig-iron of which they are made imported.

Now, sir, what shall we say of a political leader whose fancy and prejudice runs away with his facts and his figures? Instead of putting almost the entire sum of the selling price into his pocket, the manufacturer pays almost the entire amount for labor and material, and the material is nothing but the product of labor, every cent of it, and the profit which goes to the manufacturer for interest and gain is the very smallest part of the sum. Mr. MILLS'S statistics were evidently prepared without opportunity for information, or with a view to deceiving and misleading those to whom they should be presented through the medium of ink and type. One need not be a "scientist" to detect their fallacy and falseness, as they contradict and confute themselves.

Here is another statement. Mr. MILLS tells us of the cost of a suit of clothes, and says:

Here is a coarse wool suit of clothes such as our working people wear in their daily toil in the shop and field. The whole cost is $12. The labor cost is $2. The tariff duty is 40 cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. As the weight of the suit is not given, we can not get the exact tariff, but the duty on woolen clothes imported last year averaged 54 per cent., and at that rate the tariff stands $6.48 to cover $2 of labor cost.

I have, in response to that statement, the exact cost of a suit of clothes made of identically the same material to which he refers, giving the cost of the material; which is as follows:

7 yards of material, at 75 cents per yard	$5.25
Trimming, which Mr. MILLS omits	1.50
Making, according to Mr. MILLS	2.00
Showing a total cost of	8.75

In addition to this must be added the boxing, drayage, railroad freights, commissions, and the thousand and one additional expenses, which result in leaving very little profit to the manufacturer and retail dealer.

Mr. MILLS forgets that nearly every item that enters into the completed article is an item of labor and the product of the American workman's toil.

The wool to which the farmer has given a year of care and labor, the linen which makes the thread, the cotton which lines the coat and sleeves, the buttons which fasten it together, the silk that forms the twist, the buckles, and in short the thousand and one items of toil gathered together to make and to form the completed whole, coming from every department of toil and from every section of the land, the result of the labor of a thousand workmen, the product of a thousand hands, scattering its gathered rewards like the very dews of heaven into thousands of homes and firesides throughout the land.

I commend Mr. MILLS and his followers to the careful study of the questions of tariff legislation, and must beg of him to give his attention to those items of trade and commerce which will not advertise his want of knowledge, and will enable him to be at least consistent with himself.

Here is a letter addressed by the secretary of the Workman's Association for the defense of British Industry to the Home Market Club of Boston, which I present and commend to the kind and careful consideration of the gentlemen upon the other side of this House:

To the Secretary of the Home Market Club, 56 Bedford street, Boston:

DEAR SIR: Thanks for the papers you have sent me. I was in America for about two months last summer, sent over by our association to see for myself whether the working classes of your country were better off under protection than we are under free trade, and the conclusion I came to was this:

That any person who has to earn a living in America as a producer must first become crazy before he becomes a free-trader, and the farmers must be the craziest of the whole lot to think of such a thing. Before any of your workingmen, either engaged in manufacturing or agriculture, talk about free trade, let them send one of their number over here to see what it is doing for this country; let him walk about for six months looking for a job until his coat gets ragged and his shoes get thin, and he gets the thinnest of all, and everywhere he asks for work he will be told that the Germans and Belgians are doing the work cheaper than he can do it; then let them send for him home again and hear what he says about free trade.

If it is the surplus revenue that is causing the trouble, send it to some free-trade country. You never knew them to have a surplus; or, if you don't like to do that, take it out to sea and sink it, or bury it, or burn it, or do anything in fact rather than adopt free trade, that is to say, if you do not want foreign competition to ruin your manufacturing industries, and by so doing ruin your farmers by robbing them of their home market.

Yours, truly,

H. J. PETTIFER,
Electro-Plate Worker, Secretary Workman's Association for Defense of British Industry, 184 Waterloo Road, London, England.

MARCH 28, 1888.

FREE TRADE A RELIC OF SLAVERY.

A word now upon the subject of free trade. This, Mr. Chairman, is a relic of the old days of slavery. It comes to us by inheritance from the past. It is a part of the days of slavery, the days when they required coarse clothes for their slaves, and cheap food, and the markets of the world for their cotton.

Never before in the world's history has there been so inexorable a master as was this tyrant of human slavery. It demanded the abject worship of every living thing; States and Territories were made and unmade to feed its greed and its love of gain; the politician was made to bow in abject servility; the church, the mentor of God's word on earth, was with blasphemous tongue and pen compelled to declare the divinity of this most infamous crime against God and man.

The world stood appalled at its exactions and its demands, and love of greed and pelf excused its infamies and its wrongs. It invaded homes and with cruel and heartless hands dragged its victims to the blackened holds of slavers and then sold them from the block, until at last outraged Christendom could no longer endure its infamies and arose and swept its black flag from the seas.

The Democratic party was its most servile tool, and came and went at its beck and call. No demand was too infamous, no command too menial, and the whip of the slave-driver drove no poor struggling slave in the field with more unerring certainty than the lash of his master drove the Democratic party to do his bidding and to execute his commands.

The days of slavery are ended. Its exorbitant exactions and its seeming determination to be controlled neither by law nor by reason at last caused it to lift up its hydra head in rebellion, and outraged humanity struck it down and trampled it out forever, and the immortal hand of Abraham Lincoln signed the warrant for its eternal death.

Slavery is dead, but its spirit still stalks through this Chamber and I see the Democratic party on that side of the House bowing to the beck and nod of the slave-drivers to-day just as they did a quarter of a century ago.

The days of slavery are gone, but its power and prejudice remain; but they are giving way before the Knoxvilles, the Atlantas, the Chattanoogas, and the Birminghams of the new South. God speed the hour when the sun will shine upon a country knowing the worth and the value of universal liberty.

Mr. Chairman, I saw that side of the Chamber bow at the beck and bend its neck to the yoke in the ranks of that party less than three weeks ago, just as the old slave-master used to whip his captured runaway slaves after they had been lashed back into their kennels. It was humiliating, but it was a fitting acknowledgment of their continued servility and the absolute rule of the old slave power. So I saw that side whipped back into the ranks of the Democratic party less than three weeks ago. I repeat that this doctrine of free trade is a relic of the days of slavery.

REDUCTION OF SURPLUS.

Now, sir, the surplus can be reduced by taking the tax off tobacco, by paying the national debt, by building up a respectable navy, by paying proper pensions to our soldiers and their widows, by paying a service pension of 1 cent a day, and by pensioning every survivor or the widow or children of every man who died in the prison-pens, the hell-holes, Andersonville, Libby, and Belle Isle, and when this is done there will be no great accumulation in the Treasury to excite and alarm the people, no uncounted millions taken from the avenues of trade, but a Treasury reduced by wise and fair appropriations, to the end that justice and honesty may prevail.

MR. BRECKINRIDGE, OF KENTUCKY.

I wish to refer for a few moments to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and I regret that my time is so limited. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, said the other day:

> The difference between 2½ or 3 per cent., the rate at which we could borrow money, and the 4 and 4½ per cent. that we are paying on those bonds, a sum easily calculable, is the precise sum that the American people are annually paying for the glorious privilege of having had Mr. SHERMAN as Secretary of the Treasury during the interregnum of Mr. Hayes.

Mr. Chairman, I thank God that JOHN SHERMAN was the Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Hayes. While the gentleman from Kentucky was wearing the Confederate gray and attempting to tear down and destroy the Union, JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio, and the loyal men of this Government were attempting to preserve it, and by the grace of God, and Abraham Lincoln, and the loyal soldiers of the Government, they did preserve it and brought it back safe and secure. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have no reflections to make upon Kentucky. She has a grand old history in the past, in her days of Crittendens, Marshalls, and Clays, and Guthries. But I must say to her, that on her side of the river where the sun falls as it falls upon Ohio, and the rain falls just as it falls upon the Ohio shore, where the same dew freshens them into flowers and fragance alike; every acre of land in my State of Ohio is worth two dollars to one in Kentucky. Why is this so? It is, Mr. Chairman, because we have a different condition of things. We have free schools there. We have free speech, free thought, free men, while they have too much of the civilization of Rowan and Breathitt in Kentucky.

The district which the gentleman from Kentucky represents sends him here with 4,791 votes, being only 1 in every 8 of the voters entitled to vote in that district in Kentucky. But, Mr. Chairman, when I speak of these grand men coming from Kentucky I must not forget one of her grandest names, one to whom I bow now with admiration, that splendid old Kentuckian whose loyalty never faltered and whose faith in the Union was never shaken. I mean Robert J. Breckinridge, of Kentucky. [Applause on the Republican side.] He, through all the dark struggles, ay, through the darkest days, stood by the National Government and upheld the hands of the loyal men against those who were attempting to destroy it. It was said that on one occasion a young man who was going to join the rebel army was seen by him, and he called to him and said:

> I understand you are going to join the rebel army. Your father brought you to me in his arms, a struggling infant, and asked that I might baptize and dedicate you to the service of Almighty God; but had I known at that hour that you would have ever betrayed your country and joined the ranks of those who were attempting to destroy it, I could have found it in my heart to have strangled you at the baptismal font.

Ay, Mr. Chairman, I stand here to do honor to that grand old loyalist of Kentucky.

The gentleman from Kentucky might with equal truth have charged the responsibility for that great debt upon the Republican party. It came into power to find a bankrupt treasury, and the credit of the Government so low that its bonds were only worth 89 cents on the dollar; it turned over a Government whose credit was not equaled by any other nation on the face of the earth.

The Republican party lived to preserve and maintain not only its credit, but its life. When the nation was in the midst of the throes of civil war, and the Democratic party in these Chambers and at home were decrying this Government and denouncing its finances; when they stood like prophets of evil predicting the hour when a basketful of its currency would not buy a dinner, and its value would not equal the paper upon which it was printed; when rebel victories in the field drove it down, down, until in the darkness of despair it seemed as if the light would never come. But the God of justice and the God of battles at last permitted the light of the dawn of promise to burst upon them. The credit of the Government had sunken so low that it took $2.50 to buy a single dollar of gold. But a good people stood behind it, an honest people, and they set about to find a way to redeem their promise to pay, and one of their ablest statesmen stood at the door of its Treasury until at last, through the guidance of this grandest financier since the days of Alexander Hamilton, JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio, the doors of the Treasury were thrown wide open and the bonds and the currency of the land were made equal to the glittering gold and the shimmering silver; and now the credit of my Government—not by the aid of the Democratic party, but in spite of it, stands higher in every market of the world than any other nation upon the face of the earth.

Who are these gentlemen with armless sleeves and legless pantaloons who come back from rebel battle-fields to teach us lessons in finance and to tell us how to run a Government they failed to destroy?

DEMOCRATS HERE AS FREE-TRADERS BY UNFAIR ELECTIONS.

Now, I want to say more. The Democratic party are here as free-traders by reason of unfair elections of members upon that side of the House. If the people of these United States were permitted to put their ballots into the boxes and have them honestly counted, to-day there would be no danger of free trade in this Congress. When Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, comes here with 1,702 votes; when Mr. BLOUNT, of Georgia, comes here with 1,724 votes, and when I come here representing 37,422 voters, this proves that one man in twenty votes in the South, while every man votes in Ohio. That is the reason why these gentlemen are here in behalf of free trade. The ten districts of Georgia elect ten representatives to this Chamber, and the entire ten districts cast nearly 13,000 votes less than are cast in the one district I have the honor to represent, and yet you have the assurance to tell me it is a matter which does not concern the people of Ohio and the North.

Our friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says the Republican party is played out down there, and that the colored people are voting the Democratic ticket. If the colored people there vote the Democratic ticket, then I want to know where in the name of God the white people vote down there. Mr. EUSTIS, of Louisiana, in the Senate the other day, asked whose business it was. "What business is it of yours?" he said. It is precisely as much business of ours if the fraud is committed in Louisiana, in Georgia, or in South Carolina as if it were committed in Ohio. The man who sits on that side of the Chamber makes laws for you, and for me, and for every citizen of the United States, and the fraud that is perpetrated in Georgia and Louisiana is perpetrated on the people of Michigan and the people of Ohio alike. That is what business it is of ours.

And I say to these gentlemen I know that the ruling class in the South, the Confederate element, is determined to submit to no state of affairs that does not leave them in absolute control, and they are ready to go to any length necessary to keep possession of that section of the country and will not stop at any measure necessary to retain power and ascendancy over that part of the Union.

That flag, sir, whose stripes we borrowed from the rainbow of promise and whose welkin we illumined by the starlight of God protects Americans everywhere but at home.

There are no seas so wide, no oceans so deep, no lands so distant, no place on the earth so obscure, none so powerful but that that flag will go in sunshine and storm, through darkness and danger to the aid and protection of a citizen of America, native or naturalized. But at home, here almost beneath the shadows of the dome of the Capitol, it is powerless to protect and to defend.

Anarchy runs riot, madness reigns supreme, the rights of the citizen are assailed, and there seems to be no power to defend.

And here I want to say this, that so long as I occupy a seat on this floor no man shall be permitted to take a seat in this Chamber, nor shall any man be permitted to retain a seat by my vote who comes here elected by a minority that has driven the majority away from the polls, or has prohibited them by violence and outrages from expressing their opinions and convictions at the ballot-box, a right guarantied to them by the Constitution of the United States.

They will learn that the sense of fair play, which is a part of every honest man's nature, will condemn them and drive them to a just consideration of the rights of all the people. They must learn that the ballot, the only means pointed out by the Constitution, by the exercise of which the freeman's will can be made known, must be made as sacred and secure in one part of the nation as in the other, for without it there can be neither security nor peace. They must learn that outrage and violence bring neither prosperity nor wealth; but that a free ballot and a free people and a free land are the sure harbingers of national prosperity and domestic peace.

But, sir, they will learn sooner or later that outraged justice will not permit them always to trample upon the rights and liberties of the people. They will learn that the fundamental principle upon which our Government is based, the right of the majority to rule, can not be forever disregarded and trampled under foot.

This question will not down at the bidding of any class nor at the demand of any section. There will be no end to this conflict until the ballot-boxes are no longer trampled under foot, until the rights of all are recognized, and until the elections are as fair and free in Georgia and South Carolina, as in Ohio, Michigan, and Illinois. And the Southern people and their leaders may as well learn first as last that the sectional cry, behind which they seek to hide these infamies and outrages, will no longer deceive and mislead the people of this country, but that they demand and will accept nothing less than free elections and honest ballot-boxes. [Loud applause.]

THE LATE UNFORTUNATE CONTROVERSY.

If one dares to mention, from a Union standpoint, the late unfortunate controversy between the sections of this country, he is at once hailed as a disturber of national harmony, and is likely to throw into a political spasm the Democratic members upon that side of the House.

It is, however, rather interesting to notice with what serene composure they can listen to the disloyal platitudes of the late so-called Confederates, and retain their self-possession in the midst of utterances that would not be tolerated in any other nation upon the face of the earth.

One would almost be inclined to believe that men who are so continually protesting their new-born loyalty and their full conversion to the doctrine of an indissoluble Union would be willing themselves to forget the unfortunate struggle which deluged a nation in blood and poured out from the hard earnings of the people $3,000,000,000 and piled up the mountain of debt which the nation still bears as a burden.

And yet, sir, when we hear such sentiments as these expressed, not by any of the common herd, but by those who are supposed to represent the better element of that Confederate cause which went down before the glittering bayonets of the loyal soldiers of the Union armies, we may stop to inquire if the cause which went down at Appomattox is dead or only sleeping.

WADE HAMPTON the other day at Baltimore flaunted the Confederate bloody shirt. This is an extract from his speech:

I want all to remember that I did only what my duty demanded. I could have taken no other course with honor [applause], and if we had to do it over again would do precisely what I did. I have no apology to make for the part we took in the war [applause] and wish my tongue may cleave to the roof of my mouth before I would say my dead brothers were traitors. We tried to do our duty bravely. When we failed another duty was before us. It was evident that the fate of war had decided against us. We then had but one country, and had all been brought together. I said then, and I say now, it is the duty of every patriot, every surviving Confederate, to try to make that country fit for free men to live in for all time to come. [Loud applause.]

What does he mean by that, Mr. Chairman—"fit for free men to live in?" Does he simply mean that it is to be especially fitted for ex-Confederate free men to live in? or would he have us imply that he has under the inspiration of his new-born zeal for liberty, been inspired with new and lofty patriotism, which would include within his kindred of citizenship every man who is by the Constitution and the laws entitled to be recognized as a citizen and a free man in a country which has promised to accord equal and exact justice to all?

I commend him to the people of South Carolina, and present him a field broad enough for the greatest exactions upon his statesmanship, and crude enough in its understanding of the term liberty to be a fit subject for this most ambitious teacher of men. Let him enlighten them until all shall come to know that liberty means universal liberty, not the liberty of a favored and privileged few.

And again, another United States Senator, one who represents the people of one of the States of the Union on the floor of that Senate, where Clay and Webster and Crittenden and Fessenden and Morton once sat, and who is himself a living example of the forgiveness, greatness, and generosity of the grandest Government that ever existed beneath the canopy of God, speaks in no uncertain words when he says:

I say, gentlemen and comrades, we were never wrong, and I stand by my convictions to-day firmly and strongly. We fought for the right, were right, and can not surrender our opinions because our arms are stacked and we are conquered. (Senator BERRY, of Arkansas, at rebel reunion at Little Rock, August 10.)

And yet my Democratic friends who occupy that side of the Chamber are neither ruffled nor disturbed by this uncalled-for and infamous proclamation of disloyalty by one who has accepted the generosity of the Government and been restored to the full measure of its citizenship and its power.

THOSE WHO NOW CONTROL.

When I look around this Chamber, Mr. Chairman, and mark its composition and note the fact that those who are not only in constructive but in actual control of its organization and machinery are in large part the men who were but a short time since attempting its destruction, I am constrained, even at the risk of offending the oversensitive feelings of my Democratic friends, to stop long enough to inquire which side won in that great struggle?

I had been vain enough to believe, sir, that the great army to which I had given the strength and service of my younger manhood had been victorious, and that the outpouring of national treasure and the sacrifice of loyal blood had not been in vain.

But when I see this House handed over to the control of those whose boastful disloyalty finds its way into the records of my country, and whose most conspicuous and distinguished services have been rendered in attempting to destroy the liberty of my people and the unity of my Government, and who now seem determined to obtain by insidious legislation that which they failed to accomplish by force of arms, I am compelled to admit, sir, that the victories gained were but an idle boast, and that the sacrifices of life and treasure were without avail.

I trust I may be pardoned, sir, for daring to look into the organization of this House and taking from the records made by the members themselves so much of their personal histories as will enable me to enlighten my countrymen concerning the composition of the body that is to frame not only their laws, but to enact for their Government that system of tariff legislation that is to be for the weal or the woe of the people of these United States.

When I look into the record of the two Houses of Congress I am constrained to acknowledge, sir, that the timidity which seems to seize upon a Democrat every time you refer to the late unfortunate controversy between the sections of the Union has not inspired those who now ask that it may be forgotten and remain forever buried in oblivion to abstain from intruding into that record, the history of their disloyalty and treason to a Government whose only crime was the assertion of the fundamental principle upon which that Government was founded—the right of the "majority to rule."

With some considerable care I have prepared a list of those whose boastful disloyalty forms a disgraceful part of the record of these two Houses, and I append it here so that my countrymen may be advised of the fact that although it may be unwise for one who proved his loyalty to his country by faithful service in the field and camp to remind the distinguished Confederate soldier of his disloyalty and his treason, but that it is a part of the eternal fitness of things that the distinguished Confederate himself may put into the records of his country and print at the expense of the Government the history of services rendered in attempting to destroy that Government and to overthrow that country and its liberty.

The following list, taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fiftieth Congress, may be of interest to those who are not entirely familiar with the present condition of affairs, and who may be desirous of studying the complexion of the two bodies charged with the enactment of laws for the government of the people and the protection of the State, showing those who served in the Confederate armies, and are boastful and defiant in obtruding their disloyalty in that RECORD:

These eighty-seven names make a list of which the country may well take heed. But, sir, I may add with some sense of fairness that I understand that some fifteen or twenty others might be added to this list, whose personal modesty or whose just sense of the impropriety of putting the records of their disloyalty into the archives of the Government has made the history of these two Houses incomplete.

AMERICAN PEOPLE PATIENT AND LONG SUFFERING.

The American people are a patient and long-suffering people. How patient and long-suffering, I beg of you to consider, Mr. Chairman, when I tell you they have borne with almost uncomplaining patience the rule of the Democratic party and its attacks upon the labor, the manufacturing, and the producing interests of this land.

They have seen this House organized for the destruction of the protective system of the people.

They have witnessed the spectacle of one selected to preside over the deliberations of this body, aided by a Committee on Elections, denying the right of 4,000 voters to inquire into an election protested by them to be fraudulent and void.

They have seen the committees of this House headed by those whose early prejudices have been schooled in the doctrine of free trade—organized by premeditation and foresight for the purpose of making vigorous and determined war upon the industries of the nation.

They have seen an ex-Confederate placed at the head of the committee empowered to judge and report upon the election and qualifications of every member of this House, whose seat in this Chamber is challenged by every sense of justice, and whose returns show that he has received not one vote out of every twenty entitled to be cast in that district.

They have seen heading the Agricultural Committee another Confederate whose chief distinction was gained in acting as a commissioner of exchange for the men who were confined in the prisons and hell-holes of Andersonville, Belle Isle, and Libby.

They have seen standing at the head of naval affairs one whose qualification comes from his service in the Confederate army rather than in the Confederate navy.

They have seen at the head of War Claims one whose distinction was gained on fields contending for the destruction of his country and whose faithful service was witnessed by his blood; and I must stop here, Mr. Chairman, to pay him the personal tribute of my admiration for the fearless, determined, and manly courage with which he discharges every duty and the new-born spirit of patriotism that seems to be inspiring his every act.

I scarcely need stop, sir, to speak of that distinguished Confederate whom it was my fortune to meet on many a field, who is now intrusted with that most important duty of supervising the expenditures of our Treasury Department, and whose experience gained on so many battle-fields no doubt qualifies him beyond these Democratic civilians for that important trust.

I need not speak of them further, Mr. Chairman, but will add them here as a list of those distinguished Confederates who preside over the deliberations of the committees of this House:

Ways and Means	MILLS, Texas.
Elections	CRISP, Georgia.
Judiciary	CULBERSON, Texas.
Agriculture	HATCH, Missouri.
Naval Affairs	HERBERT, Alabama.
Post-Office and Post-Roads	BLOUNT, Georgia.
Indian Affairs	PEEL, Arkansas.
Railways and Canals	DAVIDSON, Florida.
Mines and Mining	O'FERRALL, Virginia.
Public Buildings and Grounds	DIBBLE, South Carolina.
Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River	CATCHINGS, Mississippi.

Need I speak of the patience of the people of this country who have witnessed the ballot-box in a large part of eleven States of this Union brought into disrepute and contempt?

Need I speak of the patience of that people who see themselves and their fellow-citizens misrepresented on the floor of this House, and without power to remedy the evil by a just and fair appeal to the ballot-boxes of the land?

Need I speak of the patience of that people who have seen a President elected by themselves putting his hand to the pen to veto the pensions of the poor widows of Union soldiers whose claims have been recognized and approved by the two Houses of Congress, and sending them starving out upon the charities of the world, and the same pen signing the commission of one to be a justice of the Supreme Court whose only distinguished service was rendered in attempting to destroy the Government whose laws he is now to administer?

Am I wrong, Mr. Chairman, when I say that the people of this country are a patient and long-suffering people? But, sir, the limit of endurance has, I believe, been reached at last, and they will enter their judgments in characters so bold and in ballots so numerous that even the Democratic party will be able to understand them. And I say to my Democratic friends—

> Brief is the time in which ye have to do
> Your work on earth, and plume your souls for flight;
> Ye have no time to lose in useless work,
> Much less to use in doing deeds of wrong,
> Which some day, sadly, must be all undone.

A BILL TO REMOVE GRAVE DOUBTS.

But a few days since, Mr. Chairman, we were called upon to pass a bill to remove the grave doubts of the President of the United States and to enable him to apply a part of the accumulated surplus of the Treasury to the purchase of Government bonds, and thus to pay the indebtedness of the nation, and to relieve the people by putting into circulation a part of the surplus from an already overburdened treasury.

No member upon this floor, Democrat or Republican, had any doubts of the power already conferred by law to do what the President then asked to be authorized to do by the action of this body. No one save the President himself had any grave doubts upon the subject.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that he who now occupies the Presidential chair has had more grave doubts than any other who ever occupied it before—one hundred and nine of them in a single term of Congress—thrust between the loyal soldiers of this country and the generous actions of the two Houses of Congress.

Is it wonderful that the people of the United States are now beginning to entertain grave doubts of the capacity of the Democratic party to manage the affairs of the National Government, and to handle the question of national finance? Is it wonderful that they are beginning to entertain grave doubts as to the propriety of intrusting it with power for another four years? I believe, sir, they will express these doubts at the ballot-boxes in November next—doubts of the faithfulness of the Democratic party to the trust confided in it; doubts of the character and capacity of the present incumbent to dignify the great office with which he has been intrusted; doubts of his fitness to occupy the chair filled with such distinguished ability by those great Republican leaders in the past; doubts of his fitness to occupy the chair which was adorned by the martyred Garfield; which was elevated by the heroic Grant; which was forever glorified by the immortal Lincoln; which was made illustrious by the patriot Washington.

Mr. Chairman, in this beautiful city, with its great avenues, its hand some public grounds and parks, its magnificent public buildings, and its costly private palaces of luxury and wealth, I may be pardoned, if, with the just pride of an American, I should call it the most splendid city upon the face of the earth.

Here and there through its avenues and streets, bursting upon you like dreams of oriental splendor, you see its green spots, clothed in all the luxuriance of the tropics, and standing in their midst like guardians of the public peace and watchmen upon the outer walls, splendid monuments and statues, which a patriotic and loving people have erected to commemorate the lives and deeds of their illustrious dead.

Yonder, standing with lips firm set, is the hero who lashed to the mast-head went to battle and to victory.

There upon his splendid charger is McPherson, the Bayard of our armies, the soldier without fear and without reproach. Here is the old hero, who from his cotton bales defied the British cannon and taught them the power of American freemen defending home and fireside.

Yonder with its uplifted peak, piercing the sky as though it would kiss the stars, is the eternal witness which American patriotism has erected to the first of all Americans; and it will stand as a tribute to his greatness and worth, and a testimony to the triumph of American skill and the genius of American labor.

Here, beautiful in the magnificence of its conception and splendid in the triumph of the artist's finished work, is that grand old Virginian, who knew no boundary lines but those which encircled his country; whose heroism at Nashville drove back and destroyed the invading hosts; who stood like a rock at Chickamauga, against which the waves and the storms of secession beat and dashed themselves into fury in vain. But while these all win our approbation, there is another monument, not so pretentious in proportion, but one which touches every heart, and before which I stand in reverent admiration.

In the park just east of the Capitol is a bronze statue of Abraham Lincoln, represented in the act of freeing the enslaved and oppressed.

It was erected by contributions from the slaves made free by the proclamation of emancipation to commemorate this great event. The multitudes which gathered around it and looked with tearful eyes when it was first given to the sunlight were those who had been in bondage. The eloquent lips which spoke the words of dedication were those of an emancipated slave.

I stood beside it a few days since and saw an old colored woman, formerly a slave, with hair gray with age and face furrowed by years, leading by the hand a little grand-child, and standing before the statue she bid the little one read the inscription upon its side. The cruel days of slavery had left her in the darkness of ignorance; the new dawn had poured a flood of light in upon the child of the slave, and as the little one climbed upon the base, and with an intelligence beyond her years read to the listening ears of the old slave-woman the inscription which told that this monument was erected solely by contributions of those made free by the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, and that the "first contribution was made by Charlotte Scott, an emancipated slave of Virginia, and was her first earnings in freedom," and when she had finished, with tears streaming down her wrinkled face, I heard the devout old woman say, "God bless him, honey;" and I uncovered in the presence of the illustrious dead.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether it is a great work of art. I do not know whether those competent to pronounce upon its merits would call it a triumph of genius, and the perfection of a master's skill. I do not know whether the hand which chiseled it and the master who molded it are among the world's most famous men, but I do know that it touches my heart and appeals to my love and admiration as no other work of art in this great city can.

There it stands, an heroic figure of Abraham Lincoln, with the kindly, benevolent face, and the love and tenderness that was a part of his great nature; at his feet an emancipated slave, with hair curled and crisp, black as though burned by the suns of Ethiop, the broken chains, the manacles rent asunder. On the other side I read this inscription:

Upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

Would you tear it down? Would you see in its stead the master and the crouching slave? Would you hear the cry of the bondman, rather than the shout of the free? God forbid; but grant that the liberty given by the immortal hand of Abraham Lincoln may remain a blessing in all the centuries to come.

And to this end let us dedicate ourselves anew to the liberty for which our brothers died, and to the preservation of the institutions of our country, that they may be transmitted to the generations to come.

For the right that needs assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that we may do.

Mr, MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 29, noes 13.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MILLS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr BOUTELLE].

MEMBERSHIP OF COBDEN CLUB.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY], who has just addressed the House, and who kindly afforded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] an opportunity to relieve the present Secretary of War, Mr. Endicott, from the charge of having belonged to the Cobden Club, was unable to grant me any time to vindicate General Garfield from the imputation of sympathy with the free-trade doctrines of that organization; but I take great pleasure in expressing my thanks to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS] and to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILKINSON], who is next entitled to the floor, for their courtesy in enabling me to occupy the attention of the House for that purpose.

A few days ago, as will be recollected, when the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] read a list of names of prominent members of the Democratic party who are connected with the Cobden Club of London, by honorary membership, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] cited the names of some Republicans who, he said, were or had been honorary members of that club, including General Garfield. I stated at the time that it was a matter of current knowledge and political notoriety that General Garfield had repudiated all sympathy with the free-trade doctrines or purposes of the Cobden Club, and had repeatedly explained the circumstances of his having been complimented by an honorary membership. I desire now simply to vindicate my statement on that occasion by showing that the evidence is cumulative in establishing what I then said.

In Bundy's Life of Garfield, page 117, he refers to the origin of this Cobden Club criticism as follows:

In spite of the well-known consistency of his (Garfield's) record on the tariff it has been his fortune, as it has been that of other great statesmen, to be the victim of gross misapprehensions as to particular declarations of his views, or as to his declarations in Congress. For instance, at a time when Secretary Boutwell regarded it as of the utmost importance to our credit abroad that the English statesmen and people should understand the nature of the fight which our soundest statesmen were making on behalf of an honest currency, he sent to Mr. Gladstone and to Mr. Bright a copy of Garfield's then recent speech on the currency question, which the Secretary regarded as highly creditable to American statesmanship.

In recognition of the ability and soundness of this argument Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright had General Garfield elected an honorary member of the Cobden Club, an honor rarely conferred except in recognition of distinguished statesmanship or ability in treating economic subjects. From this simple fact it was hastily assumed that General Garfield had won the favor of a club identified with the propagandism of free trade by his position on the tariff, while in fact the thing which obtained for him this unexpected compliment was a speech in which there was not the least reference to the tariff question.

Mr. BYNUM. What was the date of that speech?

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is referred to in Bundy's Life of Garfield, page 117. I think the speech was made in 1868.

I will state further that in 1880, after General Garfield's nomination for the Presidency, when the question of his attitude on the tariff was discussed, that very well known and very pronounced protection organ, the Iron and Steel Bulletin, spoke of him as follows:

Such is General Garfield's tariff record, and as we have already stated, it is entirely satisfactory to protectionists. He has been charged with being a member of the British free-trade Cobden Club, but he has repeatedly declared over his own signature that the use of his name by the Cobden Club was wholly unauthorized by him, and that its free-trade doctrines did not meet with his approval. If the club thought by the conferring of an empty compliment to entrap him into an expression of sympathy with its philosophy of selfishness and greed, it failed signally.

General Garfield is a candidate for the Presidency. With that we have nothing to do. Our readers will vote for or against him as they please. But General Garfield has rendered great service to the cause of home industry during his public career, and we would have been untrue to ourselves and to every individual member of this association if we had not testified, as we have done, to the excellence and fullness of that service, now that his tariff record has been misrepresented.

I cite further in this connection from General James S. Brisbin's "Life of General Garfield" a reference to the fact that this charge had been repeatedly made in public against General Garfield at a time when it was well known that he had become a great and powerful champion of protection, and that the charge never made any impression upon the public because of his well-known position on the subject, and also because of a letter which he wrote in April, 1877, I think, in reply to some criticism by Hon. Russell Errett, of Pittsburgh. In that letter, as cited on page 283 of Brisbin's work, General Garfield said:

In 1868 I made a speech in favor of the resumption of specie payments, in which I discussed elaborately the doctrines of money and the obligation of the nation to pay its debt. The Secretary of the Treasury sent some copies of that speech to our minister in London, believing that it would strengthen our credit abroad. John Bright received a copy, and was so pleased with it that he had me elected an honorary member of the Cobden Club. I had never before heard of this club, and up to that time Charles Sumner was the only member of Congress who had ever been thus complimented. Some years after that I learned that the Cobden Club believed in free trade, as nearly all Englishmen do; but of course I was in no way responsible for their belief.

It is only necessary to say, Mr. Chairman, in that connection, that while General Garfield in the early stages of his career, like many other college professors, had some inclination toward the abstract doctrine of free trade, he very soon got rid of such notions, and even in his college days he appreciated fully the peculiar conditions which render free trade inapplicable to this country. It is stated in Mr. Bundy's biography that when Professor Perry, after having pursued their studies in Wayland, asked Garfield what impression had been made on his mind by these economic treatises, he made this reply:

As an abstract theory, the doctrine of free trade seems to be universally true, but as a question of practicability under a Government like ours, the protective system seems to be indispensable.

And that was the guide and the practice of his life. In 1870 General Garfield made a speech in this House from which some disconnected quotations have been made by the opponents of the tariff in this debate, in which he again recognized the fact that a great many of the scholars and doctrinaires of the world were advocating the abstract doctrine of free trade; but in that same speech, and as its main purpose, he presented unanswerable arguments in favor of protecting home industries, and made these remarkably cogent statements, which dispose absolutely of the "raw-material" theory that forms the basis of the free-trade doctrine in this country to-day:

American industry is labor in any form which gives value to the raw materials or elements of nature, either by extracting them from the earth, the air, or the sea, or by modifying their forms or transporting them through the channels of trade to the markets of the world, or in any way rendering them better fitted for the use of man. All these are parts of American industry, and deserve the careful and earnest attention of the Legislature of the nation. Wherever a ship plows the sea, or a plow furrows the field; wherever a mine yields its treasure; wherever a ship or a railroad train carries freight to market; wherever the smoke of the furnace rises or the clang of the loom resounds; even in the lonely garret where the seamstress plies her busy needle, there is industry.

No more eloquent tribute, no more earnest and effective plea for the protection of American industry in every form and at every stage has ever been made in the forum of American discussion.

Again in 1878, at a time when free trade made its most fierce assault upon the industries of this country under the guise of the Fernando Wood tariff-reduction bill, Mr. Garfield closed a masterly speech with these words:

Let it be remembered that 22 per cent. of all the laboring people of this country are artisans engaged in manufactures. Their culture has been fostered by our tariff laws. It is their pursuits and the skill which they have developed that produced the glory of our centennial exhibition. To them the country owes the splendor of the position it holds before the world more than to any other equal number of our citizens. If this bill becomes a law it strikes down their occupation, and throws into the keenest distress the brightest and best elements of our population.

When the first paragraph has been read, I will propose to strike out the enacting clause. If the committee will do that, we can kill the bill to-day.

The enacting clause was stricken out, and that Democratic assault upon American industries was summarily killed.

Still later, Mr. Speaker, at the most important period of his public life, when presented as a candidate for the suffrages of the American people for the great office of President of the United States, James A. Garfield again and most emphatically declared his faith in the great American doctrine of protection in his letter of acceptance in these words:

In reference to our customs laws a policy should be pursued which will bring revenues to the Treasury, and will enable the labor and capital employed in our great industries to compete fairly in our own markets with the labor and capital of foreign producers. We legislate for the people of the United States, not for the whole world, and it is our glory that the American laborer is more intelligent and better paid than his foreign competitor.

Our country can not be independent unless its people, with their abundant natural resources, possess the requisite skill at any time to clothe, arm, and equip themselves for war, and in time of peace to produce all the necessary implements of labor. It was the manifest intention of the founders of the Government to provide for the common defense, not by standing armies alone, but by raising among the people a greater army of artisans, whose intelligence and skill should powerfully contribute to the safety and glory of the nation.

While these words are remembered the fame of Garfield as a great champion of the development of American industry and protection to American labor will not fail to be cherished by his countrymen.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire only a few minutes more.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] desires ten minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. I have no objection to the gentleman from Maine going on, if the session can be continued by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. I ask, then, that the session be continued until thirty-five minutes after 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN): Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But, Mr. Speaker, I might have said the other day that General Garfield's former and nominal connection with the Cobden Club was a matter of less moment to the people of this country to-day than the membership of those who are now living and active factors in our politics. General Garfield is dead; he has passed to his account; his record is made up; and that record shows him to have been one of the great masters of economic science and one of the most able and potent champions of American industry this country has ever produced.

The gentleman from Indiana cited the name of another prominent Republican, one who is not dead, a gentleman who is still alive, Mr. Halstead, the brilliant editor of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette. I called Mr. Halstead's attention to this charge made against him in open court and asked him to plead to the indictment. This is his prompt and most pertinent reply:

CINCINNATI, May 5.

Hon. C. A. BOUTELLE,
House of Representatives:

The story that I am a member of the Cobden Club is correct. One night in London with Cyrus Field, a personal friend of Cobden, I boarded a small steamboat at Westminster and was carried to Greenwich. There we had a white bait dinner, twelve courses of fish, and as good cold champagne as was ever drank in Maine. It was a lovely dinner. There was a distinguished man in the chair and a toast-master who whooped things up and made them lively. I made a speech about the white wings of commerce on the ocean and the large rivers in America, and the distance Cincinnati was from salt water, and the indifference of her people on the tariff question, and the London Times said the humorous party from the Ohio River ought to have told something about the Reciprocity Treaty with Canada, but did not seem to know much about it, and that was true.

It was for my services in making this Greenwich speech that I was made an honorary member of the Cobden Club, and I have ever since received marked copies of the publications of that energetic organization, and many marked copies of newspapers and pamphlets, indeed, loads of the most serious and dull information ever misapplied to human affairs. I would rather at any time read the essays of my old friend J. S. Moore, the parsee merchant who resides on the limited express between Washington and New York. This literature shook my faith in the application of free trade to our country, that is, of selecting our country to begin with. Then the price of news print is less than half of what it was before the war, and I told Frank Hurd and Henry Watterson about that, and that I was afraid protection had caused more paper mills and paper materials and had knocked down the price of the one article of merchandise that I did know something about, and when Hurd and Watterson couldn't explain it Cobden-club fashion, I could not.

In London some years after the white bait dinner, I was troubled for hours trying to get a trifling article through the custom-house, for there is such a place even in London. It was a case of small bottles of cologne-water, and when I was exhausted I told them I was an honorary member of the Cobden Club, and the experience was liable to make me a high protectionist; the inspector was greatly disgusted in appearance and slammed down my case of cologne-water at once. This was the instance of the greatest utility to me of the Cobden Club membership.

The policy of M. Thiers in France, and Prince Bismarck in Germany, after their war, both of these great statesmen relying upon the protective system for strength in the time of trial, has been to me a more striking chapter of history than any I have found in my Cobden Club volumes.

I do not think the Democratic party has a tariff policy that it can apply to business, or that its methods would be trustworthy if it had a policy. If President Cleveland had been a member of the Cobden Club as long as I have, he would have known better than to have written his message of December last.

M. HALSTEAD.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MILLS. There are now barely ten minutes remaining for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM].

Mr. BYNUM. If the House will extend the session so as to allow me time to reply to the gentleman from Maine, I have no objection to his going on.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the recess be vacated, and that this session continue until we adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Leaving the answer of Mr. Halstead to speak for itself, I now desire to make a few remarks about the New York Free-Trade Club, to show that some of these gentlemen whose claim that they are not members of the Cobden Club, of London, are members of the New York Free-Trade Club—an organization in this country devoted to the dissemination of the principles of free trade.

The charge of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], as I understand it, was that the leaders of the Democratic party are in actual sympathy with free trade to-day; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], and those who pleaded that some Republicans had been affiliated with the Cobden Club, were endeavoring to break the force of that statement. Now, I hold in my hand a copy of the constitution and by-laws, with a list of the officers and committees, of "The New York Free Trade Club."

That is a living institution in this country, and I find among its resident members the following distinguished gentlemen of the Democratic faith: SAMUEL S. COX, of New York; George William Curtis, of Harper's Weekly; Abram S. Hewitt, mayor of New York; Manton Marble, who rang the "fire-bell in night" in 1876; Joseph S. Moore, the "Parsee Merchant;" Carl Schurz, and Samuel J. Tilden, who is dead. Among the non-resident members I find Thomas F. Bayard, the present Democratic Secretary of State; Charles S. Fairchild, the present Democratic Secretary of the Treasury; Henry George, the land communist; RANDALL GIBSON, Senator from Louisiana; Frank Hurd, late a member of this House; J. Randolph Tucker, formerly a member of this House; ZEBULON B. VANCE, now a Senator from North Carolina; Henry Watterson, the great apostle of the Kentucky Democracy, and Walter Stilson Hutchins, of the Washington Post, of this city.

Now, there can not be any mistake about the fact that these gentlemen are members of this club, or the reason why they are members. Here are leading Democratic members of the House of Representatives, leading Democratic members of the Senate, and leading members of the Democratic Cabinet members of the New York Free Trade Club. And the New York Free Trade Club in this volume unequivocally states its platform as follows:

Article III.—Platform:

The New York Free Trade Club holds:

1. That the only commercial policy which is in its nature permanent and unchangeable, and which therefore assures stability in all kinds of business, is free trade between nations as between the States of the Union.

And there, Mr. Speaker, I think I may safely leave this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, when this question was brought up on Saturday last by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN], not having direct information as to who were members of the Cobden Club, and having heard that General Garfield during his lifetime was a member, and having heard also that Mr. Murat Halstead was now a member, I propounded to the gentleman from Nevada, who then occupied the floor, the question I did simply for the purpose of eliciting the information and placing before the country the fact that prominent members of the Republican party had been and were yet members of that club.

In order that there may be no mistake as to what took place on that occasion I quote from the RECORD what was said.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOODBURN. Certainly; if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman state when Mr. Garfield became a member of the Cobden Club, and also when Murat Halstead, of the Cincinnati Commercial, became a member of the club?

Mr. WOODBURN. Yes; I will answer that question. The book which I hold in my hand is a corrected list of all the members, British, foreign, colonial, and American, up to January, 1888, and I say the name of Mr. Garfield does not appear anywhere upon it. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Was he not a member of the Cobden Club?

Mr. WOODBURN. Never, sir. I produce the authority to show that he was not. Now let the gentleman produce his authority to show that he was. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. Was not Murat Halstead a member of it? Was not Senator SHERMAN a member of it?

Mr. WOODBURN. There is not a Republican in public life to-day on the list of the Cobden Club. [Applause on the Republican side.] This is a late publication, and was sent to Senator JONES, of my State, but got into the wrong hands. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Then these names have been removed, because they are members of the club.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who removed them?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know.

Mr. FARQUHAR. By what authority does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. BYNUM. I make it upon the authority of members of the club that Mr. Halstead is a member. I have it directly from members of the club that they met him there.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, here is the official record of membership.

Mr. WOODBURN. I do not know what the gentleman bases his statement upon. I come here with the record, and you must produce contrary authority to overthrow it.

I did not propound the question, "Was not Senator SHERMAN a member of it?" The question I did propound in which his name was used was this: "Is not Murat Halstead, who is a warm supporter of Senator SHERMAN as a candidate for the Presidency, a member of it?" I make this explanation and correction not so much in justice to Senator SHERMAN as to the Cobden Club. [Laughter.] To that question the gentleman from Nevada responded:

There is not a Republican in public life to-day on the list of the Cobden Club.

Which lead me to believe, and no doubt the whole committee, that Mr. Halstead's name was not on the list; and yet on the list from which the gentleman was reading Mr. Halstead's name appeared as having been admitted to membership in 1880.

In regard to the record of General Garfield as a member of that club, I showed from the list of membership that he was a member in 1871 and in 1876. I stated that his membership, no doubt, was brought about by the sentiments which he had expressed on the question of free trade.

In that statement I think I am fully sustained by the public declarations of that able and distinguished man. In 1866 General Garfield made a speech in the House, in which he used the following language:

If Congress pursues this line of policy steadily we shall, year by year, approach more nearly to the basis of free trade, because we shall be more nearly able to compete with other nations on equal terms. I am for a protection which leads to ultimate free trade. I am for that free trade which can only be achieved through a reasonable protection.

Again, General Garfield, on July 10, 1866, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, said:

I am willing as a compromise to favor the reduction of the proposed duty on railroad iron, and I presume the Committee on Railroads will agree with me in this. I think we should also reduce the proposed duty on salt, and I have no doubt in several other particulars we will reduce the rate of duty.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens replied as follows:

Why not come out honestly and accept the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON, who favored a tariff for revenue only], which is a much more ingenuous one?

To which General Garfield responded that—

Against the abstract doctrine of free trade as such very little can be said. As a theory there is much to commend it. But it can never be applied to values, except in time of peace.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not read that part of it.

Mr. BYNUM. No; the gentleman did not read that sentence through to the end.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not read any part of it.

Mr. BYNUM. That is substantially the sentiment the gentleman read a few moments ago, but he omitted to read the last sentence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not read any part of it.

Mr. BYNUM. It may have been from another speech from which the gentleman from Maine read, but the sentiments were substantially the same.

On April 1, 1870, in a debate which took place between General Garfield and Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Garfield said:

As an abstract theory of political economy free trade has many advocates and much can be said in its favor, nor will it be denied that the scholarship of modern times is largely on that side; that a large majority of the great thinkers of the present day are leading in the direction of what is called free trade.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is the speech of April 1, 1870?

Mr. BYNUM, Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now let the gentleman read the quotation I made from that same speech.

Mr. BYNUM. I have read from the same speech.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the quotation to which I refer.

Mr. BYNUM. You have read it and it will be in the RECORD. Once is enough.

Mr. Speaker, I read from a speech delivered on June 4, 1878, by Mr. Garfield, and I must say that I find nothing in the quotation from which I read to which I dissent. I certainly think there is much to commend and but little, if any, to condemn in the sentiments expressed by him. If the sentiments he then expressed as to the ultimate result of a reasonable tariff should prove as accurate as the prediction of the result of high protection, I think we can well calculate what will be the result if the present bill is defeated. He says:

Fortunately or unfortunately, on this question I have long occupied a position between two extremes of opinion. I have long believed, and I still believe, that the worst evil which has afflicted the interests of American artisans and manufacturers has been the tendency to extremes in our tariff legislation. Our history for the last fifty years has been a repetition of the same mistake. One party comes into power, and believing that a protective tariff is a good thing, establishes a fair rate of duty. Not content with that, they say, "This works well, let us have more of it." And they raise the rates still higher, and perhaps go beyond the limits of national interest.

Every additional step in that direction increases the opposition and threatens the stability of the whole system.

I will say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that if you are not willing to accept the present moderate bill, you will drive the people of this country to a much more extreme measure. In my judgment, if this very conservative measure is not accepted, the next House that comes here from the people will come instructed and ready to make a much more radical reduction than we now propose. The people are in earnest, and the longer the matter is delayed the more sweeping will be their demands. Continuing, Mr. Garfield says:

When the policy of increase is pushed beyond a certain point the popular reaction sets in; the opposite party gets into power and cuts down the high rates. Not content with reducing the rates that are unreasonable, they attack and destroy the whole protective system. Then follows a deficit in the Treasury, the destruction of manufacturing interests, until the reaction again sets in, the free-traders are overthrown, and a protective system is again established. In not less than four distinct periods during the last fifty years has this sort of revolution taken place in our industrial system. Our great national industries have thus been tossed up and down between two extremes of opinion.

During my term of service in this House I have resisted the effort to increase the rates of duty whenever I thought an increase would be dangerous to the stability of our manufacturing interests, and by doing so I have sometimes been thought unfriendly to the policy of protecting American industry. When the necessity of the revenues and the safety of our manufactures warranted I have favored a reduction of rates, and these reductions have aided to preserve the stability of the system. In one year, soon after the close of the war, we raised $212,000,000 of revenue from customs.

In 1870 we reduced the customs duties by the sum of twenty-nine and one-half millions of dollars. In 1872 they were again reduced by the sum of forty-four and one-half millions. Those two reductions were in the main wise and judicious; and although I did not vote for them all, yet they have put the fair-minded men of this country in a position where they can justly resist any considerable reduction below the present rates.

My view of the danger of extreme positions on the questions of tariff rates may be illustrated by a remark made by Horace Greeley in the last conversation I ever had with that distinguished man. Said he:

"My fault with you is that you are not sufficiently high protective in your views."

I replied:

"What would you advise?"

He said:

"If I had my way—if I were king of this country—I would put a duty of $100 a ton on pig-iron and a proportionate duty on everything else that can be produced in America. The result would be that our people would be obliged to supply their own wants; manufactures would spring up; competition would finally reduce prices; and we should live wholly within ourselves."

I replied that the fatal objection to his theory was that no man is king of this country, with power to make his policy permanent. But as all our policies depend upon popular support, the extreme measure proposed would beget an opposite extreme, and our industries would suffer from violent reactions. For this reason I believe that we ought to seek that point of stable equilibrium somewhere between a prohibitory tariff on the one hand and a tariff that gives no protection on the other. What is that point of stable equilibrium? In my judgment, it is this: A rate so high that foreign producers can not flood our markets and break down our home manufacturers, but not so high as to keep them altogether out, enabling our manufacturers to combine and raise the prices, nor so high as to stimulate an unnatural and unhealthy growth of manufactures.

In other words, I would have the duty so adjusted that every great American industry can fairly live and make fair profits; and yet so low that if our manufacturers attempted to put up prices unreasonably, the competition from abroad would come in and bring down prices to a fair rate. Such a tariff I believe will be supported by the great majority of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the words and sentiments of General Garfield to the other side of this House. He would not have a tariff so high as to "enable our manufactures to combine and raise the prices." This is just what has taken place under the present rates of duty.

It is a matter to be deplored that his voice can not be heard in this Hall to-day, denouncing the trusts and combinations which have grown up under the present law, and which are extorting from the great masses of the people millions of dollars annually. Whatever might have been his sentiments on the question of free trade, there can be no doubt that if he were a member of this House to-day the Republican party would not be led by him to certain defeat upon this issue in November. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. What was the subject of debate at that time?

Mr. BYNUM. The tariff.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What was the pending measure?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not now remember the particular measure.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state for the gentleman's information that it was on the Wood tariff bill, to which he was opposed, and proposed to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know whether he was for it or against it, but his sentiments are expressed here, and it is of no consequence whether he favored or opposed the then pending measure.

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] promised to show that Mr. Garfield had renounced his allegiance to the Cobden Club. With all due deference to what he has said, I do not think he has done so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I read Mr. Garfield's letter.

Mr. BYNUM. Garfield's letter?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly; the gentleman did not listen.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman did read a letter from Mr. Garfield which he says was written in April, 1877. Mr. Garfield, in the letter read, says he was elected a member of the club, not on account of his sentiments in favor of free trade, which I have shown he had prior to his election repeatedly expressed, but by reason of the position he took in favor of resumption; that at the time of his election he did not know that the club favored free trade, and only learned so afterwards. But the nowhere, as I now recall, said that after learning what the purposes of the club were, he withdrew from the same. If this letter of General Garfield, which the gentleman has read, and says was written in April, 1877, was accepted by his party as a renunciation of his adhesion to the principles of the Cobden Club and of his membership in the same, the action of the Republican members of Congress from Pennsylvania in refusing to support him for the Speakership in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses was very strange. Long after the gentleman says Mr. Garfield renounced his connection with the club, we find a Republican member of Congress from Pennsylvania defending the action of himself and his colleagues for withholding from him their support.

They were censured in Pennsylvania for refusing to give him their votes, and Mr. Killinger addressed a letter to the editor of the Philadelphia Times, dated October 17, 1877, giving the reasons why the members from that State withheld their support, which I desire to read.

To the Editor of the Philadelphia Times:

In reply to the inquiry, I will say that in the vote for Speaker we chose the lesser of the two evils. We could not elect the Speaker, and the only significance our action had was its indication of expression of confidence in the nominee on the great and vital question of protection to our industries, and employment for our laborers.

In my judgment all questions are subordinate to this. When, therefore, the caucus determined to compliment Mr. Garfield in this way I had to choose between sanctioning by my vote such an action or to express my dissent by withholding it. Mr. Garfield's record on this question is well known to the country, and some of it has come under my own observation. I could not, therefore, pass it by as insignificant or unimportant. Without meaning any disrespect to him I am compelled to say that his status has been equivocal, if not actually hostile, to the opinions we hold in Pennsylvania.

I have never found him to stand squarely for protection. He would not be accepted by the Republicans of my district as an exponent of their views, and I could not compliment him with their vote for the Speakership without manifest inconsistency and doing violence to all my convictions of duty and principle. No friend of American system of revenue and finance has ever been complimented with honorary membership in the British free-trade leagues. The object of these leagues is well known to be the strengthening of British influence in foreign countries. They aim to secure markets here for British manufactures, and to that end are hostile to our home industries.

In common with William C. Bryant, Samuel S. Cox, and D. A. Wells, notorious free-traders, Mr. Garfield stands in connection with such a league. So long as he retains such connections and does not disavow its pernicious heresies, I do not see how to acquit him of holding the opinions of British co-laborers. It needed some resolution to express our dissent from the conclusions reached by the caucus. The Republican organization should be maintained by the party's representatives, especially at this juncture when we are threatened with disintegration in high quarters. But unless we can at the same time maintain the principles which gave value and vitality to the organization, party ties will weaken and our early dissolution is certain. So I chose the lesser of the two evils in withholding the vote of the Fourteenth district from a nominee who fails to be in accord with its people on the greatest question before the country.

J. W. KILLINGER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 17, 1877.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What letter is that?

Mr. BYNUM. A letter from J. W. Killinger, a member of the Forty-fifth Congress from Pennsylvania, to the editor of the Philadelphia Times.

Mr. BOUTELLE. For what purpose is it introduced here?

Mr. BYNUM. To show that Mr. Garfield was a member of the Cobden Club and had not up to that time renounced his membership. Seven of the members of the Pennsylvania delegation, including the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Mr. BAYNE and Mr. KELLEY, who are members of the present House, refused to support him because of his membership.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suppose the gentleman understood me to say that Mr. Garfield had never been assailed on that ground or had his attention called to it until this discussion arose in Pennsylvania. At that time, in reply to some questions of Mr. Errett, of Pittsburgh, he wrote a letter, to which I have already referred.

Mr. BYNUM. It was two years after that time that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in the Forty-sixth Congress, still refused to vote for him for Speaker, as will be found by reference to volume 44, page 4446, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gave as a reason at the time that he was not satisfied with Mr. Garfield's sentiments on the tariff.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Indiana knows perfectly well that between Mr. KELLEY and Mr. Garfield the strongest antagonism existed for years upon other subjects.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not know as to any antagonisms between them upon other subjects, but upon the tariff question they were continually at war.

Now I read from a letter, dated April 23, 1888, from David A. Wells, which fully and explicitly explains Mr. Garfield's connection with the Cobden Club:

NORWICH, CONN., April 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In response to your question as to the connection of General Garfield with the Cobden Club, I would say that he was proposed and elected a member of the club in 1869, at the same time and in company with Edward Atkinson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, E. P. Whipple, John Quincy Adams, William Lloyd Garrison, of Massachusetts, and William Cullen Bryant, Henry Ward Beecher, and David Dudley Field, of New York. He acknowledged the compliment and accepted the membership in a letter to the secretary of the club, and his membership continued without any revocation on his part until the day of his death.

The statement that eminent men are, or have been, "frequently elected as honorary members of the Cobden Club simply as a recognition of their scholarship" is not correct. No man is ever elected unless his consent has been previously obtained, either directly from himself or indirectly through friends who propose his name for election, and who does not understand that an election to membership of the club involves an indorsement of its principles. The motto of the club, which appears in all its publications and correspondence, namely, "Free trade, peace, and good-will among nations," obviously does not allow of any individual self-deception, certainly not in the case of a man like General Garfield.

It is also worthy of note that the men who founded the Cobden Club, like John Bright, Thomas B. Potter, Milner Gibson, and others, were men who through the darkest hours of the rebellion stood up in Parliament and out of Parliament for the Union, and did more than any or all others in preventing Lord Palmerston and his cabinet from uniting with Louis Napoleon in recognizing the Southern Confederacy and breaking the blockade, which in time meant calamity if not ruin to the Northern cause. And yet it now suits the extreme protectionists to revile these men as the relentless foes of the American laborer.

I will further add that, of my own certain knowledge, General Garfield was a believer in the principles of free trade down to a period as late as a year prior to his nomination for the Presidency, and that it was in no small part through intercourse and discussion with him in 1867 and 1868 I abandoned my original belief in the doctrines of protection and subsequently (1870) accepted membership in the Cobden Club.

In making these statements I prefer no accusation of disingenuousness or hypocrisy against General Garfield, and neither do I think him open to a suspicion of such conduct. He probably accepted the definition of Canning that true statesmanship consists in finding the line of safe change; and while accepting the principles of free trade and looking forward to the day when they will constitute the basis of commercial intercourse between all nations, he at the same time held that such a result in this country could be best and most speedily attained through gradual and tentative reforms; and that in the then temper of the American people the advocacy of radical measures was both inexpedient and useless.

I am, yours, respectfully,

DAVID A. WELLS.

CHAS. E. ALLEN, Esq.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the gentlemen named as members of the Cobden Club, I read the following names:

George Bancroft, Washington, D. C.; General Roelift Brinkerhoff, Ohio, 1886; Jacob D. Cox, Cincinnati, Ohio, 1872; William Lloyd Garrison, Boston, Mass., 1877; B. F. Gue, Des Moines, Iowa, 1883.

Mr. WEAVER. Another Republican.

Mr. BYNUM. These are all Republicans. Then follow the names of Hugh McCulloch, Washington, D. C., 1871; Stanley Matthews, Washington, D. C., 1877; Theodore Roosevelt, New York, 1883; C. E. Russell, Davenport, Iowa, 1883; Dr. W. R. Smith, Sioux City, Iowa, 1880; General Francis A. Walker, Boston, Mass., 1872.

When reference was made on Saturday to the name of Justice Matthews I stated at the time that he was appointed an associate justice by President Garfield. I was corrected by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] who said the appointment was made by President Arthur——

Mr. BOUTELLE. By President Hayes.

Mr. BYNUM. And by a number of gentlemen on the other side who said I had better get posted.

Justice Matthews was appointed by President Hayes, but was not confirmed during his administration; he was reappointed on May 21, 1881, by President Garfield, and was subsequently confirmed.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] in concluding his speech made an earnest appeal to his brother Irish-Americans to vote against President Cleveland in the coming contest. I do not know whether he has received any response to the same as yet, but I have; and for fear that he may not realize the full effect of his eloquent words, I take the responsibility of publishing a private letter received by me to-day, and which I commend to the careful consideration not only of the gentleman from Nevada but to the careful consideration and attention of the Irish-American voters throughout the whole country.

GALESBURGH, ILL., May 7, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In the discussion on the tariff bill last Saturday a Mr. WOODBURN, of Nevada, asks "if citizens of Irish birth could knowingly support for the high office of President of the United States Grover Cleveland, when they are informed by the London cable dispatches that the surplus funds of the Cobden Club was intended as a re-enforcement for him in his efforts to control American markets and hand them over to British traitors. What he means by British traitors I do not understand, but I can inform Mr. WOODBURN that every true Irish-American will support Grover Cleveland, as I propose to do, and these are my reasons: The time was when England did with Ireland just what her spawn, New England and Pennsylvania, are trying to do with the West; that is, she compelled every article introduced to or exported from Ireland to pass through an Englishman's hands in an English port. Goods for Ireland from America had to pass Queenstown, Ireland, and be landed in Liverpool, there to be reshipped to Ireland. This crying outrage is mentioned in an old Irish ballad:

"Such misery mid luxury
Is more than I can understand;
'Tis because they took free trade
From that glorious isle called Paddy's Land."

Irish-Americans as a class are not so purblind as to hate a thing the cable dispatches say England loves. The devil can admire a good thing, why not England? (Of course a Republican can not.) Mr. WOODBURN'S attempt to lay stress that the London cable tells us that the Cobden Club is re-enforcing Mr. Cleveland to control American markets is truly laughable. Eastern manufacturers are howling for protection from England at the expense of the Western farmer. I ask Mr. WOODBURN what controls the market of every Western product if it is not that London telegram each morning? Irish-Americans are not blind to the fact that every law in force in this Union against their interest is in a Republican State, and Republican supremacy means its continuous attempts to fill us with wind. But Irish-Americans are not so easily inflated.

Respectfully,

W. F. STANTON.

Hon. Mr. BYNUM, M. C.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to occupy so much time of the House in presenting this matter, and my only apology for doing so is that I desired all the facts to go before the country. In conclusion I wish to say that while I do not favor absolute free trade, I have always had the greatest admiration for the abilities of General Garfield, and taking his statements to the methods by and through which he expected to arrive at free trade, I do not think his connection with the Cobden Club discreditable to his public life or to his memory.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Inasmuch as it is a matter of veracity between General Garfield and Mr. Wells——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to lay before the House a message from the President.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very well.

VETO MESSAGE—PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, on motion of Mr. MILLS, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and, with the bill, ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 4357 entitled "An act to erect a public building at Allentown, Pa."

The accommodation of the postal business is the only public purpose for which the Government can be called on to provide, which is suggested as a pretext for the erection of this building. It is proposed to expend $100,000 for a structure to be used as a post-office. It is said that a deputy collector of internal revenue and a board of pension examiners are located at Allentown, but I do not understand that the Government is obliged to provide quarters for these officers.

The usual statement is made in support of this bill setting forth the growth of the city where it is proposed to locate the building and the amount and variety of the business which is there transacted. And the postmaster, in stereotyped phrase, represents the desirability of increased accommodation for the transaction of the business under his charge.

But I am thoroughly convinced that there is no present necessity for the expenditure of $100,000 for any purpose connected with the public business at this place.

The annual rent now paid for the post-office is $1,300.

The interest at 3 per cent. upon the amount now asked for this new building is $3,000. As soon as it is undertaken the pay of a superintendent of its construction will begin; and, after its completion, the compensation of janitors and other expenses of its maintenance will follow.

The plan now pursued for the erection of public buildings is, in my opinion, very objectionable. They are often built where they are not needed, of dimensions and at a cost entirely disproportionate to any public use to which they can be applied, and as a consequence they frequently serve more to demonstrate the activity and pertinacity of those who represent localities desiring this kind of decoration at public expense than to meet any necessity of the Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 9, 1888.

And then, on motion of Mr. MILLS (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the change in the sugar schedule as proposed by the Mills tariff bill, unless a proportionate change is made in the duty on molasses; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of 33 citizens of Woburn, Mass., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the General Court of Massachusetts, praying for more stringent laws against the immigration of paupers, idiots, and insane and thriftless persons. This is a petition of considerable length. I believe the courtesy usually extended by the Senate to the Legislatures of the States requires that such petition should be read, but I suppose the purpose would be as entirely accomplished by printing it in the RECORD as if it had been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the usual custom. The petition will be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, if the Senator prefers.

Mr. HOAR. Let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. HOAR. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. SHERMAN], who has just come into the Chamber, that the subject of limiting the immigration of paupers, etc., is now before that committee. Therefore, with the leave of the Chair, I will have the reference of the petition changed.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in general court assembled present this memorial:

The act of Congress regulating immigration, passed 1882 and amended 1884, forbids the landing of convicts, lunatics, idiots, or any other person liable to become a public charge, and provides for the return of all convicts arriving at any port of the United States, except those convicted of political offenses, to the countries from which they came.

From testimony submitted to a committee of this Legislature it is evident that, notwithstanding these enactments, convicts are released from penal institutions in Great Britain and Germany, before the expiration of their terms of sentence, upon the condition of their accepting a passage ticket to this country or to Canada; that persons who have received relief from public charity, or who are likely to ask for such relief, are also sent to this country; that a few, through the vigilance of the immigration officers, are detected and returned; but that by falsehood, subterfuge, assistance of interested parties, and by being in possession of prepaid tickets to some interior town or city, large numbers succeed in evading the law, especially when the immigrant is accompanied by a relative or volunteer friend who has once been in the United States, and who is ready to vouch for the good character and the ability of the immigrant to earn a livelihood.

It is plain that any examination, conducted with the utmost vigilance on the part of the immigration officer, of one thousand or more passengers at the gangway of a steam ship, at the best can only be superficial, and that convicts, who by their vocation of crime have habituated themselves to evade the law and deceive detectives, in many instances are able to effect a landing.

It is an indisputable and well-established fact that convicts are not only released from prison, but that they are transported to this country either at the expense of foreign governments or by associations acting in concert with the officials, who, in disregard of international comity, violate the laws of the United States, thus imposing their burdens upon the people of this country—a procedure which should awaken the just indignation of every American citizen, and which calls for remedial legislation.

The reports of the public institutions of this Commonwealth show a marked disproportion between the native and foreign born inmates—the foreign born receiving public charity being 60 per cent., a very large proportion of whom have arrived in this country at a comparatively recent date. In other States, especially those that have received large accessions from Great Britain, the increase of foreign born in the charitable institutions is equally disproportionate to the native born.

In one of the reputable literary reviews for the month of March, 1888, it is stated that nearly every pauper from Great Britain was assisted to this country either by governmental aid or by so-called philanthropic associations.

The transportation of the improvident and thriftless classes to other countries is openly advocated as a measure of philanthropy in an article published in a reputable literary review in London, January, 1888:

"There is no wider field of work for the philanthropist than this: Let each benevolent person take up one thriftless family as a special charge, and assist emigration. Care must be taken to provide a friend on the other side, for the thriftless do not lose their thriftlessness on the voyage, and a good start in the new home is invaluable."

In 1882 and again in 1883, by acts of Parliament, $1,000,000 was appropriated to assist emigration from Great Britain; coincident with that legislation, and with assistance by philanthropic effort in that country, is a marked increase in the disproportion between those of native and foreign birth in the prisons, almshouses, and asylums for the insane throughout the United States.

Of paupers in the almshouses of the United States in 1880 there was 1 in 986 of the native-born inhabitants to 1 in 291 of the foreign-born. Of the criminals in prisons and workhouses, there was 1 in 938 of the native-born inhabitants of the country to 1 in 518 of foreign birth. Of the inmates of insane asylums there was 1 in 662 of the native-born population to 1 in 254 of the foreign-born.

From an examination of the reports of the public institutions in several of the States the evidence seems to be conclusive that the disproportion between the native and foreign born inmates of those institutions is much greater than that reported by the census of 1880.

To the end, therefore, that the people of this Republic may be protected from the evils and burdens resulting from the importation of convicts, paupers, idiots, insane, and the thriftless of other countries, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with this memorial, asks for such amendment of existing laws as shall effectually exclude these classes of immigrants.

HENRY B. PEIRCE,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, IN THE YEAR 1888.

Resolution relative to the immigration and importation into the United States of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and other persons liable to become a public charge.

Whereas his excellency the governor, in a message to the senate and house of representatives, for good and sufficient reasons has requested that Congress be memorialized for a modification of existing laws, which will more effectually prevent the immigration and importation into the United States of convicts, lunatics, idiots, and other persons liable to become a public charge:

Resolved, That the accompanying memorial, addressed to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, be signed by the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives, and that the secretary of the Commonwealth is hereby instructed to transmit copies to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress, to the Senators and Members of Congress from this Commonwealth, and to the governors of the several States of the Republic.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there resolutions concurrent or other? If there is no further morning business——

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to call up Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, it is the duty of the Chair, under the order of the Senate, to submit the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the same.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 938.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill by title for information.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the regular order.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given yesterday that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the land-forfeiture bill was passed should be taken up at the conclusion of morning business this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to violate what in the opinion of any Senator is in the nature of a promise, or agreement made in my absence, but I have a matter in charge in the nature of morning business which I think it very important to determine now, and which I should like to take the judgment of the Senate upon at once. It is the resolution reported by me adversely yesterday in regard to the mode of considering the fisheries treaty. It ought to be determined to-day; and I was about to move, if it is not a violation of the understanding, that we proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who has charge of the land-forfeiture bill, has returned. I only wish to say, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that if anything is to be done with the other matter this morning it seems to me that the informal laying aside of the land bill until the resolution to which the Senator from Ohio refers is disposed of would be better.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. I presume there is nothing to do except to vote on the motion to reconsider. I understand that the land bill has the right of way, and that the amendment of the Senator from Florida has been proposed and spoken to in such a way that all he would desire to have the Senate do is to vote on the question of reconsideration, he having given notice of the purpose of his motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Florida, to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1430 was passed.

Mr. PALMER. I hope that the vote may be reconsidered. There was a very grave error committed yesterday in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. The phraseology n my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is different from the phraseology in the amendment itself of the Senator from Wisconsin, and it does not accomplish the object that the Senator from Mississippi intended to accomplish by his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Mississippi offered a certain amendment to my amendment, which I accepted. I stated that I did not design to prevent the accomplishment of the object which the Senator from Mississippi had in view. I understand that in the haste of drawing that amendment the Senator from Mississippi did not quite accomplish what he intended. Certainly I have no desire to take any snap judgment or to get any advantage by a misunderstanding of the Senator who drew the amendment which I accepted, and therefore I shall feel bound in honor to agree to the reconsideration; but I suppose, of course, the Senators on the other side would feel equally bound, if a reconsideration was made, not to reopen the whole controversy, but simply to have the modification made in accordance with the desire of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. PALMER. I made no imputation of bad faith on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no doubt that the error yesterday was as unconscious to him as to any one. I do not wish to make any agreement as to any further amendment. As far as I am concerned I may want to make one that will be merely explanatory; that is all. I shall make no further contest.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is manifest this matter will be debated, I submit a motion——

Mr. PLUMB. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1430 was passed.

Mr. CALL. That motion was made yesterday and was voted on, I will say to the Senator from Kansas, and the Senate refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. It is plainly evident that unless that is done we shall reopen the flood-gates of talk on the bill and never get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. PALMER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CALL. I submit that the motion is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. CALL. It was the last motion we voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Other business has intervened.

Mr. CALL. No business has intervened, I think, on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds the motion to be in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. I am as weary——

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALLISON answered to his name.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation of the point suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call having commenced and a response having been made, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make an explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPOONER. I am as reluctant as any Senator on this floor to open again the discussion of any of these amendments, or of any proposition connected with the bill. I understand from the Senator from Michigan that if the bill is corrected in this one single respect he has no desire to offer further amendments under the circumstances.

I desire to explain to the Senate in a word why I think the vote should be reconsidered and the change made in the bill. Yesterday afternoon, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] seemed to be under the impression that the rights of homestead and pre-emption claimants were not adequately protected by the bill, and he offered an amendment which was intended to protect them, but which I think for want of a further amendment fails of accomplishing his purpose. The amendment which I offered simply provided for the confirmation of cash entries, and the proviso protecting the rights of homestead claimants was limited to cash entries. Afterwards upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the Senate embodied in the amendment certain "State selections" so that the amendment should be operative to confirm cash entries and State selections, but the Senator from Mississippi omitted to do what I understood he had done, to insert in the proviso, saving the rights of homesteaders, the words "State selections;" so that as it stands now, as I read it, it protects only the rights of bona fide homesteaders and pre-emption claimants against the cash entrymen, but does not protect such right as against these "State selections" of the canal company. I think, in order to carry out the manifest purpose of the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to say that my only object was to protect the homesteaders and pre-emptors, and if the amendment I offered fails to effect that object I shall be very glad to have the Senator perfect it.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggested to the Senator at the time that he add in the proviso the words "State selections," and he wrote it down in his copy of the amendment, and I supposed he had offered it; but I find it is not in the bill, so that the amendment which I shall offer, if the vote is reconsidered, will be simply to insert in the proviso the words "or any tract in any such State selection," and the proviso would then read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands on any tract in any such State selection upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims, etc.

Mr. GEORGE. If the bill is reconsidered, I hope the Senator will have that amendment made.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. I was only giving the reason why, in my opinion, the vote should be reconsidered.

Mr. PLUMB. If there is unanimous consent to that change, it can be made, I take it, at this time, the pending question to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I ask unanimous consent, if it be in order, that the words be inserted in the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Anything can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEORGE. I want the bill reconsidered for the benefit of my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL], and I object to unanimous consent on that ground, and that alone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then recurs on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent from the city. If he were present, I should vote "nay" upon this motion.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], and therefore I will refrain from voting.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is absent from the Chamber, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I had just risen to announce that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is unavoidably detained from the Senate to-day and is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if present.

Mr. SABIN. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] generally, but on this question I feel at liberty to vote, under the circumstances, and I desire to be recorded as voting "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Davis,	Hoar,	Sawyer,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Sherman,

So the Senate refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the Chair supposes that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading will also be reconsidered.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of the proviso to the section inserted as section 9, after the word "lands," it is moved to insert "or any tract in any such State selection;" so as to read:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to confirm any sales or entries of lands or any tract in any such State selection upon which there were bona fide pre-emption or homestead claims on the 1st day of May, 1888, arising or asserted under color of the laws of the United States; and all such pre-emption and homestead claims are hereby confirmed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I was about to propose another amendment, but I feel in honor bound not to do so. However, I will take this occasion to make an explanation. I received a paper from home this morning in which I find this statement:

The reason why the bill is assumed—

Speaking of the land-grant forfeiture bill—to be a defeat of the homesteaders is that they hold that in all cases where they take claims up on top of cash entrymen's claims they are beaten.

I was about to offer an amendment to cure any ambiguity of that kind, but I feel in honor that I have no right to do it, as some friends on this side voted to reconsider who otherwise would not have done so. I merely wish to get that statement on the record. I was about to propose this amendment:

And the existence of a prior private entry shall not be construed as evidence of bad faith on the part of a homestead or pre-emption claimant.

I take the advice of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] on my left, who says that it is not material. I should like to have that in, but I can not offer it. I wish to keep myself right on the record as the friend of the homesteaders and as one who has attempted to protect their rights in this matter, but I have the word of the Senator from Wisconsin that this would be merely explanatory and is not material.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not wish to be put upon the record as giving any advice which is to influence the Senator. I stated to the Senator from Michigan that, in my opinion, the bill clearly recognized the fact that there might be a bona fide homestead claim or pre-emption claim upon these cash entries. The bill clearly provides that, because it declares that there shall be no confirmation as to such entries against bona fide claims under the homestead and pre-emption laws.

Mr. CALL. I move to add to section 8 the following proviso:

Provided, That the titles to the lands described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856, which lie adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited in the granting act, and which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida, and are held by purchase from said companies made before the year 1866, are hereby confirmed to such purchasers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment which the Senator from Florida has proposed is exceedingly broad in its character. I do not care to comment on it to the extent of saying that it seems to me he is reversing in this amendment the position he has assumed for the last two or three years on the subject of land grants in Florida, but so far as it is a useful provision at all it is amply covered by the act of 1887 known as the land-grant adjustment act.

It will be noted that this amendment confirms lands which have been sold by the railroad companies which may not have been granted to them by the United States Government at all. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] shakes his head. That simply indicates that he has not carefully read the amendment. The only muniment of title which the railroad companies are required to have is a conveyance from the State of Florida, and the State of Florida may have conveyed lands to those companies which the United States never had conveyed to the State.

The amendment does not contain the provision which I think it ought to contain, found in the law of 1887, that these conveyances should have been made to citizens of the United States. It does not contain a reservation in favor of the rights of settlers who may have been upon the lands at the date of the grant. It is as complete a give-away (if I may use that term without reproach) to the railroad companies and to the railroad idea as could possibly be framed.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. CALL. I will consent to the insertion of both those terms in the amendment if the Senator from Kansas thinks it proper to so qualify it.

Mr. PLUMB. The act of 1887, which was a carefully digested act, one to which the Senator from Florida, I believe, has since objected because it was too broad, goes, I think, as far as legislation ought to go in confirming titles to lands which were not definitely granted and earned. The amendment only applies to lands which have been sold by the railroad companies. The Senator from Florida has lifted up his voice for years against the acts of railroad companies in selling lands to which they were not entitled. He now proposes that after they have sold any of those lands the title to the purchaser shall be confirmed. Of course I can not say that in these cases injustice would result, but I say that the provision is too broad; it does not contain proper safeguards; it is going further than any legislation has ever before proposed, and it is in the very teeth, I think, of what the Senator himself has heretofore said.

The act of 1887 provides, in section 4:

That as to all lands, except those mentioned in the foregoing section—

That is to say, the section foregoing, containing the reservation in favor of settlers—which have been so erroneously certified or patented as aforesaid, and which have been sold by the grantee company to citizens of the United States, or to persons who have declared their intention to become such citizens, the person or persons so purchasing in good faith, his heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to the land so purchased, upon making proof of the fact of such purchase at the proper land office, etc.

In this case there is no evidence of bona fide sale. A collusive sale by a railroad company is confirmed just as perfectly as a valid sale is. There is not the reservation which is contained in the act of 1887 in favor of persons who settled upon the lands prior to the time of the taking effect of the grant.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the point in this amendment? It is only as to Florida. The whole amendment applies to lands that have been earned by the railroad companies in Florida by the building of the roads within the time limited by the act of Congress. If the Senator will examine it he will see that no other lands are referred to than lands which lie adjacent to the completed parts of the railroad, which parts were completed within the time limited by the act of Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand the Senator's statement perfectly, that that is no portion of what is the real point in this amendment—

Provided, That the titles to the lands described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856, which lie adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida—

Not the act of the United States—entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited in the granting act—

Mr. GEORGE. That is the act of Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes—

and which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida—

That is what it is—

and are held by purchase from said companies made before the year 1866, are hereby confirmed to such purchasers.

That refers to the act of the Legislature to lands granted by the State of Florida, not lands granted by the United States, without any reference to the question as to whether the act of the State of Florida was in accordance with the act of Congress at all, and with no requirement about bona fides and with no protection for actual settlers.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this seemed to me prior to the remarks made by the Senator from Kansas a proposition so plain as to the meaning of it that I did not see how any dispute or doubt could arise about it, and really an argument to show the plain meaning of this amendment is very much like an argument that two and two make four. But still, as the Senator from Kansas understands it differently, I will read and comment a little upon the provisions of the amendment:

That the titles to the lands described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856—which lie adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited in the granting act.

That is an act of Congress, and it is title only to the lands mentioned in the act of Congress that is affected. Now what else?

The Senator objects that the amendment refers to railroads built under the act of Florida; and yet, Mr. President, the railroad could not have been built except under the act of Florida. The grant was to the State of Florida for the purpose of building certain railroads. The title was to go to the State of Florida and was to be disposed of by the State of Florida. The charters were to be granted by the State of Florida. Congress in making the grant left it to the State of Florida to provide means and agencies by which the railroads must be built and in accordance with which the lands were to go.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask a question right there. If this amendment is exactly as the Senator says, or if it should be made so, wherein does it do anything that is not already done by existing law? If the roads were built within the time named in the granting act, and this amendment only grants title to lands adjacent to completed portions of road built within the time, what is the necessity for it?

Mr. GEORGE. That is a very proper question for the Senator to ask me, and it is a question which I asked the Senator from Florida before I gave my consent to support his amendment. The answer to that was given by the Senator from Florida. The whole line of the road was not built within the time prescribed by the act of Congress, and I understand the whole line of the road probably has not been built yet, but the portion of the road to which these lands apply was built within the time, and the Senator from Florida says that it is doubtful and disputed by lawyers and courts in the State of Florida whether, there having been a failure to complete the whole road within the time, there does not remain a forfeiture of that part which was completed.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether that is the law or not, but the Senator from Florida says that matter is disputed in the State of Florida, disputed by lawyers, and different opinions are held about it by the courts.

Mr. TELLER. What courts?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator state a single court of the United States that ever held that doctrine?

Mr. GEORGE. It is a matter of doubt.

Mr. TELLER. No, it is not a matter of doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Florida is better authority on that subject than the Senator from Colorado as to whether in fact a doubt does exist. Now, the Senator from Colorado, who is a fine lawyer, may be able to interpret this act and say there is no doubt about it, but there are people in Florida and probably some in Colorado who are not lawyers, who feel that their title to their land is in dispute, and they feel and their Senator for them asks that that doubt be removed.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that it is one of the most beneficent objects of legislation to remove a doubt from title. There is nothing which so harasses and so obstructs the progress and improvement of a community as the mere fact that doubts exist as to titles to real estate; and the whole effect of the amendment of the Senator from Florida is to remove a doubt. The Senator from Colorado says there is no doubt. Certainly there is none in his mind; but all the people in Florida who have to deal with these titles, who have to consider the question whether they be the true owners of these lands, are not as well posted on the law as the Senator from Colorado. Suppose the Senator from Colorado is right, that there is no doubt about it, then the amendment certainly is innocuous and does no harm. But suppose the Senator from Florida is right and that doubt does exist in the minds of large numbers of people of his State as to the validity of these titles, then the failure to make the amendment operates very disastrously.

So, Mr. President, I do hope——

Mr. PLUMB. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the language of this amendment. I am not disputing now the general purpose the Senator has in view, but he will notice that this amendment does not accomplish his purpose unless it accomplishes a great deal more. The amendment speaks of two granting acts. Which one does it refer to when it says "within the time limited in the granting act?"

Mr. GEORGE. It only speaks of one granting act of Congress, and that is the only one.

Mr. PLUMB. But then it speaks of a granting act without referring to the act of Congress. It speaks of two grants, a grant by act of Congress and a grant by the State of Florida, and leaves it open to inference as to which one of them is to be complied with.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to yield to me for a moment for a suggestion, and that is that this difference of opinion may be settled by amending the amendment by inserting after the word "limited," where it occurs, the words "by Congress," so as to read, "within the time limited by Congress in the granting act."

Mr. GEORGE. That will do.

Mr. CALL. I am willing to accept that.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to appeal to the Senator from Colorado not to decline to pass an act which will remove the doubt.

Mr. PLUMB. The modification now suggested covers one of the points.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 of the amendment of Mr. CALL, after the word "limited," it is proposed to insert "by Congress."

Mr. PLUMB. The word "Florida" there ought to be followed by the words "in accordance with the act of Congress." We are confirming here an act of the Legislature of Florida about which we know nothing.

Mr. CALL. I accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be reported.

Mr. PLUMB. After the word "Florida" insert "in accordance with said act of Congress."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Florida," in line 8, it is proposed to insert:

In accordance with said act of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to offer his amendment in the form in which it has been read with the suggestions of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] incorporated.

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite as anxious as anybody to remove any real doubt which may exist as to the validity of titles, and I would do it for Florida; but when the Senator says on this floor that any reputable court of the United States has held that it was necessary that the road should be completed within the time fixed by law in order to make a good title to lands adjacent to that portion of the road which was completed within the time, I challenge him to produce any such authority.

Further than that, I challenge him to produce the authority of any reputable members of the profession. I do not believe he can do that. I do not believe the Senator himself would stand here and say that in his mind there is any doubt about it. It is one of the things which are regarded as settled. But if it is not settled, if we are to remove a doubt in Florida, why not remove the same doubt in Oregon, in California, and in other sections where the roads were not completed within the time prescribed? All along the line of the Northern Pacific this question could arise. There were thousands and thousands of purchasers from the railroad companies, and if we are to remove any doubts then we should remove them all.

I do not think this is a very dangerous amendment, but it looks to me like asserting that there was doubt upon a question when there is not any, and if it is necessary to pass a law of this kind for Florida, we shall then have to say that it is necessary to have it for Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Minnesota, and other sections of the country that do not have any such law, and therefore we are casting doubts on all that class of titles. If there is any necessity for this, the necessity is general. There is no necessity for this amendment whatever. If there was a respectable doubt, a respectable question that was impairing the value of these lands, I should be willing to say this should be the law, and if this was a general law applying to all such lands everywhere, I certainly should not object. While I should say there was no necessity for it, and that it was doing more than we are required to do, yet if it gave security and certainty it would be all right.

I do not see any necessity for it. It seems to me when we pass this bill with this amendment other sections of the country will say that they need something of the kind, and if they do not get it their titles will be in doubt.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not examined this statute, and I have not said there was any doubt about it.

Mr. TELLER. I know the Senator did not say it.

Mr. GEORGE. I have said that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who has examined the matter, and who represents the people affected by it, has stated that doubt exists in his State. Now I would say to the Senator from Colorado if he would come here stating so as to his State, that doubt existed in his State about the titles, and that the result of that doubt was that improvement and settlement were impeded and that there was uneasiness among the people of Colorado, notwithstanding I might think there was no real ground for a doubt, I would feel bound to accept the statement of the Senator from Colorado and would vote for an act to remove the doubt.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to put a question to the Senator from Mississippi. If there be no considerable doubt now, and you pass an act making this enactment with reference to Florida, does not that at once create a doubt on the title through the whole of the rest of the country?

Mr. TELLER. Similarly situated?

Mr. HOAR. Similarly situated, of course.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; that does not result from it. This only applies to the state of affairs there.

Mr. HOAR. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Mr. GEORGE. It removes doubts as to lands in the State of Florida, and does not apply to any other State.

Mr. HOAR. We declare that in the future the law shall be so and so as to Florida. It therefore is an expression of the intent of Congress that it shall not be so elsewhere.

Mr. CALL. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to it. I think this is a matter so perfectly plain that if Senators will give their attention to it for a moment they will perceive that the amendment is not only harmless, but that it is clearly demanded. Let us see. The State of Florida never made any disposition of these lands to anybody during the life of the grant. Bear in mind that proposition. The granting act required that they should be disposed of by the Legislature. That is one trouble.

Mr. TELLER. Like all grants made to States. Was there anything peculiar about it?

Mr. CALL. It required legislative disposal. Whether it is like or unlike, the Senator will acknowledge, is not a very pertinent consideration. It required a legislative disposal both to give any person an interest in the land granted and for lines of road designated in the act of Congress. In addition to this the granting act of Congress required a building of the road, and in addition to this a building of the whole line, and in addition to this a completion within a limited time.

Mr. PLUMB. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. Has the Legislature of Florida ever disposed of this land?

Mr. CALL. I was just about to answer that, to state how far and in what way it was done.

Mr. BLAIR. Is the legislation the Senator asks for in order to make up some defect of title arising out of the action or non-action of the State of Florida, or is it necessary in order to preclude some right which is supposed to be in the United States?

Mr. CALL. Not at all. It is not proposed to preclude anybody's rights.

Mr. BLAIR. But I want to know——

Mr. CALL. I can answer much better if you will let me state the facts.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. CALL. Just listen, and I think everybody will understand very plainly.

The State of Florida, in 1855, previous to the passage of the granting act of Congress, enacted a law entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State." In one section of that act it was provided that if Congress should thereafter grant to the State of Florida any lands to aid in the construction of the lines of railroad described in that internal-improvement act, the companies who should build in conformity with that act should have the benefit of that land.

In 1856 Congress did grant the lands contained in the grant to which this amendment refers to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of lines of road. This act of course was not operative to convey any right which the State did not have, and it was clearly, in the opinion of many lawyers, and I think myself that it is very clear, that it was only a declaration of public policy by the State to be effectuated by subsequent legislation. That act provided that as the railroad company should build 10 miles the title to the land granted to them in that act should vest in the railroad company.

The governor of the State interpreted the act of Congress to mean that the whole line should be completed before any part of the grant of May 17, 1856, vested in the companies. There were two railroad companies that gave notice under that act of their intention to build the line of road of which I am now speaking from Jacksonville to the Escambia River. Here were two parties claiming under an act of the State of Florida to construct the line of road designated in the granting act of Congress with a right to build such parts of the line as they saw fit, and with an act making the grant dependent upon the completion of the whole line, and they did build the lines of road designated in the act of Congress and by the State Legislature in part, but did not complete the line of road within the time provided in the granting act.

After the granting act had expired through its limitation in 1874, the State of Florida confirmed, so far as it had any right or power to do so, the right of the railroad companies that had constructed the parts of the line of road within the time provided in the act. You will perceive that there is no direct legal title though there has been a substantial compliance with the act.

I do not know of a single person on this land who is denying the title of these people to the land sold and purchased before the year 1866, but I do know that doubts are entertained, and I think very reasonable and proper doubts exist whether an ejectment suit can be maintained upon the title of these parties without some legislation such as this amendment will provide.

Here comes the defect in the legislation of the State of Florida, which was enacted in 1874, after the time for constructing the line of road in the granting act of Congress had expired. There is the case. Here are these people who have bought and settled upon these lands before 1860, under color of title, who have made improvements. I am willing to insert in the amendment "the citizens of the United States," and saving the rights of all settlers who were upon that ground at the time of the granting act and up to the time of purchase, before 1866. I have no objection to both those amendments, my object being to confirm by positive enactment rights which have been under a substantial performance of the conditions claimed imposed by the granting act of Congress. Far more than this has been insisted upon frequently by the Senator from Kansas and other Senators here, and it is only a small part of what they have continually insisted upon was right that I am asking now to settle the title to these lands in the State of Florida, which were substantially earned by building parts of the line within the time required by the act of Congress.

The Senator will now understand that the defects in the title which require an act of confirmation by Congress are a failure of the Legislature to dispose of the grant; a failure to locate any line of road or to authorize any company to make a definite location; a failure, therefore, of any legal right to the grant of 1856 to vest in any company, and, on the other hand, a substantial compliance by the actual building of parts of the line within the time limited, a sale and purchase and a possession of many years in good faith, and a confirmation by the State Legislature in 1874 of the right and title of these persons by the investiture in them of any right which the State possessed at that time.

All this is irregular and confers no title at law, and technically and strictly is not in compliance with the act of Congress; but it is very clear it was a substantial compliance, and the title of these persons to this extent should be confirmed.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the chairman of the committee who has the bill in charge proposes to move some amendments to this proposition. They may obviate the objection I have and I will not say anything until the amendments are made. I wish, however, to ask the Senator from Florida whether the State has got any certification of this land. I understand a large portion of this land has been certified to the State already, and therefore it is a matter of which the State has the absolute control. Is not that the fact?

Mr. CALL. I think there is grave doubt about that.

Mr. TELLER. Has any large amount of land been certified to the State?

Mr. CALL. No.

Mr. TELLER. Some of it?

Mr. CALL. I will state exactly how it is.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me move the amendments I desire to make. I move to insert before the word "purchase" the words "bona fide."

Mr. CALL. That is right. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated at the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "held by" and before the word "purchase" it is proposed to insert "bona fide;" so as to read:

And which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida and are held by bona fide purchase from said companies made before the year 1866, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to accept this amendment to his amendment.

Mr. CALL. I do.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests the insertion of the words "in good faith" in place of "bona fide." I am willing to accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires to have it expressed in English rather than Latin.

Mr. DAWES. We do not belong to the dead languages. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language proposed to be inserted will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "held by" and before the word "purchase" it is proposed to insert the words "in good faith;" so as to read:

And held by in good faith.

Mr. PLUMB. That should be "purchase in good faith."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "purchase" it is proposed to insert "in good faith;" so as to read:

And are held by purchase in good faith from said companies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to accept the amendment.

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move to add a proviso at the close of the amendment—

Provided, That a mortgage or pledge of said lands by any of said companies shall not be considered as a sale for the purposes of this act.

Mr. CALL. I accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment—

Provided, That a mortgage or pledge of said lands by any of said companies shall not be considered as a sale for the purposes of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to modify his amendment by accepting this suggestion.

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOLPH. I am opposed to this amendment, and I desire briefly to state my reasons for my opposition.

During the last Congress several bills were passed by the Senate for the forfeiture of land grants. Among others a bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands to forfeit a certain portion of the unearned land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. As reported by the committee, it excepted from the operation of the bill the unearned portion of the grant for the Cascade branch, about seventy-five and a half miles through the Cascade Mountains.

There was strenuous opposition to this on the other side of the Chamber, if my recollection serves me, and I think I can state with positiveness that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] were two of the most prominent Senators who opposed not only the exception of unearned lands in the Cascade branch, but stood in their places and asserted that the bill would be a confirmation of the lands which had been earned; and the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] offered an amendment that left the power with Congress to forfeit all the remainder of the grant—that which had been earned by the construction of the road within the time limited in the grant as well as that which had not been earned by the construction of the road after the time limited in the grant. The Senator from Mississippi stood in his place and argued the proposition, I was going to say hour after hour, that because there was a condition that the whole road should be completed within a given time that condition went to every portion of the grant, and left the whole grant from Lake Superior to Puget Sound open to forfeiture by the General Government.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky was accepted by me, and adopted without a division of the Senate. In deference to that action of the Senate the Committee on Public Lands in reporting this bill reported the following section:

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed to waive or release in any way any right of the United States to have any other lands granted by them, as recited in the first section, forfeited for any failure, past or future, to comply with the conditions of the grant, or as forfeiting any lands that have been heretofore earned by the construction of any portion of a railroad under any act of Congress making a grant of public lands.

This section leaves it open for Congress hereafter to pass on the question of whether there has been any breach of the condition on which a grant of land has been made to aid in the construction of any road. Now, what does the Senator from Florida do, and what does the Senator from Mississippi advocate—the Senators who stood up here hour after hour and discussed these propositions, and almost made the discussion personal to a man who dared stand up and say that there ought to be given time for the further construction of any of this road, or that there was not power in Congress to forfeit the entire grant? What I say in regard to the personal part of the discussion will be borne out by the record of that debate.

Now the Senator from Florida turns around and so does the Senator from Mississippi, and each advocates an amendment which confirms the title of all purchasers to lands in Florida, under all the grants ever made to Florida for railroads. As far as I am concerned, if this were general and this amendment proposed a confirmation of all lands earned by the completion of road, I should be glad to have it.

Mr. CALL rose.

Mr. DOLPH. No; I will not yield, because I want my say now. The Senator did not yield to me.

Mr. CALL. I did.

Mr. DOLPH. I propose to finish my part of the discussion.

I should be glad to support such an amendment as would close the books, would confirm title to every person claiming lands adjacent to any completed road, whether the completion was within the time limited in the grant or not. But we can not get it; the Senate will not consent to it; but the Senator from Florida asks that we shall exempt Florida from the operation of this general bill, and that we shall leave the grants in every other State and Territory of the Union open for forfeiture for any breach, past or future, which Congress may determine, if Congress has the power to do that, but as to lands in his State the books shall be closed and the power of forfeiture shall be cut off. That is one thing that I object to.

I do not believe there is any question about the title to these lands in the State of Florida. I do not believe there is any question about the title to any lands which have been earned by the construction of a road, whether within the time limited by the grant or not. I do not believe that it is within the power of Congress to make such a forfeiture, and I do not wish to be a party to an amendment which would throw doubt upon this question and leave the courts to understand that the Senate of the United States had a doubt upon the question and found it necessary to confirm lands which were adjacent to completed road in the State of Florida, and therefore throw a doubt on the title of everybody claiming under railroad corporations in every other State and Territory of the Union.

Further, I am against the amendment because before this bill becomes a law it must be passed through the House of Representatives; it must pass another branch of Congress. We already have a provision in it that certain railroads shall be excepted until the 1st of January next from the operation of the act in order that the lands may be earned. That is a foolish provision; but the object of the amendment is to give these the right to earn these lands and obtain the title to the lands by the construction of the road; and now we propose to lumber it up with a provision to confirm title to earned land in the State of Florida, to load the bill down with that provision, and send it to the other House in that shape. Equality is equity, and I do not see any reason for the provision, for, as was so well stated by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, after the Senator from Florida has taken the position he has here year after year and Congress after Congress, I do not see why we should now except all lands in his State and leave the lands in the other States unconfirmed.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I really do not understand what is the object of the Senator from Oregon in his opposition to this amendment. Certainly he has given no reason for it. Is it that he wants to punish me and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] for some ideas that he supposes we had in regard to the Northern Pacific grant? That certainly is the effect of the proposition made by the Senator. There is no reason whatever why the people in Florida should be punished because we happen to entertain right or wrong opinions. But it is very singular that the Senator from Oregon should make this statement here when he knows that in the other House of Congress other bills have been reported in regard to the Northern Pacific Railroad, and other considerations had been suggested in respect to that grant, where it was supposed vast profits had accrued to some persons by not complying with the terms of the act, even when extension after extension had been granted, and he knows that these considerations which entered into that question, so far as the Northern Pacific Railroad Company's grant was concerned, were entirely different from those which pertain to a substantial compliance with the terms of the granting act by actually building a part of the line within the time limited by the grantingact. Surely the Senator knows these facts and understands that to be an entirely different case, and that his remarks have nothing to sustain them.

In this case there was a substantial compliance in every respect with the act of Congress and only technical defects in the action of the State of Florida, so far as relates to the parts of the line actually built before 1866. For that reason, manifestly a good reason, we ask that the people who have settled upon these lands under color of titie, who have improved them, and from whom they have been transmitted to divers other persons for many years, shall have the doubts, whether they are well founded or ill founded, removed by this confirmatory act. The Senator from Oregon for days has been urging the confirmation of the title of the men claiming under the Portage Lake Canal Company, which has been assailed for fraud, and the assertion has been made here and evidence read that the very officers of the company who perpetrated the fraud are now the owners of the land, and are seeking by the amendment which the Senator has so persistently urged to obtain the benefit of their own wrong. For days he has been persistently urging this for a great, wealthy corporation, while I am here asking in behalf of the poor people, whose property is worth little or nothing, that doubts which arise out of technical difficulties, where there was a substantial compliance with the terms of the granting act, and where their title rests upon that substantial compliance, shall be confirmed, and I did it because the Senate confirmed the title of the holders under the Portage Lake Canal Company, and I then introduced the amendment in behalf of these people.

That is all I care to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been several times modified it will be read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 8:

Provided, That the titles to the lands described in the act entitled "An act granting lands to the States of Alabama and Florida to aid in the construction of certain lines of railway in said States," approved the 17th of May, 1856, which lie adjacent to the part of the lines of railroad built under and in pursuance of the act of the State of Florida, entitled "An act to encourage a liberal system of internal improvements in the State of Florida," approved January 5, 1855, within the time limited by Congress in the granting act, and which were granted to any of the said companies by the Legislature of the State of Florida in accordance with said act of Congress, and are held by purchase in good faith from said companies made before the year 1866, are hereby confirmed to such purchasers: Provided, That a mortgage or pledge of said lands by any of said companies shall not be considered as a sale for the purposes of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bill may be printed as passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate while considering the river and harbor bill.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to give notice that immediately after the disposition of the pleuro-pneumonia bill I shall call up the bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to call up for consideration at this time Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] asked me to state that he received this morning a telegram from Senator MORRILL, of Vermont, asking him to see the Senator and request him to postpone calling up this bill until next week, when he will be here. He wants to be present when it is considered. That was stated to me this morning by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not feel like yielding at this time. This bill has been on the Calendar for six weeks, and the feature which the Senator from Vermont objects to is the bridge across Sixth street. This bill does not disturb anything north of Maryland avenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The merits of the bill are not subject to discussion while a motion to take up is under consideration.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not feel like yielding to the request. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator from Illinois could have heard the request made by the Senator from West Virginia. The Senator from Vermont is absent from the city and is ill. He asks to have the bill postponed until next week, when he will be here.

Mr. FARWELL. Very well; if that is the desire I will defer calling up the bill until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to withdraw his motion.

Mr. FARWELL. Yes, sir.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHESTER, PA.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senate to consider Order of Business 1234, being Senate bill 129.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to consider the bill named by him, the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 129) for the erection of a public building at Chester, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMERON. I move an amendment as a substitute, which is a House bill on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend in the manner which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and for other Government uses at Chester, Pa. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $75,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum of $75,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Pennsylvania shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that this is a different bill from the Senate bill?

Mr. CAMERON. That is the bill as reported from the House committee. It is different somewhat from the Senate bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the difference between them?

Mr. CAMERON. Mainly in regard to the space, I think.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any difference in the appropriation?

Mr. CAMERON. No.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How large is the town of Chester?

Mr. CAMERON. It has about 30,000 people.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to Order of Business 686, being the joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis. This resolution only covers the preparation of a medal to be presented to Mr. Francis. I believe there is no objection felt in any quarter to its passage. The joint resolution which was passed at the last session covered not only this, but the thanks of Congress. It failed to receive the attention of the President during the last few days of the session.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

In view of the life-long services to humanity and to his country of the now venerable Joseph Francis, in the construction and perfection of life-saving appliances by which many thousands of lives have been saved, the Director of the Mint is required by the resolution to strike a gold medal, with a suitable device and inscription, prepared under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, to be presented by the President of the United States to Mr. Francis in recognition of his eminent services.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply want to enter my protest against the passage of any such measure. There is neither merit nor justice nor right in it.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. FILLMORE.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate now to take up a bill which is Order of Business 947.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is this by unanimous consent, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Colorado moves, as he has a right under the rules to do, to take up a bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg the Senator to allow me to address the Chair a moment without offering an objection, except to say that to-morrow morning I shall begin to object to every proposition to take up the morning hour with any business except morning-hour business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that on the 14th of December, 1864, John S. Fillmore, then of Denver, Colo., since deceased, conveyed to the United States of America lots numbered 28 and 29, in block numbered 46, in Denver city (east division), per survey of E. D. Boyd, in the then Territory of Colorado, for the purpose and upon the condition that the same should be occupied as a post-office site, which condition has never been in any part performed. The bill proposes to relinquish all the interests which the United States acquired by, through, or under the deed named to the persons who, by the laws of Colorado, would have been entitled thereto at the date of the death of Fillmore had the deed never been made, and to their heirs and assigns forever.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. E. PILCHER.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up Order of Business 1281, House bill 339. Let the bill be read in full for information. The bill passed the Senate at the last session. It is the bill (H. R. 339) for the relief of J. E. Pilcher.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the Texas indemnity fund, to pay to J. E. Pilcher $905, being the amount of one bond of $100 and $805 in paper money of the Republic of Texas, if he shall find that these claims are within the class of claims heretofore paid by the United States out of the fund named.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report about that, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the report has not come in from the Printer.

Mr. HOAR. It is very brief and I can state its substance in two minutes. This bill passed the Senate on a full statement at the last session, but did not get through the other House.

This man is a citizen of Kentucky, well known to the Senators from that State and to Members of the House, who have certified to his high character. He is the son of a very distinguished citizen of that State. He found among his father's papers a Texas bond and this amount of Texas money, amounting to less than a thousand dollars in all. The Texas indemnity fund is not exhausted, but all the claims against it have long since been paid except this; there is no other claim. This bill only provides for this being paid out of the Texas indemnity fund. The possession of the property is abundantly proved; indeed, it is proved to the satisfaction of the Treasury.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to suggest that I was out of the Chamber when he commenced.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate is considering the Pilcher case, which the Senator from Texas will recollect passed the Senate at the last session. The Senator interposed an objection, and examined the case, and then waived his objection. It is the case of a gentleman in Louisville, Ky., who discovered among his father's property a Texan bond and some Texan money, which the United States made an appropriation long ago to pay, and this gentleman discovered these among the assets of his father's estate. This bill is for paying therefor out of the Texas indemnity fund.

Mr. COKE. That fund, I believe, has not yet been exhausted.

Mr. HOAR. This is in pursuance of an arrangement with Texas when she was admitted.

I will state that all the facts are abundantly proved to the satisfaction of the committee, except that we require proof that the property came to the man in good faith from his father, and that he had not acquired it as a speculator, and on that we took his affidavit, accompanied by certificate of Mr. Willis and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of the House of the Representatives, and Mr. BECK, of the Senate, that they were personally acquainted with the man, who is a man of very high standing and character. That being so, we took his affidavit as evidence that he did not acquire the papers as a speculator. Of course the mere possession of a sum of money would ordinarily be evidence of ownership.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1053, being Senate bill 269.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to interfere with the Senator, but I wish to get up a privileged matter and settle it now in regard to the fisheries treaty. Will the Senator withhold his motion? I feel it my duty to press this question because it is the desire of Senators.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. This is a bill to provide for granting a right of way through the Indian Territory, and one that the Department is very anxious to have passed. It will only take the time necessary to read the bill. If the Senator will allow it to pass, I shall be gratified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not withhold further. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I have indicated. I will not interfere with the Senator at any other time.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Does that motion have precedence over the one I have made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would not have precedence.

Mr. HARRIS. Not unless it be a privileged matter. We do not know what the resolution is; it has not been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR April 19, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That when the proposed treaty with Great Britain shall be under consideration, the stenographic reporter shall be admitted and shall report the debates and proceedings, which may thereafter be made public if a majority of the Senate shall so order, except such portions thereof as it shall determine that the public interest requires shall be kept secret. So much of the third clause of Rule XXXVI as conflicts with the resolution is suspended so far as necessary in order that the same shall take effect.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. If this is not a privileged motion, I insist upon a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] on the point.

Mr. SHERMAN. When that bill is taken up I will move to take this up, because I feel compelled to do so by the nature of the business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that the resolution did not present a question of privilege in the parliamentary sense. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the title of the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 269) to grant to the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will not agree to the motion. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appeal to the Senator from Arkansas—he will get the floor at the next moment we go on with legislative business—and let us have this matter, which affects the convenience of all Senators, disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am not so influential a Senator as the distinguished Senator from Ohio, and this is the only opportunity I have had for a week to call this bill up. I hope the Senate will allow the bill to be considered and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator may feel certain, I am sure, through the courtesy of the Senate all around, that the very first time we go on with legislative business again he will be recognized and will get his bill up without the slightest doubt.

Mr. HARRIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that the hour of 2 o'clock will be upon us in a few moments, and his bill will necessarily have to yield to the unfinished business, and therefore I suggest to him that he let it go over for the present in the assurance that it will be taken up as soon as possible.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that bill I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been read.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Let the resolution be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. HOAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has proposed an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is on taking up the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senate by unanimous consent; and that is that it seems to me the most orderly way would be to take up the resolution of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], which covers the whole question.

Mr. SHERMAN. When either resolution is taken up it involves the whole question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] has charge of the animal industry bill, which, by unanimous consent of the Senate, was to be taken up at 2 o'clock to-day, and on which I have the floor. The Senator from Michigan having charge of the bill, I can take no course with reference to it. I am perfectly willing to abide the pleasure of the Senate so far as my right to the floor is concerned.

Mr. PALMER. I am perfectly willing to yield, subject to the rights of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the consideration of this resolution I move that the doors be closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second?

Mr. HARRIS. I second it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair directs the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the galleries and close the doors of the Senate.

The Senate with closed doors proceeded to consider the resolution.

After one hour and forty-eight minutes the doors were reopened.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CALL, Mr. GRAY, Mr. PASCO, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. SAULSBURY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 9th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1413) to increase the pension of James Coey; and

An act (S. 1483) for the registry of the barges Albert M. Condor, and Adelante.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4856) for the relief of D. M. Sprague and William Tilton; and

A bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference for the purpose of promoting arbitration and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, and the Empire of Brazil.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6831) to detach the county of Audrain, in the State of Missouri, from the eastern and attach it to the western judicial district of said State.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the bill (S. 2083) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that the pending measure may be laid aside for the purpose of taking up Senate bill 269.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to yield to me to enable me to offer some amendments to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I do not desire that the pleuro-pneumonia bill shall lose its place as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be resumed at the conclusion of the session to-day as the unfinished business for Monday.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4856) for the relief of D. M. Sprague and William Tilton, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. SPOONER. I send to the Secretary's desk eleven amendments which I intend to offer to the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia, and I ask that they may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed.

FORT SMITH AND EL PASO RAILWAY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 269) to grant to the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in section 1, line 8, after the word "Territory," to strike out the words "as may be hereinafter designated in this act;" so as to read:

That the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Arkansas," in section 1, line 11, to strike out the words:

Running thence by the most practicable route through the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations or tribes of Indians, continuing thence westwardly through the country or reservations now occupied by the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians, to a point on the eastern boundary of the "Pan Handle" of the State of Texas.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Running thence by the most practical route to a crossing of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad at a point at or near the town of Savannah, in the Choctaw Nation; thence in a westerly direction to a point at or near Cherokee town, in the Chickasaw Nation; and thence westerly to a point at or near the southwest corner of the Indian Territory.

So as to read:

Said line to begin at a point at or near the city of Fort Smith, on the western boundary of the State of Arkansas, running thence by the most practicable route, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 26, after the word "upon," to strike out the words "and in connection with;" so as to read:

With the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turnouts, sidings, and extensions hereinafter mentioned as such company may deem necessary and to their interest to construct along upon the right of way hereby granted; said line to be located in sections of 25 miles each, as working sections; and before work is begun on any such section the definite line and location thereof is to be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There are a number of sections following section 1 in the original bill as introduced which were stricken out by the committee, and a proposed substitute inserted. I suggest that the sections proposed to be stricken out be not read, and that the sections to be inserted be read as one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the road-bed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President of the United States, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, and one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or at the district court for the northern district of Texas, or at the district court of Kansas upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations. Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or the district court for the northern district of Texas, or the district court of Kansas, which court shall have the jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition, according to the laws of the State in which the same be heard provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Texas and Arkansas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which said railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate at all times the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed: And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territory, said payments to be made in installments of $1,250 as each working section of 25 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation or tribe would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in the said Territory. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him, in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes, according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congress shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed through which said railway shall have been established may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located line through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chief of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when a map showing any portion of said railway company's located line is filed as herein provided for said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws, and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That the United States circuit and district courts for the northern district of Texas, the western district of Arkansas, and the district of Kansas, and such other courts as may be authorized by Congress, shall have, without reference to the amount in controversy, concurrent jurisdiction over all controversies arising between said Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company and the nations and tribes through whose territory said railway shall be constructed. Said courts shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to the amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nations or tribes and said railway company; and the civil jurisdiction of said courts is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian Territory, without distinction as to citizenship of the parties, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build at least four sections, of 25 miles each, of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all fences, road, and highway crossings and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 10. That the said Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will never aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations any further grant of land, or its occupancy, than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 11. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 12. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act; and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever, prior to the construction and completion of the road, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In section 3 of the proposed amendment I move to strike out all after the word "purposes," in line 47, down to the word "damages," in line 55, in the following words:

If upon the hearing of said appeal the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In line 6 of section 8 of the proposed amendment, before the words "Railway Company," I move to strike out the words "Denison and Washita Valley" and insert "Fort Smith and El Paso."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fourth line of the ninth section. It is provided that a part of the road shall be built "within three years after the passage of this act," but there is no limitation upon the time for completing the remainder of the road. There should be some reasonable time fixed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. That seems to be an omission. I intended to have a limitation put in. I am perfectly willing to insert any limitation that the Senator suggests.

Mr. DAWES. Let any limitation that the Senator thinks under the circumstances reasonable be inserted.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think the entire road should be completed within five years.

Mr. DAWES. Then insert the words "and the remainder thereof within five years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At what point in the section?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. In line 4, after the word "act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 9, line 4, after the word "act," insert "and the remainder thereof within five years;" so as to read:

That said railway company shall build at least four sections, of twenty-five miles each, of its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, and the remainder thereof within five years, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all fences, road and highway crossings, and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas what is the width of the right of way through that country?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It is 100 feet on each side of the road, I think.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That makes 200 feet. I believe that ought to be limited, whether it is a barren country or not. We do not know what that country will be worth at some future time. I see no reason why we should give to the railroad company 200 feet.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the amount fixed in the general law.

Mr. CULLOM. It is the general law already.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then the general law is wrong. We are now making a special law. I move to amend by making it 50 feet on each side of the line. We ought not to be giving away 200 feet as a right of way for any railroad through any portion of this country.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that we are not giving this away, but the railroad company is to pay the Indians for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We do not know how that will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments in the Senate, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL KNOX.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 449) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Maj. Gen. Henry Knox at Thomaston, Me.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the erection of a monument to the memory of Maj. Gen. Henry Knox at Thomaston, Me., and for grading and inclosing with stone curbing and iron fencing the lot upon which the monument shall be erected, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desire to say that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] when this bill was called up a few days ago expressed a desire to make some remarks against it. Two or three days ago he came to me and informed me that he had reconsidered his purpose and should make no remarks, and that the bill might be called up at any time so far as he was concerned, but that if he were present he would vote against it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I have no disposition to debate the bill, and I so stated to the Senator from Maine. I simply wish to say, however, that I am opposed to building any monuments outside of the District of Columbia and the Territories which are under the jurisdiction of Congress. I am not more particularly opposed to this bill than to a number of others. If any monuments are to be built by the Government, I think they should be built in the District of Columbia and not scattered over the various States. That is the ground of my objection. I simply wish it understood that I am opposed to the bill.

The bill was passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT CLARKSVILLE, MO.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2024, Calendar number 700, a bridge bill reported from the Committee on Commerce by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2024) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River, at or near Clarksville, Mo., and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "spans," to strike out the words:

The spans thereof shall not be less than 300 feet in length in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 50 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

It shall have one or more channel-spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way, and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel-spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That if said bridge shall be made of unbroken and continuous spans it shall have one or more channel-spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel-spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 17, after the word "draw-bridge," to strike out the following clause:

The draw or pivot pier shall be at or near that shore nearest the channel of the river where, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the passage through the draw at that point can be consistently maintained; if not so constructed, then the draw pier to be in the main channel, and the opening or passage way to be so protected that water craft can be worked through it by lines when not safe to pass otherwise; and the span shall not be less than 200 feet in length in the clear, with two side spans of 300 feet each, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with and the bridge itself at right angles to the current of the river, and the spans shall not be less than 10 feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

It shall have two or more draw openings, each having not less than 200 feet clear channel-way, and, in addition to said draw-openings, shall have one or more fixed channel-spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way; and every part of the superstructure of said low bridge shall have a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided, That all spans of both high and low bridges shall be so located as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the river traffic, and a draw-opening of low bridges shall, if practicable, be located next or near shore: Provided, also, That in case of a low bridge, if the physical characteristics of the locality so require and the interests of navigation be not injured thereby, the lengths of the fixed spans or the number of draw-openings may be reduced: Provided, also, That for any two adjacent draw-openings of 200 feet each one draw-opening of 300 feet may be substituted, if the interests of navigation be not injured thereby.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe those are all the amendments there are except the last section, and I have consulted with one of the members of the subcommittee about that. The last provision is that the bridge shall be commenced within one year and finished in three years. I think the time is a little short in view of the fact that the plans have to be approved by the Secretary of War, and I move to strike out "one year" and insert "two years" in the third line, and strike out "three" and insert "four" in the same line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be first read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of the proposed new section it is proposed to strike out "one year" and insert "two years," and, in the same line, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to make the amendment read:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not actually commenced within two years and completed wi hin four years from the date thereof.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFERENCE WITH SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1219, Senate bill 658.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me? It is important, as the Senate has agreed to adjourn over, as I understand, until Monday, that a conference report should be agreed to or disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A conference report is in order at any time.

Mr. FRYE. It will take but a very few moments if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me.

Mr. PADDOCK. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report submitted by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference for the purpose of promoting arbitration and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, and the Empire of Brazil, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

In line 37 of the Senate amendment, after the word "States," add the words "which are hereby invited to participate in said conference."

In line 38 of the Senate amendment, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$75,000."

Strike out all of lines 48, 49, and 50, down to the word "and" in line 51 of the Senate amendment.

In line 56 of the Senate amendment, after the word "clerks," insert the words "and other assistants."

Strike out all after the word "publication" in line 58 of the Senate amendment down to the semicolon after the word "languages" in line 60, and insert the words "by the Public Printer in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages of so much of the proceedings of the conference as it shall determine."

In line 61 of the Senate amendment strike out the word "full."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same.

WM. P. FRYE,
J. N. DOLPH,
JOSEPH E. BROWN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES B. McCREARY,
JOHN E. RUSSELL,
WM. W. MORROW,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BEATRICE, NEBR.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 658.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 658) for the erection of a public building at the city of Beatrice, Nebr.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported an amendment, in line 4, after the word "procure," to insert "by purchase or condemnation proceedings;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, a proper site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults, in the city of Beatrice, Nebr., for the exclusive use and accommodation of the post-office, at a cost not to exceed $40,000, including cost of site.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VANS MURRAY PAPERS.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask to take up Order of Business 690, being the bill (S. 1929) to authorize the purchase of five manuscript volumes (being letter-books) of William Vans Murray, formerly minister at The Hague and at Paris, which was reported by the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of why we want those books.

Mr. EVARTS. The short report that was made in the other House at the last session explains the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read. The Senator from New York says there is a House report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Singleton in the House of Representatives July 17, 1886:

The Joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred Senate bill 1084, entitled "A bill to authorize the purchase of five manuscript volumes (being letter-books) of William Vans Murray, formerly minister at The Hague and Paris," have had the same under consideration, and after a careful inspection of same, and consultation with Librarian Spofford, to whom t ey were referred for examination and report, have reached the conclusion that the Senate bill ought to pass, and hence report the same back with a favorable recommendation.

There is much in those volumes relating to an important part of our early history, which has never been given to the public, and which can not fail to prove valuable to the Government.

The sum proposed by the bill to be paid for the same we consider altogether reasonable, being but one-half the amount demanded by the owner.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does this bill appropriate the same sum?

Mr. EVARTS. The same sum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2542, Order of Business 1006.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2542) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada; which was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. STEWART. It is only necessary to read the substitute.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear a part of the report read. It is a very long report, but I want to hear only part of it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, April 16, 1888, and read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2542) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the present Territorial limits of the State of Nevada, submit the following report:

The claims to be paid under the provisions of this bill are fifty-three in number, and aggregate in amount to $29,144. The persons named in the bill furnished money, supplies, and services in the Indian war in 1860 in what was then Western Utah, now Nevada.

The Comstock lode was discovered in 1859. During the winter of 1859-'60 a large number of miners crossed the Sierra Nevada Mountains from California, attracted by the new mineral discoveries. The country previous to that time was very sparsely settled by farmers and stock-raisers. The Pah-Ute (or Piute) Indians, who occupied this region, were numerous and warlike. In the latter part of April, 1860, these Indians commenced hostilities against the whites by an attack on a neighborhood of settlers and stockmen residing on the Carson River, about 30 miles east of Virginia City, Nev. They killed several persons and drove off a large amount of stock.

Previous to the outbreak threats had been made by the Indians to massacre all the whites on the east side of the Sierra Nevada Mountains. At the time of the outbreak the snow on the mountains was very deep, averaging from 10 to 20 feet, and at that season of the year was soft and impassable for teams. To protect the inhabitants and repel these Indians a company was organized in Carson City, consisting of one hundred and twenty-five men, under the command of Maj. William Ormsby. They were joined by a small company from the neighboring town of Genoa and another from Virginia City. They proceeded to the place of the massacre, known as William's Ranch, and from there pursued the Indians to Truckee River, near Pyramid Lake, where a battle ensued, in which about sixty of the whites were killed, among whom were Major Ormsby, Henry Meredith, the law-partner of the writer of this report, and other prominent citizens. Others were wounded, and those that escaped with their lives returned to the settlements destitute of horses and in a pitiable condition.

Immediately after this event home guards were formed and a regular force of volunteers were enrolled and placed under command of Col. John C. Hays. These volunteers were composed of soldiers who enlisted in Nevada and several volunteer companies who crossed the mountains from California. A small company of United States soldiers, under command of Captain Stewart, of the regular Army, also crossed the mountains and co-operated with the forces under Colonel Hays. The combined force consisted of several hundred men, who were supplied with horses, provisions, etc., by the inhabitants of Nevada, assisted by contributions from California. This force moved against the Indians, but the Indians refused to give regular battle against so formidable an army; but after considerable irregular fighting and skirmishing for several days, in which a number of white men and a few Indians were killed, the Indians sued for peace, which was granted and has ever since been observed. The whites have had no trouble with these particular Indians since that time, but they have lived in peace together.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will do. This report seems to be a very familiar one, and I see that a number of the documents referred to in it were referred to also in a bill which was before the Committee on Military Affairs, wherein there were three or four or five hundred thousand dollars involved. I see a number of the same provisions here. I ask the Senator from Nevada, does this include the same thing and is it for the same amount that was involved in the bill that was before the Committee on Military Affairs, and, I believe, ordered to be reported this morning?

Mr. STEWART. Not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why were they not all included in one bill?

Mr. STEWART. This is a different proposition altogether. In 1860 there was an Indian war in Nevada, and the Indians killed a great many people. Volunteers went out and had a battle with them, and about two-thirds of those who went out were killed, among them several prominent citizens. The people then organized a volunteer force to guard the inhabitants, for the Indians threatened to kill them all, and Col. Jack Hays came over and took command of the volunteers. Captain Stewart, of the regular Army, had a few soldiers and came, too. They made an organization then and pursued and overcame the Indians, and made peace, which has prevailed ever since.

There was contributed for this war I suppose from three to five hundred thousand dollars by citizens in Nevada and California. It was a very serious matter. There have been memorials and bills presented from time to time here to pay the individual citizens who contributed their money and served under Hays in connection with the United States forces. Finally the State appointed a commission to examine the individual claims and transmit to Congress the evidence upon which they were based.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was that commission appointed?

Mr. STEWART. Three or four years ago. It is stated in the report. They sent up the evidence on which each claim was based. Your committee have examined it in each case. We allow no interest, but these people are poor people and should be compensated. I contributed a thousand dollars to that expedition and never asked anything for it, and a great many others did the same. But this list of fifty-three persons is composed mostly of poor people. There is one company in. Why that was put in I do not know, but these men came forward and proved up their claims before the commission, and the testimony was taken and transmitted here.

The claims allowed reach some $30,000. They are much less than they would be if they were examined by Congress, for the commission that investigated them was a very exacting commission. It was called our board of examiners, consisting of the governor, the secretary of state, and the attorney-general, and all the claims in Nevada had to be examined by this commission. This particular duty was assigned to it by an act of the Legislature, and the claims have been thoroughly examined, and the committee are all satisfied that the claims were thoroughly examined by this commission, and no man was allowed more than was justly due under the proof.

As to the first expedition we allowed nothing for services, but as to the next expedition, organized in connection with United States forces, following the precedent in Montana, we allowed those who have applied here—of course, only a small portion have applied—for the time they actually served, according to the rolls; and it is all without interest.

The supplies had to be got there on the ground. There was snow on the mountains at the time and no teams could cross; but men came over, and Colonel Hays, who was accustomed to Indian fighting, came over and took charge of the command. This is for the relief of poor people who contributed to that expedition. There are abundance of precedents for it in Montana, Oregon, Minnesota, and other places, where such things have been paid for.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not had time to look over the report entirely, but I ask if there is included in this list the claim of Mary M. Symes for $3,450.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not in?

Mr. STEWART. That was for boarding officers, was it not?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. That is not in.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, after the word "any," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Utah shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; but no justice shall act as a member of the supreme court in any action or proceeding brought to such court by writ of error, bill of exceptions, or appeal from a decision, judgment, or decree rendered by him as a judge of a district court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 1, after the word "President," to insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and in line 3, after the word "court," to strike out "in manner now provided by law;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one additional associate justice of said supreme court, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, line 3, before the word "judicial," to strike out "first" and insert "third;" and in line 4, after the word "Utah," to insert:

As an associate of the judge already assigned to said district; and each of said judges may hold separate hearings and trials, or sit and act together for the expedition of the business of said district, as they may deem expedient.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That temporarily, and until otherwise ordered by law, the additional associate justice to be appointed under this act is hereby assigned to the third judicial district in said Territory of Utah, as an associate of the judge already assigned to said district; and each of said judges may hold separate hearings and trials, or sit and act together for the expedition of the business of said district, as they may deem expedient, and the times and places as now fixed by the statutes of said Territory for holding court therein shall remain until changed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect (except as to the number of judges) as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCCREARY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this is the first measure of this kind which has ever been introduced and passed in this House, and I believe good results will follow.

SALE OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB], a member of the Committee on Labor, asks leave to file and have printed the views of a minority of that committee on the bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced. In the absence of objection, the leave requested will be granted.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

D. M. SPRAGUE AND WILLIAM TILTON.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4856) for the relief of D. M. Sprague and William Tilton, and that the House consider the bill now.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of D. M. Sprague and William Tilton for the sum of $943, for damages accruing to them in 1865 by reason of the failure of the Quartermaster's Department to comply with its contract, be allowed by the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and paid as similar claims are paid by the Treasury Department.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the presentation of reports from committees.

Mr. OATES. I hope consent may be given that reports be filed with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. That consent is usually asked after the order dispensing with the morning hour has been made.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my colleague [Mr. SAYERS].

SPECIAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 9788, and that the bill be now considered in the House. It is a bill making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]?

Mr. ROGERS. I ask that the bill be read, the right to object being reserved. We would like to know what the bill is.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated, the sum of $450,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by, or under the direction of, the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to cause to be paid therefrom the full compensation which the employés in the customs-revenue service would have been entitled to receive had no order been made reducing their compensation in consequence of an estimated deficiency in the appropriation.

That section 3687 of the Revised Statutes, appropriating, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,750,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and from fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, to take effect from and after June 30, 1889.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill and considering it now in the House?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 26, on page 2, insert as a separate section the following:

"SEC. 2. For Army and Navy pensions as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, and survivors and widows of the war of 1812, $3,500,000, to supply a deficiency on account of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose: And provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the amendment just adopted insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 3. That the appropriation of $190,000 made by the act approved March 3, 1887, for heating apparatus to be furnished before June 30, 1888, for the following new public buildings, namely, Aberdeen, Miss.; Augusta, Me.; Clarksburgh, W. Va.; Columbus, Ohio; Concord, N. H.; Council Bluffs, Iowa; Dallas, Tex.; Erie, Pa.; Hannibal, Mo.; Jefferson City, Mo.; Leavenworth, Kan.; Lynchburgh, Va.; Macon, Ga.; New Albany, Ind.; Pensacola, Fla.; Peoria, Ill.; Quincy, Ill.; Shreveport, La.; Syracuse, N. Y.; Terre Haute, Ind.; Toledo, Ohio: Tyler, Tex.; and Waco, Tex., shall continue available to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fulfill contracts entered into therefor prior to June 30, 1888."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I demand the previous question on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that is done I wish the gentleman from Texas would explain the effect of the original bill with reference to the change in the collection of the customs.

Mr. SAYERS. The effect will be to change the appropriation from a permanent to an annual one. It is in accordance with the previous recommendations of Secretaries of the Treasury, and meets the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Appropriations.

I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports from committees may present them at the desk.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, MISSOURI.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Texas will yield a moment, as I wish to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary for present consideration. I am instructed by the committee to report back the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 6831) to detach the county of Audrain, in the State of Missouri, from the eastern and attach it to the western judicial district of said State, with the recommendation that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment will be read.

The amendment was read at length, and concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, has the motion to reconsider been made in reference to the bill H. R. 9788? If not, I desire to enter that motion now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the motion was made and laid on the table.

Mr. REED. My objection to this bill is to the last clause, and I made an inquiry with reference to the point before the bill was considered. I understood that it was not in the bill. I did not understand that this provision was embodied as I now find it, for I intended to make opposition to the clause. It is a very serious matter, and has been passed without the slightest consideration. I think there should be some little time given to a matter of that importance.

Mr. MILLS rose.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. MILLS. I must demand the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. I think I am entitled as a privileged matter to make this statement.

Mr. MILLS. But we want to proceed with the debate on the tariff.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think that the House will want to cut me off without allowing an opportunity for a brief explanation.

The gentleman from Maine did inquire of me if there was a clause embodied in this bill repealing the permanent appropriations for the collection of the customs. I was busy about something else at the time, and, indeed, was not quite sure about the provision myself, and told him I thought not; that the provision had been agreed upon by the Committee on Appropriations and was soon to follow the introduction of this bill, but that it was not on this bill.

I notice now that it is on the bill; and the gentleman from Maine stating that owing to that information which I had erroneously given him, and which I gave in good faith, I may be permitted to say he did not examine the bill with care, and did not offer the opposition to the clause of the bill which he had designed to offer. Now I think it would be but fair, I will say to my colleague from Texas, that under these circumstances or by common consent that matter may be considered as opened.

Mr. MILLS. I shall object to reopening a question now which is likely to consume any considerable time of the House.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very considerable seriousness. We ought not to change our whole policy in regard to the collection of the customs without at least some consideration or discussion. This matter has been brought up before the House at a time when it was expected that no business would be transacted except such matters as related to the tariff bill under discussion. Hence nobody was on the alert to look after it, and I myself was misled by the response made to me, as has been stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to object unless this is to be considered at some future time.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to that whatever. I only wanted to be fairly understood by the House before it is enacted into law. I think it altogether possible that the House may change its conclusion after a full consideration of the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. That would delay the appropriation to an indefinite period, and I object to that.

Mr. CANNON. Permit me just here for a moment. While I am in favor of the provision embodied in this bill, yet the gentleman will understand that his objection to considering the question at some future time places me in rather an embarrassing position, the gentleman from Maine having asked me, and I not giving him the full answer which perhaps I ought to have been able to give him and should have given him, and which answer, I am satisfied now from what he says, misled him. I should prefer, therefore, that either to-morrow or at some future time this matter may be opened and may be considered as far as relates to the last clause of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I am not willing that the business in which the House has been engaged shall be postponed or hampered in any manner by a lengthy consideration of an appropriation bill like this.

Mr. REED. It seems the gentleman yielded to take up this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The question was put distinctly by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], and the answer of the gentleman from Texas was made.

Mr. REED. Not on that point.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; I explained the matter in response to an inquiry of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. RANDALL. And when the bill was presented the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] reserved the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I now renew the request that members having reports from committees may be permitted to hand them in at the Clerk's desk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7348) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print twelve thousand five hundred copies of the eulogies on Seth C. Moffatt, late a Representative in Congress.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

CRUELTY TO DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 8344) to prevent cruelty to domestic animals; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROAD FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK., TO THE NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. MAISH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 6096) to construct a road from Little Rock, Ark., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 9917) to construct a road from Little Rock, Ark., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANKLIN LEE AND CHARLES F. DUNBAR.

Mr. LAIDLAW, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8462) for the relief of Franklin Lee and Charles F. Dunbar; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHAPLAIN C. M. BLAKE, U. S. A.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 640) to restore Chaplain C. M. Blake to rank and pay; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message further announced the approval of bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 6453) granting a pension to George P. Stone;

An act (H. R. 1788) for the erection of a public building at Lancaster, Pa.;

An act (H. R. 3617) for the relief of John C. Adams, administrator of Joseph Adams, deceased;

An act (H. R. 3333) to authorize the city of Chicago to erect a crib in Lake Michigan for water-works purposes;

An act (H. R. 4082) for the relief of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama;

An act (H. R. 1438) to authorize the Kansas Valley Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Riley military reservation in Kansas, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 1158) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for losses by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty," approved March 17, 1882;

An act (H. R. 1070) for the relief of J. A. Wilson; and

An act (H. R. 112) granting a pension to George Schneider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering revenue bills.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. The Speaker will remember that May 10 was set apart under a special order of the House for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Agriculture, not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills. I ask the Speaker what position that order will be left in if the House goes on to-day with the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. According to the present recollection of the Chair it was to be a continuing order until at least two days had been occupied by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH. That is my recollection.

The SPEAKER. The order embraces this language:

The order assigning a day to the Committee on Agriculture shall be a continuing one until at least two days have been occupied in the consideration of bills reported by it.

Mr. HATCH. I am content with that statement.

TARIFF.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

[Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, under existing legislation and administration of the Government all will admit the propriety of an amendment to the revenue laws which will reduce the revenue. I am constrained to say, however, that with just and in the long run economical legislation a part of the money in the Treasury should have been used in keeping the promises that were made to the soldiers of the late war. The last Congress, and so far this Congress, has failed to do them justice. The veto by the President of the dependent pension bill deprives a large number of the soldiers of the late war who are dependent upon their labor for support, who are disabled and can not make the technical proofs required, of pensions justly due them.

MEXICAN PENSION BILL.

The President, however, did sign the Mexican pension bill, which grants a pension to every soldier of that war who is disabled from any cause, and to every one of the age of 62, whether disabled or not, whether rich or poor; also to the widows of such soldiers. Mr. Chairman, to-day soldiers of that war who fought in the Confederate army, and widows of soldiers of that war are upon the pension rolls whose husbands were killed in battle upon the Confederate side, while the widows of soldiers who fought against them in the Union Army are denied a pension because they can not make the full technical proof—tie all the knots and adjust all the ribbons—tracing the death of their husbands to injury strictly from service in the Army. More than that, Mr. Chairman, in many cases where Congress passes special acts, placing widows of such soldiers on the pension-roll, the President makes haste to veto them. Legislation ought to be had at least placing soldiers of the late war and their widows upon an equality with the soldiers of the Mexican war. Such legislation would properly take a part of the idle money in the Treasury.

APPLICATION OF SURPLUS.

In the absence of such legislation the President under the law should have applied the surplus in the Treasury to the payment and purchase of the indebtedness of the Government. True, he elected to say he had no authority so to do, but without any additional legislation he is now taking in the bonds of the United States which he could have heretofore done from time to time, buying the bonds at a less price then than now and saving from one to two years' interest thereon. In addition to this, I want to say that the placing by the President of $60,000,000 now on deposit with three hundred national banks, without interest, instead of having applied the same to the liquidation of the Government debt, deserves the censure of Congress, and should receive the condemnation of the people.

The policy of the Administration from its commencement to the present time has been to pile up money in the Treasury and prevent proper legislation for the expenditure of money, so it could point to the overflowing coffers of the Treasury and demand legislation looking towards a tariff for revenue only. Sir, no man in the House or the country will more heartily support an economical expenditure of the public money than I, but true economy consists in paying the debts of the Government and keeping faith with its defenders, who did so much to preserve it.

Mr. Chairman, after payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government for the year 1887 there was a surplus, in round numbers, of $55,000,000; the estimate by the Department is a surplus for the year 1888 of $66,000,000, which estimate is probably too low; for year 1887 from customs (tariff) the receipts were $217,000,000; for year 1887 from internal taxes, $119,000,000, and from other sources sufficient to make in the aggregate $371,000,000. The majority of the Ways and Means Committee estimate that we can safely so amend the revenue laws as to reduce the annual income $78,000,000. They have reported a bill placing articles on the free-list, imported to the amount of $22,000 000, and reducing duties on other articles, which they claim will further reduce the revenues $32,000,000, making a total tariff reduction of $54,000,000. They also recommend the repeal of internal taxes as follows: On tobacco, $17,000,000; special taxes for licenses retail liquor-dealers and special taxes on malt liquor-dealers, $7,000,000, making, as they estimate, a total reduction of $78,000,000. In the claim as to the articles placed by the bill on the free-list, $22,000,000, and reduction of internal taxes, $24,000,000, making $46,000,000 reduction, the committee is no doubt correct.

As to the claim that the reduction in tariff on the other articles will reduce the revenues $32,000,000, I have to say, instead of reducing the revenues, such reduction would no doubt so stimulate importation of these articles that there would be an increase of revenue from customs instead of a decrease.

The bill as a whole is "vicious, inequitable, and illogical." Its bare introduction and favorable recommendation with the threat of enactment has filled the manufacturing business and labor interests of the country, including the agriculturists, with fear and alarm.

Mr. Chairman, there is a conflict of opinion in this country, and always has been, touching the principle upon which should rest. The motto of the Democratic party has been and is "to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market," and this, too, without reference to the place of production or the diversification of industries in our own country. That party would tax such articles as can not be produced in the United States upon their being imported into this country and let such articles as are or can be produced in the United States be imported from abroad free. This bill is constructed with that principle in view, and journeys in that direction. The Republican party would let articles imported into the United States which can not be produced in our borders come free of taxation, and would raise the revenues by taxing such articles imported as are or can be produced in this country in sufficient quantity to supply our own people, the object of such taxation being twofold.

First. To raise sufficient revenue to carry on the Government.

Second. The diversification of our own industries without decreasing the wages of labor, so that those engaged in agriculture and those engaged in other pursuits shall be found scattered throughout the country side by side, ready to exchange their commodities at the least possible cost for transportation and commission. The highest order of statesmanship dictates a policy that will in the shortest time possible so diversify our industries that the product of each industry in the country will be sufficient to supply the wants of those engaged in all other industries. Such a policy cheapens the product and makes us an independent, self-supporting people in war and in peace. So far as we approximate this condition we approximate prosperity; so far as we journey in the opposite direction we approximate disaster.

The position of the Republican and Democratic parties touching protection was tersely stated by Hon. Walter Q. Gresham in a speech made in New York in 1884, as follows:

It must not be forgotten that this (the Democratic) party would have involved us in untold embarrassment if its leaders had been permitted to carry out their unsound financial views, not to say heresies. In revising our tariff laws and reducing our customs revenues, home interests should not be neglected. Indeed, protection to our manufacturers and laborers can and should be afforded by taxing only such imports as come into real competition with them and admitting others free. No one disputes that the Republican party is in favor of thus affording protection to our domestic industries.

Revenue laws should be enacted with reference to our local conditions and wants. We should legislate in the interest of our own people rather than in the interest of mankind. Not until we are able to control the markets of the world can we afford to adopt free trade. No intelligent man need be told that the weight of opinion in the Democratic party is decidedly opposed to protective principles, but that, if in full possession of the Government, it would refuse to enact or maintain protective-tariff laws.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the contest between the two parties is of long standing, dating back for a generation before the war; it was a contest between two systems of labor,

SLAVE LABOR AND FREE LABOR.

The South, before the war, as now, dominated the Democratic party. Her civilization was built upon cheap labor—slave labor. That labor did not vote, was not educated. A peck of corn-meal and six pounds of salt pork would subsist a laborer South for a week. A cheap suit of clothes would last for a year. That labor produced cotton; great value in little bulk. The South did not desire diversification of industry. Its statesmen believed it to be good policy to exchange its products for the products of cheap labor on the other side of the sea: hence their mottoes, "Buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest markets." "Free trade." "A tariff for revenue only."

Under this policy the waters of her rivers turned no machinery. Her mineral wealth remained without development. Cotton was king. The civilization of the North rested upon free labor; every man was a citizen, a sovereign. Each had his family to maintain, his taxes to pay, his children to educate. The exercise of citizenship required a little leisure, a surplus for the book and the paper and the home. The products of the agriculturist of the North, unlike cotton, were bulky and of far less value. They would not bear transportation to foreign markets like cotton; therefore the citizen of the North believed it to be indispensable for individual and national prosperity to diversify our industries so that there could be a mutual exchange of products upon our own soil. They were without capital, without skilled labor.

They had to come in competition with foreign capital that had been accumulating for hundreds of years and foreign labor which was so cheap that its reward barely sufficed to afford the laborer a mere subsistence from the cradle to the grave. The North demanded a protective tariff, protection against their cheap labor and capital. The conflict led to nullification in South Carolina in 1832. One compromise after another was made, yet the antagonistic forces underlying the two systems of labor were ever present, and one compromise only demonstrated the necessity for another. Finally the inevitable came. The Southern Confederacy was formed; her chief corner-stone was her system of labor, and to make sure that no contest touching labor and industries should in the future interfere with her peculiar system, in the formation of the Confederate constitution, article 2, section 8, it was provided—

That no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

The South believed in that doctrine, wrote it in her constitution, fought for it. The Southern Confederacy failed, slavery is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, our Southern friends are in the Union; they are here, they dominate the Democratic party, and that party believes to-day, as it believed in 1856, when it declared for free trade and free ships, as it believed during the war, as it believed in 1876, when it declared for a tariff for revenue only. In short, from its standpoint, a sound economic policy constrains it to declare—nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

The Mills bill is a step in the direction of and in harmony with that principle. Do I misstate the position of the gentlemen who framed the Mills bill? If so I pause and ask to be corrected. What says the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and all the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee? No answer is heard. I have stated the positions of the two parties correctly.

THE MILLS BILL.

Mr. Chairman, in the short time that I have for general debate I can not criticise the Mills bill in detail, but will seek to do so when the bill comes up for consideration item by item. The bill is subject to criticism for many sins of omission and commission, one of the principal of which sins is the placing of wool on the free-list. The wool industry is one of the principal industries of the country and has been wisely fostered by the Government. Let us inquire about it a minute. In 1859 the product of wool in the United States was 60,000,000 pounds. In 1884 the product was 308,000,000 pounds. The legislation in 1883 reducing the tariff on wool caused it to run down until in 1886 the production was only 285,000,000 pounds as against 60,000,000 pounds in 1859. The average weight of the fleece has increased from 2.4 pounds in 1860 to 5 pounds in 1885, showing what a wise system of protection has done for the development of this industry, not only in the increased production of wool, but also in the increased number of sheep and the increased weight of fleece.

The product of wool in 1886 in the United States was a little under three-fourths of the amount necessary to answer our purposes; the other one-fourth was imported. The largest producer of wool in the world is Australasia. With 78,000,000 sheep she produces 435,000,000 pounds annually. Next comes the United States with 44,000,000 sheep (a little over one-half the number that Australasia has), producing 285,000,000 pounds. Next comes the Argentine Republic with 75,000,000 sheep (nearly double as many as we have); she produces 283,000,000 pounds, which is less than we produce. The quality of our sheep is much better. Next comes Russia with 47,000,000 sheep; she produces 262,000,000 pounds of wool annually.

Mr. Chairman, if we place our great wool interest in competition with the cheap land and labor of Australasia and South America we shall destroy it, and then prices will increase and we shall be at the mercy of the foreign wool-grower.

But again, in the bill reported by Mr. MILLS it is proposed to reduce the duty upon woolens. First, wool itself is to be placed upon the free-list, and then the duty is to be reduced upon woolen goods. Let us inquire about the manufacture of woolens. In 1850 the total value of all woolens manufactured in this country was $43,000,000. In 1860 it was $66,000,000. The imports in 1860 were $43,000,000. In 1870 the manufacture had jumped, under the influence of the protective policy of the Republican party, from $66,000,000 to $177,000,000. In 1880, under the continuation of that policy, it had increased to $267,000,000. In 1886, according to the best information I can obtain, the value of the wool manufactures in the United States had increased to $350,000,000, and we imported $44,000,000 worth. That means that our consumption of woolens in 1886 was, in round numbers, $400,000,000. How much did we consume in 1860? Why, in 1860 we produced $66,000,000 and imported $43,000,000; so that we consumed a little over $100,000,000 worth in 1861, as against $400,000,000 in 1886, nearly all of which we produced ourselves. And in this connection it may be well to remind gentlemen that whereas the average consumption of wool per capita by the people of the United States in 1860 was two pounds, it was five pounds in 1885. And yet, from early morn to dewy eve, the deep bass notes and the high soprano voices of gentlemen upon the other side are screaming out that our people are freezing to death. [Laughter on the Republican side.] What a set they must have been to stand the cold away back in 1860. [Renewed laughter.] More wool produced, far more, double, treble, quadruple, quintuple: manufactures of wool likewise increased; prices cheapened, aye, greatly cheapened since 1860, and still our friends are not happy.

Strangely enough, Mr. MILLS wants free wool so that our manufacturers can compete with the English manufacturers. You recollect what he said. He said that if we were to compete with England we must produce as cheaply as England, if not cheaper. Well, suppose we have free wool as England has, will that enable us to produce as cheaply? No, no. Our labor receives at least one-half more than the English labor receives, and we have got to reduce there in order to obtain the advantage which the gentleman desires. But he says he wants to reduce the price of wool, it being a raw material, so that our manufacturers can compete with those of other countries. I was amazed and amused a few days afterwards when his colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], arose in his place and, through several pages of his speech, labored and pulled and hauled to convince his Texas constituents that putting wool on the free-list would raise the price. [Renewed laughter.]

It reminded me of that old story of the doctor who made pills from the bark of a tree, if you stripped the bark from above downwards, it was lorumbobhi, but if you stripped it from below upwards it was hibobilorum, and had a very different effect. [Renewed laughter.] But the Texas constituents of the two gentlemen can pay their money and take their choice between the conflicting statements and theories of their Representatives.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR LEGISLATION.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side of the House boast that the Mills bill proposes to reduce revenue, and they charge that we upon this side do nothing but criticize their bill, and fail to submit any proposition of our own. Gentlemen, you are in the majority, and are responsible for legislation here. We of the minority are powerless to legislate; and, up to this time, have not even the power or the privilege of submitting a bill for you of the majority to lay upon the table. If the country will give the Republicans a majority in this House and the President, that party will promptly meet the emergency, revise the tariff, decrease taxation without interfering with its time-honored principles—without reducing wages, without breaking down the industries of the country; but until we get power, we can well say: "We are not called upon to legislate; we have no power to legislate."

PROPOSITION FOR REDUCTION OF REVENUE.

Mr. Chairman, while this is the situation, I, as one member of the minority, am willing now, as at all times, to state how I would reduce revenue if I had the power. It is claimed that the Mills bill would reduce the revenue $78,000,000 per annum, and that they can safely be reduced by that amount—some claim to a greater amount.

Much talk on both sides has been had about the repeal of internal taxes. Even if desirable, this can not be done; for we can not reduce taxation to so great an amount and have money sufficient to carry on the Government. President Cleveland and the Secretary of the Treasury advise against the repeal or reduction of internal taxes; yet the Mills bill takes the tax off of tobacco, leaves it on cigars, and adds a repeal of special taxes on retail liquor dealers and malt liquor dealers, amounting, all told, to $24,000,000. Standing alone as a single proposition I would not support that measure; but out of deference to the views of others I am willing to concede that reduction, provided we add other items of reduction to it.

If we could spare a repeal of the tax on alcohol used in the arts and manufactures, I would vote for that; but, believing that, added to the repeal of the tax upon tobacco, a provision placing sugar upon the free-list from all countries that do not levy an export tax on it would reduce the revenues as far as is prudent at this time, I would so place it, and there stop, except so far as it might be necessary to pass a so called administrative bill, to which all parties agree.

FREE SUGAR.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a tabulated statement, made up at the Treasury Department, touching sugar and its importation for a series of years, which I take pleasure in printing with my remarks.

Statement showing the percentage of the value of imported sugar and molasses entered for consumption to the total value of imported merchandise entered for consumption, and the percentage of estimated duties collected on imported sugar and molasses to the total amount of duties collected; also the average cost per pound, and the average specific and ad valorem rates of duty on sugar during the years named below.

TREASURY DEPATMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, May 4, 1888.

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

It appears that in 1887—last year—our imports of sugar and molasses amounted in round numbers to $76,000,000. How much was the duty or tax on this? Listen, my Democratic friends—you friends of the poor man! Fifty-eight million dollars of tax was collected on $76,000,000 of imported sugar and molasses.

A MEMBER. Eighty per cent.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, 82 per cent. ad valorem, or 2 cents a pound on the average. The average value of this sugar was 2½ cents a pound, the tax was 2.03 cents, equal to 82.04 per cent. ad valorem.

What is the average consumption of sugar in the United States? Fifty-three pounds to every man, woman, and child in the country. Rich and poor, great and small, wise and unwise, black and white, farm laborer and factory laborer, everybody consumes on a average 53 pounds of sugar annually, and the poor man pays as much as the millionaire. How much does the tax amount to per capita each year? One dollar and six cents. That is collected upon this imported sugar and molasses from every man, woman, and child in the country; yet the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], as I understood his remarks to-day, seemed to think that if there was a direct tax placed upon each inhabitant of this country to that amount it would sweep out of power the party that did not remove it.

Let me go a step farther in regard to sugar. The imports of sugar and molasses for five years—1883 to 1887, inclusive—amounted, according to this tabulated statement from the Department, to $410,000,000. What was the duty? Two hundred and fifty-seven million dollars in those five years; the importation with the duty amounting to $667,000,000. For the five years from 1856 to 1860, inclusive, the importation was $163,000,000, as against $410,000,000 in the more recent period of five years; and the duty was $43,000,000, as against $257,000,000. Thus it will be seen that the importation of this article has grown year by year, although it is the best-protected article on the list, every thing considered, and has been so substantially from the foundation of the Government to the present time.

From 1821 to 1887, inclusive, the value of the imports of sugar and molasses for consumption in the United States, not for re-export, was $1,967,000,000—nearly $2,000,000,000. The tariff or tax was $1,038,000,000, making the first cost of this product before it reached the retailer, much less the consumer, more than $3,000,000,000; and the great bulk of that was in the last thirty years. What has protection done for sugar? Only one-tenth of all the sugar consumed is produced here. Why, sir, the production is falling off. Instead of producing more sugar we are producing less than formerly.

Now, gentlemen, I am willing to stand by the logic of the principles of the Republican party. I believe that we should tax products from abroad where it is practicable to produce in this country in due time a sufficient amount of the same product to answer the demands of our people. Upon that principle we did well to protect wool; upon that principle we did well to protect iron and steel and woolens and all the textiles. But here stands substantially one thousand million dollars of tax in the last thirty years upon sugar, and nearly two thousand million dollars of imports; and the sugar product of the United States is not one-tenth of what we consume, and is growing less. What is to be done? I have here a table showing the amount of the product of sugar in the United States. Last year it was 302,000,000 pounds, less than one-tenth of what we consume. What was the protection? About 2 cents a pound.

But, say our friends on the other side, "You are going to admit now that the tax is added to the import." Yes, it is in certain cases. If you import coffee into this country, every dollar of the tax is added, because we can not produce coffee here. If you import tea, every dollar of the tax is added. Before we commenced to produce iron, steel, steel-rails, and textiles in any considerable quantities, while we imported substantially all of those articles that we used, the tax was added. But everybody understands that the tax is not added now on most of these articles. The amount of textiles, cotton and wool, the amount of iron and steel and their manufactures imported into this country, is now a mere bagatelle in comparison with the home product, and the competition at home has reduced the price far lower than it was when we first levied the duty.

How is it with sugar? Has there been any increase of production in the United States? No; a quarter of a century registers a decrease. And the small amount produced, which has not been increased, leaves the import tax a tax upon the consumer. What is to be done? Fifty-eight million dollars paid last year into the Treasury from this source! How much have you produced in this country? Again, let us see. Three hundred million pounds. Why, gentlemen, you can pay by way of bounty upon that 300,000,000 pounds 2 cents a pound, and it would only cost annually $6,000,000, and you have $52,000,000 of the sugar tax annually collected left.

From every standpoint it is plain what should be done. From the home of every laboring man in this country, North and South, who understands this matter comes the demand to reduce the revenues and relieve the whole people of this $1.06 a head yearly tax, and thus reduce the surplus. Who does it hurt? The Louisiana planters? No. The Kansas farmer, and the California coast beet producer, who believe they have in the diffusion process a solution of the problem of sugar production in this country? No; they get the same bounty they now receive at a cost of $6,000,000, and the rest of the country is relieved of $52,000,000 annual tax.

Wise statesmanship dictates that we should make this provision. A product in such universal use as sugar should, if possible, be produced in this country. I have but little hope of Louisiana's increasing the product. If it is increased at all I believe the increase is to come from the sorghum and the beet. Europe now produces one-half of the sugar of the world from beets, yet at the beginning of this century not a pound was produced in Europe. A judicious system of bounties created the production there. In my opinion we should give the project a fair trial.

Gentlemen, it is a curious fact, when you hunt up these statistics, to find what stories they tell, and they tell the truth. We hear something about the sugar trusts; and whenever a Democrat lifts his nose and thinks he comes in sight of something that can be called a "trust," which truly or falsely—and it does not make much difference to him which—can be laid to the tariff, he begins to step high. [Laughter.] I say to you, if you will put sugar on the free-list it will break up the payment of a bounty now paid to the sugar refiners. I will explain.

Notwithstanding the great importation of sugar, we exported in 1886 and in 1887 $22,000,000 in round numbers of the refined sugar. We did not export any brown sugar; we imported that.

Mr. GEAR. I want to suggest to the gentleman that under the arrangement of the tariff to-day there has not been a hogshead of what is called fair merchantable sugar introduced in this country in ten years.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, the average duty, as I have shown, is 2 cents a pound on the present valuation of sugar. I went to the Treasury Department the other day and said: Under this section of the statute allowing a rebate, where duties have been paid upon articles imported, when they are exported how much do you allow to the refiners? He answered: "Oh, I can answer that question in a minute," and here he hands me a circular, which I have before me, which provides that—

On and after November 1, 1886, a drawback will be allowed at the rate of 2.60 cents on all refined sugars exported——

Mr. BUCHANAN. On the pound?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Now, mark you, 2 cents is what it amounts to when imported; that is the duty; and 2.60 cents is the drawback when exported. I said: "Well, do not you know that they exported eleven millions last year and the same quantity the year before?" He said "Yes." I asked: "How do you explain it; how can they export sugar unless that .60 cent of the drawback rate above the duty amounts to a bounty?" Says he: "I give it up."

Mr. BUCHANAN. So do I.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; everybody will have to give it up. It does amount to it. Now you break up that much of the trust when you let sugar come in free. [Applause.]

Another strange thing, and I must hurry on; my time is getting limited. Do gentlemen know that the duty on sugar in 1876 was 27½ per cent. of all the duties collected upon the imported articles brought into the United States, the value being $76,000,000? Why, do you know that wool and the manufactures thereof, iron and steel and all manufactures thereof, chemicals, drugs, dyes, medicines and everything entering therein, all combined, do not pay as much duty as that collected on sugar? Yet it is necessary now for the good of the Democratic party that they should have the Louisiana vote, and the Mills bill only reduces the tax on sugar 20 per cent.

I give you notice now that, like the voice of the prophet crying aloud in the wilderness, I will not cease to cry aloud until I get an opportunity to see that 20 per cent. and go you 80 per cent. better. [Laughter.]

How much sugar did you import last year?—nine-tenths of all we consumed. How much did we produce in the United States?—only one-tenth, of the value of $12,000,000. How much wool and manufactures of wool and chemicals, drugs, dyes, medicines, and iron and steel, and all manufactures thereof are imported?—$135,000,000 last year. What amount of these articles were produced in the United States last year?—over $1,000,000,000 worth. That is what protection has done as to these articles.

How long, Mr. Chairman, have I been talking?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCADOO). The gentleman has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. Why, it seemed to me I had not much more than commenced. I was just getting warmed up to the work.

Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised and amazed at many statements from the other side. They cry out: "Oh, how the poor farmer is oppressed!" Why, sir, there are gentlemen on the other side who shed crocodile tears about the poor farmer who would not know a cow from a deer if they were to see them. [Laughter.]

THE POLICY OF THE FARMER.

I understand about this farming proposition. I grew up on a farm on the Wabash. I recollect back for forty-five years and over, and know something about it. I know something about glutting the market with farm produce. Gentlemen will recollect how, in 1861—I am sure all my colleagues do, and my friend from Iowa, Governor GEAR—corn as good as was ever grown was bought in Illinois, and I dare say in Iowa, at the farm and the railway station at 10 and 12 cents a bushel.

The war took from the farms a great number of patriotic farmers and farm laborers, who ceased to follow the plow and who went into the Army, and before 1864 came the same quality of corn was worth a dollar in currency and over 65 cents in gold at the railway station and at the farm. Why? Because a large number of men who had followed the plow had taken up the sword, and there were fewer producers on the farms.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. And more home consumers.

Mr. CANNON. Because a part of those who had been producers became consumers and ceased to be producers. There is the key of the policy of the Republican party from the commencement—from the time it wrote the Morrill tariff act on the statute-book till the present day. Its motto has been: So shape your policy that you will distribute a portion of the labor off the farm. [Applause.] Get more of it into the factory. And by and by we will produce substantially all the articles consumed in this country that can be produced on our soil and in our climate, and you give the farmer more customers and fewer competitors; while the policy of you Democrats would increase the number of farmers and decrease their present customers now engaged in other pursuits.

Mr. Chairman, I well recollect the good old Democratic days that our friends on the other side sigh for the return of.

Born in the South, my earliest recollection is of my father owning a small tract of land there. He went from the South to the North and West, where he could come in contact with free labor. Thank God for it. [Applause.]

There is no path the farmer has trodden in my section that I have not trod. I know what it was in the good old Democratic days to work month in and month out through all the seasons for $8 per month, and get pay in store-truck, or what was generally worse, "stump-tail currency," issued by banks which would break before you could spend it.

I know what it was in the good old Democratic times to see the corn raised and fed to the hogs and the hogs sold net at $1.50 per hundred and paid for in English-made calico (prints) at 35 cents a yard. Sir, under a policy of protection better prints, made in the United States, are now sold at retail for 5 cents a yard everywhere throughout the country. Sir, you can buy a better suit of men's clothes at retail in my city of Danville, ready to put on, for $15 than could have been bought for twice that money in good old Democratic days. The clothes, too, are made from American wool and American material throughout, including the buttons, and the laboring man makes the $15 to buy the clothes within less than half the time it took in the good old Democratic days. And still you Democrats are not happy. [Applause.]

I tell you, my Democratic friends, and your President, you might as well try to drown a duck by pouring water on its back as to try to convince the farmers of the great West that your propositions and policies are sound. The best, the most intelligent, the truest and most stable protectionists on the face of the earth are the men who follow the plow, and who believe their prosperity is to come from the diversity of industries.

THE INTERESTS OF LABOR.

Much has been said about how the laboring man is oppressed by the protective policy, and the claim is made that he is better off in England than in the United States, everything considered. A statement of fact in a sentence fully refutes that statement. The reports from the Treasury Department show that from 1820 to 1887, in round numbers, 14,000,000 people have immigrated into the United States from Europe. Over 5,688,000 of these were from Great Britain. Listen, my Democratic friends. In round numbers, 9,000,000 of these people have come to the United States since the Republican party wrote the policy of protection upon the statute-book, under the lead of Abraham Lincoln. Great flocks of people, like individuals, go where they can get the best reward for their labor.

"DEFENSE OF SPEAKER CARLISLE."

Mr. Chairman, there has been much adverse criticism of the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the formation of the Committee on Ways and Means. It is said that the committee is controlled by gentlemen from the South who are not familiar with the industries of the country and not in harmony with their welfare and preservation. I want to defend the Speaker as to the organization of that committee. He could not have done otherwise than he did. As long as the Republic endures it will from time to time have its legislation shaped by the party in power. As long as the South remains solid and Democratic, and that party remains in power, just that long will it dominate the executive, the legislative, and later the judicial branch of the Government. The created knows the creator. [Applause.]

TRUSTS.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, during this debate about trusts or combinations to limit the production and control the prices of products. It is claimed that our customs legislation is responsible for the same. These combinations are common in the country and throughout the world, and from time to time have existed for ages past. I submit, however, that the protective policy is one of the principal means of combating such organizations. Before our industries were diversified, and while we were dependent upon Europe for our manufactured products, the foreign manufacturer who wanted a good price and the importer who wanted a good profit and commission in handling the foreign product fixed the prices as they chose, but wherever protection was sufficient to afford the home manufacturer security against the cheap labor and capital of the foreign manufacturer, home manufactories have been established and home competition has cheapened the product.

The manufacturer produces side by side with the agriculturist and other producers. Exchanges of products have been made upon smaller commissions and small charges for transportation. All over the country manufacturers come in direct contact with the retailers and consumers. This does not suit the importers, especially at New York, who with our Southern brethren, are the most persistent enemies of the protective system. Let it be noted that a trust or combination between the importer and the foreign manufacturer can not be reached by legislative penalty.

Mr. Chairman, these combinations are against public policy, and the American people can and will subdue and destroy them. We can reach "trusts" formed in the United States by legislative penalty, but "trusts" of foreign growth are beyond our reach, except as we reach them by development of home industries.

The interstate-commerce bill, in the enactment of which one of the Senators of my own State, Mr. CULLOM, was an important factor, was a step in the right direction, and goes a great way toward the destruction of the most onerous of all trusts, namely, the transportation trust. Surely the cotton-seed oil trust, the dressed-beef trust, the anthracite-coal trust, the Standard Oil trust, and many others which might be mentioned are in no way dependent on the tariff for their formation or existence.

Mr. Chairman, I have been amazed at claims of gentlemen upon the other side in connection with this matter. Sir, if any party profit by, sustains, or is sustained by "trusts," it is the Democratic party. The standard oil trust, it is alleged by Democrats like ex-Senator Thurman, sends a Senator to the national Congress from the State of Ohio, and it is further alleged that its all-potent influence dictates the appointment of a member of President Cleveland's Cabinet. It is further alleged that this giant trust stands ready to pour its money out to assist in the re-election of Mr. Cleveland.

More than this, Mr. Chairman, it is alleged that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] is the adviser and close friend of the Administration; one of its special aids in the use of the patronage of the Government to force the will of the Executive upon Representatives in the passage of the Mills bill. I am informed by one who claims to know whereof he speaks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] is one of the members in interest with that other great trust which limits the output of its product and fixes its price by combination and agreement. I refer to the anthracite coal trust.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which by its bill reduces the tariff on plate-glass, starch, and various other products, which is believed to be not for the best interests of the country, while iron ore and soft coal remain upon the protected list as heretofore. The gentleman is said to be one of the largest owners of coal and iron-ore interests in the country. I do not accuse him of acting for his own interests in the premises, nor do I say that either of these articles should be reduced, but I do say when the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], and other Democrats talk about free raw material and the robber tariff, and at the same time these articles are retained on the protected list because they happen to be produced in their districts, that in my opinion such action shows a want of fidelity to the principles which they profess, and is simply extraordinary.

Gentlemen, you may claim to your immediate constituents that you saved coal and iron-ore, but my word for it you will not profit thereby. The men who believe in the protective system in your districts and in the country at large will not be deceived by such action upon your part. They know that the system is either good or bad. If good, they will elect Representatives who are in harmony with the system and will stand by it. Representatives who are big enough and broad enough to look over the whole country and shape a policy that shall be consistent, and will result in the greatest good to all the people.

WHAT PROTECTION HAS DONE.

Mr. Chairman, I do not claim that the protective policy is the only element that has led to our marvelous development and success since 1861. But I do claim it is the quickening principle that underlies our progress and prosperity. It goes hand in hand with industry and good wages; it stimulates diversity in production and cheapens products; it fosters invention. Under that policy the products of agriculture aggregated in value on the farm in 1887 over $3,700,000,000, while the value of manufactured products, Mr. MILLS tells us, for the same year was $7,000,000,000. This far exceeds the value of Great Britain's product. Ours is the greatest agricultural and the greatest manufacturing country on the earth.

Listen, Democrats; over nine-tenths of all these products find a market within our own borders.

Great Britain reaches all about the earth for her markets; her navy and merchant marine is upon every sea. She dominates and in most instances oppresses 250,000,000 people that she may find a market for her products. Yet we have a better market for all our products within our own borders than she has throughout the world.

Sir, we now have 60,000,000 people, and our present territory when developed will support 300,000,000. To the northward is British America. To the South is Mexico, Central America, and the high plateaus under the Equator. The Republican party favors a continuation of that policy which, pending the development of our own territory and that which may be added, will enable us to dominate our own markets with our own products.

The Democratic party, under the lead of Cleveland, proposes to reverse the engine and pursue the opposite policy. The issue is made up. The two great captains will soon be in command of the opposing forces. The country can not afford to decide the issue in favor of the Democratic party. [Applause.]

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Chairman, we have been treated to a wide variety of topics in the discussion of this bill. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY] told yesterday of the child whom a minister of God had regretted that he had not throttled when he baptized him, it was enough to make the blood run cold. I almost shuddered as he told of that disciple of the meek and loving Savior who regretted —whatever the provocation might have been—that his hands had not been imbued with an infant's blood. But, sir, the story was but an appropriate parable in the harsh doctrine which he advocated—a fit prelude for the slanders that fell from his lips, and for the unwarranted intrusions into the domestic affairs of a State which is the peer of his own in all its rights, in all its dignities, and in all its powers.

These slanders have been denounced as they deserve in the other end of this Capitol when they issued fresh from the lips which gave venomous utterance to them, and I regret to see that the author of them has found an apt pupil and imitator here. Louisiana, sir, has her complete election laws, her own courts to punish violations of them, her own polls, and is absolute and exclusive in her police powers and the administration of her domestic affairs. She proposes to guard and cherish this precious privilege of local self-government regardless of the disappointments of defeated office-seekers or the railings of ready calumniators. She proposes, sir, as long as the Constitution is not torn into a thousand fragments, to retain this sacred right which belongs to her as well as to Ohio and to every other State. Her star of equal rights and equal powers shall not be dimmed in yonder flag while every other star that represents the rights of every other State retains its brightness unimpaired!

I do not feel that I need go further than this in meeting the aspersions of the gentleman from Ohio, uncalled for as they are. But, sir, if I did, I would remind him again that these charges when first uttered were denounced and proven unwarranted by the Senators from Louisiana, both in general and in detail. If I did go further I would challenge a comparison of the methods of election in the district which I have the honor to represent—and whose fair name it is my privilege as it is my pride to defend—with those that prevail in the district represented by the gentleman from Ohio, or any other district in the country, in all the elements which affect the honest, the fair, and the untrammeled expression of the will of the whole people. I might tell him that among the warmest greetings I received during my canvass were hurrahs from colored throats and the hearty grasp of colored hands, and that I had the earnest support of colored voters by the hundreds—not by fraud, nor force, nor intimidation, but of their own free will. [Applause.]

Regretting, Mr. Chairman, this digression into which I have been drawn, I will come to the subject that is now directly before us. It seems to me that the debate on this bill has attempted the solution of problems which we are at this time not called upon to solve.

The extremists on one side of this House talk as if the people could and should get along without the horrid impositions of a custom-house, which interferes with their freedom to purchase abroad and compels them to submit to the outrage of having to pay more for their imported goods than they would have to pay if the custom-house was not there to levy its tribute. And the indignation of this class might be very justifiable if the Government was of such an accommodating kind as to run along like perpetual motion, which is so much sought after, without something to make it go.

Another class of extremists on the other side talk as if there actually was a proposition before this House to abolish the tariff, stop the collection of duties, utterly destroy the protection system, tear down the custom-houses, and turn the custom-house officials out upon a cold and unfeeling world to obtain a living in some other avocation.

It might be well to remind the extremists of each class, the advocates of the "buy and sell where you please" principle on the one hand and the advocates of protection by means of prohibitive duties on the other, that the theories of both if carried to logical conclusions would agree on one point, and that is, the Government, so far as customs are concerned, would have practically no revenue. Tear down the custom-houses, so that you can buy where you can buy cheapest, or build the tariff wall so high as to entirely keep out foreign goods, and the result will be precisely the same; no revenues will come in from that source. And yet since childhood we have learned that governments were necessary institutions for civilized peoples, and that the support of such governments as ours requires a great deal of money, which has been chiefly collected from customs duties, and which will continue to be until some more perfect system is devised.

As governments are necessary, taxation is necessary. The government exacts of the citizen a portion of his earnings in return for the benefits which it affords him and which are essential to his welfare and even to his existence. No sane man expects to receive something for nothing, and no honest man, whatever his condition or calling be, expects to receive the benefits of government without bearing some portion of the burden which the support of that government entails.

Taxation to be equitable must be general. As the government has its benefits for all, so should its obligations likewise be borne by all. And he who seeks immunity from bearing his share shirks an obligation that is inherent in citizenship.

If, then, revenues are collected at moderate cost; if they are levied and collected in a manner as little obnoxious and as little burdensome as possible—for any tax, no matter how collected, is bound to be obnoxious and burdensome to some extent; if they are honestly and reasonably applied when collected; and if such amounts only, and no more, are collected than are absolutely needed for the support of the government, efficiently, honestly, and economically administered; if all this is done, then no fair-minded citizen, when he contributes his proportion for the general good, should complain of the obligations that come hand in hand with the benefits. If, however, these conditions of taxation are not complied with; if the taxes are made and kept needlessly offensive, onerous, and excessive; if they are needlessly withdrawn from the channels of circulation or withheld from the development of our great public works and our national defense, then there will be just cause for complaint, and the citizen will feel that the powers of taxation have been most grossly abused.

The abuse of Federal taxation, which is greater than all others, is that the Government is collecting more than it needs; that the people who support the Government are being compelled to bear such burdens as are not required to be borne. As the people have to pay for the Government, they do not want to, and they are determined not to, pay any more than they need to pay. It cost during the last fiscal year to conduct the Government, including a sinking fund of nearly $48,000,000, the total sum of $315,835,428, or the sum of $5.74 per capita. The Government collected in that time the sum of $371,403,277.66, or $6.75 per capita. The people paid, therefore, considered on a purely revenue basis, without going into the complex calculation of what was or was not paid by those who were incidentally benefited by the tariff—the people paid the sum of $55,567,849.74, or about $1 apiece for every man, woman, and child more than there was any need to be paid. While necessary taxation is all right and should be cheerfully borne, any needless taxation is all wrong. "Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation," and the people should not be asked or compelled to endure it longer.

In considering this subject we should bear constantly in mind the fact that two distinct systems of taxation now combine to levy their tribute upon the earnings of the people. The system that the fathers instituted and maintained has another system united with it which danger, emergency, and cost untold called to its aid, and which remains joined with it still, although the danger and the emergency are past, because some of the cost is left to be provided for still. The two systems combined are pouring into coffers now full to overflowing the moneys absorbed from a circulation already not sufficient for the people's wants and from earnings too scanty for their comfortable support. In this singular state of affairs the Government is getting needlessly rich in direct proportion as the people are getting needlessly poor; and if this continues and no remedy can be invoked and no relief given; if the people, through their representatives, can place burdens on which when no longer entirely needed they are powerless to take off or abate, then, indeed, do we behold a sad commentary on the wisdom and efficiency of republican institutions. "The safest and the simplest" remedy for such a state of affairs, as General Jackson said, "is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of the property in their own hands for their own profit."

I believe, sir, that a great majority of the people of this country and a majority of members of this House will agree that the remedy suggested by General Jackson should be applied; but in the methods to be adopted there will be found a great diversity of opinion.

This remedy for the existing abuse can be applied in three ways:

First. By making the entire reduction in customs.

Second. By making it in internal-revenue taxation.

Third. By dividing the reduction so as to let each system of taxation bear a share.

Each of these plans has its earnest advocates.

Any proposition to limit reductions in taxation to customs duties only would seem to imply that this system of taxation was more unusual or was less justifiable or was more unpopular or was, on the whole, more burdensome to society than the other system; yet we find that this system has been in force from the beginning of our Government until now without any exception; that the other has only been for brief periods until 1862. One has been the rule and not the exception; one has been constantly employed; the other has been a supernumerary only; one has always been considered necessary; the other has been gladly abolished or reduced when the opportunity afforded. The preamble of the first tariff act, which has been so much quoted, stated that:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on imported goods, wares and merchandise.

The objects of the tariff are stated here in the order of their importance:

First. The present support of the Government;

Second. The payment of the debts which it may have previously incurred; and Third. The encouragement and protection of manufactures.

A few extremists have claimed that this last function of a tariff has no constitutional justification, and while they may be right, provided this function only is exercised, they surely are not right provided this function is exercised simultaneously with and secondary to the others. The Constitution itself had been adopted in 1788, only one year before, and it would be singular, to say the least, if the Congress in 1789 was not acquainted with its limitations or the intentions of its founders, or would so soon have set them aside. The instances of the recommendation and sanction of this function of a tariff are so numerous in American history and so many have already been cited that I will not occupy the time of the committee by adding any new instances or repeating those which have been already referred to.

But, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of this House reverse the order of the objects of a tariff and put the last function first whenever they find it to their convenience to do so.

That a tariff levied to foster manufactures or productions which bring in little or no revenue should be objected to by the classes which it does not benefit, I can readily imagine.

The duty on pig, bar, and ingots of copper and copper-plates of the same not rolled is 4 cents per pound. And yet the entire value of the amount imported during the last fiscal year was $40, and the entire duties collected were $16.60. Such a tariff, performing virtually only the last function which I have mentioned is either not needed or is entirely for the benefit of private individuals, and surely seems without justification.

On the other hand, a tariff that performs all of its functions, which furnishes revenue such as is needed and protection if it can—revenue as its object and protection as its incident, or revenue first and protection afterwards—has the highest constitutional justification. Any tariff levied on an article, when it is such as is produced here, is bound to furnish some protection, whether that protection or benefit be meant or not; and it seems to me, sir, that no one should object if a duty levied to pay the expenses of the Government should perform a benefit to somebody if it could. I quote from a speech by a distinguished member and Speaker of this House [Mr. CARLISLE]:

The experience of mankind has shown that it is almost, if not quite, impossible to devise any system or scheme of duties upon imports that will not to a greater or less degree either injure or benefit private industrial interests, and I have never hesitated to say that I would rather benefit them than injure them; but what I mean to assert is that when the primary or principal object of the tax imposed by public authority is to foster a private interest, it is not a legitimate use of the power of taxation, but it is simply spoliation.

Indirect taxation has long been preferred by our people, and, however its burdens may be inveighed against, it is the only system of revenue collection that brings certain benefits as a necessary incident to its levy, building up a diversity of pursuits which is essential to the comfort and happiness of our entire people.

Those advocating the first method exclusively, by making the entire reduction in customs, I believe to be in a decided minority in this House. With these ardent advocates it seems to be more a question of sentiment than a matter of practical legislation. A gentleman from Minnesota upon the other side of this House has been the first during this session to raise the cry of down with customs and hold on to direct taxation.

There is no proposition before this House to have free whisky. Whatever opinions some of us may hold as to the policy of endeavoring to make the United States do two things at the same time, collect revenues and dispense morality, it seems to me the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] may have been a little premature in his protests against the removal of whisky from internal tax. But there is a proposition in the bill under discussion to abolish the internal tax in great part on tobacco, and this proposition the gentleman from Minnesota has expressed his opposition to before it was even up for discussion in this House. The gentleman admits the necessity of customs reduction more than sufficient to satisfy the ideas of the veriest extremists on this side of the House, but contends that the people should continue to pay the tobacco tax and be relieved of some others instead. It may be said that this article is not a necessity, and, unlike food and clothing, the people can use it or not and thereby pay a tax on it or not as they choose.

But whether a necessity or not, our people do use it, and will continue to do so for all time. They do pay an unneeded tax on its use, and if this tax were modified as proposed by this bill they would save $24,000,000, or if the entire tax was removed they would save $30,000,000, which is now needlessly exacted from their earnings. It is also an unequal tax. Is it just to make the man that uses tobacco pay more to support the Government than he who does not use it? Sir, if this money is saved by the people is it not worth just as much to buy the necessities of life with as a saving in any other kind of taxation? If the head of the family saves even the sum of $2 or $3 per annum by cheapened tobacco, does not that leave him that much more to support his family with? Every dollar saved from the tax on tobacco is the same kind of a dollar as that saved from the payment of any other tax. It has the same devices on each side. It will buy just as many loaves of bread, pay just as much house-rent, go just as far towards buying a plow or a reaping-machine, a dress or a suit of clothes.

The gentleman says that the statesmen of certain European countries "must have found good and justifiable grounds for taxing it or they would not so universally have imposed a tax." He might have mentioned also that the statesmen of most of the countries of Europe "have found good and justifiable grounds for taxing" sugar also, which he opposes with so much vehemence, and derive large revenues from it. The taxing of sugar has been in constant practice in this country, evidently for some good reason also, during our entire history, and yet the gentleman from Minnesota proposes to hold on to the tobacco tax, whose imposition is no longer needed, and wipe out the sugar duties, whose imposition gives revenue to the Government at a less percentage of cost in the collection than that obtained from tobacco, and also keeps alive an industry whose existence has been and is bound to be of some benefit to the entire country. I admit, sir, as the gentleman says, that so far as the tax is concerned "whether we pay a tax on a hogshead of Cuban sugar or Virginia tobacco, makes little difference."

But if it is the same, and if a cutting off of one can do no harm, and the cutting off of another can do irreparable damage, why not cut off the one the maintenance of which brings no compensating advantage whatever? Why not take off the one the removal of which will do no harm to anybody? Sir, the destruction of any great interest in this country which has grown up under a system of Government finance that has been in vogue since the beginning of our political existence is a matter of no small moment. Benjamin Franklin said, I believe, he that made two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a benefactor to the community; and the converse is equally true; he that destroys one blade of grass where two grew before is a curse to the community. I say, sir, as I have said before outside of this House:

Any one industry that is destroyed will cause the people employed in it to swell the ranks of the unemployed and increase the competition among those seeking employment in the other industries. I believe that every new industry that is started, opening up new channels of employment, is a blessing to the country and to all the people in it, and the destruction of any existing industry, closing up one channel of employment, is a curse to the country and to all the people in it.

The removal of the tobacco tax can be accomplished without doing any harm to anybody.

Remove this tax, sir, and do you injure the calling or employment of a single man, but do you not confer rather an actual benefit on the producers? Do you take away the bread from a single mouth? Do you injure or destroy a single consumer for the products of your farmers and your mechanics, your workshops and your fields? Remove it, and you remove burdens from the tax-payer indeed, and at the same time you do not put out the light of a single furnace fire, or stop the revolution of a single wheel, or bring want and deprivation to a single fireside or a single home. Such considerations as these have no doubt had their weight with the framers of this bill, and such considerations as these will surely overcome the opposition to the removal of this tax

I do not believe that there is any danger of adopting a policy so short-sighted as to make the entire reductions in customs alone.

The second method, making the entire reduction from the internal revenues, has also its earnest advocates. The different bills that would bring this about are yet in the committee-room, and there they seem likely to remain; hence there is no proposition of the kind now under consideration. When in time more sweeping reductions in the internal system of taxation are made, a just system of rebates should be allowed to prevent from ruin those who will have already settled the taxes. These rebates should be allowed on unbroken packages only, to cover the cost or difference in amount of taxes that have been either reduced or abolished.

This view has been earnestly advocated by the distinguished and able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], on the other side of the House, and is also held by a number of Representatives on this. Democratic conventions and Democratic Legislatures in certain States have urged and demanded this action again and again. It seems to me, sir, that the teachings of the statesmen and sages of the past have been departed from on more than one occasion to embrace the creed and bow at the shrine of sentimentalism. To advocate the large curtailment of internal taxation and its repeal as soon as practicable has the highest sanction for legislative action, especially to members on this side of the House, and recruits to that faith should be welcomed whensoever and from wheresoever they come.

A convention held at Chicago nearly four years ago, coming from the people direct, and whose explicit declarations are and must continue to be, until the next convention, the supreme law and the infallible political creed of this side of the House as members of a political party—that convention singled out the system of internal taxation for the opprobrious designation of "war tax," and intimated that the present law might not continue by pledging the proceeds of that tax for a certain purpose "so long as the law continues." No one speaks of a law in that way that is considered to be permanent. In marked contrast to this, the members of that convention forcibly and explicitly declared their adherence to the other system of taxation, asserting that—

From the foundations of the Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source Federal revenue—such they must continue to be.

Again they asserted that—

All the expenses of the Federal Government, economically administered, including pensions, interest and principal of the public debt—can be obtained, under certain conditions which they mentioned, from custom-house taxation.

The members of that convention recollected doubtless how obnoxious the internal system had been. They recalled how it had only existed twice before, and then for brief periods only. They remembered the fact that the wisest statesmen, of whom Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party, was a conspicuous exemplar, demanded and accomplished its repeal in the past. And this course has been urged—not to the extent, indeed, that Mr. Jefferson did—by men who are here to-day; men who have grown gray in the service of the country; men who have uplifted the Democratic banner in this House in struggles where the rights and the liberties of their countrymen hung trembling in the balance, whose past services can not be obliterated, whose present patriotism can not be underrated, and whose splendid abilities can not be questioned, either upon this floor or anywhere in this land!

It is a system whose tremendous taxation of alcohol used in the arts and manufactures even the sentimentalists can not justify. It prevents the building up of a number of small industries in our midst which would make new avenues of employment for our people and provide additional consumers for the productions of our farms. The gentleman from South Carolina claimed that the inauguration of any new industry that required tariff taxation for its support was a curse, not a blessing; but it seems to me, sir, that even he will admit that it will be a blessing to any country if new industries can be started and new employments given and increased consumption afforded, not by an increase but by a reduction of taxation.

This is a system of taxation, sir, which follows the farmer to his toil, abridges his rights and his liberty, and says he shall not do what he will with the products of his orchards and his fields which his own labor and God's sunshine and showers have caused to grow and ripen for his use. It lays its tribute and its restrictions upon the harvests which his own exertions have garnered, and even in the chamber of sickness and suffering adds its exactions to the cost of the medicines which alone can bring health to his stricken ones.

It is a system of governmental watching and prying into private affairs—a system which breeds, fosters, and rewards a race of informers and spies, and begets and gives temptation to corruption, evasion, and fraud, and all that is worst in human nature. It is a system which cultured Christian women have denounced in their conventions from the centers of civilization, and weeping mothers, with hungry children in their arms, have called down curses upon from their desolated mountain homes; which has every crime, beginning at deception and ending at murder, laid at its door.

These are two methods, Mr. Chairman, by which unnecessary taxation may be reduced, and if the choice were confined to one of these I should unhesitatingly choose the second, the repeal in whole or at any rate in great part of internal taxes, and in doing so I should have as my guide the illustrious example of those who by precept held this view and by action put it into practice, and whose memories will be enshrined in the admiration and affections of their countrymen for all time to come.

I should also be carrying out the views which I have expressed to the people whom I have the honor to represent, and by whom they were indorsed in meetings all over my district without a dissenting voice.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a third remedy for excessive taxation, and that is to make reductions in both systems. This plan is adopted in the bill now under consideration, and it seems to me that no bill is likely to pass which does not provide for this twofold reduction. I frankly confess that I should have preferred to see greater reductions proposed in internal taxation, and a less reduction proposed in customs duties; but if those who are opposed to any reduction in internal taxation can afford to go as far as they do in this bill, surely those who favor far more sweeping reductions can afford to surrender something also, and meet them half way upon that question.

I am glad to say, however, that this bill recognizes the fact, and in this respect it is far superior to those which preceded it, and which met an early death in the two preceding Congresses, that there can be no satisfactory or successful solution of the surplus question without a considerable reduction of internal taxes.

The tariff on the productions of my native State has had reductions dealt out with a lavish hand. Bagging, bone-black, pottery, rice, sugar, certain early vegetables, shingles, lumber, and salt, all products of Southern Louisiana, have all been either considerably reduced or put upon the free-list.

With these sacrifices proposed for us I can hardly be summoned as a proper witness to testify to the advantages in this bill. It has had these advantages pointed out by able, earnest, and eloquent orators who are fitted both by ability and by inclination far more than I am for the task. I can not rejoice, sir, while Louisiana is injured, or willingly help direct the blow that is to fall upon her. But, sir, while this bill has not been framed to suit all the views that I hold or those of the people whom I have the honor to represent, not only in the schedules affecting their interests but in certain others as well, the friends of an honest reduction in taxation may be sure that we do not shrink from bearing our share of a reduction in the taxes which are now needlessly imposed upon the people. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Are you ready to put sugar on the free-list?

Mr. WILKINSON. No; I have made no such proposition.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Would it not be as just to put sugar on the free-list as it would to put wool, a Northern product, on the free-list?

Mr. WILKINSON. I did not know before that wool was specially a Northern product, as the State of Texas, I believe, is one of the two largest wool-producing States in the Union.

The gentleman has not heard me advocating putting wool on the free-list, but there are wool-producers on this floor and representatives of large wool-growing constituencies who have advocated this policy and who are far better judges than I am as to whether the abolition of this duty will do material harm to the industry. On the other hand, men of eminence and of patriotism—men who have no sort of interest in the sugar industry, have earnestly advocated as good public policy the maintenance of the sugar duties.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman state——

Mr. WILKINSON. As my time is limited, I prefer not to yield further. I have answered the gentleman's question.

Sir, the gentlemen on the other side of this House, or many of them, at any rate, seem to have singled out the sugar industry of this country for destruction. We are threatened with wounds upon this side, death upon the other.

Denouncing as free-traders the Democrats of this House, they have themselves put forward free trade in sugar as the creed of a great number of their members; and their principle now is not protection to all American industries, but protection to some American industries.

I do not shrink from the fullest blaze of investigation of the sugar duties. They will bear the closest scrutiny, as they have done for ninety-nine years. I feel satisfied that this tax can even withstand the attacks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], with all his ability and all his parliamentary experience.

I desire to call his attention to the fact that in making his calculation of the value of the sugar industry he entirely omitted over four and a half million dollars for molasses, which is as much a product of our cane-fields as sugar is.

The gentleman from Indiana complains that the interest has been at a "standstill" and that "still the industry languishes," notwithstanding the collection of about $1,000,000,000 from sugar duties since 1861. But, sir, has the industry languished, and has it stood still?

There are two eras in the history of sugar culture in Louisiana. In each of these eras the growth of this industry contradicts the assertion that it has been or is a languishing industry. In the first era of its existence, in the decade between 1831 and 1841, the average product of sugar was 77,200 hogsheads; from 1841 to 1851, 192,327 hogsheads; from 1851 to 1861, 297,462 hogsheads. The second of these decades showed an increase in production as compared with the first of nearly 150 per cent., and the third of these periods showed an increase over the second of over 50 per cent.

But the gentleman seems to think it remarkable that the production now has not reached that of the exceptionally large crops of 1853 or 1861—the largest ever made in Louisiana. I would remind him, sir, that from a crop of only a little over 5 tons in 1864, it increased to 144,881 hogsheads in 1870, or fourteen-fold; that between 1870 and 1880 it increased to 218,314 hogsheads, or more than 50 per cent., and that the crop last year was an increase over that of 1880 of over 60,000 hogsheads, and while that was less than several of the largest of the ante-bellum crops, it exceeded those of 1855, 1856, 1859, and 1860. And this rehabilitation of the industry, this new birth and growth to sturdy proportions has been achieved under such disadvantages that even the most skeptical may well question whether it has stood still, or languished, or proved a laggard in the industrial race.

The war fell upon it with peculiar hardship and most destructive effects. The cane-fields were not like the farms, where the soldiers with the horses that had borne them to battle turned the sod, and scattered the seed, and ripened grain stood ready for the harvest where cannon-balls had plowed the earth and armies had fought and bled only a few months before.

With levees broken and destroyed and fields open to devastation from the floods; with sugar-houses dilapidated or burnt down; with costly machinery broken or destroyed; with ditches overgrown with willows and fields set in weeds, briars, and young saplings; with seed cane scarce and almost impossible to obtain—for remember that it takes nearly five tons of seed cane to plant a single acre—it was the work, sir, of years, not months, to get well under way again, even. It took time, I admit, and it took money. It took strong arms and brave hearts. It took dauntless courage, untiring energy, and arduous toil by night and by day to rebuild this industry, but we have done it. We fought the floods and they have been conquered. We have overcome the ravages of war, and in our factories and our fields have adopted such implements and machinery as American ingenuity has devised and our means have permitted us to adopt. We have contended with reductions in the tariff amounting actually to nearly 40 per cent., with constant threats in each recurring Congress of far more.

We have contended with free trade from Oceanica and bounties from Europe, with productions of Hawaii and Chinese labor pouring in unrestrained on the one hand, and exports from France and Germany artificially stimulated on the other. We have contended with falling markets and furnished to the consumers of this country this season sugar at 5½ cents for which they paid 15 in 1869.

With these difficulties in its re-establishment, with this reduction in the duties, with this competition with partial free trade and bounty, with this tremendous fall in the market, it might not have been remarkable if it had languished or stood still, or even gone back a little. But remarkable to say, it not only held its own, not only did not stand still, but actually increased in production during that period—from 1869 to 1887—310 per cent.

The gentleman from Indiana said:

For one I am not willing to longer burden the people with this tax—to longer levy by this method a tribute on every table in the land to protect this limited and sectional industry.

In these three lines or less it is remarkable what misleading statements and illogical conclusions are crowded in. He first assumes that there is or has been some special burden in this tax which the other taxes paid by the tax-payer did not possess.

Sir, in an equitable adjustment of Government revenues this tax will only be a portion of the amount levied by the Government for its necessary support. The sugar duties that will still be left in part will certainly be no more burdensome, and very certainly less burdensome, than many that will remain. I ask, sir, is it true that universal tribute is levied, or ever has been levied, whose prime object has been to protect this industry?

I frankly confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am not an impartial judge in this matter. I go further and frankly confess that I take more interest in the maintenance of these duties because under their encouragement so many of my people earn their bread than because they give such revenues to the Government. That is human nature, and human nature is the same in Louisiana as it is elsewhere. My views may be biased by a regard for the welfare of my people before any other considerations, but, sir, before I finish I shall call in the testimony of other witnesses whose judgments have not been biased by such reasons as mine may have been.

I find, sir, that some of the truest patriots and wisest statesmen have urged the maintenance of these duties, because it was wise public policy to do so. They recognized the wisdom of this policy, because they were among the simplest, the surest, the most easily collected, and the least burdensome to the tax-payer among all the sources of our revenues. Our people, through their representatives, could never have prevented the repeal of these duties up to now if the benefit to them had been the only factor or even the largest factor in their continuance.

Why, sir, have those who certainly have been moved by no local or selfish interests advocated the maintenance of these duties in large part, at least? Why did the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who stands in constant guard against wasteful, and sometimes even against liberal expenditures of the people's money—who, as much as any living man, is ever ready to lift the burdens that the people bear—why did he, when the sugar duties were attacked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], rise in his place to speak a word in their defense? Why did that clear thinker and master mind in that school of politics to which the majority of this side the House belong, the late Secretary Manning, in his report of December 6, 1886, take the ground that the sugar duty was one of "the cheapest and best taxes to retain?" After citing briefly certain objections to the removal of internal taxation on whisky and tobacco—from which views on that subject, however, I beg leave to dissent—he says with some elaboration and minute detail:

The price of sugar has fallen to an exceedingly cheap rate. Our own sugar crop is so very small a part of the total amount of sugar we consume that sugar ranks next to articles we wholly produce abroad, like tea and coffee, in suitability for taxation on the ground that its consumption is universal, that the tax is easily and cheaply collected, that the increased price paid by the consumers is an unconsidered trifle, and that what is taken from the tax-payers goes into the tax-payers' treasury, not into a few private bank accounts.

Like the casting away of the revenue from coffee and tea in 1872, the removal of the tax on sugar, which gives us our easiest and next to largest single item of revenue ($51,778,948) at an annual cost of less than 90 cents per head, is now pressed forward to avert the repeal of other taxes which are desired to operate on incidental and private benefit by enhanced prices to the domestic consumers of a large domestic product.

These incidental and private benefits, in fact, are subject to all the deductions I have already mentioned, and are subject to the chief deduction that the endeavor to make our tax laws exclude foreign competition in our home markets promotes the success of that competition, besides effectually preventing the sale of our surplus product, our labor product in foreign markets. But the incidental benefit of the sugar tax to our cane-sugar producers, who are under the harrow of beet-root sugar competition and German bounties, which have driven them to imputed processes and already lowered the price of sugar more than the whole tax, is not got by excluding foreign sugar, for the great bulk of our sweetening comes from climates more tropical than ours. Nor does it prevent our sales in foreign markets of imported sugar refined and increased in value by the processes of American labor.

Sir, the gentlemen that I have mentioned, and others of that school as honest, as sincere, as patriotic as they, have been animated by no selfish desire—as I am pardonable in having—to benefit the State of Louisiana. They recognized the fact that sugar duties furnish a greater ratio of revenue to the Government and a less ratio of tribute to the industry than any other article such as is produced in this country which is upon the whole dutiable list. The economists of that school remember the fact that while the Government received $58,000,000 in revenue, it increased the price on an amount of home production only one-ninth of the quantity imported under the tariff. That is to say that for every $9 of revenue it gave only $1 of protection. It certainly did not come within that category which has just been denounced by a State convention in Wisconsin, which creates a dangerous surplus, and "At the same time indirectly taxes the producer of the West for the sole benefit of protected manufacturers, $9 for every $1 that goes into the Treasury."

Motives of local interest may have had some share in the successful efforts to prevent the repeal of these duties, but, sir, the loftiest sentiments of the wisdom and of the patriotism of disinterested men have had far more. Upon this question the veriest extremes of political opinions have met in perfect accord. The gentlemen that I have mentioned, eminent as they are in one school of economics, reasoning from their point of view, have arrived at a conclusion on this duty precisely the same as did the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], the great master of the opposite school of economics, and reasoning from an entirely contrary standpoint from theirs.

This is corroborative testimony of the strongest kind to show what little justice there is in the assaults of the gentleman from Indiana.

It may be said that this article which produces revenue with such facility to the Government and at the same time such small cost to the individual had better be put on the free-list, because revenues are not now so much needed as curtailment. I think, sir, curtailment in taxation is what is wanted, at least as much as curtailment in revenue. A curtailment in revenue does not mean necessarily a curtailment in taxation and might mean just the reverse. Revenues might be diminished by increasing taxation. And however necessary may be a reduction in revenue, it will not do to forget that such reduction should be made as would most benefit the tax-payer. He is a very important factor in this problem, and one that seems to be occasionally lost sight of.

I have called the attention of the gentleman from Indiana before to the fact that the present tariff on sugar is very considerably below the war-tariff rate. I speak of the acts levied in 1864, when the Government expenses were at their highest. From 1864 to 1870 the rate was 3 cents on the lowest grade and 5 cents on the highest, or an average of 4 cents per pound. The rate was reduced in 1870, increased in 1875, and reduced again in 1883, until now it is 1.4 cents on the lowest and 3½ cents on the highest. It is, therefore, now 38¾ per cent. below the war-tariff rate, and the present bill proposes to reduce it still further, to 1.15 on the lowest and 2⅘ on the highest, or a proposed average of 1.97½ now, against an average of 4 cents, or more than 50 per cent. reduction over the average rates of the longest period of war-tariff taxation. Thus, sir, the war tariff (1864 to 1870) per pound was more than 100 per cent. higher than is proposed under the schedules of the bill now under discussion. The rate of sugar duties under this bill has been so curtailed that the proposed reductions, added to the repeated reductions made already, have reached a point when it is a grave question with those engaged in the sugar industry whether their livelihood will not be seriously jeopardized and whether our industry can be sustained under them. But whatever difficulties the future may have in store for us, we shall endeavor to meet them as they arise and overcome them if we can.

Sir, the sugar duties were levied under the first act that was passed after the adoption of the Constitution. Even the gentleman from Indiana will hardly urge that they were levied and kept up for fourteen years for the benefit of Louisiana when during these years she was in possession of foreign powers.

And yet, the first tariff act levied an average duty of 2 cents per pound, which was increased by four successive enactments until in 1812, when duty was placed at 5 cents for raw and 18 cents for refined, or an average of 11½ cents per pound, and from then on until the low-tariff periods, commencing in 1846, it averaged 6½ cents per pound. Even throwing in the low-tariff periods, I am within bounds in saying that the average tariff on sugar of all the tariff bills affecting that article from 1789 to 1861 was, per pound, more than 200 per cent. higher than it is in the schedules of the bill now before this House.

The gentleman from Indiana speaks of the sugar duties as "this monstrous taxation." Let us see if it is. The Government needs about $320,000,000 per annum to run it. The tax-payers have to pay this amount by taxation, no matter what is put upon the free-list. If a part of this sum is paid in sugar duties, does that make the taxation any more "monstrous" than if it were paid in something else? Sir, the sugar tax is one that has commended itself to our legislators as a source of revenue ever since the foundation of the Government. It gives a large revenue and at the same time very little burden to the consumer outside of the necessity of his contribution to support the Government. It costs less to collect than any other large Government revenue.

The rich use more than the poor, thereby contributing a greater share of taxation, as they should, by the consumption of it, and I am at a loss to see, sir, on what just grounds it should be singled out as "monstrous" by the gentleman from Indiana.

Pity, sir, that Madison is not here to learn from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that the taxation which he first proposed is so "monstrous!" Pity that he lived and died without finding out what a wrong he had done! I would that I could summon, to learn wisdom from the lips of him who has made this startling discovery, the Senators and Representatives of all the Congresses from 1789 to 1883 who have thought otherwise. Most of them are where no voice can reach them; but members who have served with honor in the Congresses of the later portion of that period are here to-day, and it is not too late for them to learn what a woeful mistake they made.

If the dead could be here with the living there would be witnesses that passed the acts of 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1794, 1795, 1797, 1800, 1804, 1807, 1808, 1824, 1825, 1828, 1830, 1832, 1836, 1841, 1842, 1846, 1857, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1870, 1872, 1874, 1875, 1880, 1882, 1883—all taxing or leaving taxed this article—making an array both in numbers and in statesmanship beside which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] would be as a grain of sand among the millions of the shore, or as a little twinkling star in all that bright array whose steady light decks with splendor the firmament of heaven. [Applause.]

All these hosts, the names of so many of whom our lips in childhood learned to call patriots and sages—if the views of the gentleman from Indiana are just—were dullards, who had mistaken their calling, or, by reason of instituting and maintaining a taxation so "monstrous," deserve to live in history, not as we know them now, but as tyrants and oppressors of their people! [Applause.]

And what, sir, is to be the remedy for this "monstrous taxation?" "Pay bounties," he says. Only add a little more taxation and make it a little more "monstrous." If, sir, the sugar duties are singled out to throw overboard and other duties maintained as high as now, will the tax-payer be a gainer by that rather than by some more equitable plan of revenue reduction? The $320,000,000 will have to be raised to support the Government and high tariffs kept up on other things that are more oppressive to the people than the sugar duties have ever been. "We must adopt a method of protection less costly," he urges, and in the same breath proposes to increase the cost of Government by adding to taxation a few millions of bounties now, which would be far more as the industry gets bigger. Add fresh millions to the $320,000,000 that the tax-payer will have to pay even under remodeled tax laws. Make the tax-payer happy, the gentleman proposes; but how? In lightened burdens? No! But by still more indulgence in that delightful occupation in which he is already such an adept, going down in his pocket for more! [Applause.]

Sir, this bounty plan will never pass Congress, or would never be maintained if it did, by the representatives of a people who could claim with equal right bounties on wheat or corn, on mules or hogs or bacon. Sirs, on the part of my people I thank you for such portion of your proffered charity as might have been meant for us. However well meant your intentions may be, we are not asking to be made the beneficiaries of any class legislation. We can not ask that ourselves, our families, and the maintenance of our pursuits shall be placed as burdens upon the shoulders of this American people. They have burdens enough upon them now, and I or mine do not care to add one jot or tittle more!

If these plans are suggested to encourage and build up a great national sugar industry, of which beets on the Pacific Coast and sorghum in Kansas and elsewhere are to be large components in the future, they will woefully fail of their object. Even if you gentlemen were successful in the first part of your proposition and could repeal the sugar duties, I do not believe the American people would ever consent that you should substitute bounties in their stead, building up and maintaining thereby a favored class by contributions from the pockets of every tax-payer in the land. Sir, the present system of duties can encourage the different branches of the sugar industry, and there is no need to devise a new plan of encouragement, which is open to the objections which this proposed plan has, and which, in the manner that has been suggested, has not even the justification of present European example.

Sir, this article has ever been a favorite subject of revenue, not only here but abroad. In all our years of peace, in all our years of war it has performed no mean part in the support of the Government.

Gentlemen may say that the need for the collection of these large revenues is past. It is not past, sir, until the Government with its tremendous expenses is ready to go on without cost. From 1789 to 1846, when governmental expenditures were only an average of less than one-tenth what they are now, these duties were considered just and wise at an average rate per pound 300 per cent. higher than they are now. Sir, the war has indeed gone, and its angry thunders hushed, I trust for generations to come, but the obligations of its plighted faith are here to its creditors on the one hand and to its valiant defenders on the other.

The need for these duties, or at any rate such portion of them which this bill proposes to retain, is not past while we have our rivers to improve, our harbors to deepen, our navies to build, our seacoast to defend, and a government to uphold and support in its beneficent functions for the welfare of its people and the honor and glory of its flag.

Destroy this industry if you will, gentlemen of that new creed, the "selected protection" faith, and the Government will go on at no less cost than now.

Destroy this industry if you will and drive to distress the people who earn their bread in its pursuit, and give, instead, the glowing figures of your rhetoric, and your apostrophes to a prosperity which will be gone. Abolish this duty under whose encouragement our forests have been felled, our lands reclaimed, our factories erected, and our fields made to support a population as numerous, I believe, in proportion to the area of cultivation as is supported by any other agricultural section in America—a source of revenue in war and peace alike, which all parties have found wise, expedient, and just, from the time of Washington, without a single exception, until now.

Destroy it, sir, if you will, and if you think to lighten the burdens upon the shoulders of the people by abolishing this tax and maintaining instead, unimpaired, others that are far more burdensome to the people, you will be grievously mistaken. Sir, those interested in sugar culture in Louisiana have never asked the imposition of any needless burdens on the tax-payers of this country in order that they might be benefited thereby. The revenue needs and wants of the Government will afford incidental encouragement, if properly adjusted, to every existing industry dependent for successful maintenance upon the continuance of a tariff, ours among the rest.

Forget the precepts of Jackson, that we should produce in this country everything essential to our national independence, and learn no experience from the fact that the cause to which was due the origin of the culture of sugar in France was that in time of war the price went up to $1.25 a pound.

Unbar our doors to Cuba, and let her chief product pour in without a hinderance. Little matter if under the guns of Moro Castle our corn, our bacon, our hams, and our flour are made to pay tremendous tribute to the depleted treasury of Spain.

Open wide our gates to the beet sugars of Germany and France, and send our hard-earned moneys across the sea to enrich the farmers there. What matters it to our own farmers if the products of their fields are restricted by high tariffs at the ports of those countries and some that are most valuable are not restricted only, but outlawed and forbidden to come in?

Unlearn, sir, the lesson that the wise Government experiments have lately taught, that the capacity of this Government for sugar production is not confined to the lands which lie along our Southern Gulf. Shut up the little fountain of supply which is trickling forth in New Jersey, and which may be destined to prove, to that State, the beginning of a veritable Rio Grande—a great river of wealth and comforts and blessings to her people.

Shut your ears to the sounds that come from Kansas, whose people—with an energy and an intelligence which difficulties have not daunted, and repeated failures have not discouraged—seem at last to have been successful in their efforts to found a new industry in that State.

Ignore, if you choose, the climatic advantages of Florida and the preparations now commenced to develop her resources, the steady increase of production in Louisiana, the rapid strides now being made in Texas both in improved cultivation and improved manufacture, and the effort to do what has never before been done in the world—to grow and manufacture two sugar-producing plants, sugar-cane and sorghum, side by side in the same factory and in adjoining fields. Blind your eyes, to the bright prospects which seem in store for the States upon our Pacific coast in following that pursuit, and cease to remember that California has long demonstrated her capacity for beet-sugar production, and now seems about to show her plains will produce in time from beets far more than her mountains gave up in gold.

Destroy this industry if you will, and constituents whom I know of members on this floor from other States than mine will rue its destruction. Green vales of Kentucky, coal-mines of Pennsylvania, cornfields of Kansas, flour-mills of Minnesota—workshops and foundries of Boston and New York, of Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and Toledo—farmers and mechanics of more than twenty-five States will then find one large purchaser of their products blotted from off the industrial map.

This industry, so different from others that we have, gives life to trade because it is so different. It diversifies agriculture, quickens commerce, builds up manufactures. Wheat-fields ripen for it, wheels fly round for it, lathes revolve and anvils ring, and liquid metal is poured into useful forms for it. To carry its products rail-cars speed on land and steam-boats plow the rivers and great ocean ships breast the seas.

Adopt this course, and hard may be the lot for years to come, not only of ourselves, but of others dependent in some measure on our existence whose injury you little dream of now. The distress will not stop with us. The ripple on the pond where some object falls spreads fast to the shore which is farthest from the spot where its stillness was first broken. Many will go away and engage in other pursuits. The avocations now so full will have thousands more clamoring for work, and the laboring man far from Louisiana may yet feel the hardship of the bitter competition of others whose employment is gone for his daily occupation and his bread. Some would go West to raising wheat and corn; others to the States around to raising cotton. Hoist the farmer's flag, O Representative from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and inscribe upon it: "Long live competitors! Down with consumers! More corn; more wheat! This is our pressing need; our want long felt! Grow corn cheap enough not only to make the food, but to make the fire to cook it by; wheat cheap enough to undersell the Indian helot in the markets of his empress!"

Strike down this industry if you will, gentlemen of the "selected protection" faith! Put out its blazing furnaces; silence its busy sounds; devote its emerald fields to devastating floods and its dense population to distress; but the tall smoke-stacks of its factories will remain as lasting monuments to your lack of wisdom and of statesmanship, and mayhap, indeed, of humanity!

But think not that you can offer destruction in the one hand and prosperity in the other. You can not give life and death together. Think not, sirs, to satisfy the qualms of conscience for an abandonment of principle by talking of bounties. The two systems of taxation that we have are one too many now. Pause long before you try to write a third upon our statutes.

And seek to found no favored class by means of new burdens upon the people. It were better far by some wise plan, bringing relief to all and ruin to none, to join in some patriotic effort to try and take the burdens off, not pile them on. [Great applause.]

[Mr. BRUMM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman to answer the question that I proposed to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. CLEMENTS withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has arrived at which the Committee of the Whole, by order of the House, must rise.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to say that I yield the residue of my time to my colleague [Mr. CANDLER].

The committee rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis., asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PALMER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. GIBSON.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 339) for the relief of J. E. Pilcher; and

A bill (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis;

A bill (S. 129) for the erection of a public building at Chester, Pa.; and

A bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

And then (the hour of half past 5 o'clock having arrived) the House, in pursuance of its previous order, took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 10, 1888.

Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session to-day.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YARDLEY] has the floor.

Mr. YARDLEY. Before proceeding I desire to yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN].

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. Chairman, a glance at the provisions of this bill would indicate that this wonderful production of star-chamber gestation had been conceived in malice and brought forth in hatred of the institutions and the manufacturing establishments of the Northern States. I find by a careful perusal of the bill that as far as it was possible to do so the framers of this wonderful measure have maintained the protection which the tariff affords to the principal industries of the South, and have allowed the Northern States to whistle for the breeze of protection. In the original bill, concocted by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, the tariff on sugar was cut quite severely. Then came a cry from Louisiana, "We shall lose the State."

The State election was close at hand, and fears were entertained of the effect of the first step towards free trade upon the future of the Democratic party. There was a conference, and as a consequence when the bill appeared in the House again we find that the sugar schedule has been fixed up so as to be less objectionable to the Louisiana sugar-planters. Here, Mr. Chairman, is a tax which is borne directly by every household in the land. It is a direct tax upon the consumer and has absolutely nothing to commend it, aside from the protection which it affords to the few planters of Louisiana who are trying to fly in the face of Providence and to force from the soil of the United States what it is incapable of producing, namely, a sufficient quantity of cane-sugar to supply the home demand.

The sugar tax, Mr. Chairman, is about the only tax on imports which comes solely and directly out of the pockets of the people, and the reason is that nine-tenths of all the sugar used in the United States to-day is imported, against one-tenth which is produced in this country. Yet, sir, I fail to find in the wonderful message submitted by the President to this Congress one word or suggestion for the removal of this tax which, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] pointed out to-day, amounts to upwards of $1 per capita per annum for the entire population. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speakers on the other side of this Chamber, but up to the present time I have failed to hear one of them arise and advocate the abolition of the tax upon sugar.

I have failed, too, to hear the first gentleman from the Southern States advocate the repeal of the duty upon rice. Rice is another Southern product, and the rice industry can scarcely be said to be of the "infant" variety. Rice, Mr. Chairman, is a staple food product which enters largely into the domestic economy of nearly every family in the United States. The tax upon rice is borne by the poor man (if the theory that the tariff is paid by the consumer is well founded), for the poor man uses more rice than the rich one. The tariff on rice benefits a few thousand Southern planters, and is another tax upon the breakfast-table. The protection afforded by the tariff has not served to stimulate production to such an extent as to bring the inevitable reduction in price which competition has invariably brought in the case of every manufactured product protected by the tariff.

Sugar, rice, and salt, Mr. Chairman, are necessities in every household. Sugar and rice are taxed to the extent of 2 cents per pound and upwards by the Mills bill. The removal of the duties on sugar and rice would go a long way towards wiping out our surplus and would be a relief to the consumers of those products. Salt at present pays a duty of less than one-twelfth of 1 cent per pound, yet the framers of this bill propose as a remedy for the gorged Treasury to remove the duty of one-twelfth of 1 cent per pound on salt and to allow the duties on sugar and rice to remain practically undisturbed. Yet when we consider that this measure was prepared by the eight Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee, and that of the eight, six are from the Southern States, and that New York, New England, and the other great manufacturing States, except only Pennsylvania, were entirely ignored when the majority of the committee was selected, it is not surprising that the protection afforded by the tariff to the States of the South is to be maintained, even if the Northern manufacturing interests are all wiped from the face of the earth.

I desire to appeal to this House in behalf of a large section of my district. The manufacture of salt, Mr. Chairman, is one of the oldest industries in the United States, and Syracuse is one of the first places on this continent in which the production of salt was begun. It is not, as is claimed for many of the industries of this country, a mere infant, but it has been carried on for more than one hundred years by the Indians and by the whites in the vicinity of the city in which I live. It is argued that the tax upon salt is a burden upon the American people; yet, Mr. Chairman, it is a tariff so light that I doubt if there is a tax in existence to-day which is borne with so little sense of burden as this one. Statistics show the average consumption of salt in the United States to be 50 or 60 pounds per capita. The tariff upon salt is only 8 cents per hundred pounds, so that it will be seen that the tariff, even if we admit for the sake of argument that it is paid by the consumer, does not amount to more than 5 cents per annum for each individual.

The President, in his annual message, said:

These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. * * * Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer.

But is the tariff paid by the consumer? I claim that in this instance, at least, it is not. On the contrary, the foreign shipper pays tax upon the salt which he sells in the American market in order that he may enjoy the benefits of this market. That this is true seems to be amply demonstrated in the fact that the salt manufacturer of Syracuse, in spite of the protection which the tariff affords, sells his product near its actual cost that he really loses the interest on his entire investment instead of making a profit.

There was manufactured at Syracuse last year over 6,000,000 bushels of salt, which sold at an average price of 7.84 cents per bushel, making the price, after the passage of this bill—if the President is correct—3.34 cents per bushel. What nonsense!

In this connection I can only say that if the amount of tax paid upon a hundred pounds of salt is really borne by the consumer, it would follow that the protective benefit of the tax would accrue in part to the owner of the salt works. It would seem, too, that the price of salt per pound would have increased since the tariff was adopted.

Mr. MCCREARY, of Kentucky, in speaking of salt, in his recent remarks on the measure under discussion, said:

> The salt manufacturers of this country are protected by a duty on imported foreign salt equal to about 100 per cent. This has had the effect of building up a number of wealthy and powerful companies.
> Salt is a raw material in cheese-making, butter-making, and in meat-packing—three interests that exceed the salt-making interest tenfold—but our tariff policy forbids our dairymen and meat-packers from buying cheap imported salt, and compels them to buy from the protected home manufacturers in New York, Michigan, and Ohio, at a price which is nearly doubled by the tariff duty.

Yet I will show by testimony which can not be refuted that instead of the enormous profit of 8 cents per 100 pounds—for this profit would be considered enormous at the present time—our manufacturers have not made a dollar during the last three years, and the entire difference in the amount received from the refined product in excess of the cost of the brine and the charge for transportation and packing, went to the laborers in the salt fields and works.

Before the policy of protection was adopted the price of salt ranged in the vicinity of 40 cents per bushel. To-day it is sold at less than 8 cents per bushel of 56 pounds.

If the tariff tax has been added to the price of the salt itself, will some gentleman upon the other side—some one of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee—tell this House by what arithmetical calculation the addition of 4½ cents, the tax on a bushel of salt, to 40 cents, the price before the present tariff was adopted, can be made to equal 8 cents?

The truth is, sir, that the discovery of fresh deposits of salt in one place after another in this country, the improved methods of production, and constant, ever-growing desire on the part of manufacturers to increase the supply, are more than sufficient to keep the price down to such a figure that there can be no danger of oppression.

Ten years ago, Mr. Chairman, the only salt works in the State of New York were found in the neighborhood of Syracuse. In the year 1878 the Onondaga district produced a total of 7,176,197 bushels of all grades of salt. At that time the Warsaw field had not been developed. In 1886 the total product of the same district was 6,101,757 bushels, and to this must be added 6,056,060 bushels as the output of the Warsaw, N. Y., district, which has in ten years grown to be one of the great salt regions of this country. I am advised also that a new deposit of salt has just been discovered in New York State. A well sunk at Ithaca has traversed through 27 feet of solid salt of excellent quality.

If the present tariff is allowed to remain undisturbed this new field will doubtless add millions of bushels of salt each year to the production of the State, and it certainly will not serve to increase the price to the consumer. There is no "crying demand" for the removal of the present duty. It is not an onerous tax; it is not felt by any one; it does not cause the slightest distress; it does not increase the price of salt consumed by the average American citizen to the extent of one cent a year. It simply acts as a bar to the unlimited dumping upon our shores of the cheap product of the poorly-paid laborers of Cheshire and continental Europe.

I speak, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the laboring men of my district. There are employed in the salt industry in Onondaga County upwards of one thousand five hundred persons, who depend for a living upon their earnings in these salt fields. Many of these men were born salt-makers. Their fathers occupied similar positions before them. They are not imported laborers brought here to drive out honest American citizens who have struck against oppression. They are not tramps and loafers who have no interests at stake. They are as hard-working, as honest, and as industrious a class of people as can be found in the United States to-day. Many of them have succeeded in saving enough from their earnings to buy small houses. It is not cant when I assert positively that the removal of the duty upon salt to-day would entirely close up every salt well in the State of New York.

The reservation upon which the salt springs are found in Onondaga County is owned by the State. Each manufacturer pays to the State 1 cent per bushel for each bushel of salt produced. It costs our people nearly 7 cents per bushel to manufacture salt. A bushel of salt weighs 56 pounds. The actual cost of the salt at the wells, therefore, without transportation charges, is, approximately, $2.75 per ton. It is shown by the statement of the importers of English salt, who are asking that this duty be repealed, that salt can be produced in Cheshire, England, for 54 cents per ton. The difference in cost between English salt and that produced in Syracuse is paid entirely to the laboring population and the three thousand five hundred people who are employed in our State, and who must of necessity be deprived of their employment if this protective tariff is to be removed.

I appeal to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and ask him whether free salt under these circumstances would be consistent with his extreme solicitude about the poor man's blankets, upon which his bill imposes a uniform duty of 40 per cent. I appeal to his colleagues on that committee, Messrs. BRECKINRIDGES, TURNER, WILSON, SCOTT, and MCMILLIN, not to wipe out this only protection which there is for the people who are dependent upon this industry for their living. I say to them, will you sweep away all protection from this product, of which 90 per cent. of the cost is the labor, and retain a duty of 2 cents per pound upon such necessary articles of food as sugar and rice, agricultural products of Democratic Southern States, while the Northern agricultural products, with which the Canadians can compete, are put on the free-list?

The employés of the salt-works in my district, Mr. Chairman, are largely Democratic, and I feel that my colleagues from New York City, who are put down among those certain to vote for this bill, will not go so far as to deprive the people who are employed in the manufacture of this staple in Onondaga County of the protection which insures them their wages. It would be absolutely impossible to continue the manufacture of salt in competition with the English products if the tariff is removed. Salt can be placed in New York City to-day, brought over, as it frequently is, as ballast in ocean steam-ships, at a less price than the manufacturers of Syracuse can place it there. This is due primarily to the fact that the British salt is manufactured for less than one-fifth of the cost of the New York State salt. The transportation from Syracuse to New York costs more than from Liverpool to New York, for the simple reason that ocean steam-ships coming west for cargoes are compelled to carry ballast, and they find salt more remunerative than sand.

I would call the attention of my friends upon the other side to the statement which I shall submit with this, coming from one of the best-known men in our State, the Hon. George F. Comstock, ex-chief-justice of the court of appeals, whose probity has never been questioned, and the only thing that has ever been said against whom is that he has been used as a figure-head to give respectability to Democratic meetings.

Of the company which he designates as the Dairy Company, he was the founder, and he has been connected with the salt-producing interests of the State for upwards of twenty-five years. Judge Comstock has kept himself thoroughly posted upon the subject of the labor and material used in the purification of common salt for purposes of the dairy and the table, and is as familiar as any man in the State of New York with the items of expense in producing salt.

He says that there never was a more baseless assumption than that American producers of this article are unreasonably prosperous through their exactions upon the public. Accompanying the affidavit which he submits herewith he produces another signed by Thomas Molloy and John W. Barker, both Democrats, who have been identified with the same interest, and for whose veracity and trustworthiness he absolutely vouches. These men positively swear that for the preceding three years the net receipts per bushel at the works was 6.617 of a cent, after deducting the expense of sale and the State duty on salt, which is 1 cent per bushel, packing, etc. The actual cost of producing such salt was 6.67 cents per bushel, making an actual net loss on every bushel produced. It would seem to need no demonstration therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the entire cost of the salt, exclusive of the amount paid to the State for the use of the brine, has been paid to the laborers who worked in the salt factories and fields.

It is very natural, sir, that the foreign producers of salt should desire to strike down all the barriers which prevent the free admission of the products of their salt wells into the United States. The United States consumes at present about 1,500,000 tons of salt per annum, of which about one-third is now imported from abroad. A large quantity of this imported product comes in because of the erroneous impression that British salt is better than the American product. British fine table salt sells to-day in the markets of the United States for a price far in advance of the American salt of the same grade, even when the import duty is allowed. The reason for this is that some people in this country imagine that everything British is better than the American articles. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the American salt manufacturers to day can produce dairy and table salt equal in every respect to that manufactured in England or anywhere else. This is demonstrated in the statements of the importers themselves, who complain that some American manufacturers put their salt up in bags identical in every respect with the bags used by the British manufacturers and no one can tell the difference.

In all tests which have been made wherein the American salt has come into competition with the foreign article, the American manufacturer has invariably come out ahead. In the four years between 1851 and 1854 the United States Government instituted a series of tests of the preservative qualities of Onondaga solar salt, as compared with the salt from Turk's Island. Three hundred barrels of pork were packed with salt of both descriptions. The hogs were especially fattened and split in two, half of each hog being treated with foreign salt, and the other half with Onondaga salt. The pork was shipped to different Army posts, and in nearly every instance the officer in command testified that the meat preserved by the aid of native salt was sweeter, better in appearance, more economical in the boiling, and more acceptable to the soldiers.

In my remarks I have referred to the salt industries of my own districts more frequently than to those of Michigan, Louisiana, or some of the other States where salt is produced, because I know more of the facts relating to the Onondaga salt industries than I do of those in any of the other sections. Further than this, my district would be more disastrously affected by the removal of the duty upon foreign salt than would the salt interest of Michigan, for the reason that we are nearer the seaboard and consequently come into closer competition with the Liverpool salt brought over here as ballast than do the Michigan manufacturers.

I have said before, Mr. Chairman, that the removal of the duty, small as it is, upon salt would disastrously affect and probably wipe out the production of this commodity in the State of New York. I base my assertion in this respect upon well-known facts. For instance, in the year 1802 there was invested in Barnstable County, Massachusetts, $130,000 of capital in the salt industry. This investment paid a profit of 25 per cent. under the duty then collected, which was 20 cents per bushel, the duty having been increased in 1798 from 12 to 20 cents a bushel, with an additional 10 per cent. when brought to this country in foreign vessels. In 1807 this duty was repealed, and was not reimposed until 1813. From 1807, the year in which Congress enacted the legislation repealing the duty on salt, up to 1813 the product of the Massachusetts salt-works steadily declined until it had almost entirely disappeared. From 1813, under the protection of the tariff of that year, the industry revived and extended steadily from year to year until 1830, when the duty was again reduced, and from that time forward the production of salt seems to have steadily diminished.

Our laborers to-day receive from $1.12½ to $2.50 a day, according to the character of the work performed and the skill required. The highest wages are of course paid for night work. If you insist upon passing this bill in its present form the result must be the reduction of wages in New York State to something like 75 cents per day in order to meet the cut. It is not likely that the men could afford to work at this rate of starvation wages. While they are contented and happy at present, they would be compelled to seek other employment if forced to the alternative of accepting the lower wage or quitting the business. Consequently we may predict with absolute certainty that to repeal the duty on salt will close up the great number of salt manufactories in New York State.

Right here I call the attention of this House to the importance of the industry. The following tables, taken from the "Mineral Resources of the United States for the year 1886," published by the Geological Survey, gives the production of the salt wells in the Onondaga district for the past one hundred years. They show, Mr. Chairman, that the industry has been steadily maintained and that it has continued to furnish employment for a century to a large number of industrious and useful citizens. The following is a statement of the number of bushels of salt made at the Onondaga salt springs since June 20, 1797, the date of the first lease:

From the same source I take a table of the average price per barrel of Michigan salt for twenty-one years. This will show conclusively, I think, that the existing tariff, instead of increasing the cost of salt to the consumer, has, by judiciously fostering the production and by the wise protection afforded against the foreign product, caused a steady decline in price, until now it has reached the point where a barrel of 5 bushels can be bought for 46 cents, exclusive of the package.

It is argued by the advocates of this bill that its passage would secure cheaper articles to the consumer. This argument is an absolute fallacy as far as it relates to salt. The history of the salt industry during the last eighty-five years, Mr. Chairman, shows conclusively that American salt can be supplied far more cheaply than foreign salt. The immediate effect of the removal of the tariff would be, perhaps, a lower retail price, but this would not long remain; just so soon as American manufactories had been closed up the price of the foreign product would advance once more. The foreign manufacturer sells his product at cost or below cost so long as competition exists; when that competition has been killed off his prices inevitably advance.

The British manufacturer is always our opponent; the policy of our British friends has always been to kill off competition and then to monopolize the market at figures to suit themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I have confined myself mainly to this single industry because it more closely affects the people of my district than it does the constituents of any other member of this House; but I would be derelict to the welfare of the people I represent if I should neglect to call the attention of this House to the destructive, inequitable, inconsistent, and sectional provisions of this bill.

It is proposed to radically reduce the import duty upon window-glass, which is now sold at a bare fraction of profit above the cost of the labor and material used in its manufacture. If this schedule is adopted the result will be that even with a reduction of 30 per cent. in the wages of the employés of the glass factories of Syracuse, the imported glass made by the underpaid mechanics of Europe will drive our American product out of the market.

It is the fashion on the other side of this Chamber to traduce and villify the enterprising men of this country who chose trade rather than the profession of the law as a means of livelihood. Yet it is these men who have built up this country, and it is to them that Syracuse, my home city, owes a large measure of her prosperity. It is to them, too, that is due the credit of the low prices which prevail in all the commodities. We have heard a great many absurd statements relative to the advantages which accrue to the purchaser of clothing on the other side of the ocean. It is true that the finer grades of clothing may be bought for less money in London than in the cities of the United States. But in all other grades the American purchaser has a great advantage. He can buy in the United States clothing that for appearance and workmanship is infinitely superior to the English, French, or German article. Syracuse has thousands of hands employed in the manufacture of clothing, and the industry, like others of the North, is to receive a severe blow if this bill becomes a law.

It strikes a blow at nearly every industry in the district I represent. One of our native-born citizens conceived and established in our midst a soda-ash manufactory, alluded to by Mr. BURROWS, who said:

> But a more forcible illustration, if possible, of the unsoundness of the President's theory is found in the history of a recently established industry in his own State. Previous to 1884 there was not a pound of soda-ash manufactured in the United States. We consume annually 175,000 tons in the manufacture of glass and other American products. Previous to 1884 we imported every pound of it at an average cost of $48 a ton. A duty of $5 was imposed, and the Solvay Process Company was organized at Syracuse, the only one on this hemisphere, at a cost of $1,500,000, with a capacity of 50,000 tons annually. It commenced manufacturing soda-ash in January, 1884. How has it affected the price of this commodity? Was the duty of $5 added to the $48, advancing the cost to $53 a ton? On the contrary, it fell in the American market as low as $28 a ton in three years, a saving to the people annually of $20 a ton on the entire consumption of the 175,000 tons, or $3,500,000.

Another one, commencing as a poor boy, has established and made successful extensive works for manufacturing refined steel, which were among the first and are equal to the best in the United States, and have caused the celebrated Sanderson Company of Sheffield, England, to establish works there under his supervision.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, we have in our midst almost every conceivable industry established by our own enterprising citizens, furnishing employment to thousands of honest, industrious, and thriving workingmen who will (now that the mask has been removed) vote to sustain and not to strike down these magnificent enterprises, thereby preventing disaster and ruin to themselves.

The men who labor with their hands in the State of New York will not be likely to sit idly by in the coming elections and permit the return of the men who are striving to deprive them of their employment by forcing this legislation upon the country. The mechanics of this country who were born on foreign shores came to the United States for the purpose of bettering their condition. They know the value of protection because they have profited under its benign influence. Their sons have grown up and have become prosperous under the policy which is rapidly making the United States the greatest manufacturing country on the face of the globe. They will not be likely to indorse the legislation which reduces their wages and diminishes their prosperity. This country is still young, but it is vigorous and thriving. England's commerce was not built up in a decade, nor even in a century. Protection is responsible for her commerce to-day. When the American States were English Colonies they were prohibited from engaging in manufactures. If this bill is allowed to become a law the prohibition will be re-established, not by the Government of Great Britain, but by the very men who have been elevated to power by the laboring people themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had as much experience with the laboring men of this country, perhaps, as any other member of this House. I know them as intimately as any gentleman on this floor. I know that they are not to be fooled by the specious arguments of the free-trade advocates. They are not fools; on the contrary, they are usually far better posted upon matters of political economy than men who have had greater advantages. If the gentlemen who are trying to force this bill through the House think they can hoodwink these people they are doomed to disappointment. The man who buys a pair of pantaloons for $1 can not be fooled into believing that he pays a tax of $2 upon those garments because the tariff is 40 cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. The workingmen of this country are and always have been, since the adoption of the policy of protection, better paid than their fellows in Europe. They know this, and the knowledge is sufficient for them. Prosperity under protection has been realized; they will not care to try the experiment of bettering themselves with lower wages. You gentlemen who have expended your eloquence in advocating this bill are vainly striving to gain votes from the men who know that your theories are unsound. They have intelligence enough to vote for their interests, and I tell you here and now that they will never indorse the men who ask their suffrages after voting to reduce their earnings.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will present to the consideration of this House the affidavit of Judge George F. Comstock and others, to which I before alluded. It is an argument in itself against the proposed reduction, substantiating in a manner that can not be refuted every statement I have made and proving beyond all question that domestic salt is now being and for years has been sold in New York for less than the cost of production.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of Onondaga, ss:

George F. Comstock, of the city of Syracuse, in said county and State, declares upon oath as follows:

I have resided in said city fifty-three years, and for more than fifty years I have practiced in my profession of the law continuously, save and except a term of six years when I was judge and chief judge of the court of appeals in said State, and one or two shorter periods when I held public office.

More than forty years ago I came to be the possessor of a considerable interest in the manufacture of salt from the brine, belonging to the State of New York, which are found by the sinking of artesian wells upon the lands of the State situated in and contiguous to the said city, the said brines having been reserved and excepted when the State sold such lands or any portion thereof, which said wells are now usually sunk to the depth of about 400 feet.

It has been the custom of the State under its laws to sink these wells and to raise the brine into tanks elevated above the surface of the earth, and then to distribute it through conduit logs or pipes to the different salt manufactories, which are in all cases owned by private individual associations or corporations organized under the State laws. The State imposes a tax or duty of 1 cent per bushel to be paid by the private manufacturers as compensation for the use of the brine and for the services aforesaid.

It is within my knowledge that for twenty-eight years last past the business of making and selling salt from the State brines aforesaid has been carried on continuously at a particular place in the city of Syracuse by associations or corporations created and organized under the laws of the State for that purpose. From the year 1860 to this time my interest in the salt business and my relations to its management have required and received from me all the attention which the engrossing duties of my profession would permit.

I became in 1860 the president of a salt manufacturing corporation organized in the year 1860 in accordance with the general laws of the State enacted in 1848 for the formation of such corporations, and I continued to be such president until the year 1872, when it ceased to do business except to wind up its affairs. I was then judicially appointed receiver of its property. The debts of that company have been paid, and its shareholders have received dividends on their shares amounting in the aggregate to between 70 and 80 per cent. of the par value thereof

I omit to state further details of the history of that company because I assume that such details would be irrelevant, understanding, as I do, that the present inquiry before the House of Representatives in Congress has relation rather to the present condition of the salt manufacture and trade in the United States.

The company which I have above referred to took offices at the commencement of its business at the place in Syracuse already mentioned, occupied it until 1872, and during all that period has the control of the greater portion of the salt business carried on in and near to Syracuse in respect both to the production and sale of salt.

When it went out of business, as before stated, in 1872, it was succeeded, after a short interval, by another legally organized association, which was called "The American Dairy Salt Company," formed under the same authorizing statute, namely, the act of 1848. This company carried on its business in the same general office in Syracuse already mentioned, and while so doing reorganized itself under a special authority contained in an act passed in the year 1875, which was a general act authorizing the formation of companies for the transaction of "any lawful business." The new company adopted the same name with the word "limited" at the end thereof. Both these companies may be considered as one for all present purposes, and they will be hereinafter called the dairy company for the sake of brevity.

I was the founder of the dairy company, became one of its managers and the president, and have so continued to the present time. It has been and now is a large producer of common as well as dairy and table salt, and much larger than any other person or company. From the commencement of its business it has kept its principal and central office in Syracuse at the same place hereinbefore described, which is in the same block where I have for twenty years or more kept my own office as counselor at law.

In the said offices as aforesaid, occupied successively by the two associations or companies herein mentioned, there are safely deposited in a vault the books of business and account kept by them respectively, and it is within my knowledge that all books and accounts customarily used in the most elaborate systems of book-keeping were so kept by the said associations or companies successively. As before stated, they go back to 1860, a period of nearly twenty-eight years.

In my relations to these associations the books were always accessible to me, their contents always known to me, and I have had occasions to look into them quite too numerous now to be recalled to memory. The several boards of managers have held regular weekly meetings, at which financial and business statements were always read, and speaking generally their entire business has been conducted without concealment, and in the most open and honorable manner. It has been the invariable practice of the said companies to make up annual statements showing the profit and loss account of their business for the preceding year. These statements have always been made up from exact and minute entries of all and each of the items of receipt and expenditure occurring in the course of the year, and they have been in all cases the basis of dividends to shareholders whenever dividends were made. I do not think it possible or conceivable that shareholders were imposed upon or defrauded of their dividends by any system or practice of false or deceptive book-keeping. These are the same books referred to in the verified statements of John W. Barker and Thomas Molloy, hereto annexed.

The Dairy Salt Company still conducts its business at the place and in the manner aforesaid. If it has deceived itself, its shareholders, and the public by false book-keeping, it has acted contrary to all conceivable and probable motives. The associates have always been as much, to say the least, in want of regular returns for their investments as people engaged in other branches of industry, and common experience and observation may be appealed to as proof that the company has no concealed fund held in reserve. My own interest on this manufacture, and my particular relation to its conduct and mangement have required from me at all times as much personal attention to the financial condition of the companies aforesaid as my other pursuits would permit. Except in cases of absence from Syracuse my attendance at meetings of the board of managers has been constant and regular, and I have had at all times an intimate acquaintance with their financial concerns. I have kept myself specially acquainted at all times with the cost of fuel and labor used in the production of salt, of annual repairs, of chemical substances used in the purification of common salt for purposes of the dairy and table, of taxation and insurance, and other items of expense in producing salt. I have always participated in the making of large contracts for supplies of every kind, and have been constantly consulted by my associates on every question of importance arising in the conduct of the said business.

The sources of the revenue and receipts of the said companies have at all times been the proceeds of the sale of their products in the markets of this country. With the subjects of sales and current prices I have kept myself constantly familiar and for the last few years those subjects have been the occasion for particular attention and no small anxiety on my part. I do not conceive it to be possible that the prices actually obtained for salt sold in the market, as such prices have been publicly and generally understood and known, should be different from those entered regularly on the books kept by the said companies without my knowledge of the fact.

I do further say that Mr. John W. Barker, of Syracuse, was at all times the secretary of the aforesaid company organized in the year 1860; that he conducted all the business correspondence thereof and was the selling officer who uniformly made the sales of salt in all markets, and that his knowledge of the entries on the books which contain a record of every sale was at all times perfect; also that Mr. Thomas Malloy was the treasurer of the said company during nearly the whole period of its existence, whose particular duty and function it was to enter all sales in said books and keep a full and correct record thereof.

I make the like statement as to the Dairy Salt Company of which the said Barker and Molloy always have been and now are, respectively, the secretary and treasurer. I have been long acquainted with both these gentlemen. They are both persons who are unusually competent to fill the positions they have occupied. Their standing is high in the business community, and their integrity was never questioned, to my knowledge, and as I verily believe. I refer to their statement annexed, which verifies the books of the companies aforesaid; and I accept such statement, corroborated as it is by my own relations to the business, of which the books are the record as absolute and undoubted proof of the accuracy of those books; nor do I believe it possible that I can be mistaken.

It is known to me by personal experience, and by examination of the said books, that they contain a faithful and honest representation of the business of making salt from the brines of the State of New York and marketing the same as carried on by the companies of which I was the chief officer and by other parties engaged in the same business. I have not the remotest belief or even suspicion that the persons managing such business or interested therein have ever entertained so much as a thought of concealing the profits of such business. These books are now in the custody of the company of which I am the first officer, and they are freely offered for examination in any mode deemed the most convenient.

My purpose in this paper is to state facts and not to give opinions. I can not pretend to know what are the grounds on which it is urged that in revising a tariff system domestic salt should be placed on the free-list. So far I have heard of no ground except the suggestion or affirmation that American producers of that article are unreasonably prosperous through their exactions upon the public. This assumption calls for no inquiry beyond the ascertainment of facts. As to this I can say and do say that there never was a more baseless assumption than this, so far as American salt produced in this portion of the State of New York is concerned; and upon the best information I can obtain I believe the condition of the same business and trade does not materially differ in any other part of the State. When producers in different localities sell in the same markets equally acceptable to them there can be no reasons leading to material differences in the value of their business.

I know of no way to solve the question of fact whether the production and sale of salt in the United States is a prosperous or an unprosperous industry (if that is the material inquiry) than to ascertain by authentic evidence. In this view my aim is simply to aid in the elucidation of the subjects so far as I am acquainted with relevant facts. The papers annexed are referred to as containing authoritative evidence more in detail which establishes the conclusion beyond all reasonable cavil, that so long as tariffs prevail as the policy of the country the salt of foreign countries is the last article which ought to be admitted free of duty.

GEO. F. COMSTOCK,
President American Dairy Salt Company.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 16th day of March, A. D. 1888.

WILSON R. HARE,
Notary Public, Onondaga County, New York.

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of Onondaga, ss:

Thomas Molloy and John W. Barker, of the city of Syracuse, in said county and State, declare upon oath as follows:

That the brines belonging to the State from which salt is manufactured are found by sinking artesian wells in the city of Syracuse or immediately adjacent thereto to the depth of about 400 feet; that such brines are brought to the surface of the ground by the State with pumps and placed in tanks elevated above the surface and then distributed in conduit logs or pipes to the several manufactories of salt, which are in all cases owned by private individuals or private corporations and associations; that he, the said John W. Barker, has been interested in the manufacture of salt of the various kinds for fifty years and upwards; and that he, the said Thomas Molloy, has been connected with such manufacture for thirty years and upwards; that he, the said John W. Barker, has been concerned in the production and sale of such salt for twenty-eight years last past in the capacity of trustee or manager and secretary of companies and associations organized for the manufacture of salt and doing business at one particular place in said city; and that during all of such period it has been his particular function and duty to conduct the correspondence of such companies or associations and to make the sales in all markets of their productions. That he, the said Thomas Molloy, was appointed assistant treasurer in the earliest one of the companies just mentioned, in which Mr. Barker was secretary; that in the year 1864, after having been assistant treasurer for two years or thereabouts, he was appointed treasurer for that company, and that ever since that time he has been treasurer of that company or of another company, which established its business in the same place after the first one ceased to do business, for the purpose of winding up its affairs; and that it has always been his particular function and duty to receive all the moneys and funds accruing from the sales of salt in all markets and enter them in the books of the company to which they belonged.

Both the deponents do further say that the salt companies hereinabove referred to conducted and carried on a larger portion of the salt business with the connected brines aforesaid than any other person, corporation, or association; and that any true exhibition of the business of those companies would be a fair and a reasonable statement of the general business of manufacturing and selling salt in and about the city of Syracuse. They further say that all books of account and other books which are usually kept in the most elaborate and complete systems of book-keeping were always kept in the business of those companies; and especially they say that in such books were entered in detail and by items all the costs and expense of producing such salt and marketing the same; also, of all sums of money or other available funds received from the sales of salt in all markets; and they do further say of their own knowledge that such books were faithfully and accurately kept, and do truly represent the items of cost and expense and of revenue and receipt for the whole period of time herein referred to; and they especially say that the said Thomas Molloy, in his capacity of treasurer, always gave his personal attention to the keeping of said books; that he uniformly made the entries himself in person, or if there be any exception to this statement it was only casual and accidental, so that no entries were ever made of the cost of making salt or of revenue and receipt therefrom except by himself or under his immediate supervision; and so far as any entries were ever made by any other person it was done under his direction and afterwards supervised by him.

The deponents, therefore, deem themselves entitled to say, and they do say, that the said books were correctly kept of their own knowledge. These deponents are advised that the present inquiry in the House of Representatives in Congress has relation to the recent history and present financial condition of the salt manufacture and trade in the locality aforesaid. The following statements, therefore, will refer to facts and details which lie within the last three years of the manufacture and sale of salt from the brines aforesaid by the American Dairy Salt Company, which is one of the companies hereinbefore referred to, of which the deponents are the secretary and treasurer, as aforesaid. This company is much the largest producer of salt and dealer therein among all the producers of salt from the brines aforesaid. It now has in its custody not only its own books but also all other books in which the records of the salt business are contained for the last twenty-eight years. These books have never been kept secret, but have always been and now are open to the inspection of any person having a reasonable desire to examine them.

COMMON SALT.

The following is a true account of the production and dealing in this article for the last three years, namely, 1885, 1886, and 1887, reference being had to the said American Dairy Salt Company:

Common salt, 5,726,064 bushels.

Total net receipts per bushel, $0.06617.

The aforesaid net of $0.06617 represents the gross prices per bushel obtained in market after deducting all expenses of sale, to wit, State duty of 1 cent, packing, shipment, transportation, selling, agencies, etc.; and therefore the same figures represent the total compensation received by the manufacturer for production yearly. In other words, the said figures are the market prices of salt reckoned at the place of production after taking out all the cost of marketing.

The actual cost of producing such salt was $0.0667 per bushel, leaving a difference between the net of sales and the cost of production of $0.00053 against the manufacturers. These figures show a trifling loss as the average result in the business of making and selling common salt for the last three years.

For information the deponents do further state that the above figures, representing the cost of producing common salt per bushel, mean the moneys actually paid out for fuel, for labor, for annual and ordinary repairs, for insurance and taxes of all kinds on the salt blocks used in producing the common salt.

The results above stated appear from the books of the company, which were kept as herein above set forth; and the deponents affirm of their own knowledge that the said books are accurate and true.

DAIRY AND TABLE SALT.

The deponents further say that the amount of dairy and table salt produced by and for the said American Dairy Salt Company during the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, was:

Bushels	1,635,819
Receipts on sales, net per bushel	$0.1649

Such net receipts are reckoned at the place of production after taking out of gross receipts all items treated as cost of marketing, namely, State duty, transportation, agencies, sales, etc.

Cost of producing was as follows:

Common salt, as above	$0.0667
Labor of all kinds for conversion into dairy taxation on salt mills, insurance, annual and ordinary repairs, chemicals used for purification	0.0824
Total	0.1491

The average differences, therefore, between the net of receipts as above and the cost of producing dairy and table salt was $0.0158 in favor of the manufacturer. These results of the dairy and table salt business of the company aforesaid also appear on the books kept as before mentioned by items and details, and these deponents do affirm that the said books are accurate and true of their own knowledge. They further say that in the above figures and calculations embracing common and dairy salt no interest whatever on capital invested in the construction of salt works of any kind is computed, and that no dividends have been made by the said company to its shareholders within the said three years.

SOLAR SALT.

The deponents do further say, in reference to this article, that sixteen years ago, or thereabouts, a joint-stock solar organization was organized by and among certain individuals and private corporations for dealing in the article of salt produced by solar evaporation, which said association established its general office in the offices then and ever since occupied by the American Dairy Salt Company. This association comprehended a majority, but by no means all, of the parties then engaged in the manufacture of solar salt. The business of the association was conducted to the present time in such office. This deponent, the said John W. Barker, being interested also in the manufacture of solar salt, was one of the original managers of such association, and has continued to be one down to this time. He was appointed the first corresponding secretary of the association, and has continued in that situation to the present time. The records and business books thereof have always been kept in the same office occupied by the said American Dairy Salt Company.

This deponent, the said Thomas Molloy, was appointed the original treasurer of such association, and has remained in that position to the present time; and both these deponents have sustained the same relations to the association which they have always held to the American Dairy Salt Company, and have at all times discharged the same functions. They are, therefore, equally familiar with the dealings and books kept by such association. The same general clerical force in said office has been equally worked for both of said companies. These deponents further say that during the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, 8,196,050 bushels of salt were made by the producers thereof and delivered to the said association at the Solar Salt store-houses situated on the Erie and Oswego Canals. The proceeds of selling said salt in all markets were, net $0.07843 per bushel, the price being in all cases computed as being realized at the place of production and delivery, after taking out the State duty and the actual cost and expense of transporting the same salt, of agencies and other items, if any.

COST OF PRODUCING SOLAR SALT.

The deponents further say that during the three years last aforesaid the actual cost of producing solar salt, including delivery at the store-houses, was from $0.055 to $0.06 per bushel. The books kept in the office of the association aforesaid do not show the figures precisely representing such cost paid out by the producers, but they do show that the association paid by agreement to the several producers the price of $0.07 per bushel for original cost of manufacture and delivery. They further say that during the said three years the said association, in addition to the $0.07 paid or advanced as last aforesaid, paid to the manufacturers severally who delivered the salt the further price, averaged during the same years, of $0.00843, which was the profit and all the profit realized on the sales of salt over and above the $0.07 per bushel first paid for the production. This result as now stated is ascertained from the books of the said association now kept in the office of the said American Dairy Salt Company, and the deponents affirm of their own knowledge that the said books are correct and true. They further say that in the above statement of the cost of production no interest on the capital invested in solar salt works is charged.

These deponents do further say that the producers of salt from the brines aforesaid view with apprehension and alarm the proposal to place on the free-list the article of foreign salt by any act of national legislation so long as the policy of the Government maintains an extensive system of tariff duties. The injury to their interests would be greatly diminished in their judgment if universal or general free trade were to be inaugurated at the same time, because while the prices of American salt might and must be extremely low under such a policy there would be a compensatory reduction in the price of everything entering into the cost of producing and selling the article in the United States.

And the facts and figures exhibited in the foregoing statement show that for three years last past common salt has been produced in this locality at an actual loss, although small; that dairy and table salt have been produced at a profit so infinitessimally small as scarcely to entitle it to rank among the industries which are profitable to those who engage in them.

Tariff duties on foreign manufactures are generally assumed to protect the corresponding American product according to the amount of such duties. If this be true, or approximately true, it must be evident at a glance that the manufacture of salt in and about Syracuse must cease entirely under free trade in the article until foreign producers, having obtained control of the markets in this country, shall find it for their interest to raise the prices of salt to whatever standard will satisfy their interests or their wishes. Then, after our own salt-producing works shall have become decayed and valueless, we shall be likely to experience the difficulties in the way of getting back to a condition of trade rendered healthy by competition.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March , 1888.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your communication of the 29th ultimo inclosing to us a summary of the argument to be used before the committee and Congress in favor of free salt, the undersigned—a committee of salt manufacturers on the Onondaga Salt Springs reservation—beg leave to make the following representations in regard to the manufacture of salt on said Onondaga Salt Springs reservation, located at Syracuse, N. Y., and in its immediate vicinity, and does not include any salt works outside of the county of Onondaga, in the State of New York:

First. That the salt springs on the said Onondaga Salt Springs reservation are the property of the State of New York, and that the salt made on said reservation is under the supervision of a superintendent of salt springs appointed by the State, under whose supervision all the salt wells for the supply of salt water and the machinery necessary to deliver the same to the various manufacturers are made. Said superintendent has also the control of all the salt made on said reservation, and he appoints a corps of inspectors to inspect all salt in course of manufacture to see that it is properly made and properly packed, and branded in packages of full weight. For these services the State, since the year 1846, has charged to the manufacturers the sum of 1 cent per bushel of 56 pounds on all the salt made on said reservation. This duty of 1 cent per bushel to the State was, when the law was passed in 1846, considered to no more than cover the actual expenses to be incurred by the State, and that no particular revenue should be derived from the manufacture of salt.

The result up to and including 1886 shows that this duty has somewhat more than covered the expenses incurred by the State as shown by the State superintendent's report for 1886 on pages 7 and 8, said report being sent herewith and marked "A." The same report shows, on pages 9 and 10, the total quantity of salt made on the reservation from the years 1797 to 1886, inclusive.

Second. The kinds of salt made at this locality are as follows:

Common fine salt, agricultural salt, Onondaga solar evaporated salt of the different grades, namely, C solar, BC solar, F solar, standard solar, and ground solar salt. For the mode of manufacture and uses of the above grades of salt we beg leave to refer you to a salt manual issued by the different salt interests in this locality in 1884, which contains all this information and much more which may be of interest.

COST OF MANUFACTURE.

The absolute cost of the common fine salt made at the works of the American Dairy Salt Company, Limited—the most extensive manufacturers on the reservation—during the year 1887, as taken from the books of said company, was 6.47 cents per bushel of 56 pounds. This cost includes only the following items, namely: Cost of fuel, which is known as "anthracite coal dust," the lowest-priced fuel in the market, $1.75 per ton of 2,240 pounds, delivered at the works.

	Per bushel of 56 pounds.
Making cost of fuel	$0.0329
Labor at $2.12½ to $2.25 per day of 12 hours	.0259
Cost of ordinary repairs, insurance, and taxes	.0059
Absolute cost of manufacture	.0647
To this must be added the duty of 1 cent per bushel paid to the State	.0100
Also, office expenses, clerk hire, etc	.0050
Making the actual cost	.0797

per bushel of 56 pounds in the bins at the works, without including any interest on capital invested in works or otherwise, or for any extraordinary repairs.

During the year 1887 this company sold and shipped to New York 359,339 bushels, or, say, 8,984 gross tons of its product of common fine salt. This salt was sold on a credit of two to four months, without interest, and the gross amount received for the same delivered on board of canal-boat in New York was $39,838.27. The actual cost of loading this salt at Syracuse and transportation to New York was $11,636.77; proceeds at works, $28,201.50.

An average of 7.84 cents per bushel of 56 pounds, or $3.136 per gross ton, as against an actual cost of 7.97 cents per bushel, or $3.188 per gross ton, as hereinbefore stated, showing an actual loss to the manufacturer of 5.2 cents per gross ton on all sales made in the New York market during the year 1887.

	Per bushel.
The actual cost of the F. F. dairy and table salt, made up on the same basis as the common fine salt is	cents... 13.02
Add the 1 cent per bushel duty paid to the State	do..... 1.00
Add office expenses, etc	do..... 0.50
Cost	cents... 14.52

The sale of this salt in New York market is mostly in small or car-load lots shipped wholly by rail. It is also largely sold in bulk, the purchaser furnishing his own bags to pack the salt into at the works, and is sold at a price per gross ton delivered on car in New York, viz:

	Per gross ton.
The cost at the works is, say	$5.61
Cost of rail transportation	1.35
Cost of loading cars at Syracuse	.19
Cost on car in New York	7.15

During the year 1887 this salt has been sold as low as $7, and ranging from that price to $7.75 per gross ton delivered on cars in New York. If the salt was put up by the manufacturer in English sacks same as those used for English salt, the cost would be $3 per ton more, or, say, $10.15 per gross ton in English sacks, delivered on cars in New York. The total quantity of this salt sold by the American Dairy Salt Company, limited, in the New York market during the year 1887 was 59,173 bushels, or, say, 1,480 gross tons.

COST OF MANUFACTURE OF ONONDAGA SOLAR SALT.

There are situated on the Onondaga Salt Springs reservation about 40,000 vats and covers, 16 by 18 feet in size, covering about 1,000 acres of land, including the land necessary for laborers' dwellings, store-houses, etc.

It would at this time cost to erect these vats and covers, including cost of store-houses and shipping facilities, not less than $50 per vat and cover, or in all $2,000,000. The annual production from these works for the past five years from 1882 to 1886, inclusive, has been 69½ bushels per vat and cover, or say an annual product in all of about 2,800,000 bushels. The actual proceeds of the product of between 36,000 and 37,000 of these covers, after deducting the 1 cent per bushel paid to the State and the actual expenses of selling and cost of packages and transportation, for the five years from 1882 to 1886, inclusive, has been as follows:

	Per bushel.
In 1882	cents... 10.01
In 1883	do..... 10.50
In 1884	do..... 8.68
In 1885	do..... 8.25
In 1886	do..... 7.85

It will be seen from the above that the net proceeds on this product are decreasing from year to year, which has been occasioned by the sharp competition at all points with recent large discoveries of fossil salt, which is mined and thrown upon the various markets at very low prices, and, although the crop of 1887 is not yet all disposed of, it is entirely safe to say that the proceeds of that crop will not return to the manufacturer more than 7½ cents per bushel of 56 pounds.

The cost of labor in manufacturing this salt is $1.37½ per day for ordinary labor; $1.50 to $162½ per day for carpenters; annual city and county taxes 45 to 50 cents; superintendance, 30 cents; lumber, ordinary repairs and other materials, 60 cents annually per vat and cover, making the average cost of manufacturing not less than 6 cents per bushel of 56 pounds. This, on the proceeds of 1886, would give to the manufacturer 1.85 cents per bushel, or say, about 2½ per cent on capital actually invested.

From the above statements of cost of manufacture on the Onondaga Salt Springs reservation (which statements are correct and can be verified in any way desired) it will readily be seen that the profits on the manufacture of salt in this locality are far from being as enormous and exorbitant as claimed in the free-trade summary you sent us, but that on the contrary they are in fact next to nothing, and that a repeal of the present duty on imported salt would absolutely wipe out all the salt industries in this locality, or if the Solar salt interest should be continued, it would compel the manufacturer to reduce the cost of labor and material from 40 to 50 per cent. and to be content with no returns whatever upon his capital actually invested.

As is said in the summary of the free-trade arguments you send us, the manufacture at this, as compared with other localities, is in closer proximity to the sea-coast markets and has superior advantages in the way of transportation, etc. (which is undoubtedly true), it would seem to follow that if the salt industries here were entirely destroyed (which would inevitably be the case in a very short time if imported salt was admitted free), that as soon as the works here were effectually squelched and the manufacture of salt in this locality discontinued, the result would be that one of the main competitors for the sea-coast trade would be out of the way, and that in consequence prices on salt for these markets would at once be advanced by the foreign dealers so as only to meet the competition in other and more distant localities. In other words, it may be said that the manufacturers of salt on this reservation, while making no appreciable profit, do now regulate and control the prices in New York and other sea-coast markets, and that with this interest knocked out, prices of foreign salt would be immediately advanced so as to meet and compete with its next nearest domestic producer.

The statement in the summary hereinbefore referred to, that foreign salts are superior in quality to the domestic, and that in consequence the foreign articles should be admitted free of duty, is wholly untrue and without a shadow of foundation in fact. This favorite argument of the free-trader was exploded years and years ago. The different grades of salt made on this reservation are as pure and as well adapted to the various uses for which they are made as the same grades of salt made in any foreign country. This has been for many years shown by the tests made by the United States Government and others, and the numerous certificates and testimonials from provision and fish packers, dairymen's associations, and individuals from all parts of the country, and the numerous analyses made from time to time, as are fully shown in the pamphlets herewith sent you, marked B, C, D, E, the one marked C relating wholly to the solar evaporated salt. Those marked B, D, and E relate to all of the various grades, but more particularly to the superior quality of our F. F. dairy and table salt. In all cases where absolute tests have been made (and they are numerous) as to the quality of foreign and domestic salt, the salt made on this reservation has come out victorous in every case. We beg leave to refer you to the pamphlets heretofore referred to, marked B, C, D, and E. The analyses, testimonials, and certificates contained in these pamphlets are valid and present arguments that should satisfy any candid mind of the superiority of the quality of the salt made on this reservation to any foreign article.

We have only further to say that since the reduction of the duty in 1872 from 24 cents per 100 pounds in sacks and 16 cents in bulk to 12 and 8 cents per 100 pounds our trade to the seaboard market has gradually fallen off, so that in the year 1887 we shipped in all but 564,685 bushels (which was sold without any profit to the manufacturer), while during the year 1871 (the year previous to the reduction of the duty to the present rate) there were 2,413,345 bushels shipped and sold in these markets, the proceeds of which gave to the manufacturer a very moderate profit.

It will be seen from the above that nearly four-fifths of our market has been taken from us in consequence of the reduction of duty made in 1872, and that any further reduction would most effectually wipe out the interest here, which is almost wholly dependent on the Eastern trade for its existence.

Yours, truly,

Hon. Thomas G. Alvord, ex-speaker of the New York assembly, over which he presided for fifteen years, adds his testimony in the form of the following affidavit:

I am now and have been since its incorporation (for over thirty years) a trustee of the Salina Solar Coarse Salt Company, a corporation under the laws of the State of New York, engaged in the manufacture of coarse salt by solar evaporation, at Syracuse, in the county of Onondaga, the capital stock of which company is $150,000, fully paid in, and to which was added, prior to the year 1880, in permanent fixtures, at least $50,000, which has not been added to or made a part of its capital on which are based its dividends.

On the capital stock of $150,000 we have made four dividends in five years, foregoing any dividends in 1884 and making in 1883 and 1885 each a 6 per cent. and in 1886 and 1887 each a dividend of 5 per cent. averaging 4.4 per cent. dividend for the five past years. We made in these years on our plant of 60 acres, aggregating 3,200 16 by 18 feet vats, an average of 206,000 bushels of salt of 56 pounds to the bushel, but for the statement hereinafter made I have taken the result of the year 1887, which is ahead in the average quantity of salt made, and in the average dividend declared: Expenses of producing 220,000 bushels of salt, including State duty $2,200, and taxes, $1,600—$13,000; dividend at 5 per cent. on $150,000 capital, $7,500. The dividend left no appreciable surplus. The present duty on imported salt at 8 cents per 100 pounds on our crop of 12,320,000 pounds, $9,856, which, if deducted for free salt, would use up our dividend and take from the bare labor item $2,356, or about 30 per cent., reducing the wages of the laborer from $1.12½ per day of ten hours to 79 cents. This is, provided we continue the manufacture simply for the purpose of giving our laborers a reduced per diem, not sufficient for their daily needs, but must not such a result (the legitimate outcome of free trade in salt), end in the absolute destruction of our plant, which, from its nature, can not be used for anything else, thus absolutely wiping out our capital and turning (in our case) thirty laborers to seek employment in other business?

ONONDAGA SALT INDUSTRY.

The Industrial History of the United States, by Albert S. Bowles, just published, contains the following:

"A great revolution in salt manufacture was wrought by the utilization of the valuable salt springs of Onondaga County, New York. These were known very early to the Indians. Father Lallemont is the first white man who is recorded as having visited them. De Moyne, a Jesuit, mentions them in 1653. In 1770 Onondaga salt was well known in Quebec and Albany, whither the Indians brought it. The whites first made salt there in 1787; in which year or the following one the Oneida Indians ceded the lands to the State. Leases were then granted to manufacturers, who sunk wells and went to pumping from the rich salines beneath. But the State reserved the control of this mineral production to itself, and soon took charge of the pumping.

"To such dimensions has the business grown that whole villages of vats and brick 'blocks' for containing the kettles have sprung up around Syracuse."

The tariff reduction in 1874 put a sudden check to the development of the salt industry of Syracuse. "Blocks" worth $10,000 each were abandoned by their owners, and are now in ruins.

Another evidence of the disastrous effects of reducing the tariff may be seen in the subsequent reduction of the amount of capital invested in salt manufacture at Syracuse. There was invested in 1872:

In solar salt works	$2,200,000
In boiling or fine works	2,000,000
In dairy salt works	150,000
In State property	400,000
In cash capital	1,250,000
		$6,000,000
The census of 1880, the investment	2,286,081
Add to this the cash capital	1,250,000
		3,536,081
A shrinkage of		2,463,919

The salt works of Syracuse grew in importance and proportions until the maximum production was reached in 1870, when 8,748,956 bushels were made. The reduction of the tariff in 1874 caused a decline to 5,392,677 bushels in 1876, since which time there has been a gradual increase in the amount of product. The following table shows the number of bushels of solar and common fine salt produced during the last decade, the dairy salt, made from the common fine, of course, not increasing the amount:

Years.	Solar.	Common Fine.	Total.
	Bushels.	Bushels.	Bushels.

The attached is the report upon the Government tests of salt to which I have referred:

COMPARATIVE MERITS OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC SALT.

Attempts having been made to depreciate the quality of American manufactured salt, and especially to prejudice the minds of the friends of the protective policy against the purity and preservative properties of salt produced in this country, the salt manufacturers of Syracuse, in the State of New York, respectfully submit for the consideration of members of Congress, in both branches, the following testimonials as to the merits of the article produced by them. It will be proper to observe here that the kind of salt referred to, and mostly used for packing purposes, is called the "Onondaga solar or coarse salt"—a variety resembling Turk's Island in appearance, and manufactured principally in the State of New York; but there is nothing to prevent the manufacture of this description at any of the salines in this country; or, under a suitable system of protection, to limit the amount to anything less than what is needed for consumption in the United States.

The first testimonials in relation to this production are derived from the annual report of the superintendent of the Onondaga Salt Springs, in the year 1856, as follows:

[Extracts from said report.]

REPORT OF GOVERNMENT TESTS.

Results of certain trials of Onondaga solar salt and Turk's Island salt, instituted by the General Government during the years 1851, 1852, 1853, and 1854.

Complaint having been made to the President in 1851 that the regulations of the War Department in this respect unjustly discriminated against the character of the Solar salt of the State of New York, an order was issued by Secretary Conrad, directing that 300 barrels of pork should be packed in New York with salt of both descriptions, in equal quantities, for the purpose of testing, by actual and thorough experiment, the comparative merits of the two kinds. The agent of the Onondaga manufacturers, N. Randall, esq., was apprised of this order, and the pork was put up in his presence, in New York City, in November, 1851. The hogs were of the best quality, fattened in the river counties near the city; each hog was split in two, and one-half packed with Onondaga and the other with Turk's Island salt. The barrels were distinguished by numbers—those containing Onondaga salt receiving the odd number, and those with Turk's Island the even number.

Six barrels of this pork were sent to each of the different military posts along the seaboard and at the South and West and in the year following a lot was shipped to California. Instructions were given to the commanding officers of the several posts to have two barrels of pork inspected in each of the three succeeding years by a regularly organized board of survey—the results to be reported to the Department at Washington.

ABSTRACT OF REPORTS.

Trial made upon two barrels of pork (packed as above stated) at Fort Trumbull, Conn., August 24, 1852.

No. 31. Onondaga salt: Color, the fat portions of a clean, white color; the lean of a clean, dark red. Hardness, the meat of both the fat and lean very hard and firm. Sweetness, very sweet and sound. Loss in boiling, 17¼ pounds; boiled one and one-half hours, weighed 13¾ pounds. Quality after boiling, was firm and hard, same color as before, and of good taste. Weight, 198¼ pounds.

No. 32. Turk's Island: Color, the fat portions of a clean, fine, white color; lean of a clear, bright red color. Hardness, No. 32 not as hard and firm as that of No. 31. Sweetness, very sweet and sound. Loss in boiling, 17¼ pounds; boiled as in No. 31, weighed 13½ pounds. Quality after boiling, soft and liable to run, but had the same color, and the taste was good. Weight, 198¼ pounds.

Conditions the same in both barrels.

Trial at Fort Mifflin, Pa., August 24, 1852. Pork all quite firm and solid. No 56 was the whitest; No. 55 appeared to be the hardest. An offensive smell issued from No. 56 on opening the barrel, which was not the case in No. 55. Throughout No. 55 the meat was sweetest in smell. The piece boiled from No. 55 was the sweetest and firmest, and apparently the best preserved.

Trial at Fort Moultrie, S. C., August, 1852: The examiners sum up their observations with the remark that "the board is of opinion that for immediate use the difference between the two barrels is very slight, but, judging from the appearance and retentive firmness of the pork in the two barrels, they think No. 91 will retain its present state of preservation longer than No. 92." "The inside of the pieces in No. 92 were of a slightly greenish tinge."

Trial at Castle Pinckney, S. C., August, 1852: The smell and taste of No. 1 was decidedly the sweetest and best flavored, that of No. 2 being strong and rank."

Trial at Fortress Monroe, Va., August, 1852: The board concluded their examination by saying: "There appears to be so little difference in the qualities of the two barrels of pork that the board can not express any decided opinion as to their comparative merits."

Trial at Key West, Fla., August, 1852: To the statement of the examiners is appended the following by Capt. J. Vogdes:

"I concur with the board in the above report. I would, in addition, beg leave to state that the salt was much better dissolved in No. 26 than in No. 25. The salt in No. 26 tasted strongly of the pork, whilst that of No. 25 seemed as pure as when it had been packed. No. 25 was issued immediately (August 24), No. 26 on the 10th of this month (September). The soldiers prefer No. 25 for eating meat to No. 26."

Trial at Fort Adams, R. I., September, 1852: Major Sherman concludes his report thus:

"It is the opinion of the board that at the present time no essential difference can be found to exist between the two barrels of pork. They both appear to be good and sweet and of sufficient hardness," etc.

Colonel Gates adds a statement as follows: "I have carefully examined the said barrels of pork and tasted some of each (cooked and uncooked), and I am of opinion that the pork contained in the barrel marked No. 25 is preferable at this time to that contained in No. 26 by reason of its more fine appearance and more agreeable taste upon the whole, and I should prefer for my own use the meat contained in barrel No. 25."

Trial at East Pascagoula, Miss., August, 1852: "The board is of opinion that the pork examined is uncommonly good. Before it was boiled the board was of the opinion that No. 28 was better than No. 37. After boiling there was no perceptible difference between the two."

Trial at East Pascagoula, Miss., September 7, 1853: "The board is of opinion that the pork in both barrels is uncommonly good and very well preserved, so much so that it is difficult to say which is the best; in the hardness and color there is a slight difference which would lead the board at this time to decide in favor of the salt in No. 39."

Trial at Fort Sullivan, Eastport, Me., August, 1853: "Both pieces were found to be very good, but that from barrel No. 3 was a little the hardest, a little the sweetest, and a little the best. The color of both was the same and pretty white."

Trial at Fortress Monroe, Va., August, 1853: Colonel Bankhead remarks: "The orderly sergeants of the companies report that they have used the entire contents of the two barrels (No. 81 and No. 82), and give a decided preference to the pork in No. 81, being sweeter, more solid, and less loss on boiling, and less affected after the barrels were opened by exposure to the air. The pork in No. 82 exhibited a slight taint by being kept a few days before boiling."

Trial at New York, September 29, 1853: The examination took place in the presence of the principal pork packers and pork dealers of the city.

"Barrels Nos. 51 and 52 were opened in the presence of these gentlemen, and the results given were the unanimous opinion. No. 51, before boiling. Color: yellow on the surface, looking as if rusted; scraping the surface it showed white and clean.

No. 52. Color: bright and clean, both lean and fat, looking as if just packed. Both sweet and firm.

After boiling:

No. 51. Color: yellowish on the surface, white and clean within. Hardness: harder than 52, but attribute that to the hog being younger. Loss in boiling: 6 pound 3 ounces. Quality: very firm and sweet. Weight: 195 pounds.

No. 52. Color: fat, white; lean, pink; both bright; hardness: firm, but not equal to No. 51. Loss in boiling: 7 pounds. Weight: 199.

A number of barrels of each kind were then opened. The result in color was, in all, the same. The barrels unevenly numbered were uniformly stained yellowish, whilst the even-numbered barrels presented the pork white and clean.

The pork in the uneven numbered barrels was invariably better cured.

It was the unanimous opinion of the packers, that for sale in the New York market, the even numbered barrels would be preferred, because of the better color of the pork. But for long shipments the preference would be given to the uneven numbered barrels, the pork being better cured.

All other differences, except the two last named, were deemed by them due to the age and feeding of the hog.

Trial at Fort Washington, N. H., August, 1853.—"Altogether the pork in 75 was superior to 76 in color, sweetness, and firmness, and fewer pieces rusty."

Trial at Key West, Fla., August, 1853.—"Pork in No. 27 much superior to No. 28, and so preferred by the men."

Trial at Fort Mifflin, Pa., August, 1853.—"On opening barrel No. 57 I found that about 6 or 8 inches of brine had leaked out, and that the pork was slightly rusted. Otherwise it was white, tolerably hard, and perfectly sweet.

No. 58 was full of brine. The pork of quite a red color, rather soft, and had an offensive odor. The salt had not penetrated or 'struck in' the pork, which is tainted and unfit for use."

Trial at Fort Trumbull, Conn., August, 1853.—"No. 34, after boiling, had flavor decidedly rusty; No. 33 not perfectly sweet, but much superior to 34."

Trial at Fort Van Couver, W. T., August 1854.—"The board is of opinion that the pork in barrel No. 61 is better preserved in every respect than that in No. 62."

Trial at Fort Reading, Cal., August 30, 1854.—"The flavor of No. 73 was better and more agreeable than No. 74, although No. 74 was not quite so salt. Both 73 and 74 were considered excellent in quality, but the preponderance in favor of No. 73." At a previous trial, same post, in February, the report says: "From the above experiments and tests, the board are of the opinion that No. 71 is a superior quality of pork, losing less in weight and generating less thirst—two very important points," etc.

Trial at Key West, Fla., August 24, 1854.—"No. 29. Hardness: Firmer than usual contract pork; fat and lean, no appearance of separation. Color: A little redder redder than usual contract pork; very healthy appearance, fat very white. Sweetness: Sweeter than the usual contract pork; no offensive smell on opening barrel. Loss in boiling: 20 pounds reduced to 11½. Quality after boiling: Firm, sweet, of a good color, much more acceptable to the men than the usual contract pork; by the men considered the best pork they have ever had at this post.

No. 30. Hardness: Rather soft. Color: Bright red; unhealthy; very offensive smell when barrel was opened. Sweetness: Sour before and after boiling. Loss in boiling: 20 pounds reduced to 7¾. Quality after boiling: Soft, sour, greenish, and lean inclined to separate; not good pork; the fat had separated from the lean in the barrel; salt well dissolved.

Trial at Fort Moultrie, S. C., August 24, 1854: "In regard to the color of the pork, the board is of the opinion that the pork in barrel marked 95 is superior, it having apparently changed its color but slightly since it was packed, whilst that in barrel No. 96 was changed to a dingy yellow. As to hardness, that in barrel No. 95 is superior, being quite hard, while that in 96 has become somewhat soft. As to sweetness, 95 is superior." Same after boiling.

In addition to the above the following certificates and letters from experienced and responsible business houses have been furnished to the Syracuse manufacturers within a few weeks past:

[From Messrs. Crowell & Paine, a well-known provision house in New York.]

NEW YORK, May, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: In response to your request for an expression of our experience in the use of "domestic salt," for curing fish, we would say: We have been for twenty years engaged in furnishing vessels going after fish, and supplying packers of fish with salt, and selling their fish for the fishermen; that for the last three years, since the "Onondaga salt" was introduced into this market, we have supplied the fishermen with from forty to seventy thousand bushels each year, and do not hesitate to affirm that the domestic salt is superior in every respect to foreign salt for curing fish. It gives the fish a better appearance, and is more economical in use. In every instance where it has been used we have had favorable reports from it, and our customers give it the preference to foreign salt.

Very respectfully,

CROWELL & PAINE,

Dealers in Salt, 103 Broad Street, New York.

[From C. Nickerson & Co., a long-established and respectable firm in New York.]

NEW YORK, May 18, 1866.

DEAR SIR: We take great pleasure in addressing you upon the excellent qualities of the salt produced by the company for which you are acting.

We have bought your salt largely, both the last and present year, and those parties who have used it most freely speak in the highest terms of its quality. We have also sold fish which were cured with it, and they were of superior color, being free from lime-spots, and leaving the surface of the fish free from sediments.

We feel free to say that we think for curing codfish or mackerel your salt is unsurpassed, and but few kinds are its equal.

Yours truly,

C. NICKERSON & CO.,

NEW YORK, May 19, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: We have been extensively engaged in packing beef and pork at Chicago, and inspecting the same in New York, for the last ten years.

We have used the Syracuse solar salt extensively, and consider it equal to any salt in use for packing and preserving provisions.

NEW YORK, May 16, 1866.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request for an expression of our experience of the comparative value of the Onondaga and foreign salt for curing meat, would say: We are not curers of meats, but have been large dealers in meats cured by both kinds of salt, and of late years we have found the meats cured with Onondaga salt to appear as well, sell as well, and keep as well as that cured by foreign salt.

Yours, respectfully,

WALLACE & WICKES.

NEW YORK, May 21, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: I have been engaged in supplying fishermen with salt and dealing in fish for the last four years; have used the Onondaga salt extensively, and have found it equal, if not superior, to any kind of foreign salt for curing fish, and therefore take great pleasure in recommending it.

GENTLEMEN: We would say in reply to your inquiry that we sold last season some 40,000 bushels of your Syracuse salt, mostly of the description called Diamond F, to the packers and dealers in fish in this market, and it has in every instance given perfect satisfaction.

Yours respectfully,

BAKER & DOWNS.

Also signed by B. Clark, pork and beef inspector for the Board of Trade, Detroit.

[From Mr. Alfred A. Howlett, of Syracuse, N. Y., for twenty years past connected with one of the most extensive and successful packing establishments in the West, their location being at La Fayette, Ind.]

MY DEAR SIR: I was this day shown copies of two letters under date of Boston, April 24, 1886, addressed to Hon. Samuel Hooper, Washington, D. C., signed by James Oakes, and James Oakes and others.

In speaking of the comparative values of Turk's Island and Mediterranean salt on one hand, and domestic salt on the other, the writers, among other things, say that the first is "indispensably necessary for the purpose of packing provisions," etc.; and again, "American manufactured salt is not suitable to preserve provisions any length of time in hot climates."

I believe that the larger share of beef and pork packed in the United States, both for home consumption and export, is put up in the Western States, and in none other more extensively than in the States of Indiana and Illinois; and from my own personal observation and experience I know that the salt used and that has been used in those States for packing for years back has been almost exclusively the Onondaga solar or coarse salt, and I challenge any pork or beef in the markets of the world to claim superiority over the packing of those States.

I have been myself a beef and pork packer in Indiana for the last twenty-two years, never packing less than 2,000 barrels, and from that up to 25,000 barrels per year, and for a number of years back not going below 10,000 barrels with but very little exception, and that occasioned by inability to obtain the Onondaga solar salt. I have used no other than the coarse salt made by solar evaporation at Syracuse, Onondaga County, New York; and in all that time I have not been compelled to take back in the aggregate 300 barrels on account of failure from any cause, and then none on account of failure of the salt. The pork and beef of my packing has been marketed year after year at the same point, and I have always received without trouble in New York and elsewhere the highest market price obtained for army beef or pork on the market.

Having had a life-long experience in packing, dealing in, and hand in hand beef and pork, and having used myself and seen used by others all kinds of salt for packing, I freely and conscientiously say that I would give as large a price per pound for the Onondaga solar salt as for any other salt known to the commerce of this country, for I consider it in all curative and preservative effects not inferior to any other, and for some reasons superior.

No discrimination is asked for or expected on account of this salt by our customers, and the old prejudice against this salt, triumphantly exploded by the United States Government tests of 1851 to 1854, inclusive, is no more heard of among the beef and pork dealers and consumers of this country.

A. A. HOWLETT.

Hon. T. T. DAVIS.

For the genuine and authoritative character of the foregoing testimonials reference is respectfully made to Hon. Thomas T. Davis, representative from the Twenty-third Congressional district in the State of New York.

I also submit the statements of others engaged in the manufacture of this staple in the Onondaga and Warsaw districts, which statements speak for themselves:

[Extracts from statement of salt manufacturers at Warsaw, N. Y.]

About the year 1883, the discovery of salt in Western New York, distant about 125 miles from the Syracuse field, led to an extensive development of this industry in that region, and with the result that standard common fine salt was freely offered during 1886 and 1887 as low as 55 cents per barrel (barrels worth 25 cents included), being equivalent to 6 cents a bushel for the net salt.

As regards the assertion that a salt pool or trust has been organized, with a view to the artificial elevation of prices, or the curtailment of production, the undersigned committee are not aware of such an organization, and are able to state in the most positive manner that such does not exist, so far as salt district of Western New York is concerned; and a general pool among the salt producing interests of this country could hardly exist without the fact coming to the knowledge of one or the other of this committee.

Turning from these general considerations, we invite the attention of your committee to the salt trade of Western New York. This field embraces two contiguous districts, commonly spoken of as the Warsaw and the Genesee, lying within the counties of Wyoming, Genesee, and Livingston. In the Warsaw district there are fifteen large salt blocks with an aggregate capacity of about 5,000,000 bushels annually. These are the—

Castile Salt Works, Castile, N. Y.
Duncan Salt Company, Silver Springs, N. Y.
Silver Lake Salt Company, Perry, N. Y.
Kerr Salt Company, Rock Glen, N. Y.
Eldridge Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Empire Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Hawley Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Gouinlock & Humphrey Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Warsaw Dairy Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Miller Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Crystal Salt Company, Warsaw, N. Y.
Pearl Salt Company, Pearl Creek, N. Y.
Le Roy Salt Company, Le Roy, N. Y.

The amount of capital invested in these works, according to the estimate of a competent authority, is about $2,100,000, and the number of persons directly supported by this industry numbers about 2,000.

As regards the profits of the business in this district, this committee believes itself to be in possession of reliable information, to the effect that no company paid any dividend during the past year, two companies failed during 1887, and from the best information we can obtain we are persuaded that the production of salt in the Western New York district for the last two years has not paid the cost of producing. Some companies have made a little, but others have lost more, so that on the whole the business has not paid.

We may further say that in consequence of the development of the salt manufacture the counties of Genesee, Livingston, and Wyoming are experiencing a prosperity never before known to them. Money is more abundant than ever before, labor finds employment, and the farmer and the mechanic find market for their products and their skill. Salt is cheaper than ever before and of a better quality.

Butter and cheese manufacturers formerly looked abroad, especially to England, for their salt, but now as good an article is furnished of domestic production and at a much lower price.

Should the duties on salt be removed and the price of the article correspondingly decline, every salt plant in the States of New York, Michigan, Virginia, California, and Louisiana would be rendered worthless; the large amount of capital invested lost, and the laborer, the mechanic, and the farmer obliged to seek other markets for their products.

In the Genesee district of Western New York there are two salt blocks located at Mount Morris, N. Y., on the line of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, and known as the Lackawanna Salt Company and the Royal Salt Company, while in the same district on the line of the Western New York and Pennsylvania Railroad, there are the—

Leicester Salt Company, at Cuylerville, N. Y.
York Salt Company, at York, N. Y.
Livingston Salt Company, at Piffard, N. Y.
Genesee Salt Company, at Piffard, N. Y.
Retsof Mining Company, at Piffard, N. Y.

This latter company mines the rock salt, instead of evaporating the brine, as is the case with all the other companies mentioned.

The shipments of salt during 1887, from the stations on the Western New York and Pennsylvania Railroad, are stated by Mr. George S. Gatchell, general superintendent of that road, to have amounted to 79,194 tons, or a little more than 5,000 car loads. He further says: "We expect the same to be materially increased during the coming year."

Of the companies in the Genesee district, it is believed that none have paid dividends from the earnings of the years 1886 and 1887. The business has been conducted without profit and in most instances at a loss. This is due in part to the earnest effort put forth by manufacturers to improve the quality of their product, leading to costly experiments, which absorbed profits without yielding any immediate return, other than the increased appreciation of customers.

During the past three years, the average quality of the salt produced in the Western New York field has very rapidly improved, and it may be said, without fear of successful contradiction, that the best salt produced there, for dairy and packing purposes, is superior to the best produced in England for similar purposes. It would seem, therefore, from the standpoint of the political economist, bad policy to destroy in its infancy an industry which in the near future promises to render the country independent in this respect of foreign control.

In the district represented by this committee immense quantities of standard salt for packers' use have been sold during the years 1886 and 1887, at a net price of from $2 to $2.40 per ton of 2,000 pounds, the average probably being about $2.25, prices which, as already shown, have not paid the cost of manufacture.

In estimating the influence of the removal of the duty on salt, we must consider its relations both to the consumer and to the domestic manufacturer, and the tariff should be equitably adjusted in such way that neither interest should be placed entirely at the mercy of the other.

Fine salt for dairying purposes comes from England in sacks holding 224 pounds and pays a duty of 12 cents per hundred pounds, equal to about 27 cent per sack. The best quality of this salt sells in New York for about $2.25 per sack or say 1 cent a pound. One pound of salt is usually added to 16 pounds of butter, so the salt in each pound of butter costs in this market $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent. If now the duty of 27 cents a sack be removed and the market price correspondingly fall, there will be a saving to the butter-maker of about $\frac{1}{3}$ of the present cost, equal to about $\frac{1}{112}$ of a cent for each pound of butter made. In other words, removal of the 12-cent tariff on dairy salt will save the creamery and dairy men one cent for every 128 pounds of butter made.

Is this saving to the butter-maker or the consumer of butter worth the sacrifice of the dairy-salt-making interest of the United States?

Salt imported for packers' use and commonly known as "Liverpool ground," usually comes in bulk and pays a duty of 8 cents per hundred pounds, equal to $1.60 per ton of 2,000 pounds. If the market price of salt in the United States should be reduced to the extent indicated by these figures, it is clear that the domestic manufacturer would receive but 65 cents a ton for the salt that he makes. As fuel required for making a ton of salt costs a little over $1, the salt manufactories of this region, and in fact of all the salt-making regions of the United States, must inevitably close. With the salt works of this country closed and the plants dismantled, the market would be in the hands of the English manufacturers and prices would probably reach, if not surpass, those of twenty-five years ago. We trust that such a condition of affairs may be averted.

In all reports on salt it has been classed as a raw material. We beg to state that it is a manufactured article, using large quantities of coal, machinery, iron, and wood in its production, and, owing to its nature, the major part of the plant has to be renewed in three to five years.

Respectfully submitted.

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC SALT.

SIR: In compliance with your request the undersigned beg leave to lay before you a short compendium of the relations existing between foreign and domestic salt, and we beg that this paper may be taken in connection with, and as supplementary to the "memorial" recently addressed to you by us.

CONSUMPTION OF SALT.—The salt consumed in the United States is partly of domestic production and partly imported from other countries, and the relative proportion of domestic to foreign has been for—

Years.	Domestic.	Foreign.
	Tons.	Tons.
1883	774,029	367,469
1884	894,369	405,719
1885	879,769	400,422
1886	983,385	389,104

These figures, compiled from Day's Mineral Resources of the United States, [Government Printing Office, Washington, 1887], show a gradual increase in the demand for salt in this country, which demand was chiefly for salt of domestic manufacture; and the domestic production, to meet this demand, has increased about 25 per cent. in four years, while the demand for imported salt has actually decreased. It is a fair inference, therefore, that consumers to the extent of over 200,000 tons believe that they have found better value for the same money in domestic than in foreign salt.

KINDS OF SALT.—There are four principal kinds or grades of salt used in this country. The grades made in the United States are:

"Common fine," corresponding to the English "Common."
Dairy (factory filled) corresponding to the English "Fine" (factory filled).
Solar (Syracuse, California) corresponding to sea salt (West Indies, etc.).
Rock salt (Louisiana, Western New York), corresponding to rock salt (England).

"Common fine," and factory filled or dairy salt, is made both at home and abroad, by evaporating strong brines in either wooden or iron vessels. The wooden vessels, called grainers, are long tanks containing steam pipes, and the iron vessels are large kettles or pans with furnaces underneath them.

Solar salt (American) is obtained by exposing the brine contained in the wooden tanks to the open air and without the use of artificial heat. This industry is chiefly carried on at Syracuse, N. Y. But the demand on the Pacific coast for a good solar salt at a reasonable price has led, within a recent period, to the development of this branch of salt-making in California.

Sea salt (foreign) is usually obtained from ponds or small lakes connecting with the sea.

Rock salt is mined much after the manner of coal, and is found quite near the surface in Louisiana, and at a considerable depth (1,000 feet) at the Retsof mine, at Piffard, in the western part of the State of New York. (See circular Retsof Mining Company, Exhibit A.) Rock salt is furnished in large lumps for salting cattle and horses, or crushed into small pea-sized fragments for hide-salting, acid-making, and other purposes.

Price of salt.—The selling price of common salt at the various works in Western New York during the past two years has averaged less than $2 50 per net ton (2,000 pounds), and in Michigan the price has been still lower. The freight from works in Western New York to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York City is at present 10 cents per hundred pounds, and to Boston 12 cents, being somewhat higher than before the passage of the interstate-commerce act.

The selling price of English common salt at Liverpool is nominally 7s. 6d. per ton (2,240 pounds), but large sales have recently been made as low as 6s. 6d. The freight on this salt from Liverpool during the past three years has varied from 1s. to 8s., according to the port to which it is sent, season of the year, etc. The average freight for this period to the principal ports of our Atlantic coast has probably been less than 4s.

Salt of this grade it brought over in bulk and pays a duty of 8 cents per hundred pounds.

Dairy or factory filled is chiefly prepared from common salt by certain processes of purification, drying, grinding, etc., and fetches at the works in Syracuse, Western New York, and Michigan from $5 to $6 per ton (2,000 pounds). A better quality, made direct from the brine by more expensive processes, fetches a higher price.

English fine salt varies greatly in quality; the lower grades, e. g., Falk's being obtainable for 21s. free on board at Liverpool; Deakin's at 25s.; while the highest grade, Ashton's, is not quoted to the trade for shipment to America, as the entire quantity brought to this country comes through a single house, namely, that of F. D. Moulton & Co., of New York, who thereby enjoy a monopoly of the sale of this salt in America. This salt is quoted in the New York market in sacks at $25 per ton. The duty on this salt is 12 cents per 100 pounds, equal to $2.68 per ton.

The sacks in which English fine salt is brought to America pay no duty, but the American salt manufacturer using similar sacks is obliged to pay a duty of 40 per cent. on them, or on the material from which they are made.

English lump or rock salts cost in Liverpool about 7s. to 8s. per ton, and until quite recently was sold to the American consumer at a very large advance in price.

Sea salt from Turk's Island and the Mediterranean is held in the New York market at from $8 to $12 per ton. Just how much of this is profit to the importer we are not prepared to state. Until recently there existed among the importers of sea salts in New York a combination or pool which controlled the price in that city, and it was not until American rock salt from Western New York was freely offered in the New York market at comparatively low prices that consumers were able to obtain coarse salt at a reasonable price.

Cost of manufacture.—The comparative cost of manufacture of salt in this country and in England involves a comparison of the original cost of the plant, the cost of repairs, the fuel used for evaporating the brine, and the labor employed in raking or lifting the salt from the pans and grainers and putting it in the bins.

The first cost of a salt plant in America is about double that of an English plant of the same capacity, due to the greater cost of the wood and iron which enter into their construction, and to the higher wages received by the masons, carpenters, and laborers employed in the work. Much of the machinery is liable to rapid deterioration, and the large iron pans, costing say $2,000 for a pan 100 by 30 feet in size, will require annually repairs amounting to fully 20 per cent. of their prime cost. These repairs are relatively more expensive than they would be in England.

All of the boiled salts, that is, the grades known as "common" and "fine" (factory filled), necessitate the use of large quantities of coal and the employment of much labor.

Coal is cheaper in England than here, and the rate of wages paid in England is about one-half that which is paid in America for similar services.

The cost of fuel for evaporating brine in this country we can state with some exactness, based on the actual production of salt and consumption of coal during the months of December, January, and February just passed, at one of the works in Western New York.

During these months 165,033 bushels of salt were made at a cost of $5,000.93 for fuel, or a little over 3 cents per bushel, or $1.23 per ton (2,000 pounds).

The rate of wages paid in Western New York to rakers and lifters of salt is $1.50 per day, and the actual cost for labor on the salt above referred to amounted to $4,403, equal to $2.66 per bushel, or $1.06 per ton (2,000 pounds). A ton of salt therefore costs for fuel and the labor of raking and putting in bins $2.29. Dairy salt requires a further expenditure of fuel and labor to dry, grind, and screen, and fit it for its intended purpose. It will be noted that the expense of packing and putting on cars, the expense of selling the product, and the expenses of administration are not included.

From the above it will be clearly seen that under existing circumstances common and fine salt can not be manufactured as cheaply in America as in England. We may further state that rock-salt can not be mined, even with improved machinery, as cheaply in this country as in England, and that solar salt can not be made and gathered as cheaply by American labor as it can by the native Portuguese, Italians, and West Indian negroes.

In a communication from Messrs. F. D. Moulton & Co. to your committee, a statement is made as to the comparative expense of laying down a ton (2,240 pounds) of Syracuse and a ton of English salt in New York. It is there stated that it costs $4.20 to deliver a ton of Syracuse salt in New York, while English salt can be placed there for $3.32 if admitted free of duty, which is entirely in harmony with what we have ourselves stated above.

The inference of F. D. Moulton & Co., "that the American manufacturer takes the full advantage of his position in extorting from the consumer every cent that he can consistently with keeping out the foreign article," and "that the American manufacturer is receiving an unduly large percentage of profit," are not warranted by the facts, as the cost of producing Syracuse salt is probably greater than even that of Western New York.

Much valuable information concerning the relations of English to American salt will be obtained from an examination of Falk's salt circulars. From these circulars, covering a period of several years, we find that the average prices of English salt at Liverpool have been as follows:

Years.	Common salt.	Fine salt.
	s. d.	s. d.
1872	10 6	35 0
1873	15 0	40 0
1874	16 0	42 0
1875	12 0	40 0
1876	10 0	31 0
1877	9 0	28 0
1878	10 0	28 0
1879	9 0	27 0
1880	9 0	26 0
1881	9 0	26 0
1882	9 0	26 0
1883	9 6	25 3
1884	7 9	25 9
1885	9 0	27 0
1886	9 6	25 0
1887	7 9	24 6

The very remarkable but gradual fall in the price of English salt is probably not due to accident or special benevolence on the part of the manufacturer, but is unquestionably due to overproduction or great (chiefly) American competition.

An examination of a series of Falk's circulars reveals some very interesting facts relating to the formation of a combination or trust among the salt-producers of England to control production and regulate prices, and the hope and expectation that the American Congress will pass laws that will enable them to recover the American trade now slipping from their grasp. That English manufacturers are losing money on their shipments to America is frankly conceded, and the unprecedentedly low prices prevailing can only be explained on the theory that the English makers are selling in this market at prices greatly below cost in order to discourage and if possible crush out American manufacture with the ultimate result of a return to the high prices they formerly obtained. (Exhibit B.)

The crisis in the salt industries of America and England is at hand, and the question for the American Congress to decide is which shall yield to the other.

The fear has been expressed that if English salt is shut out of the American market domestic manufacturers will form a pool or trust for the purpose of putting up prices to an unreasonable figure. This fear is baseless.

The salt manufacture of England is practically confined to a single county, Cheshire, and an English pool has been formed and can be readily maintained. The salt manufacture of this country, on the other hand, is widely distributed, and experience has shown that an American pool is impracticable, for if an attempt were made to unduly raise prices new territory would be developed to offset it.

The salt deposits in Western New York alone cover an area of over 2,000 square miles, under which there is a stratum of rock salt 60 or 70 feet in thickness. Michigan possesses an equally extensive deposit of the raw material, and other localities are abundantly supplied. America is fully equal to the task of furnishing all the salt needed by the domestic consumer, and at a reasonable price. Remove the present duty, destroy domestic manufacture, and you make our entire country, as a great portion of the civilized world now is, tributary to Cheshire.

The communication from Messrs. F. D. Moulton & Co., already referred to, coming from a house that has so long been identified with the English salt interests, merits careful consideration, as they are unquestionably in a position to be well informed as to the matters of which they speak. We must, however, join issue with them on some points, both of fact and inference.

These gentlemen, the sole agents for Ashton's English dairy salt, attack the quality of American salt, especially that prepared for dairy use, speaking as follows:

"American brine is full of lime, gypsum, and other foreign matter, which can not be wholly eliminated by any process of manufacture. English is free from these injurious elements."

These statements we absolutely and categorically deny. The fact is, there is absolutely no "lime" (oxide of calcium) in American brine. Gypsum (sulphate of lime) does exist in American brine also, and to a great extent in English brine. As, however, butter-makers use salt, not brine, the purity of the manufactured article is alone in question.

From an analysis made by Dr. F. E. Engelhardt, formerly New York State chemist, we learn that Ashton's salt contains—

	Per cent
Pure salt	97.75
Sulphate of lime	1.21

From the same authority we have analyses of several American salts, as follows:

No. 1.

	Per cent.
Pure salt	98.48
Sulphate of lime	.99

No. 2.

Pure salt	98.89
Sulphate of lime	.72
Pure salt	98.84
Sulphate of lime	.16

From Dr. Goessman, director of the Massachusetts State Experimental Station, at Amherst, we have an analysis of American dairy salt, yielding—

	Per cent.
Pure salt	93.52
Sulphate of lime	1.01

From Prof. C. F. Chandler, of New York, an analysis of American dairy salt, yielding—

	Per cent.
Pure salt	99.69
Sulphate of lime	.04

From J. F. Geisler, official chemist, New York Mercantile Exchange, we have a direct comparison between English and American common salts, as follows:

	Per cent.
English—
Pure salt	98.57
Sulphate of lime	1.28
American—
Pure salt	98.88
Sulphate of lime	.97

The utter falsity of the charges preferred by Messrs. F. D. Moulton & Co. against the purity of American salt is shown by the above.

F. D. M. & Co. further state that "salt evaporated from sea-water is very strong and remarkably free from impurities, and on this account is preferred by packers and others to American salt." The true fact is, that repeated analyses, both here and abroad, show that sea-salt produced by solar evaporation usually contains but 95 to 96 per cent. of pure salt, the balance consisting of various impurities. We are surprised that F. D. M. & Co. are so ill-informed on the question of the purity of sea-salt.

We are not in a position to know what the preferences of American meat packers may be, but will simply state that to our knowledge over 2,000 tons of salt were shipped by one works in Western New York to the packers in a single Western city, during six months ending December 31, 1887.

That the dairymen of America do not universally prefer English or even Ashton's salt, is shown in the "memorial" previously addressed to your committee. Additional evidence on this point may be obtained from the advertising circular of one of the American companies. (Exhibit C.)

In F. D. Moulton & Co.'s communication it is stated that the cost of mining and crushing rock salt at Piffard, N. Y., is from 50 cents to $1 a ton, and that the company receives for the same from $6 to $7 a ton. The officers of the mining company have stated to the undersigned that the cost of mining this salt and putting it on the cars is fully $2 per ton. They further state that they do not receive the prices named by Moulton, and offer in evidence an account of sales with that house (Exhibit D).

In conclusion, the undersigned desire to express their candid belief that the American salt industry will not be able to survive the removal of the present duty on salt; and that with this industry destroyed, the trade will be almost wholly in the hands of the English, who, with their American agents, will reap the profits that will inevitably accrue from the advance in price to the consumer.

We do not believe that other conclusions can be arrived at, or that it is the desire of your committee, or of Congress, to bring about this state of affairs.

Respectfully yours,

H. G. PIFFARD.
S. T. KERR.

MARCH, 1888.

Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS,
Chairman of Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. YARDLEY. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON].

Mr. ATKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitation in saying that I am a believer in the American policy of protection as applied in imposing duties upon the importation of foreign commodities which come into competition with the productions of the United States, and after a careful consideration of the arguments which have been adduced against this policy my faith in its propriety is still unshaken. I support it not solely because it is of advantage to American manufacturers in giving them the opportunity to supply the markets of the United States, nor only because it has increased the wages and raised the standard of living among the working masses of the country, but for the reason that it has been and will be of advantage to the whole country.

I trust that I am not so narrow in my views nor so lacking in patriotism as to favor a policy that would be of advantage only to the district which I have the honor to represent or to the State or section in which I live, and which would be injurious to the people of other districts, or States, or sections.

I would not willingly insist upon the adoption or perpetuation of a system of government that would build up one portion of this country at the expense of the rest, nor would I advocate a policy that would favor a class or classes of our people and impose undue burdens upon the others who are equally entitled to the benefits of just government. But I conceive that the paramount duty of the Government is to develop the resources of our common country, and this embraces the duty to provide for the employment of all our people so far as this can properly be done, either directly or indirectly, by legislation. For the wealth of a country does not consist only in fertile lands and prolific mines supplemented by a genial climate, but over and above all these, utilizing and making them productive, are the skillful hands which, guided by intelligence and stimulated by a fair reward, create out of that which before was unproductive the varied commodities which fill our marts and figure in the census reports as the wealth of the nation.

We can not legislate for all mankind, but we can and should in the first instance so shape our policy as to give our own people every possible advantage in their own land.

And I do not favor a policy which invites "our manufacturers in the emergency that presses upon us to surrender something for the public good," as the President in his message suggests. I do not believe that the interests of one set of men are so hostile to the interests of the rest that any surrender need be made or should be demanded, nor do I believe that our own manufacturers, or mechanics, or miners, or laborers should relinquish their ability or their right to supply the wants of the American people. If the carpenters, and joiners, and milliners, and dressmakers, and blacksmiths, and tailors, and masons, and butchers, and bakers, and plasterers who are so carefully enumerated in this remarkable message have the power to build our houses, make our clothing, and supply our food, is there any good reason why the miner and skilled artisan and the men who by means of their capital and energy make the work of the miner and the artisan productive, and put their products upon the market, should be deprived of their ability to supply us?

As in historic days the motto of "no surrender" brought honor and renown to the men who upheld American interests in the presence of foreign armed foes, so I shall insist upon "no surrender" of any American industry, especially when a surrender of existing right will give an advantage to foreign competitors. This surrender is called for because there is a surplus of money in the Treasury which is withdrawn from the business of the country, and the President believes that we are, in consequence, likely to be plunged into business distress.

This will probably be so unless some intelligent way of expending the surplus income can be devised by those who are now unfortunately in power, and of this I confess I have little hope. It has often been pointed out that the income of the nation might well be applied to the payment of the public debt, to needed public improvements, in furnishing greater facilities for the education of the people, in giving much-needed relief to the thousands of indigent and disabled soldiers, their parents or widows and orphans, or in smoothing the declining years and giving some adequate recompense to the brave men who, when the nation was threatened with destruction, freely offered their lives to protect and preserve it.

But none of these suggestions have met with favor from the party in power, and a call upon some of our people to surrender something they are now supposed to enjoy is regarded by our rulers as the highest statesmanship.

It may not be improper to contrast in this connection the difference between the present and the culmination of the revenue-tariff period in 1857.

President Cleveland complains of the excessive accumulation of money in the Treasury, due, as his friends allege, to the protective tariff; President Buchanan complained because the Treasury was empty, the effect of the revenue tariff of 1846.

Protective duties have filled the Treasury, and Democratic statesmanship is not equal to the task of applying the money to any good purpose. But in 1857 there was less currency circulating among the people than now; a condition of things existed which was described by Mr. Buchanan in his first annual message, December 8, 1857:

The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly, and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and, up till within a brief period, our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufactures suspended, our public woks retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, while the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.

Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove it to be a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among our people. With this the Government can not fail to deeply sympathize, though it may be without the power to afford relief.

Under a revenue tariff in 1857 the United States Treasury was empty, while $400,000,000 of gold taken from the mines of California in the preceding eight years had been sent abroad to swell the coffers of the British Empire; in 1887 the silver and gold have accumulated at home. In 1857 our money was in the hands of foreigners, our manufactories were suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out employment and reduced to want; in 1887, under the system inaugurated by a Republican administration, which has thus far escaped mutilation at the hands of its free-trade enemies, the money is in our own hands, we find our manufacturers actively at work, our public works, so far as the Executive has permitted appropriations to be made therefor, in full progress, private enterprises vigorously pushed, while the wage-workers are generally employed at remunerative wages.

In 1857 our manufacturers had surrendered, not upon the call of the President and for the public good, but because the American market had been occupied by the products of foreign manufacturers. Our gold and silver had been sent abroad to pay for goods that could and should have been made at home; and our people, by reason of this loss of the precious metals, were too poor to buy. If the present situation is alarming, the condition of the country in 1857 was deplorable. Intelligent statesmanship can avoid the present danger, but the money sent abroad to pay adverse balances of trade can not by any laws of our framing be brought back. The President says that we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. The condition that he deprecates and desires to change is the circumstance that the revenues are in excess of the expenditures of the Government, by reason of which large sums of money are locked up in the Treasury vaults instead of circulating among the people. This state of things is productive of evil, and a remedy must be sought. And right here is where we are confronted by a theory. It is the President's own theory; not his own in the sense of having originated it, but his own because he has adopted it from others and thus made it his.

Theory is defined to be "a plan or scheme existing only in the mind, opposed to practice," and the term is here correctly applied, for never in the history of our country has such a plan been adopted in practical affairs. He assures us that it is not a question of free trade and at once proposes to place upon the free-list a vast number of articles which are produced in the United States and which he affects to believe can be supplied for a less money price from abroad. He proposes that we shall have free coal, free wool, free iron ore, free salt, free lumber, and says that the question of protection and free trade is not involved. He mistakes; what he proposes is free trade. The advocates of free trade recognize his plan as in full accord with their teachings and belief and promptly rally to his support, while the friends of protection see in his recommendation that "raw materials used in manufactures" shall be admitted into our ports under a reduced duty, or without duty, an attempt to bribe manufacturers and divide the friends of the protective policy. The admission of anything free of duty which competes with American productions of a like character is contrary to the meaning and spirit of the policy of protection, and a surrender of any one article is a surrender of the principles upon which the whole policy is based.

But while the message of the President carried consternation to the producers of America who were by it summoned to surrender, there were places where it met with universal approval if not enthusiastic applause. Our commercial rivals, who have long sought to pierce and destroy the armor which secured the market of 60,000,000 of consumers to our own people, and which restrained foreigners who contributed nothing to our welfare from participation in this market, received the intelligence of the views of the President as contained in his message with "ghoulish glee." These commercial rivals saw in the distance, perhaps, but none the less clearly, their approaching triumph, to be celebrated upon the prostrate forms of dead or dying American industries, and their loud hosannas over the message were for a while almost childish in their exuberance. Nearly every British journal sang pæans to the message.

The London Post says:

We shall be much mistaken if the effect of this state communication will not be to strengthen considerably the case of free-traders in all parts of the world. It will be regarded as a step in the right direction by all who believe in the soundness of free-trade principles.

The London Globe says:

The President, it is true, does not call his new departure by that ugly name; on the contrary, he waxes indignant at the supposition that he has come over to free trade. But to American ears the whole message must be redolent of Cobdenism in a slightly modified form. * * * This remarkable utterance will be certain to exercise an absolutely paramount influence on the next Presidential election. Party names and party ties are thrown into hotch-potch. The governing issue at the contest will lie between protection and free trade.

The London Spectator says that the message has—struck a blow at American protection.

It adds that the President—has fired a shot at the protectionists which will be all the more effective for his refusal to discuss the theoretic issue.

The London Saturday Review says that the message—deals with a question which is as interesting to Englishmen as Americans.

And it adds:

President Cleveland has devoted himself entirely to the tariff. It is impossible to recast this without touching directly the pockets of every citizen of the United States, and indirectly influencing the commercial interests of the world. The President and the Democratic leaders have finally decided that they have nothing to gain by keeping measure any longer with the protectionists. They have, from whatever motive, resolved to adopt a free-trade policy. Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language. "The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury." In America this means free trade.

The Scotchman says of the President's proposal to reduce duties:

It may be admitted that large reductions in the duties on imported manufactured goods would produce great distress in many parts of the country—

Meaning the United States, and adds:

The free importation of iron, coal, and wool would be a great boon to British producers. * * * If it were accompanied with reductions in the tariff upon cotton, woolen, and other manufactures the artisans of this country would derive a marked benefit from it. If once the United States finds herself on the road to free trade she will hardly know where to stop.

The London Iron and Steel Trades Journal says:

The facts set forth in the President's message, though by no means new, are now brought so prominently under the notice of the American Congress and of American citizens that a violent stimulus must be given to the party which advocates entire freedom of trade.

The London Iron says:

The message of President Cleveland to the United States Congress is the preliminary to a movement which we trust will gain in strength.

The London Ironmonger says:

Dealing with the message as it stands, it would certainly seem to indicate a greater leaning towards free-trade principles on the part of the United States Cabinet than has been observable hitherto.

In a leading article the London Colliery Guardian for December 16 says:

If President Cleveland should be able to carry out his plan for admission into America free of duty, one of the first effects which would be produced on the English iron trade would be the transference of much of the enormous stocks of pig in the Scotch and Cleveland markets to United States ports. Shipments of hematites from Scotland and from the west coast of England would also increase. The iron-ore mines of Lancashire and West Cumberland would be certain to do a greatly enlarged trade with the United States.

In an article on "The coal trade in 1887 and its prospects for 1888," the London Times says:

If President Cleveland's tariff reforms are carried, English goods and iron and steel largely will go to the States in greatly increased proportions.

AN END OF BRITISH EXULTATION.

Suddenly all these expressions of sympathy and delight with the President's message have practically ceased in England and Scotland. The London Pall Mall Gazette gave the following warning, and it has been heeded:

English free-traders would be well advised if they moderated the ecstacy of their jubilation over President Cleveland's message. Every word which they say in its favor will be used as a powerful argument against the adoption of its recommendations.

But this warning seems to have been lost on the Queen of England, for in her speech from the throne on February 9 last, she declared that—

The prospects of commerce are more hopeful than any which I have been able to point to in many years. I deeply regret that there has been no corresponding improvement observable in the condition of agriculture.

The prospects of British commerce became more hopeful when the Democratic position was announced by the President, and the heart of the British Queen was gladdened. If she were the ruler of the United States, also, she would probably put as much pressure upon the Democratic side of this House to compel the passage of this bill as the President is now said to be doing.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of protection is national in its scope, and based upon well-defined principles. It is not intended to benefit one class nor one interest, but it is intended to encourage and develop the productive forces of the nation for the benefit of the whole nation. If the manufacturers are to have free coal and ore and wool that these things may be cheaper, I may ask, at whose expense? Of course, at the expense of the American land-owner and the American farmer and miner, for their rights to the American market are to be sacrificed for the benefit of somebody else; and if cheapness alone is desired the reason for cheapening only the raw materials of manufacture is not obvious. Why not give the consumer the benefit of the greatest possible reduction in price and admit the finished product free? The logic which would abandon the farmer and the miner to their fate would not feel called upon to stop until the legitimate conclusion is reached, and this would be free trade in everything. That the free-traders themselves recognize this as the logical result is shown by the fact that all have arrayed themselves in favor of the message and loudly proclaim themselves the supporters of its author.

The "raw materials used in manufactures" to be admitted free may to-day be iron ore and lumber and wool, but after them would follow the next higher forms into which these things may be made. Carey, answering the question, What is raw material, says:

All the productions of the earth are, in their turn, finished commodity and raw materials. Coal and ore are the finished commodity of the miner, and yet they are only the raw material of which pig-iron is made. The latter is the finished commodity of the smelter, and yet it is but the raw material of the puddler and him who rolls the bar. The bar again is the raw material of sheet iron, and that in turn becomes the raw material of the nail and the spike. These, in time, become the raw material of the house, in the diminished cost of which are found concentrated all the changes that have been observed in various stages of passage from the rude ore lying useless in the earth to the nail, the spike, the hammer, and the saw required for the completion of a modern dwelling.

Mr. David A. Wells, in No. 7 of his Economic Disturbance Series, states that—

With the exception of Great Britain, Holland, Sweden and Norway, Denmark, and possibly China, there is not a state in the world claiming civilization and maintaining commerce to any extent with foreign countries which has not within recent years materially advanced its import or export duties. Russia commenced raising her duties on imports in 1877, and has continued to do so until the Russian tariff at the present time is in a great degree prohibitory and one of the highest ever enacted in modern times by any nation, the aggregate value of its importations for 1886 being returned at only $194,450,000, a reduction of about 25 per cent. in three years, or since 1883. Italy and Austria-Hungary raised their tariffs in 1878; Germany in 1879; France in 1881; Austria-Hungary again in 1882 and 1887; Switzerland in 1885; the Dominion of Canada in 1883 and 1887; Roumania in 1886; Belgium and Brazil in 1887; while in the United States, owing to the decline in the prices of goods subject to specific duties, the average ad valorem rate of duty on dutiable merchandise has advanced from 41.61 per cent. in 1884 to 45.55 per cent. in 1886.

If these other nations see proper to restrain the importation of foreign goods which compete with their own productions, are we to assume that they are mistaken in doing so? Have they not been taught by experience that their own producers and manufacturers need the help that is given them by protective duties? It can not be alleged that these nations, embracing republics, kingdoms, and empires, acted in ignorance and wholly without consideration in thus increasing their tariffs, and it is assuming a great deal to presume that the majority of our Committee on Ways and Means and their free-trade backers understand the art of government better than the statesmen of these nations I have named. But the statesmen from Texas and Arkansas and Kentucky and their compeers prefer the British system of free trade, and they propose to force its principles upon us and compel us to adopt some of its practices.

They appear to act in happy obliviousness of the fact that England for more than five hundred years was under protective laws and for only forty-two years under free trade. That before she adopted free trade she had developed her manufactures until she believed that she was invulnerable and could successfully compete with any and all other nations in the markets of the world; that by means of her highly improved machinery, her trained artisans, her natural resources, and her vast foreign and colonial possessions, acquired by war after war and bloodshed succeeding bloodshed, she could defy the world commercially as she defied the various nations. Before her conversion to free trade her protective system embraced the prohibition of the exportation of machinery and raw materials, the emigration of skilled mechanics, and the importation of all manufactured articles which she could produce herself. The violation of these laws was punishable by fines, imprisonment, maiming, and death, and they were rigidly enforced. By such means she succeeded in building up, perfecting, and maintaining her industries until she believed she could furnish the whole world with manufactured goods. Her colonies were spread in every direction, and every one was expected to be an addition to her market.

India, long noted for the manufacture of the finest fabrics ever known, became a part of the English market. Years ago the East India Company annually received of the produce of the looms of India 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 pieces of cotton cloth. In 1800 the United States took 800,000 pieces, in 1830 not 4,000. In 1800 Portugal took 1,000,000 pieces, in 1830 only 20,000, and now none are exported, and production has almost ceased. The poor Indian weavers were reduced to absolute starvation; numbers died of hunger. And what was the sole cause? The presence of the English cheaper article. Belgium, France, Germany, Austria, Hungary, have all been duped by England into adopting in some shape low tariff or free trade, and they have now seen their mistake and corrected it by the adoption of high tariffs. While England was able to induce other people to buy her goods, their own manufactures were suppressed, and when they began to work for themselves she had every advantage in her favor—capital, skilled workmen, improved machinery, ships, and markets. Now every European nation has asserted its industrial independence and is engaged in the race for industrial supremacy. But so great are her advantages that they are compelled to pay less wages and hedge themselves around with protective tariffs in order to compete with her at all. And now it is asked of us that we shall surrender our advantages to her and admit her goods untaxed into our markets in equal competition with our own people, who bear all the burdens of our nation. Shall we fall into the trap from which other nations have just lately liberated themselves? I hope not.

TRUSTS.

Gentlemen assert that this bill is so adjusted as to defeat the so-called trusts or combinations which have recently sprung into existence and threatened to destroy some of the advantages which it was hoped would be derived from free competition amongst American producers. Duties have been lowered on sugar, and copper, and steel rails, and other things in the production of which combinations exist or are suspected, and we are told that the purpose of these reductions is to admit the foreigner into our market upon such terms as will enable him to successfully compete with the trusts and combines of which we now hear so much. Several objections suggest themselves to this policy.

First. It is an admission that we can not by law regulate such combinations, and we therefore call upon foreigners to save us from the consequences of our own impotence. It is desirable that all the commodities named should be produced in America for Americans, and the admission of foreign commodities to our markets involves to this extent the production abroad of what we should make at home, thus leaving labor unemployed and resources undeveloped.

Second. The remedy proposed is inadequate, and does not meet the evil complained of. The coffee trust, coal oil trust, the cotton-seed-oil trust, the whisky trust, and many others would not be in any way affected by the so-called remedy, because there can be no competition in these from abroad, and yet their exactions may be as burdensome as the sugar or steel combine.

Third. The proposed remedy would be defeated whenever a combination would be made between producers on both sides of the Atlantic, as is illustrated by the copper trust, which, originating in France, has been made to embrace the civilized world and controls production and prices everywhere.

Free-traders prate about the the formation of these so-called trusts and attribute their existence to the protective tariff, for it seems that no enthusiastic advocate of free trade hesitates to misrepresent the facts in the interest of his favorite theory; but in fact combinations to corner the market and enhance prices are as old as history. By a constitution of Zeno, Emperor of the East, who reigned from A. D. 474 to 491, all monopolies and combinations to keep up the price of merchandise, provisions, or workmanship were prohibited upon pain of forfeiture of goods and perpetual banishment. If the evil had not then existed it is not likely that a remedy would have been provided.

The offenses of forestalling the market, the engrossing of any commodity with an intent to sell it at an unreasonable price, and of monopolies and combinations to enhance prices are indictable and punishable under the common law, and were denounced by a statute of Edward VI, passed A. D. 1552, which imposed severe penalties for these crimes. And I submit that in the light of these historic precedents it is ridiculous to attribute the existence of trusts and combinations to the effects of a protective tariff. Men have combined to advance what they believe to be their interests from the beginning of history, the greatest "combine" of modern times having been the Southern Confederacy, which was organized to secure the perpetuation of human slavery and the adoption of free trade.

Trusts of home growth can and will be suppressed or restrained by home-made laws; trusts of European growth can not be affected by American laws, save as their products can be taxed by our tariffs. It is false to say that "trusts" are creatures or in any way results of the protective tariff, and it is silly to assume that delivery from the power of home trusts to the power of foreign trusts is a desirable thing.

The present protective tariff was adopted March 3, 1861; it has been in force for twenty-seven years, but it is only lately that "trusts" have been formed in any commodity protected by tariff duties. The coal-oil trust, the whisky trust, and the cotton-seed-oil trust were all formed long ago, although neither the production, distribution, nor consumption of coal-oil, whisky, or cotton-seed oil is affected by tariffs.

WOOL.

Wool is placed on the free-list by the so-called revenue reformers. Its production is a source of revenue to the American farmer; if placed upon the free-list his revenues from this source will surely be diminished. Who demands this sacrifice? Is it the manufacturers of woolen goods? We find that they protest against it. In a petition presented to this House they say:

> The undersigned, manufacturers in New England, recognizing the principle of protection as national and not provincial, and consequently equally applicable to all the industries of the United States; repudiating any distinction in this connection between so-called "raw materials" of domestic production and "finished products," whether the output of mines, farms, or workshops; claiming that the American policy should benefit alike all citizens, whether engaged in agriculture, manufacturing, or mining; that the industries of the country are interdependent and mutually sustaining, and the people of the different sections co-customers and co-consumers, do therefore respectfully submit that no article, "raw" or otherwise, of home production should be added to the free-list or inequitably changed in the tariff rates.

And to the same effect is the action of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, which—

> Resolved, That while the revision of the tariff and the laws governing the tariff may have become necessary, no law should be passed which would tend to cripple, break up, or destroy the home industries and home markets of the United States.
> Resolved, That the extension of the free-list of imports into the United States should be only of such character as will aid the further development of manufactures, and that no free importation of any article should be allowed that will militate against any of the industries of the country.

If manufacturers oppose the removal of the duties from wool and the principal commercial bodies lift their voices against it and the farmers denounce it, pray state what men or class of men desire it. Has there been a single petition presented praying for the removal of the duties upon wool? I have seen none; I have heard of none. The profit of the farmer upon the wool he raises has been so small that no considerable body of citizens of the United States has asked that it shall be diminished. Only theorists demand the removal of these duties. It is well known that woolen clothing is cheaper now than ever before in the history of this country, and at no time could a laboring man buy more or better with a month's wages than now. But cheapness should not be the sole aim of life, especially when it means the degradation of human labor. All the products of the woolen mills of the class generally used by the masses of the people are as cheap here as in a free-trade country, and this is especially so of blankets and ready-made clothing. The fact that we have domestic competition, skilled artisans trained to the work, and the large and constant demand of the best market on earth has contributed to reduce prices so low that all persons who have employment are well supplied. The workingman can purchase clothes from $5 to $12 per suit as good as can be bought for the same money abroad. He can buy a pair of good blankets which will last a lifetime for $5, and the same low prices prevail for all ordinary woolen goods.

And in this connection we must not overlook the important fact that only a very small proportion of a laborer's income goes for woolen clothing. This is so well known that no complaint has ever been heard from the laboring men about the high price of clothing, and it is equally well known that our laborers and their families are better clothed than the laborers of any other nation. This crusade against the protective tariff upon wool has been conducted by the free-trader upon a specious and deceptive plan. He tells the farmer that free trade in wool will increase the price and benefit him; he assures the manufacturer that it will decrease the price and benefit him; the laboring man that it will make his clothing cheaper through foreign importation; the manufacturer is told that he can make goods cheaper and thus keep out the foreigner, and give him in addition a share of the world's market, while at the same time the importers and their foreign allies are intriguing and working to place wool upon the free-list.

If they succeed somebody will be cheated, and it will not be the importers or foreigners. Clothing will not be much cheaper; if the powers of the farmer to purchase are much reduced the manufacturers can sell less, while the amount of goods imported will be increased, and the market for home production to that extent will be diminished. But suppose the farmers produced the wool and gave it to the manufacturers for nothing—did not get a cent for it—how much would a suit of clothes be reduced in price? Five or six pounds of wool will make sufficient cloth for a suit of heavy clothing. If the wool is worth, ready for making into cloth, 60 cents a pound; the wool that enters into a suit worth $25 to $30 would cost $3.60. The highest class wools only pay a duty of 12 cents a pound. If the duty were added to the price it would only enhance the price 72 cents for an entire heavy suit of clothes. If the duty were off wool and 72 cents were saved in the cost of each suit, how much would be saved to the wearer? Not one cent. The trifling difference would be lost in the course of trade, and would probably be distributed between the manufacturer of the cloth, the jobber, the wholesale merchant, the mechanics who made up the goods, and the clothier from whom the clothing is at last bought.

In 1881 we produced 272,000,000 pounds of wool in the United States, and we imported in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, 56,000,000, making an aggregate of 328,000,000 pounds, out of which we exported 5,500,000 pounds, leaving for the consumption of the country 322,500,000 pounds. Our population was then over 50,000,000 of people, and the amount of wool, if distributed per capita, would have been but 6⅜ pounds each. The duties on wool vary from 12 cents a pound for the finest imported wool to 2½ cents for the coarsest kinds, and most of that imported was the latter sort. But admitting for the sake of the argument that every pound of wool consumed was enhanced in price to the full extent of the maximum duty, the whole additional cost of woolen clothing to each person in the United States would average only 76 cents.

The rich, who buy more woolen clothing and of finer varieties than the poor, would pay much more than this proportion, while the poor would pay much less. All the money that would be saved to the poorest man by removing the duties on wool, if the price were reduced to the extent of the duties, would not pay for the tobacco he uses in a month. At best it would be a mere trifle; in practical mercantile affairs it would amount to nothing. But what will be the effect of the removal of the duty upon the wool-producers of the country?

Mulhall (History of Prices) states that the production of wool has more than doubled since 1850—that is, the increase has been three times faster than that of population, the clip of all nations summing up as follows:

Countries.	1850.	1860.	1870.	1883.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
Europe	630,000,000	715,000,000	807,000,000	660,000,000
United States	90,000,000	112,000,000	154,000,000	300,000,000
River Plate	25,000,000	56,000,000	167,000,000	305,000,000
Australia	43,000,000	70,000,000	197,000,000	421,000,000
Cape Colony	48,000,000	68,000,000	101,000,000	122,000,000
Total	836,000,000	1,021,000,000	1,426,000,000	1,818,000,000

The marvelous increase in the production of wool in Cape Colony, Australia, and the River Plate country is without a parallel in history. It is due to the fact that in these places land is cheap, the climate is well adapted to sheep-raising, no feed need be provided for winter, and the wages of the natives who are employed in attending the sheep are very low indeed. Against such competition as will come from these countries, if unrestrained, it will be impossible for our farmers to compete; and if wool is placed upon the free-list, as proposed by this bill, its production in this nation will soon practically cease.

The majority of the Ways and Means Committee assert in their report that if wool is placed upon the free-list our manufacturers can "make their goods cheaper and send them into foreign markets and successfully compete with the foreign manufacturers." But before we can reasonably expect to send woolen goods into foreign markets, to compete with foreign-made goods, we should first supply ourselves, which we have not yet done.

It appears that in 1887 we imported $45,000,000 worth of woolen goods. These imported woolens not only bore the cost of transportation from abroad but also paid duties.

Before we can command the markets of the world with woolen goods we must supply our own market with $45,000,000 worth of woolens and must also reduce the price not only below the cost of woolen goods sent to our country from abroad, but must in addition pay their transportation to distant countries in order to sell them there. This we can never do and pay existing wages to the mechanics who make the goods or existing prices to the farmers who now produce the wool. No proof is offered by the advocates of free wool to show that the removal of the duties on wool will enable us to manufacture woolen goods for export; they ask us to take the fact for granted because they say so.

This is easily disproved. We have a full and abundant supply of cotton of every quality desired; it is produced in our own country, so that no foreign transportation charges need be paid upon it, and our opportunities to use and manufacture it are superior to those of any other nation so far as cheapness and abundant supply are concerned. Our operatives engaged in manufactures are as skillful as any in the world, and our machinery is equal to the best.

Foreign wool will be brought to us with additional transportation charges upon it and subject to the losses incident to long-distance carriage. Our cotton cloths are in demand in the South American markets, where woolen goods are unsuited to the climate; and yet with all our facilities for manufacturing, and with a market near, our exports of manufactured cotton in 1880 were only $10,000,000 out of a total domestic production of $210,900,000 worth of such goods; and in 1886 our exports had risen to only $13,959,934.

The following table shows the extent of our exports of cotton manufactures for ten years:

During the fiscal year ended June 30—
1877	$10,235,843
1878	11,438,660
1879	10,853,950
1880	9,981,418
1881	13,571,387
1882	13,222,979
1883	12,951,145
1884	11,885,211
1885	11,636,591
1886	13,959,934

From the above statement, it will be seen that the average annual value of the exports of cotton manufactures for the last five years (1882–'86) amounted to $12,731,128, and the exports of 1886 were but a trifle in excess of those of 1881.

On the other hand, the average annual value of cotton goods imported in the last five years exceeded $31,000,000.

If we can not export cotton goods, with all our advantages, how can we succeed better with woolen goods, even if the wool is admitted free of duty and will be cheapened if it is placed upon the free-list? But I do not believe that the removal of the duty upon foreign wool will ultimately reduce its price.

In 1864 the production of wool in the United States was 142,000,000 pounds; in 1874 it was 181,000,000, and in 1884 it was 308,000,000 pounds. We imported in the same years 43,840,154, 54,901,760, and 70,596,170 pounds, respectively. In twenty years our wool production was increased 166,000,000 pounds, while our imports were increased only 26,756,016 pounds. At the same relative rate of supply we will soon furnish our own markets with wool from our own flocks, and no foreign wool will be needed.

It will be seen that until 1885 there was a gradual increase in the amount of wool grown in this country. This increase in the production of wool, it will be observed from the table, is very gradual. From its nature it was not susceptible of sudden enlargement. The acreage in cotton or wheat may vary very greatly in successive years, but with wool there can be no such variation.

Our flocks have grown slowly under the intelligent care of their owners, the statistics of this industry being as follows:

	Sheep.
1840	19,311,375
1850	21,723,221
1860	22,471,274
1870	28,477,951
1880	42,192,074
1885	50,360,243

Not only has the production of wool increased actually but relatively to the number of sheep. Owing to favorable and permanent legislation wool-growers have improved their flocks by raising better breeds and thus increased the weight of fleeces. In 1840, according to the census, the average weight of farm fleeces was 1.85 pounds; 1850, 2.42 pounds; 1860, 2.68 pounds; 1880, 4.79 pounds. Says Mr. Dodge, in commenting on this:

"The improvement in density and weight of fleece constitutes the great advantage that the manufacturing demand has made rather than increase of price, which tends to steadiness and cheapness in material and product, by the full development of the manufacture."

Another point is the higher value of American wools. The imported wools of the last five years constitute nearly one-fifth of the quantity manufactured, but it is little more than a tenth of the value of wool manufactured. This shows that under a sufficient tariff American growers have gone into the best qualities of wool. With this enormous increase in production, has the price been increased to the consumer? Not at all. I give the total average prices, in gold, of domestic, fine medium, and coarse-washed fleece wool for each year from 1859 to 1884, and let the reader judge for himself:

	Cents.		Cents.
1859	49	1872	62
1860	48	1873	48
1861	39	1874	47
1862	45	1875	43
1863	52	1876	37
1864	43	1877	40
1865	51	1878	38
1866	43	1879	36
1867	37	1880	49
1868	33	1881	42
1869	37	1882	42
1870	40	1883	39
1871	48	1884	33

These tables could be extended back to 1832, and the fact would be revealed that, with two single exceptions, wool has never averaged as low as in 1884; that the tendency has been a steady increase in production, improvement in quality, and decrease in price, and yet, in spite of all, the Democratic party now proposes to destroy by a single blow the important industry that has grown and flourished so under protection by opening our ports to the free wools of Australia and the River Platte country. This amounts to the confiscation of the property of the farmers, and every sheep-grower in the land should protest against it.

The market for fine wool has been almost completely supplied, and the importations have been principally of the coarser wools. In 1885 we imported clothing wools valued at $2,262,824, combing wools valued at $669,604, and carpet and other similar wools valued at $5,947,495.

Duties more or less protective in their character have been imposed upon wool from the very beginning of this Government, and even the low-revenue tariff of 1846 imposed duties upon imported wool. If foreign wool is now admitted free of duty it is probable that our market will be flooded with wool from abroad and the prices of domestic wool will be broken at once. Wool-growing will become unprofitable and our flocks will be slaughtered, competition between American and foreign wool will cease, and our markets will be surrendered to the foreign product.

The supply of domestic wool no longer competing, the increased demand for foreign wool to supply our own markets will advance the price, and we will find ourselves paying higher prices for inferior foreign wools than we now pay for a better quality of the domestic article. This was the history of prices under the revenue tariff of 1846, and I see no reason to doubt that this result will follow the pernicious legislation imposed by this bill.

In 1880 there were 382 establishments engaged in the manufacture of silk in the United States. The capital invested in the industry was $28,189,400, and 31,337 hands were employed.

In that year raw silk was imported to the value of $12,024,699, and the manufactured product was valued at $34,519,723.

In the same year our imports of manufactured silk were valued at $31,460,947. The raw silk imported was free of duty, while the manufactured silk had charged upon it an average duty of 58.98 per cent. Here we have an instance of free raw materials such as is contended for by the free-traders, with every facility for its manufacture in the United States. The machinery used was of the best class, and skilled workmen, many of whom had learned their trades in the factories of Europe, were employed. The product of the American looms was superior in quality to that imported, and the duty on foreign silks was higher than upon almost any other fabrics. In fact, it was the high duty that first induced our people to engage in the manufacture of silk.

But with free raw material, skilled workmen, good machinery, and a high duty on manufactured silks, we were not able to supply our own markets. The theory of the gentlemen on the other side is that with free raw materials our exports of manufactured products will be increased. Why was there not a large exportation of American silks after raw silk was placed on the free-list? But the beneficial influence of a protective tariff was well illustrated in the growth of the silk industry of the United States. In 1870 we imported only three millions' worth of raw silk, while in 1880 our imports were twelve millions, and in 1886 eighteen millions of dollars' worth, while the value of manufactured silk imported was reduced from thirty-nine millions in 1882 to twenty-eight millions in 1886. Silk goods were first manufactured here in 1867. Without a protective tariff we would import all the silk goods we use; with protection we manufacture more than one-half. We employ more than thirty-five thousand people at this industry, and add $40,000,000 annually to the value of the raw materials imported before they are placed on the market for consumption.

SALT.

Salt, too, is placed upon the free-list by this bill. Imported salt in bags and barrels now pays a duty of 12 cents a hundred, and salt in bulk a duty of 8 cents a hundred pounds. In 1886 we imported 2,406,305 barrels, paying duties amounting to $706,324, or about 1.16 cents of duty to each person in the United States. The domestic productions for the same year was 7,707,081 barrels, and this was furnished by the States of Michigan, Louisiana, New York, Ohio, West Virginia, California, and other States. In Louisiana, Nevada, and Utah deposits of salt are found, and this rock salt is mined and placed upon the market. Elsewhere it is prepared by the evaporation of brine, in some localities by solar heat, in others by artificial heat. Michigan heads the list of salt-producing States, her output in 1886 having been 3,677,257 barrels. The fuel used is in most cases the offal of the saw-mills, the salt works and mills being located side by side, and the sawdust and other offal being utilized in evaporating the brine. The history of the salt industry in the United States shows a progressive decline in price with increase in the quantity produced.

In 1860 the salt product of Michigan was 4,000 barrels and cost $2.35. In 1887 her product was 4,000,000 barrels, costing 58 cents per barrel, including the cost of the barrel, 20 cents. Salt is indispensable in the household as well as in commerce and manufactures. If there is anything in the world in which we should be self-supporting it is salt. It is highly imprudent in us to rely upon foreign countries for our salt supply, and we should not permit other nations to make this country a dumping-ground for their excessive stock.

We have here the "raw material of manufacture," the rock and the brine, and according to the theory of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee we should send out salt into the "markets of the world," that great undefined region which they have not yet located. But the reason that we do not sell salt abroad and that it is imported here is that the foreign rates of wages are not quite one-half of what are paid in this country, and the removal of the duty will result in either the reduction of the wages of our people or a large influx of foreign salt, with a corresponding loss of employment to both labor and capital. The foreign article comes as ballast or at nominal freight and is sent into the country from the seaboard until it meets the domestic article. The removal of the duty will enable it to reach a further point inland than now and it will thus usurp a greater portion of our market. No better salt is made anywhere than in the United States, and every consideration of safety and patriotism requires that we shall maintain this industry.

If our industrial independence is to be maintained and our national safety provided for, we must be prepared to furnish our own clothing and our own food, and salt is indispensable to the production of the latter. The revenue from importations of salt is insignificant, while the removal of the duties may destroy the salt industry of the United States.

COAL.

Under the pending bill "mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought" are to be admitted free, except when otherwise provided, and no duties are imposed on iron ore and bituminous coal. What will be admitted free under this provision of the bill? "Crude" is said by lexicographers to mean "in a raw state," "not changed by any process of preparation," "unrefined," as common crude salt. Coal and iron ore are not mentioned in any of the schedules of this bill, and there can be little doubt that they are placed upon the free-list as "mineral substances in a crude state."

A similar expression in the existing tariff law has been held to embrace all ores not otherwise provided for, and to include limestone and sand. Iron ore and bituminous coal have each a duty of 75 cents a ton imposed upon them by existing law. It is remarkable that these important products are not placed upon the free-list by name, so that attention might at once have been given to the wrong done by exempting them from duty; but the dark-lantern methods pursued in framing this bill seem to have crept into its verbiage and a part of its destructive purposes is left to interpretation instead of being clothed in honest expression. A duty has been imposed upon bituminous coal from 1824 until the present time, and the importance of the coal industry demands that its interests should be protected, and that the miners engaged in its production, the owners of our coal lands, and the vast capital invested in its transportation should be permitted to have their own market. No one has charged that excessive profits have been made in the production or transportation of bituminous coal, and no bituminous coal "trust" has anywhere appeared as a bogy to frighten the free-traders.

The average cost of bituminous coal at the mouth of the mine in Pennsylvania is estimated to have been during the last year 80½ cents a ton, many mines having been worked at a loss to the operators. The production of bituminous coal in Pennsylvania for 1886 was 26,160,735 short tons, and the aggregate production for the United States for the same year was 73,707,957 short tons, against 5,775,077 tons mined in 1860.

That this vast increase of production was largely due to our protective tariff goes without saying, and the low prices at which it is now produced is an illustration of the unvarying rule that prices have declined under domestic competition.

But if coal is placed upon the free-list the coal from Nova Scotia, which is mined at tide water and shipped upon vessels at the mouth of the mines will compete with domestic coal all along the Atlantic coast as far south as Baltimore, and to the extent that the market is supplied from this source our miners will be deprived of employment and mine owners of a market.

Chinese labor is employed in the Nova Scotia mines, wages paid them are of the lowest, and it is currently reported that they have no houses there, but live inside the mines like the beasts that draw the miners' cars. I ask, is it fair that American miners should be subjected to such competition?

The wages of our miners are now too low, strikes occur in which the fault too often lies with the mine owners; but Chinese competition may destroy the ability of the men to strike, and this perhaps may enable a few heartless mine owners to score new triumphs over poor American wage-workers. It can not be that coal is placed upon the free-list in order to carry out the President's idea of "free raw materials of manufacture," for the coal we have is already free. As it lies in the mine it is the free gift of nature to us. It costs absolutely nothing until capital has been expended in developing the mines and the miner has gone down into the recesses of the earth to bring it to the light of day. If any part of the market is taken by foreign coal, it will be a blow to our labor and capital as unnecessary as it will be harmful to American interests.

IRON ORE.

The amount of iron ore produced in the United States in 1886 was much larger than in any previous year, and is estimated at 10,000,000 gross tons, and the amount of iron ore imported was 1,039,433 tons. The imported ore comes from Cuba, Spain, Algeria, and Elba. Slave labor is employed in its production in Cuba, while the laborers engaged in the mines of Spain and Africa consider themselves well paid at 25 cents per day.

If iron ore is put upon the free-list American miners of iron ore will be placed in competition with slaves and lazzaroni, and if this is done to cheapen the price of iron ore this cheapness comes at too great a cost. The average of wages to our own miners is shown by official reports to be from $1.40 to $2.08 per day, and if iron is to be cheapened by the introduction of free foreign ore this cheapening must begin with the labor of the men who are engaged in its production.

The advocates of this plan do not openly and directly propose to reduce wages, but they aim at the same result in this indirect way by substituting the products of foreign labor at starvation wages for the products of the American workingman, and thus depriving him of work. The question that arises is, shall American labor engaged in the production of iron ore and coal be protected as well as the labor that is employed at the furnace and the forge? What is the reason for placing these articles upon the free-list? The supply of American ore is unlimited in extent and of every variety suitable for steel as well as iron. If there is a necessity for importing other crude materials there is none in this. Under a protective duty home competition can be relied upon to meet the wants of our iron and steel manufacturers, with every variety of ore at the lowest cost consistent with fair wages to American labor. We should not rely upon importations for that which we can ourselves supply. American ore can not be exported; why not give it the home market? The splendid growth of our iron and steel industries, under protection, is without a parallel in the history of the world.

And in the presence of this vast increase in production there has been a marked diminution in price, as shown by the following table:

PRICES OF IRON AND STEEL UNDER A REVENUE TARIFF AND UNDER PROTECTION

The prices given in the following table embrace the revenue-tariff period before the war and the last fourteen years of the protective-tariff period, which was ushered in by the Morrill tariff of 1861. In these fourteen years the inflation of values caused by the expansion of the currency as an incident of our civil war had passed away. These prices are yearly averages of monthly quotations for No. 1 anthracite foundry pig-iron, best refined bar-iron, and iron rails, all per gross ton, at Philadelphia; nails, per keg, wholesale, at Philadelphia; and steel rails, per gross ton, at Pennsylvania mills.

These figures show that pig-iron, bar-iron, and nails have been cheaper under protection than under a revenue policy, and that steel rails have been sold under protection at much lower prices than iron rails were sold under a revenue tariff.

But notwithstanding the decrease in price, American wages have been maintained, and the men engaged in iron and steel production have been better paid, better clad, and better fed, have lived in more comfortable houses and have given their children better educational advantages than any other iron and steel workers on the face of the earth have been able to afford. Although we have achieved this vast result in our production of iron and steel, we have not been able to supply our home market.

The following table shows the foreign values of all our imports of iron and steel, including fire-arms, hardware, cutlery, machinery, etc., from 1871 to 1886:

Years.	Values.	Years.	Values.	Years.	Values.
1871	$57,866,299	1877	$19,874,399	1883	$47,506,306
1872	75,617,677	1878	18,013,010	1884	37,078,122

1874	37,652,192	1880	80,443,362	1886	41,630,779
1875	27,353,101	1881	61,555,077
1876	20,016,603	1882	67,075,125

The total importations of these sixteen years aggregate $716,173,711 in foreign value. Their cost to our people was, however, much more than this sum—importers' profits, ocean freight, and other charges, bringing the total cost up to almost, if not altogether, double the foreign value.

These importations were admitted because the articles named were produced more cheaply abroad than they could be made in this country, and this was only rendered possible by the fact that wages abroad were lower than here. The cost of producing a ton of iron is 73 per cent. labor, as shown by the following carefully-prepared and well-authenticated table:

	Anthracite and bituminous.	Charcoal.
Labor in producing raw materials	$10.26	$9.62
Labor in transporting raw materials	1.78	3.17
Labor at furnace, including repairs	1.91	2.44
Total cost of labor	13.95	15.23
Taxes, insurance, commissions, office expenses, interest, freight, traveling expenses, royalties, etc	5.22	5.18
Total cost of a ton of pig-iron	19.17	20.41
Percentage of labor cost to total cost	73	74

Let us give all this labor to Americans and not to foreigners.

WAGES.

Official investigations show that the rates of wages in the United States were in 1879 more than twice those of Belgium, three times those in Denmark, Germany, and France, once and a half those in England and Scotland, and more than three times those in Italy and Spain. At the same time the prices of the necessaries of life are lower in the United States than in any of the foregoing countries, and the relative prices of necessaries of life and wages it is believed have not materially changed since that time. In 1884 it was estimated by competent authority that assuming the produce of labor to be one hundred, in Great Britain fifty-six parts go to the laborer, twenty-one to capital, and twenty-three to government; in France forty-one parts go to the laborer, thirty-six to capital, and twenty-three to government; in the United States seventy-two parts go to the laborer, twenty-three to capital, and five to government.

The hearings before the Tariff Commission in 1882 brought out a very complete comparison between the wages then paid in this country and in Europe. The result is on record. It is that in industrial pursuits generally the standard of wages is at least 60 per cent. higher here than in Britain, and the difference is still greater against every continental country.

This conclusion is established beyond controversy. Our mills and factories while peopled with men and women whom we are proud to call Americans, are not the work-places of those only who are native born. In them you will find working side by side Americans and Irish-Americans and German-Americans, all receiving like pay for similar services, and in estimating the rates of wages no one asks about the nationality of the artisan. Why are these foreign mechanics and artisans and laborers here? They have left friends to whom they were attached, have braved the perils of the ocean and begun life anew in a strange land. They came to better their condition, and have found that with the same amount of exertion they can secure more of the comforts and conveniences of life than they could secure at their old homes, and to these they may here add luxuries which were unattainable abroad.

They earn better wages here than in Germany, or Ireland, or England, and their increased earning power is not due to their increased efficiency, but because the American rate of wages is higher than in the countries from which they came. No verbal juggling about high wages occasioning low cost of production can wipe out this stubborn fact.

If a man gets $1.75 in England for puddling a ton of iron and $5.50 for the same services in Pittsburgh, it can not be successfully contended that the cost of the production of a ton of iron in Pittsburgh is not increased by the enhanced value of the labor employed. And the relative wages of all labor is substantially the same. Between 1861 and 1886 the number of foreigners who came to our country was 8,620,664, and these were mostly mechanics and laborers. Why did they come if not to better their condition? Of this vast number but few have returned. How many American mechanics and laborers, have gone abroad to better their condition? I have never heard of a single one who did this.

Under the benign influence of the legislation placed upon the statute-books of the nation by the Republican party, our manufacturing establishments have grown until they are second to none in the world. The character of their products has equaled those of the older nations, while the wages paid are higher than in any other nation.

GROWTH OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

In 1850 the product of our manufactures was		$1,019,106,616
In 1860		1,885,861,676
Increase	$766,745,060
In 1870		3,385,860,334
Increase	$1,499,998,658
In 1880		5,369,579,191
Increase	$1,983,618,857
In 1888 (estimated)		7,000,000,000
Increase	$1,630,420,809

Notwithstanding the terrible civil strife, destroying the lives of hundreds of thousands of our young men, and exhausting many of our States, the growth of our manufactures between 1860 and 1870, under a protective tariff, was almost double the increase under the revenue tariff of the preceding decade, while the growth from 1860 to 1888 is almost 400 per cent., in round numbers $5,114,138,324.

The total wealth of the United States in 1880 was $43,642,000,000. The total wealth of Great Britain in 1880 was $43,366,000,000. Chambers' Journal for January, 1884, declares that statisticians after calculations "pronounced the United States to be not only potentially but actually richer than the United Kingdom." It has been alleged by the friends of this bill that labor does not receive a fair share of the products of manufacture in this country; and as Mr. Edward Atkinson has been quoted as authority by the gentleman who made the opening speech in this debate [Mr. MILLS], I, too, will read from his works. Of $1,100,000 product of a cotton mill he shows in his "Margin of Profits," page 23, that 91.62 per cent. goes to the laborers, 7 per cent. to the owners, and 1.38 per cent. to the payment of taxes; or putting it in figures, $1,007,820 of the $1,100,000 of product goes to wage-earners. That the condition of the workmen is better now than ever before is shown by the same author, who says:

A hundred years ago, as nearly as I can make it out, it took more time and more hard work for a family to get their clothing than it did to get their food. Now it takes a great deal less time to earn money to buy clothing than it does to buy food. Where a man spends $100 a year for uncooked food for his own use, he need not spend more than $40 a year for his clothing, ready made, including his boots and shoes and hats. It is a great blunder to say that while the rich are growing richer the poor are growing poorer. It is only the poor who can't work well, or who won't work well, who grow poor while the rich are growing rich in this country. The best times for the manufacturer are the times when he makes the most money, and they are always when the wages are highest, and not when they are lowest, because wage-earners are their principal and most important customers.

Again I quote:

The men of special skill, who are at the head of their trades, are 100 per cent. better off to-day than they were twenty years ago and more. That is, they can buy twice as much clothing, food, fuel, and as good a shelter to-day for a year's wages as they could buy twenty years ago with what they earned then.

The average carpenter, mason, painter, or other mechanic, who minds his own business and keeps the control of his own time, can buy nearly twice as much, but not quite. The average factory operative can buy two-thirds more than he or she could buy twenty years ago with a year's wages; and the common laborer can buy 50 per cent. more.

But gentlemen assert that the profits of the manufacturer are enormous, and they quote the census of 1880 to sustain their position. Mr. Edward Atkinson shows how worthless such estimates are:

It is a common blunder, made even by many members of Congress who ought to know better, to try to find out what were the profits of manufacturing in 1880 from the figures of the census. For such a purpose the figures of the census are mere rubbish. All that you have in the census, and I know of what I speak, for I framed the forms of many of the questions, especially in the department in which I took the census myself. I say that all you have in the census which is of value and which can be made use of with safety, is the gross value of manufactured products; the cost of the materials; the number of employés, and the sum of their wages; but when you undertake to arrive at profits by deducting cost of materials and the sum of the wages you are all at sea, because no statement was asked and no answer was given as to the cost of depreciation, the cost of insurance, of taxes, of administration, of interest, of loss by bad debts, of distribution by railway, or of many other elements which used up the greater part of the 48½ per cent. which is erroneously assigned as the profits of capital. The year 1880 was a very prosperous year, and the capital invested in manufacturing, mechanic, and mining arts in that year probably did earn from 6 to 10 per cent., but on the average not more than 10, and probably not as much.

Protection has brought with it not only a development of the productive forces of the nation, but it has cheapened prices also. The decline in the annual average currency price of some of the leading commodities in the New York market from 1850 to 1886 is shown in the following table:

[Prepared by Mr. Joshua Reece, jr., of the New York Journal of Commerce.]

MARKETS OF THE WORLD.

But we are told by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee in their report upon this bill that with free raw materials we can send our manufactured goods out into the markets of the world. Where are these markets? If we go to Germany, or France, or Italy, or Russia we find them hedged in with protective tariffs, and straining every effort to supply their own markets as well as to produce a surplus to send abroad. Of the "world's market" Mr. David A. Wells says:

With the introduction of new, more effective, and cheaper methods or instrumentalities of production, every nation of advanced civilization has experienced, in a greater or less degree, an increase in the product of nearly all its industries save those which are essentially handicraft in their character, with not only no corresponding increase, but often an actual decrease in the number of laborers to whom regular and fairly remunerative employment constitutes the only means of obtaining an independent and comfortable livelihood. Every country with accumulating productions has accordingly felt the necessity of disposing of its surplus by exporting it to the markets most freely open to it, and, as a consequence, that has happened which might have been expected could the exact course of events have been anticipated, namely, increased competition in every home market, engendered by increasing domestic production and the efforts of foreign producers to export (introduce) their surplus; fiercer competition to effect sales of the excess of competitive products by the sellers of all nations in neutral markets, and an almost irresistible tendency toward a universal depression of prices and profits, and, to a greater or less extent, a displacement of labor.

It is also to be noted that as the capacity for industrial production increases and competition to effect sales becomes fiercer the more feverish is the anxiety to meet competition—especially on the part of foreign rivals—by producing cheaper goods; and that this policy in the states of continental Europe, and more particularly Germany, is antagonizing efforts to shorten the hours of labor and restrict the factory employment of women and children, and is also tending in a marked degree to do away with the heretofore general practice of suspending labor on Sundays.

In Saxony it is stated that—

Sunday labor has become usual in most factories and workshops solely under the stress of competition, so that the hours of divine service are alone excluded, and these only from absolute necessity.

Are we to surrender our own market to foreigners and follow the ignis fatuus of "markets of the world" into the "fierce competition" and "feverish anxiety to meet competition" that he describes and encounter the "universal depression of prices and profits" with the abandonment of the "heretofore general practice of suspending labor on Sundays" in order to succeed in doing so? I hope not.

But we have here in our own nation the best market in all the world. Sixty millions of enlightened people with ability to buy and a disposition to consume, who are alongside our manufacturing establishments, furnish a better market than we can possibly secure elsewhere. Let us keep our own market for ourselves. England never once repealed, remitted, or abated a protective duty on any foreign goods until long after her superiority was established and she could produce cheaper than any of her competitors. Let us learn a lesson from her and maintain our duties so that we can retain our own markets. Every patriotic consideration requires that this shall be done.

England must export manufactured products, because her very existence depends upon it, for her own markets are too limited to take the supply that can be produced by her own factories, and we look in vain for markets that are not already occupied and fully supplied.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing clearer or truer in human reasoning than that labor is the source of wealth, and that its freedom and diversification are the measure of its productiveness.

Universal history testifies that not a single nation on the globe has reached independence and wealth but such as have firmly maintained a protective policy in the regulation of foreign trade. Protection is strong because it is national; because it has rendered possible the brilliant industrial achievements of the last quarter of a century; because it is conservative and not wasteful; because it builds up and does not destroy. It means the defense of American interests, of American labor and capital, of American commerce, and of American homes. It gives to our own workmen the preference in doing the work that may be required to be done for the benefit of the American people. It has carried us safely through a civil war, it has brought us wealth and prosperity as a nation, and it should be maintained.

With our experience we may well say:

Labor is discovered to be the grand conqueror, enriching and building up nations more surely than the proudest battles.

[Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is now speaking in the time of another gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I still trust that there will be no objection.

Mr. YARDLEY. I will yield the gentleman additional time if he desires it.

Mr. ATKINSON. I should be glad to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. YARDLEY. Then I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINSON resumed and concluded his remarks, as above.

Mr. YARDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not flatter myself that in the closing days of this debate I shall be able to present any new views or offer any suggestions but what have practically received the attention and consideration of this House; but I have the honor to represent upon this floor a district whose hills are black with the smoke of the furnace and whose valleys echo the sound of the shuttle and the loom—a district of more than one hundred and seventy-five thousand intelligent, prosperous, hopeful people, who believe that their great manufacturing and agricultural interests will be seriously affected by the destruction of the system of protection; and therefore for them, and in their name, I solemnly and earnestly protest against the passage of this bill.

Less than thirty years ago, when the Democratic party went out of business, it left the country with its credit impaired and its Treasury bankrupt; but to-day we are confronted with the anomalous condition of an outstanding debt and an overflowing Treasury. More than $80,000,000 of the people's money have been allowed to accumulate in the vaults of the national Treasury. Upon whom rests the responsibility for this large and unwarranted accumulation?

Let the Democratic party answer whether at any time during the term of the present Executive there has been any attempt by a Democratic House to avert the financial disaster and ruin so freely prophesied by the President as likely to result from the surplus in the Treasury.

Sixteen million dollars of the surplus should long since have been refunded to the loyal States in repayment of the direct taxes paid by them during the war. The vetoes of the President have deprived the old soldiers of the pensions which their patient sufferings so justly earned. Thousands of men and women with honest and legally adjudicated claims against the Government are awaiting with empty hands because forsooth a Democratic House, presumably anxious to avert impending disaster of an overflowing treasury, has persistently neglected and refused to make the necessary and proper appropriations for the payment of the just debts of the Government. The Blair educational bill passed a Republican Senate, but has been strangled in the committee-room of a Democratic House, that its death might aid to accumulate and continue the vast surplus in the Treasury.

These observations, Mr. Chairman, apply only to the surplus that has already accumulated, and are only important as tending to show that the Democratic party has repeatedly and persistently neglected and refused to follow any of the methods which would have prevented the accumulation of the surplus, but, on the contrary, as willfully and unlawfully hoarded the money in the Treasury for the purpose of frightening the people, and thus intending to break down a system of protection.

An enterprising business man with $5,000 surplus in bank and $10,000 in outstanding notes would proceed to apply the surplus to the payment of the notes. If the Administration had been moved by an honest desire to reduce the surplus it would have applied the surplus revenues to the payment and the redemption of the bonds of the Government and thus reduced alike the surplus and the debt of the nation.

Congress has lately informed the President that in their unanimous opinion the Administration has for years been invested with ample statutory authority to purchase and redeem the bonds of the Government, and it is fair to assume that in obedience to this information the bonds of the Government will be purchased, the debt of the nation be redeemed, and the dangers arising from the present surplus thus be averted.

We are still, however, confronted with the graver and much more important question how to so reduce taxation that hereafter the revenues of the Government shall not materially exceed its necessary and proper expenditures.

The Government has the inherent constitutional right to collect from the people by taxation so much money as will surely provide for its necessary and proper expenditures, pay its just debts, and make its financial condition secure, but beyond that it can not go.

The Government has no right to levy unnecessary taxes for the purpose of hoarding the money in the Treasury, for the purpose of creating trusts or fostering monopolies, nor for the purpose of making wasteful and extravagant expenditures; and when it collects annually seventy-five or eighty million dollars more money than is necessary to defray its expenses and pay its debts, the people have the right to demand that there shall be some reduction of taxation; and upon this main question of the importance and necessity of the reduction of taxes there can be no contention or controversy. The Republican party is not opposed to a reduction of taxes; on the contrary, almost all the reductions of taxes that has been made in the last twenty years have been made by the Republican party. Gentlemen upon the other side talk much about oppressive taxes and the necessities for reduction, but when have they ever reduced the taxes of the country? For five long years they have had control of this House, and yet during that time not one dollar of taxes has been reduced. The tree is known by its fruits, and a political party is judged by its record, and that the people may know just what has been done by both parties in the last twenty years, I offer in evidence an extract from the "views of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means," as presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY]:

By the act of July 14, 1870, the reduction of the revenue from customs duties was:

Free-list	$2,403,000
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	23,651,748
Total	26,054,748
By the act of May 1, 1872, tea and coffee were placed upon the free-list, making a reduction of	15,893,847

By the act of June 6, 1872, tariff duties were further reduced, and the reduction by the—

Free-list	$3,345,724

Free-list	$1,365,999
Estimated reduction from dutiable list	19,489,800
Total	20,855,799

The foregoing estimates were made when the several bills were passed.

Of internal taxes the following have been the reduction made by the party now in the minority since the conclusion of the war:

By the acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,381,199
By the acts of March 31, 1868, and February 3, 1868	54,802,578
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,315,321
By the act of December 21, 1871	14,436,862
By the act of June 6, 1872	15,807,618
By the act of March 3, 1883	40,677,682
Total	284,421,260

This we present as the result of Republican legislation from July 13, 1866, down to and including March 3, 1883.

The Republican party was in control of the House of Representatives from the first-named date to March 4, 1875. During that period it will be observed that taxation was reduced and revenue diminished in the aggregate sum of $284,421,260. On the 4th of March, 1875, the control of the House passed to the Democratic party and remained with it until the 4th day of March, 1881, a period of six years. During these years the internal revenue was reduced $6,368,935. On the 4th day of March, 1881, the Republican party was reinvested with control of the House of Representatives, holding it for two years, during which time it reduced taxation and the revenues from custom sources in the estimated sum, $20,855,799, and upon internal revenue, $40,677,682, a grand total of $61,432,481.

It will be observed that from 1866 to 1888, a period of twenty-two years, the control of the House of Representatives has been equally divided between the two political parties, each having eleven years.

During the eleven years of Republican control the revenues were reduced (estimated)	$332,504,569
During the eleven years of Democratic control the revenues were reduced	6,368,935

These figures have never been challenged or denied, and they show what the Republican party has done in the past, and she stands now, as ever, ready and willing to further reduce the revenues of the Government, but she insists that the reductions shall be so made as to afford the greatest relief to the American people, and on the lines of fair and honest protection to American industries and American labor.

How, then, shall the revenues of the Government be reduced?

There are two methods of raising the revenues of the Government, one by direct or internal taxation, the other by duties or customs upon imported goods. The system of direct or internal taxation has always been regarded by our people as inquisitorial, and not to be endured except in times of great national necessity; only three times in the history of our country have internal taxes been imposed upon the people, and then only as necessary war measures.

The internal taxes imposed after the Revolutionary war were repealed in nine years, and those imposed after the war of 1812 were repealed in four years.

The present system of internal taxation was enacted in 1862, and grew out of the necessities of the late civil war; the taxes included in the system have all been repealed except those on whisky and tobacco. A total repeal of the internal taxes, however, might leave us with a deficit instead of a surplus, and, as has been well said, "a surplus is easier to handle than a deficit."

Whenever it becomes necessary to repeal the whisky tax in order to save and protect American industries I shall willingly and unhesitatingly vote to repeal the tax upon whisky, but I do not think that necessity now exists. To repeal or reduce the tax on whisky, unless the same be necessary to protect our industries, while continuing in force duties upon sugars would, I think, be unjust to the tax-payer and unsatisfactory to the people.

The tax upon spirits or alcohol, to be used for medicinal, scientific, or manufacturing purposes, is a direct tax upon our own people, from which they should be relieved, and the special tax imposed upon druggists for the sale of alcohol is a relic of the war taxes which should now be repealed. The tax upon tobacco is a direct and obnoxious tax which falls upon the farmer whose fields are adapted to its cultivation, and upon the home cigar manufactory that furnishes employment to thousands of skilled laborers, and its repeal would relieve the people of $30,000,000 of taxes. These, Mr. Chairman, are the internal taxes which, in my judgment, should be repealed.

NOW, WHAT OF THE TARIFF?

The gentlemen upon the other side of the House seem to take particular pains in speaking of the tariff to denounce it as a war tax. Why, Mr. Chairman, the present tariff law was not passed as a war measure. It was signed by President Buchanan before the war. Its object was to restore the protective policy of the nation, and the duties were not laid in expectation of war, but were such as were then thought necessary to protect and maintain American industries and fairly reward American labor. It is true that duties were increased during the war by the acts of 1862 and 1864, but it is equally true that since the war corresponding reductions have been made in both customs duties and internal taxes.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand the spirit of the Republican party, we are ready to join in any fair and honest revision of the tariff, but we insist that such revision shall be by the friends of protection and not by the friends of free trade; a revision by such methods as will protect American industries and not destroy them; a revision that will relieve the tax-payer without reducing the wages of the laborer; a revision that will protect our home markets and not injure the interests of our own people.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to consume the time of this House in discussing in detail questions of classification or rates of duty, but gladly leave that to gentlemen whose superior knowledge of the subject and long legislative experience has abundantly qualified them for that duty; but I beg to suggest certain principles upon which it seems to me the tariff may be revised and the people relieved of unnecessary taxes without disturbing the business of the country, crippling industries, or impoverishing labor.

If there are any articles now subject to duty that are not raised or produced in our own country, I would place them upon the free-list, and if there are any raw materials which enter into production or consumption in this country that can not be by reasonable outlay profitably produced here, they should be admitted free, but due preference should always be given to our own raw materials, and due regard had for the value of labor expended upon it. I would reduce, or abolish, the duties upon such articles as are not generally produced here, or only in such limited quantities as to make the cost of production a grievous burden upon the tax-payer, and where the industry after fair and repeated trials gives no promise for its future growth.

Every man, woman, and child of our sixty millions of people is a consumer of sugar, and yet not more than one-twelfth of the total consumption is produced here.

The following table shows the amount of sugar imported in the last ten years and the duties paid:

Year.	Consumed, pounds.	Value.	Duty paid.
1878	1,552,875,112	$78,986,070	$36,387,464
1879	1,598,461,986	65,918,931	37,294,197
1880	1,592,261,958	67,015,831	39,107,256
1881	1,869,173,808	82,721,087	45,933,045
1882	1,913,396,455	84,355,545	46,711,795
1883	1,931,610,911	84,327,942	44,517,851
1884	2,437,570,913	88,044,316	47,500,750
1885	2,578,993,335	69,078,857	50,885,916
1886	2,509,287,099	71,311,090	50,265,538
1887	2,781,159,646	68,882,884	56,507,495

For the last ten years we have paid on an average $45,000,000 every year in duties on sugars. We have fostered and encouraged the sugar industry by imposing a higher rate of duty upon it than upon any other article of general consumption, and yet with all this encouragement and protection the amount of the production has not increased.

The State of Louisiana produces about 93 per cent. of all the cane-sugar in the United States. The following table shows the amount of sugar raised in Louisiana and the other Southern States in the years mentioned:

Louisiana.		Other Southern States.
	Pounds.		Pounds.
1860–'61	265,063,000	1860–'61	9,661,000
1861–'62	528,321,500	1861–'62	11,509,000
1884–'85	211,402,963	1884–'85	14,560,000
1885–'86	286,626,486	1885–'86	16,128,000

I have not the official figures for 1886–'87 at hand, but I believe the production for that year was less than for the year 1885.

Mr. Chairman, the principle of protection is to foster and encourage every American industry that after a fair trial gives such reasonable promise of success as would encourage competition, and thus bring about a reduction of prices. Sugar does not come within this rule, and it seems to me that it is unfair to longer continue this heavy tax upon the people. It is probable, however, that there may be hopes for the sugar from the cane, the sorghum, and the beet, and upon the principle of encouraging American industries I would offer a bounty for all sugar raised on our soil.

Mr. Chairman, a reduction of the internal taxes and the duties upon imports upon the lines I have indicated will reduce the revenues of the Government about $80,000,000, and these are the methods which seem to me to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number, and therefore likely to prove most satisfactory to the people. I realize, however, that other and different views are entertained by gentlemen upon both sides of the House, and I fully understand that to effect a revision of the tariff it is necessary to concede something to the views and opinions of others; but there is a certain well-defined line beyond which the friends of protection can not go. Every effort to cripple American industries, break down the home market of the farmer, and reduce the wages of the laborer must be steadily resisted.

This is not a new question; the system of protection is as old as the Constitution of our fathers. Under the Articles of Confederation there was no authority in the General Government to levy taxes, collect revenues, and regulate foreign or domestic commerce, and as was clearly shown by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], when upon the floor yesterday, during this period from 1783 to 1787, while the country was under the policy of free trade, the commerce of the United States went down, the Treasury was bankrupt, and the people were disheartened and discontented, and from this distress and disaster came the convention to frame a constitution, and the debates of that convention show that those early patriots were fully persuaded that if the prosperity and welfare of the people were to be secured and the young Republic was to assume her place among the nations of the earth it was necessary to thus early foster and protect the home industries of the country. The Constitution gave the General Government the power to levy and collect taxes and to regulate the commerce of the States and of foreign states; and the First Congress of the United States under this Constitution, recognizing the wisdom and necessity for protection, enacted a law which provides:

It is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactories, that duties be laid on imported goods, wares, and merchandise.

This act was signed by George Washington nearly one hundred years ago, and from that day protection to American industries has been the policy of every President of the United States, Federalist and Whig, Democrat and Republican alike, down to the time of the present Executive. It was reserved for the present Executive to disregard the teachings of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe, of Jackson, of Polk, and of Buchanan, and declare that the principles advocated by them were "vicious, inequitable, and illogical."

We are told by the President that the tariff should be revised because the farmers are suffering from taxation, and yet, when the farmers of the country, exercising the American's right of petition, respectfully ask—

That wool-growing be restored to the protection enjoyed under the tariff of 1867, and that for the more effectual protection of agriculture the duties on farm products be increased—

they are told that wool-growing and vegetable raising are American industries, and therefore, in the opinion of the Democratic party, not the subjects of protection, and the farmer is expected to go on his way rejoicing that the hills upon which he fed his flocks shall know them no more forever.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer has long since ceased to be imposed upon by sophistry upon political and economical questions; the average farmer is a man of common sense, who does his own thinking, makes his own investigations, and draws his own conclusions. He investigated the favorite and constantly repeated statement of the free-trader that the cost of the article was increased by the exact amount of the duty and found it to be a delusion and a snare; he soon discovered that prices were never lower than under the present tariff, and that if our markets were left to the control of foreign producers prices would soon be higher than now. The fact that the greater the home competition the cheaper the wares is clearly proven by the familiar illustration of steel rails.

In 1867 American steel rails were selling in this country for $166 per ton; in 1870 the price was $106.75 per ton. In 1871 Congress imposed a specific duty of $28 per ton. As a result of this protection the product of our steel-rail mills rose from 2,277 tons in 1867 to 2,101,904 tons in 1887, while the price went down from $166 a ton in 1867 to $31.50 in March, 1888.

The history of the silk industry and of the soda-ash industry of America tell the same story. Prior to 1884 we imported all our soda-ash at an average cost of $48 per ton. A duty of $5 was imposed and the manufacture of soda-ash became an American industry and the prices fell as low as $28 per ton, and I think recently it has been much lower than that. The fact that calicoes, blankets, and other goods can be and have been bought in this country for less than the tariff duty proves that the protective tariff does not increase the price of the protected article. Goods were never cheaper than now. The decline in the price of salt and other protected articles has long since exploded the false theories of economic books that a protective duty increases the price of the article.

Mr. Chairman, in their burning anxiety to break down the system of protection, gentlemen upon the other side of the House denounce the manufacturers of the country as barons and robbers, and by belittling the greatness of agricultural districts seek to array the farmer against the manufacturer. I admit that at this time farming is probably not the most profitable business in the world, and I hope that in the near future some action upon the currency question and cheaper and more equitable transportation rates may furnish the remedy; but no thinking farmer charges the unfavorable condition of agriculture to the operation of our tariff laws.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, in his last annual report, for 1886, pages 417, 418, thus states the situation:

DEBTS OF FARMERS.

There are now about five million owners of farms. A million of new farms have been acquired since 1880. Many of the four million then in cultivation have since changed hands. Hundreds of thousands of these are owned by young men and others who never before tilled lands of their own, and who commenced husbandry with small means, little more than health, energy, and determination to succeed. Necessarily indebtedness has been incurred in many of these cases in purchasing old farms, in stocking farms already paid for, or in fencing and building upon lands obtained from the Government under the homestead act.

To such as commenced judiciously, with a full knowledge of the responsibilities involved, and with will and industry commensurate with the burden assumed, a mortgage may prove a blessing. It represents capital, without which the business of farming can not be undertaken, or its products and profits be secured. It enables a poor but capable and industrious young man to secure a home and a profitable business, paying for it in easy installments; but it becomes a withering curse when it makes production dear and difficult, consumes a crop before it is made, and renders indebtedness hopeless.

It is a matter of congratulation that the burden of debt is decreasing, and is in fact relatively less than it was ten years ago. An investigation made by State statistical agents, undertaken to show the actual and comparative condition of farmers as to indebtedness, affords evidence of gradual amelioration, decrease in number and amount of farm mortgages, and in advances by merchants in those regions where such practice prevails. The inquiry was first made in the cotton States; afterwards in the Ohio Valley, and in New York and Pennsylvania. In the Eastern States, where no such inquiry has yet been instituted, the farmers are not burdened very much with debt, while many of the more prosperous hold mortgages on farms of the distant West and other farms of Western property. In the newer States west of the Mississippi there is far more general indebtedness than in the central district east of that river. Further investigation in that region and on the Pacific Coast is contemplated.

I have listened to the speeches of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] stating the amount of mortgage indebtedness upon the farms of their States, and describing the distressed and impoverished condition of the farmers.

Mr. Chairman, without admitting the correctness of their statements of the condition of the farmers of the South and the West, as one of the Representatives of the great State of Pennsylvania, the keystone of the arch, and the center of protection, where the forge, the furnace, the factory, and the toiling millions have added to her grandeur and greatness, I take pleasure in quoting again from the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, 1886, page 419, in which he thus speaks of the farmers of Pennsylvania:

PENNSYLVANIA.

The indebtedness of farmers of Pennsylvania, it is believed, has decreased as compared with ten years ago. It is estimated that not more than 15 per cent. of the farms are mortgaged. The average interest rate is about 5 per cent. Many farmers have property in other branches of business, and farmers themselves hold in part the indebtedness of other farmers. With an average value of farms, according to the last census, of almost $50 per acre—nearly $1,000,000,000, or about one-tenth of the farm valuation of the United States—owned mainly by the farmers cultivating them, and yielding a product worth $431 for each person engaged either as farmer or laborer in agriculture, the agricultural interest in Pennsylvania may be said to be prosperous, even in the present era of low prices. Of course there are some who occupy positions of hardship and difficulty. The source of this prosperity is found in the local markets of the State. It is probable that no other State is more nearly self-supporting, and perhaps none that depends on other States or other countries so little either in buying or selling products of agriculture.

The source of their prosperity is in the local markets of the State.

Mr. ATKINSON. And these mortgages to which reference is made there are held largely by Pennsylvania farmers themselves.

Mr. YARDLEY. Yes, sir.

Let the farmers from those States where American industries are in their infancy or yet unborn read and ponder upon this before they give their votes for free trade.

I come from one of the largest manufacturing districts in the State of Pennsylvania, and I am proud to say that among the farmers of the rich fields and teeming valleys of the counties of Bucks and Montgomery progress, prosperity, and happiness finds an eternal and everlasting abiding place. Let farmers cross the water and behold the want, the woe, the misery, and the despair of the farmers of free-trade England, and then believe, if they can, that the happiness, prosperity, and welfare of the farmer are found in the policy of free trade.

Mr. Chairman, I would revise the tariff by increasing the duties upon many of the products of the farm, in order that our farmers may be the better able to compete with importations from Canada and other foreign countries. The last quarterly report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shows that for the three months ending December 31, 1887, we imported the following articles:

This table shows $574,361 of dairy products, $696,923 of potatoes, and $930,014 of other vegetables brought into this country in three months, and yet gentlemen upon the other side who profess to be interested in the welfare of the farmers come in here with a bill which says that milk and poultry and vegetables and seeds shall be imported free of duty.

Mr. Chairman, farmers not only need protection for the products of the farm, but they are interested in protecting and diversifying the industries of the country. Free trade would disturb the business interests of the country, paralyze industries, reduce wages, and drive thousands of laborers to seek employment in other vocations. A protective tariff will enlarge the home market, build up and diversify industries, and increase the general wealth and prosperity of the country.

Mr. Chairman, over and above all other people who need and are entitled to protection are the wage-earners of our country. We have a country of vast extent and boundless magnificence; but yet, with all our natural resources and advantages, we are unable to compete with the countries of Europe, because we are handicapped by their cheap labor.

The following table, taken from the consular reports of 1885, show the difference in the prices per week paid for labor here and those paid in other countries:

The false theories of free-traders that there is not much difference in the wages of Europe and America are refuted by living, burning facts. Every man is supposed to know his own business, and the laborers of the world have long since settled that question in favor of American labor. How many American laborers are going across the water to work for the wages of Europe because food and clothing are cheaper? But thousands of laborers from England, from Scotland, from Ireland, and from Germany are annually coming to our shores to work for American wages, and once learning the true value and dignity of American labor they never return.

Mr. Chairman, the revision of the tariff is a business question of the greatest and gravest importance, a question that affects the manufacturer and the farmer, the capitalist and the wage-earner. The bill under consideration represents the policy of a great party, and if passed for weal or for woe will shape the future destiny of the Republic. And yet how have they approached this great question? The majority of the Ways and Means Committee, instead of seeking for light upon this important question, have closed the doors upon the manufacturer, turned a deaf ear to the wage-earner, and denied the petitions of the farmer; and after months of secret consultation come forth from their hiding-place with a bill that was conceived in darkness, born of a desire for free trade, and intended to cripple the industries of the North. This bill is a political and not a business measure. It discriminates against the interests of one section and in favor of the interests of another.

Its passage will destroy the wool industry of our nation and will compel the farmers of our country to compete with the great wool-growing country of Australia, where labor is paid but 8 cents a day.

This bill is the entering-wedge to free trade, and free trade means poverty, ignorance, and vice. Reduce the wages of American workmen and you degrade American labor and crush the spirit and harden the heart of the laborer.

It is said that the safety of an empire centers in her standing army, but the safety and the welfare of a republic depends upon the prosperity and the happiness of her yeomanry.

The protective system has given to the American laborer better wages for himself and better schools for his children; more books to read, more leisure time to read them, and as the result in this country, where there is no royal road to success, thousands of men from the humbler walks of life have carved their way to fortune and to fame.

The principle of protection is to give preference to American goods, American industries, and to American labor. Under that system our nation has grown and strengthened until our flag floats on every sea, and our name is respected in every land.

Mr. Chairman, there is no higher law than the law of self-preservation. It is as much the law of nations as it is of individuals. The Congress of the United States is expected to legislate for the prosperity, happiness, and welfare of the people—not of England, but of America.

We are a nation of sixty millions people, who are better housed, better clothed, and better fed than the people of any nation upon the face of the earth.

Our valleys and our mountain slopes are dotted with the homes of freeman, whose labor is so adequately rewarded and so elevated and dignified that every man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow contributes to the honor and the glory of the nation, and early in November next the supreme rulers of the nation, the people, will declare in no uncertain tones that they have no use for an administration whose free trade policy destroys American industries, and degrades American labor, so that the laborer stands alone and unaided in his competition with foreign pauper labor. [Applause.]

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, until within the past few days it was my intention not to make any remarks during the discussion of the tariff bill, but listening to the very able speeches made by gentlemen on both sides of this House, it occurred to me that, while the subject under discussion would be almost exhausted without my aid, so far as argument is concerned, it might be in my power to add to the truth of history by correcting some misstatements made in debate, and possibly to add to the strength of the tariff-reform movement by stating, as the Representative from the district containing the capital of the great Empire State, that the wish of the people of that State is that duties on imports be largely reduced.

It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that in New York State it has been confidently expected by men of all parties that the time having arrived when the necessities of the Government no longer call for continuance of war taxes, a reduction would be made. It has therefore been a surprise to me to hear on this floor gentlemen advocate not only a continuance of these high taxes, but some even recommending an increase of duties. Most surprising of all, however, has it been when members have deliberately asserted that President Cleveland has not represented his party in calling attention in his message to the advisability of reducing taxes and in urging that a greater reduction be made in import duties than in internal-revenue taxes.

One member of this side of the House, my esteemed friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], has, I regret to say, joined with gentlemen of the minority in attacking the bill now before the committee. All who know my friend must concede that his motives are honest; but, Mr. Chairman, he is in error when he insinuates that the principles of the Democratic party lead it to favor extreme protection.

My friend says—

That President Jackson was a protectionist, is clearly revealed in his messages.

Mr. Chairman, I think that Jackson's opinion of protection was about the same as is held by most members of the majority of this House, that in time of war money must be raised, and that reasonable protection be given to infant industries. Mr. Chairman, I will read from Andrew Jackson's farewell address to the country, March 3, 1837. He said:

There is perhaps no one of the powers conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power. The most productive and convenient sources of revenue were necessarily given to it, that it might be able to perform the important duties imposed upon it; and the taxes which it lays upon commerce being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets.

Congress has no right under the Constitution to take money from the people unless it be required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; and if they raise more than is necessary for such purpose it is an abuse of the power of taxation and unjust and oppressive. It may indeed happen that the revenues will sometimes exceed the amount anticipated when the taxes were laid. When, however, this is ascertained it is easy to reduce them; and in such a case it is unquestionably the duty of the Government to reduce them, for no circumstances can justify it in assuming a power not given to it by the Constitution, nor in taking away the money of the people when it is not needed for the legitimate wants of the Government.

Plain as these principles appear to be, you will yet find that there is a constant effort to induce the General Government to go beyond the limits of its taxing power, and to impose unnecessary burdens upon the people. Many powerful interests are continually at work to procure heavy duties on commerce, and to swell the revenue beyond the real necessities of the public service; and the country has already felt the injurious effects of their combined influence.

They succeeded in obtaining a tariff of duties bearing most oppressively on the agricultural and laboring classes of society, and producing a revenue that could not be usefully employed within the range of the powers conferred upon Congress; and in order to fasten upon the people this unjust and unequal system of taxation extravagant schemes of internal improvement were got up, in various quarters, to squander the money and to purchase support. Thus one unconstitutional measure was intended to be upheld by another, and the abuse of the power of taxation was to be maintained by usurping the power of expending the money in internal improvements.

But, rely upon it, the design to collect an extravagant revenue, and to burden you with taxes beyond the economical wants of the Government, is not yet abandoned. The various interests which have combined together to impose a heavy tariff, and to produce an overflowing Treasury, are too strong and have too much at stake to surrender the contest. The corporations and wealthy individuals who are engaged in large manufacturing establishments desire a high tariff to increase their gains.

Designing politicians will support it to conciliate their favor and to obtain the means of profuse expenditure for the purpose of purchasing influence in other quarters; and since the people have decided that the Federal Government can not be permitted to employ its income in internal improvements, efforts will be made to seduce and mislead the citizens of the several States by holding out to them the deceitful prospect of benefits to be derived from a surplus revenue collected by the General Government and annually divided among the States. And if, encouraged by these fallacious hopes, the States should disregard the principles of economy which ought to characterize every republican government, and should indulge in lavish expenditures, exceeding their resources, they will before long find themselves oppressed with debts which they are unable to pay, and the temptation will become irresistible to support a high tariff in order to obtain a surplus distribution.

Do not allow yourselves, my fellow-citizens, to be misled on this subject. The Federal Government can not collect a surplus for such purposes without violating the principles of the Constitution and assuming powers which have not been granted. It is, moreover, a system of injustice, and if persisted in will inevitably lead to corruption, and must end in ruin. The surplus revenue will be drawn from the pockets of the people—from the farmer, the mechanic, and the laboring classes of society; but who will receive it when distributed among the States, where it is to be disposed of by leading politicians who have friends to favor and political partisans to gratify? It will certainly not be returned to those who paid it and who have most need of it and are honestly entitled to it. There is but one safe rule, and that is to confine the General Government rigidly within the sphere of its appropriate duties. It has no power to raise a revenue or impose taxes except for the purposes enumerated in the Constitution; and if its income is found to exceed these wants it should be forthwith reduced, and the burdens of the people so far lightened

So much, Mr. Chairman, for Andrew Jackson's views on the tariff, as expressed at the close of his political career, fifty-one years ago.

In another portion of his speech my friend from Ohio states that Samuel J. Tilden, more than twenty years ago, denounced in unmistakable terms the system of internal-revenue taxation. Mr. Tilden may have done this, although I do not know upon what occasion, but I do not think the gentleman will find that Mr. Tilden ever expressed a preference for high protection; it is probable he denounced the methods by which officials collected these internal-revenue taxes. And let me say here, Mr. Chairman, that this bill seeks in several ways to give relief in this respect.

As I quoted from the venerated Jackson to make clear his views on taxation, I will now read the words of Samuel J. Tilden, spoken twenty years ago. On March 11, 1868, he said to his friends in his native county in the State of New York:

These taxes carry with them other incidents, which greatly increase their burden. They fall most heavily upon men of small incomes, the proceeds of whose labor and industry are consumed to support themselves and their families. Every man who has attained a situation of comfort and prosperity can in some way stand them. But take the poor man—take the man not poor, whose annual income is consumed in his annual support—and he pays a most disproportionate amount from his earnings or income for the taxes levied upon the country.

It is not for myself that I speak to-day to you, yeomanry and citizens of Columbia; it is for you, and because I have cherished from my childhood and still cherish the thought that America is to be the home of its people and not a state in which the wealthy are prosperous at the expense of toiling millions. It is because I still cherish the belief that America is to be what in my youth I fondly believed it—the home and refuge of the man who spends the toil of his year for the maintenance of his family and himself, and is able to reserve but little at the end of the year. * * *

These taxes, when laid on imports in the manner in which they were laid in the Congressional carnival of manufacturers which framed our present tariff, cause a misapplication of industry that charges on the consumer what neither the Government is able to collect as taxes nor the manufacturer to appropriate as profits. They lessen the productive power of human labor as if God had cursed it with ungenial climate or sterile soil.

And four years later, September 17, 1874, at Syracuse, he said:

Retrenchment in public expenditure; reform in public administration; simplification and reduction of tariffs and taxes; accountability of public officers, enforced by better civil and criminal remedies—the people must have these measures of present relief, measures of security for the future.

The Federal Government is drifting into greater dangers and greater evils. * * * It undertakes to direct the business of individuals by tariffs not intended for legitimate taxation, by granting special privileges and by fostering monopolies at the expense of the people.

Mr. Chairman, the Democracy were not frightened by these expressions; quite the contrary; they must have indeed approved them, for they shortly after nominated him for governor, and the people ratified the choice. He was elected by 50,000 majority.

Perhaps it may be thought that the people had not generally heard of the Syracuse speech and that the discrete governor kept very quiet about tariff matters after that. Did he? Let me read from his message in 1876—January, 1876, bear it in mind.

He said:

The consequence is that the pecuniary sacrifices of the people are not to be measured by the receipts into the Treasury. They are vastly greater. A tax that starts in its career by disturbing the natural courses of private industry and impairing the productive power of labor, and then comes to the consumer distended by profits of successive intermediaries and by insurance against the risks of a fickle or uncertain governmental policy and of a fluctuating governmental standard of value, blights human well-being at every step. When it reaches the hapless child of toil who buys his bread by the single loaf and his fuel by the basket, it devours his earnings and inflicts starvation.

Another evil of such a system of excessive taxation is that it creates and nourishes a governmental class with tendencies to lessen services and to enlarge compensation, to multiply retainers, to invent jobs and foster all forms of expenditure, tendencies unrestrained by the watchful eye and firm hand of personal interest which alone enable private business to be carried on successfully. In other countries such a class has found itself able, sometimes by its own influence, and sometimes in alliance with the army, to rule the unorganized masses. In our country it has become a great power, acting on the elections by all the methods of organization, of propagating opinion, of influence, and of corruption. The system, like every living thing, struggles to perpetuate its own existence.

Every useful and necessary governmental service at a proper cost is productive labor. Every excess beyond that, so far as it is saved by the official, merely transfers to him what belongs to the people. So far as such excess is consumed it is a waste of capital as absolute as if wheat of equal value were destroyed by fire, or gold were sunk in the ocean.

Well, Mr. Chairman, having thus again pronounced against excessive taxation, and having even been so daring as to say that it was an injury to labor, was Governor Tilden set aside for a more conservative man? No, Mr. Chairman, the State of New York presented him as its candidate for the Presidency at the national convention in 1876, and the Democratic party nominated him without hesitation. We may assume that the platform was as cautious as was deemed prudent in its tariff expressions. I will read from it:

REFORM IN FEDERAL TAXATION.

Reform is necessary in the sum and modes of Federal taxation to the end that capital may be set free from distrust and labor lightly burdened.

We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly 4,000 articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense.

It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising, revenue.

It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few.

It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor.

It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas.

It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad, and depleted the returns of American agriculture, an industry followed by half our people.

It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor.

It provokes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants.

We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

And with this we went before the country. My friend from Ohio must have been somewhat concerned about that time, and indeed we did lose Ohio, but only by a little over 6,000, and we lost Pennsylvania. But we carried New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, and Mr. Tilden seemed not to have suffered because of his low tariff views. There was trouble in some Southern States, but not due to the tariff. In 1880 the Democratic party did not do so well; it still wanted tariff reform, but was cautious, and New York State in its convention did not allude to the tariff. We nominated an honorable gentleman, a soldier with a splendid record, and hoping to carry Pennsylvania, and perhaps Ohio, we were not bold on the tariff. We gained in Pennsylvania, but Ohio went Republican by 35,000, and we lost New York and Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, in 1884 the Democratic party in convention at Chicago nominated Mr. Cleveland. The platform declared—

That change is necessary is proved by an existing surplus of more than $100,000,000, which has yearly been collected from a suffering people. Unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation. We denounce the Republican party for having failed to relieve the people from crushing war taxes, which have paralyzed business, crippled industry, and deprived labor of employment and of just reward.

The Democracy pledges itself to purify the administration from corruption, to restore economy, to revive respect for law, and to reduce taxation to the lowest limit consistent with due regard to the preservation of the faith of the nation to its creditors and pensioners.

To my mind this was not hesitating to state that the Democrats opposed an unnecessarily high tariff and called for reduction; still, the charge has been made by a gentleman of the minority here that Mr. Cleveland posed as a protectionist during the campaign. It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that the present occupant of the White House did not go about the country making speeches during the campaign, but remained in Albany attending to his duties as governor. On one occasion, however, a short time before the election, he was persuaded to visit his native State, New Jersey, and a great celebration took place. In the evening he addressed a large assemblage in the active manufacturing city of Newark, and I will quote from his speech.

When we consider the city of Newark we find a municipality ranking as the fourteenth in the land. It leads every other city in three important industries. It is second only in another, and third in still another. Of course all these industries necessitate the existence of a large laboring population. This force, in my opinion, is a further element of strength and greatness in the State. No part of the community should be more interested in a wise and just administration of their government, none should be better informed as to their needs and rights, and none should guard more vigilantly against the smooth pretense of false friends. In common with all other citizens they should desire an honest and economical administration of public affairs.

It is quite plain, too, that the people have a right to demand that no more money should be taken from them, directly or indirectly, for public uses than is necessary for this purpose.

Indeed, the right of the Government to exact tribute from the citizen is limited to its actual necessities, and every cent taken from the people beyond that required for their protection by the Government is no better than robbery.

We surely must condemn, then, a system which takes from the pockets of the people millions of dollars not needed for the support of Government, and which tends to the inauguration of corrupt schemes and extravagant expenditures.

The Democratic party has declared that all taxation should be limited by the requirements of an economical government.

This is plain and direct, and it distinctly recognizes the value of labor and its right to governmental care when it further declares that the necessary reduction in taxation and the limitation of them to the country's needs should be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without injuring the interests of our laboring population.

At this time, when the suffrages of laboring men are so industriously sought, they should by careful inquiry discover the party pledged to protect their interests and which recognizes in their labor something most valuable to the prosperity of the country and primarily entitled to its care and protection.

I think, Mr. Chairman, a President who thus spoke before his election in 1884 may be permitted to send to this body such a moderate message as was received by us without exciting to wrath our friends of the minority.

Mr. Chairman, the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Daniel Manning, in his report of December, 1886, calls attention to the pledge made by the Democratic party to lower taxation. He wrote as follows:

These pledges can never be fulfilled without a reform in the sum and methods of Federal taxation, nor can our country ever profit fully by its incomparable advantages among the nations of the earth in population, peace, land, and liberty so long as we go on pleading infancy and swaddle in mediæval rags its victorious energies. It is these which need release and liberty. All our requisite taxation may be made an easy garment. We have made a prison of it, plastered stiff with obsolete contention about protection and free trade.

AMERICAN LABOR GETS AND EARNS THE HIGHEST WAGES.

Now, one proud fact attests the substance of our prosperity, and is the guaranty as well as proof of our power to hold against all competition the markets of the United States for everything we choose to dig or fabricate or grow, and to command and control for our surplus products, against all rivals, any foreign market.

We pay to labor the highest wages in the world. Highly-paid labor signifies the most efficient labor; signifies that high wages are the most profitable wages; signifies that the high rate is earned. The highest wages to the laborer thus involve and imply the lowest percentage of labor cost in the product. But, other things being equal, the lowest percentage of labor cost in any product is the guaranty that competition is outstripped.

Protectionists have done service to humanity by insisting upon the fact that we pay to labor the highest wages in the world. While debate has been going on whether our high wages were because of taxation or despite taxation, economists have discovered and demonstrated the correlative fact that labor cost in our products is the least in the world.

HIGH WAGES INSURE LOW LABOR COST IN PRODUCT.

Were trade as free with and within all the ununited states of Europe as it is among the United States of America, the great surplus products of our industry, including the manufactured, would have the pick of foreign markets, for the reason that our labor, being the most highly paid and insuring most percentage of labor cost, would everywhere surpass rivalry. Great Britain would follow next, for next to our labor ners is the highest paid, therefore the most efficient, and therefore next in effecting a low percentage of labor cost in her chief products.

France and Germany would follow next, and command the next unsupplied markets, and last of all, at the foot of the list, quite unable to compete with a single rival in whatever that rival chose to produce, would come the "pauper labor" of Europe and Asia. The low wages of pauper labor signify least efficiency, which is but another name for highest percentage of labor cost in the product. Other things being equal, it is obvious that high wages can never be paid unless it is profitable to pay them, and it can only be a good business to pay the highest wages, because the efficiency of those who earn them vindicates its superiority by the reduction of labor cost in the product.

High wages to labor and cheaper product are correlative terms. Low wages to labor and a costlier product are correlative terms. The one implies the other wherever labor competes with labor upon otherwise equal ground. What pauper stands any chance competing with the inteligent artisan? The "pauper-labor-of-Europe" cry is a bugaboo, except that, in truth, our war-tariff taxes favor "pauper labor" at the expense of American labor. Its products are not fenced out by our tariff laws. They come in because we ourselves destroy our own easy power of successful competition, even in our home market. By tariff taxes on raw materials we fence in our own surplus products, making them cost too much to compete at home, and of course too much to compete abroad with manufactures from untaxed raw materials.

In Mexico, Central and South America we can, of course, make no better headway against European competition than at home. Diplomacy is not an acceptable substitute for trade and its laws. Our highly-paid labor insures the lowest percentage of labor cost in the product, but our tariff taxes upon raw materials handicap American manufacturers with the highest percentage of cost of material in the product. The result is that capital and labor united in our American industrial products, despite our advantage in the most highly-paid and efficient labor, are put into a most hopeless competition with the industrial products of other nations, none of which tax raw materials. The advantage we possess in the most efficient and highly-paid labor in the world is nullified by the self-imposed disadvantage of tariff-taxed raw material, with which our labor is inwrought.

OUR SUICIDAL TAXES ON RAW MATERIALS.

The total value of our domestic exports for the last fiscal year was almost exactly $666,000,000, of which 86 per cent. were the products of our fields, forests, fisheries, and mines, and 16 per cent. only were the sum total of manufactured products in which American labor was inwrought.

In the last quarter of a century progress in telegraphs, transportation, labor-saving inventions, and the mechanic arts has reduced the profits of capital and the rate of interest by more than one-half; has increased the wages of labor throughout the world; has augmented by at least a third the surplus which our manufacturers can produce beyond domestic needs for sale abroad.

Prolonging without necessity our war-tariff taxes on raw materials, we have been undersold and excluded from foreign markets by nations not taxing raw materials. Despite their low-priced inferior labor, and the high percentage of labor cost therefore included in their product, our taxed raw materials and their free raw materials have protected the so-called "pauper labor" of Europe against American competition.

These prolonged war-tariff taxes, incompetent and brutal as a scheme of revenue, fatal to the extension of our foreign markets, and disorderly to our domestic trade, have in the last resort acted and reacted with most ruinous injury upon our wage-earners. As the more numerous part of our population our wage-earners are of course the first, the last, and the most to be affected by injurious laws. Every government by true statesmen will watchfully regard their condition and interests. If these are satisfactory nothing else can be of any momentous importance. But our so-called protective statesmanship has disfavored them altogether. Encumbering with clumsy help a few thousand employers, it has trodden down the millions of wage-earners. It has for twenty-one years denied them even the peaceable fruits of liberty.

MORE INCOME FOR WAGE-EARNERS BY DROPPING WORST TAXES.

The taxes to be first remitted are those which prevent or hinder the sale of our surplus products in foreign markets. Their removal will set capital in motion by the promise of better returns, enlarge the steady employment, and increase the annual income of many thousand wage-earners, whose prosperity will diffuse prosperity. These taxes are the duties on raw materials, and the most widely injurious of them is the tax upon raw wool. But the income of all the wage-earners of the United States can be at once enlarged effectively, certainly, permanently, by reducing the cost to them of the great necessities of life.

UNTAX THE CLOTHING OF 60,000,000 PEOPLE.

I respectfully recommend to Congress that they confer upon the wage-earners of the United States the boon of untaxed clothing, and in order thereto the immediate passage of an act simply and solely placing raw wool upon the free-list.

Of course a repeal of the duty on raw wool should be followed by, but need not wait for, a compensating adjustment of the duties on manufactured woolens, whilst our manufacturers are learning the lesson that with the highest paid and most efficient labor in the world, with the most skilled management, and the best inventive appliances they need fear no competition from any rivals in the world in home or foreign markets so long as they can buy their wools free, of every kind.

But the common daily clothing of the American people need not be taxed; therefore, it ought not to be taxed; to free their clothing of taxes will finally reduce, by half, their expense for one of the three great necessities of life, and thus enlarge honestly and justly the income of every wage-earner in the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Secretary Manning was well known to the people of New York, and in 1887 when the State convention met it adopted, in accordance with his views, a platform a portion of which refers to Federal taxation. I read an extract:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, STATE OF NEW YORK, 1887.

The unnecessary Federal taxation of the last fiscal year exceeded $100,000,000, and unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation.

Therefore the Democracy of New York demand that Federal taxation be straightway reduced by a sum not less than $100,000,000 a year, and also respectfully urge upon Congress that a measure shall be adopted which will, in the language of the President's inaugural address, "relieve the people from unnecessary taxation, having a due regard to the interests of capital invested and workingmen employed in American industries."

The taxes to be first reduced or altogether removed are those on imported raw materials, which now assist and promote foreign competition with ourselves in our own markets, and prevent or hinder the sale of our surplus products in foreign markets.

Along with those taxes should forthwith be remitted or reduced the taxation which increases the cost to our wage-earners of the common necessaries of life and the price of the common daily clothing of all our people.

Besides these there are several hundred articles among the 4,182 articles now taxed which should be swept off the tax-list into the free-list, thereby diminishing the cost of collecting all our seaport taxes and casting away those which are petty, needless, and vexatious.

We also urge an immediate enactment of the measures prepared by Mr. Manning and Mr. Hewitt and reported to the last House by the Committee on Ways and Means to systematize, simplify, and economize the machinery for the collection of the customs revenue, and especially for making correct appraisements of foreign values wherever ad valorem rates of duty shall be retained.

With this platform in 1887, not yet one year ago, the Democratic party carried the State of New York by 17,000 plurality. It will next week adopt a platform equally as pronounced, and ask that it be ratified by the national Democratic convention.

Mr. Chairman, has not a consistent effort on the part of the Democrats of the State of New York in favor of tariff reform been proven?

Mr. Chairman, among those who have, on the floor of this House, advocated extreme protection, gentlemen from Massachusetts have been the most earnest. By one of them we have been shown, in language beautiful and plausible, how two manufacturers, A and B, continued competing in efforts to improve machinery and quality of goods, until ultimately the consumer purchased at figures so low as to prove that high tariff lowers prices.

We must admit, Mr. Chairman, that if A and B continue to produce, and if no outlet can be found for their goods, the purchaser will get them at low figures, so low in fact that A and B become apprehensive and talk over their affairs together and call in other manufacturers to consult with them. They get together, Mr. Chairman, at the city of Boston, or some other central point, and find that they represent, say, one hundred and thirty-eight factories. Mr. C, who is the head of a very large establishment, rises in the meeting and states that it is evident too many goods in their line are being produced, and that unless the tariff on raw materials is taken off, and on some other articles duties lessened, so as to enable this industry to ship goods to South American and other ports, in competition with English houses, the trade will be ruined. "I have favored protection," says Mr. C, "but I now realize we must get an outlet for our goods or overproduce, and I am disposed to be a low-tariff man hereafter. To be sure, there is a way to keep up prices by closing many of our factories, discharging our clerks and workmen, and forcing figures so high that money enough will be made to pay all the stockholders fair dividends. I do not like it, as it seems cruel to the workingmen and their families. But we must do something. "However," says Mr. C, "I will give you the argument in favor of it as given me by a gentleman who is a leading man in one of the trusts, and he is impartial, as his business is not affected by custom or internal-revenue taxes. He said to me last week: 'My dear C, do not allow your people to make any mistake; form your trust at once—shut down one hundred of your mills and keep thirty-eight large ones running. Your road is clear. We know how Mr. Blaine stands on the question of protection. He wants duties raised, and says our people should look to our own country for prosperity. Have you not heard how the prominent Republicans are talking in Congress? They call for higher duties, and even people who are opposed to a surplus in the Treasury, fearing corruption will spring from it, are to be satisfied by this argument. The members from Massachusetts will help you, and the talk of competition with pauper labor of Europe and flaunting the Cobden Club banner in the face of the Irish will give the control of the Government to the Republican party again. Then, with Mr. Blaine as President, and a policy of high duties proclaimed, such measures as the Mills bill will pass, if ever, only after your day and mine. It is a great opportunity for your business interest to enrich itself, my friend C.' Well now, gentlemen," says Mr. C to his associates, "you have the matter before you. I still prefer the broader policy of enlarging our works and looking for an export market under lower tariff; but if you decide to form the trust, I must give up my idea of voting for Cleveland and tariff reform; but I do it with regret, as I am sure suffering to our employés will follow our organizing as a trust."

Mr. Chairman, we must have reduction in the tariff or ruination in this country. My friend from Ohio has said, in reply to a gentleman from Tennessee:

Trusts are the results of social forces now operating in all industrial countries, whether under the protective or free-trade policy. They are simply one of the many phases which the evolutions of mankind present. Should they abuse the patience of the people to the extent my friend fears, it will certainly be bad for the trusts. There is a higher law than a written constitution.

Now, I accept my friend's statement, but at the same time insist that this very phase of the evolution leaves us no other course than to reduce the tariff and thus correct a bad system which excludes importations. As to the higher law than the written Constitution, we do not want to look for that. The gentleman also said, "The Knights of Labor organization is a vast labor trust."

Mr. Chairman, we can break up neither trusts nor labor organizations in any other than constitutional ways. Surely the two gentlemen, one on each side of this House, who represent labor organizations are more nearly correct when they take the view that the President does regarding the situation.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken the liberty of quoting from the remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia, Judge STEWART. He said:

I insist that the farmers of this country, although in numbers the largest, are not benefited by a high tariff, but on the contrary are shamefully discriminated against, and it is not so strange that their farms are heavily mortgaged when we come to understand how the tariff affects them.

Under the present law let us see what an ordinary family on a farm has to contribute to the Government. I submit a schedule of articles mostly used by a family as an illustration, and the duty on them, and also showing the reduction proposed under the Mills bill.

Total value and present tariff	501.00		189.27
Total gain under Mills bill				84.29

* Average.

From the foregoing calculation it will be seen that the entire amount of goods purchased at the prices named amounts to $501, that the present duty on these articles amounts to $189.27, and the duty as proposed by the Mills bill would amount to $104.98, which deducted from the rate of duty under the present law would be a net gain of $84.29.

Mr. Chairman, if under the present tariff laws duties are collected amounting to $189.27 for what one farmer or mechanic requires during the year, where are the people of this country to get means to supply themselves with the necessaries of life when all industries are running as trusts and we live altogether by ourselves, with more than half the factories closed, people out of employment, and higher prices than we ever had before? To be sure the duty paid will not go to the Government, but to the trust to pay dividends to closed factories all over the land. Such must surely be the outcome of an attempt to reduce the surplus in the way our friends of the majority want it done.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us hope that common sense and reason will prevail. The talk of the Cobden Club controlling parties here is silly. Our Irish fellow-citizens are not to be deceived by such small demagogery. Indeed, one finds them as ready to unite with Gladstone and other Englishmen in efforts for proper government as they are to work with each other for the same object. I have no doubt some of these same English Liberals belong to the Cobden Club. That England is to gain by our reducing duties I believe to be untrue.

I recently heard a prominent English gentleman, who has made a study of the subject, state that our reducing duties would so increase our export trade and lessen that of Great Britain as to cause a great loss to his country. The subjoined table indicates what an opening there is for our industries in this direction.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, April 17, 1888.

We sell them a little over $6,000,000; Great Britain over $46,000,000.

Before closing my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the criticisms of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] in relation to the retention of duty on alcohol used in the arts. As we are endeavoring to secure cheaper articles for uses in manufacturing it would seem but reasonable that this duty be removed. The difficulty, Mr. Chairman, is that there is no way to accomplish this at present without making an opening for revenue frauds, which once so disgraced our land.

It is possible that by methylation the danger of the alcohol being used for drinking purposes might be lessened. Experience in European countries, however, goes to prove that methods are found to make use of the methylated product, and great injury to health results. It is to be regretted that the gentlemen who take such an interest in this particular tax have no remedy to suggest by which their claims can be safely carried out. A pity it is that the only relief the minority offers to the manufacturer is not practicable.

Mr. Chairman, I claim that the bill under discussion is a wise measure. It may be that some amendments should be made. People in my district I find generally satisfied with it as presented to the House. It is in no sense a free-trade bill, but on the contrary gives at least as much protection as is wise.

I desire to read a letter written by a gentleman who has just retired from the office of mayor of Albany:

ALBANY, N. Y., May 3, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In common with many other manufacturers in Albany we are watching with eagerness the progress of the Mills bill.

After patiently waiting twenty years for a reduction in the war tariff, the people now demand relief.

We believe no industry in this vicinity will be disastrously affected by the Mills bill, but that, on the contrary, our trade and commercial interests will be benefited.

In our own particular branch of business we should look for a great increase in the building of cars and in railroad traffic.

Yours,

GEO. H. THATCHER & CO.

Hon. CHARLES TRACEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I have also a private letter from the manager of the largest cotton mills in my district, an establishment employing thousands of workmen. This gentleman writes: "From what I have seen of the Mills bill, it is a good one; and if it could be passed without so much partisan politics discussion, would prove a benefit to business interests of the country."

The following, giving expressions from manufacturers and business men in Albany, I quote from the Albany Argus:

It has been persistently stated that changes in the tariff would involve business catastrophe, reduction of wages to labor, and general mischief to the country. All reports agree that the bill soon to be presented to Congress, in accord with the suggestions of President Cleveland's message, will contain a proviso repealing the tariff tax of $2 per 1,000 feet on lumber. The lumber interest is one of the largest in Albany, the receipts here in 1870 amounting to 415,000,000 feet, and in 1887 to 435,000,000. In the last seventeen years the largest receipts were in 1884, amounting to 477,000,000, and the lowest in 1875, when they fell to 290,000,000 feet. In order to ascertain how Albany lumber dealers regard the proposed change in the tariff in this respect, reporters of The Argus yesterday visited them in their several offices. In the winter time the lumber dealer has little apparently to do but keep the run of his books and correspondence and devote ample leisure to meditation on the affairs of State. It is reasonable then to assume that the views expressed below are the results of deliberate judgment on the part of those fully qualified to speak. Of the twenty-six wholesale lumber dealers in the city all but six were reached. Of these only four are pronounced in opposition to the repeal of the tariff on lumber, ten are earnestly in favor of the repeal and believe it would be greatly to the advantage of the whole country, and especially of this city, and six are indifferent, expressing various opinions. The replies show that the question is being considered fairly by business men, without regard to partisan affiliations. Following are the questions submitted in each case:

1. Are you in favor of or opposed to the repeal of the tariff on lumber?
2. How would the repeal of the tariff on lumber affect the business in Albany?
3. Would the abolition of the tariff on lumber reduce the wages of men in your employ in this State?
4. Would it lead to cheaper lumber, and thus be of advantage to consumers?

STRONGLY FAVORING REPEAL.

Mr. Charles G. Saxe, head of the firm of Saxe Brothers, said: "Most decidedly I am in favor of the repeal of the tariff of $2 per 1,000 feet on lumber. It stands in the way of the development of one of the leading lines of business in Albany. If the tariff tax on lumber were repealed the lumber trade of Albany, I believe, would materially increase. So far from reducing wages of men employed in the business in the State, and especially in 'the district,' by increasing the business it would increase their wages or increase the number of men employed. While the American consumer might not get the full benefit of the removal of the $2 tax, he would undoubtedly get part of the benefit. The repeal of the lumber tax, I believe, would be for the advantage of the whole country, and Albany's share of the advantage gained would be very great."

J. Benedict & Sons say: "We are strongly in favor of the repeal of the tariff tax on lumber, believing the repeal to be for the benefit of the people of the county, and especially of Albany. It would take more time than we can spare, and probably more space than The Argus could afford, to present the reasons for our statement and to reply fully to the questions suggested. Count this firm in favor of the repeal of the tariff on lumber."

Hughson & Co. say: "We favor the repeal of the tariff on lumber, and among lumber dealers we know of little opposition to its repeal. It would undoubtedly increase the business of Albany materially. It would not reduce the wages of men employed in the business. On the contrary, if the business here increased more men would, of course, be employed, and the total of wages would be larger. It would be for the benefit of men employed in the trade. As to its effect on the price of lumber to the consumer, that is an open question. The price of lumber is so largely controlled by other matters that it would be difficult to trace the bearings of the tax on lumber to its price."

Messrs. Douglas White & Co. say: "We favor the repeal of the tariff tax on lumber. It would undoubtedly increase our business in Albany with Canada, and thus, if anything, increase the aggregate business of 'the district' and the city. It would not, of course, reduce the wages of men employed in the business. If there were more business, of course wages would be higher or we should employ more men. The $2 saved by the repeal of the tax on each 1,000 feet would probably be divided between the producer and the consumer, conditions of the market from time to time fixing the amount of benefit which each would receive."

Mr. S. B. Towner, successor to J. G. Towner & Co., says: "I am most decidedly in favor of the abolition of the tariff on lumber. The tariff tax has interfered with and reduced the business of this city, and its repeal in my judgment would add wonderfully to the volume of business done here. It would not tend to reduce the wages of men employed here in the business. On the contrary, if there was more business, as any man can see for himself, more men would be employed and wages would be as good and probably better. The repeal of the tax of $2 would unquestionably make lumber cheaper to the consumer, but not probably to the full extent of the tax. The greatest good of the greatest number in this country clearly demands the abolition of the tax on lumber."

Messrs. Arnold & Co. say: "We are in favor of the repeal of the tariff on lumber. The repeal would be no detriment to any men dealing in lumber in the United States, and of decided advantage to all men in this country who deal in Canada lumber. The trade should be reciprocal, Canada requiring some grades of Michigan lumber and the United States requiring Canada lumber. It would undoubtedly increase the lumber business of Albany, and if it increased the business it would give more men steadier work at better pay, probably. Americans already have put in nearly one-third of the capital invested in Canada in the lumber business."

Mr. John McDonald, of Boyd & Co., says: "I am in favor of the repeal of the tariff on lumber. Nearly all lumber dealers favor the repeal. It would vastly increase the business of Albany. Albany is the natural outlet for Canada. The Canada and Atlantic Railway, built by a syndicate of Ottawa lumber dealers, I am in a position to say, is ready to contract for five years to deliver lumber in Albany for $25 a car, by its connections with the Delaware and Hudson at Rouse's Point. That tariff of $2 stands in the way of the growth of the lumber business in Albany. If the business were increased, of course, there would be more work for the men and better pay. The whole $2 tax would not go to the consumer, if repealed, but would be divided between manufacturer and consumer, according to the state of the market, governed by supply and demand. I do not apprehend that the 'limits' in Canada will be raised if our tariff is reduced, as do some. Premier Mowatt, of the Ottawa government, has assured me that the policy of the Canadian Government contemplates no such increase, whatever the action of Congress may be. 'Stumpage' has already gone so high in the West that American lumbermen are being driven into Canada of necessity, and the repeal of the tax will be a benefit shared by Americans on either side of the St. Lawrence."

Philips & Dunscomb say: "We are in favor of the repeal of tariff on lumber. It probably would not greatly affect the business of Albany one way or the other, though its tendency would be, perhaps, to increase it. The repeal of the tariff tax on lumber would not tend to reduce the wages of men employed in the business in the State. Of the benefit of $2 per 1,000 to be obtained by repealing the tax, the consumer here would probably get about half and the Canadian manufacturer about half on the average. A large number of Americans from Michigan have already gone to Canada to conduct the business there, and there would be little opposition to the repeal of the tax from Michigan, in our opinion."

Mr. James Moir says: "I am in favor of the repeal of the tariff on lumber. I have no doubt that it would increase the business of Albany and of the United States. When business increases of course more men are employed, so the repeal of the tax on lumber, in my opinion, would be for the direct benefit of laboring men employed in the business. The repeal might not make a great difference in the price of lumber to the consumer, although to express a positive opinion on the subject one must, of course, discuss all the factors in the market."

Mr. Lemon Thomson said: "I am in favor of the abolition of the tariff on lumber, although I have not 'large interests in Canada,' as I have seen stated. There is virtually no opposition, even in Michigan, now to the repeal of the tariff on lumber. Under the tariff our best timber-lands have been rapidly stripped. The repeal of the lumber tax would undoubtedly help increase the business of Albany, as there is much Norway or red pine, useful for flooring, etc., which would come to Albany but for the duty of $2 per 1,000 feet. Free lumber would not reduce the wages of men in the business in this State. The price to the consumer is governed by supply and demand. If our supply became greater of course the price would be less."

OPPOSED TO REPEAL.

Mr. C. B. Nichols says: "I am opposed to the repeal of the tariff on lumber, and I think it would be a detriment to the business of Albany, as it would put us out of the Michigan trade. The discrimination in freight against Albany and in favor of New York is much greater in the Canadian lumber trade than in the Michigan trade."

Messrs. Patton & Co. say: "We are opposed to the repeal of the tariff on lumber. It would not affect Albany's business materially, as the increase, if any, would be slight. Of course, it would not affect wages, which are determined by other matters. It would not cheapen lumber to the consumer."

Mr. Robert James, of Smith, Craig & Co., says: "We believe the tariff on lumber should not be reduced, as it serves to offset the difference in freight between Canada and Albany and Michigan and Albany. It would not greatly affect the lumber business of Albany. Canada trade would increase and Michigan trade fall off. It would have no effect whatever on wages. It would not make lumber cheaper, as lumber could not be much cheaper than it is. There has been nothing in the trade for the last few years. The Canadians would try to appropriate the benefit from the repeal of the tariff on lumber."

Mr. W. H. Weaver says: "In my view the removal of the tariff on lumber would hurt the lumber trade in this country and also in this city. The present tariff of $2 makes it possible for us to pay our men their present high wages."

INDIFFERENT ON THE SUBJECT.

Messrs. Hubbell & Hill say: "We do not care whether the tariff on lumber is repealed or not. It would probably have no effect on the volume of Albany's lumber business, and it certainly would not affect wages. Of the $2 tax probably the Canadian producer would get half and the American consumer would get half."

Mr. H. S. Van Santford says: "I am indifferent on the subject, but I see no objection to the repeal of the duty on lumber. There used to be considerable opposition to the repeal of the tariff from Michigan, but that has ceased, and on the whole I am inclined to favor the repeal of the tariff on lumber. One-half the capital invested in Canada on lumber, I presume, is American money. The abolition of the lumber tax might possibly increase the Albany lumber trade, but not greatly. It would have no effect on wages. It would not make much change in the price of lumber to the consumer, especially if Canada should lay an export tax."

Mr. William Easton says: "I do not care whether the tariff on lumber is repealed or not. Our business is chiefly with Michigan, and I doubt if the repeal would affect it much. It would adjust itself in one season. I don't think the business of Albany would be materially increased by the repeal. Albany is only a dry-house for New York, so far as the lumber business is concerned, and the railroads have more to do with business than the tariff does. The repeal would not affect wages. Wages are governed by supply and demand of labor. If the tariff was repealed I should not look for material and long-continued lower prices for lumber. The Canadians are sharp and would try to absorb the gain."

Mr. A. S. Kibbee says: "I do not care whether Congress takes the duty off of lumber or does not. I used to be quite strongly opposed to the removal of the duty; but I am indifferent now. I do not believe it would much increase the business in Albany, and probably would not much affect prices, as the Canadians would try to secure the benefit of the $2 repealed. The tariff on lumber is certainly wrong, in so far it is hastening the disappearance of our American forests."

Mr. Oscar L. Hasey says: "I don't care whether the tariff on lumber is repealed or not. It would not make much difference with the Albany business. It would not reduce wages. I am afraid that the Canadians would try to get the advantage by raising the prices of Government 'limits.' I am entirely indifferent on the subject."

Mr. Acors Rathbun says: "I do not care whether the tariff is kept on lumber or taken off. The removal might increase Albany's business somewhat. It certainly would not reduce wages. I do not believe that the business in Michigan would be injured by the removal of the duty. Our business with Canada would be increased, and no home industry would be harmed. However, I am indifferent on the subject."

ANILINE DYES.

Francis V. M. Hudson, superintendent of the Albany Aniline Works, said: "The provisions of the bill, so far as they affect our business, are most satisfactory and beneficial. The tariff act of 1883 did us much harm, but if this bill becomes a law, we look forward to increasing our business, making new colors, and probably increasing our force. The bill puts our raw materials on the free list, and thus enables us to compete with foreign manufacturers. My opinions on this subject, I can say with safety, are held by all those engaged in the business. In brief, the bill is of the greatest aid to our business, because it removes an obstacle which legislation put in our way, and we hope it will pass."

IRON FOUNDRIES.

Mr. Rufus K. Townsend, proprietor of the large Townsend furnace, one of the oldest and most widely known manufacturing firms in this city, said: "The changes in tariff bill in the iron and steel schedule do not harm our business at all. The reduction in pig-iron may be a slight gain. We have all the work we can do and are not afraid of competition. There is a great deal of nonsense about this tariff 'scare.' If the bill passes we shall not bank our fires and discharge our men or cut down wages. I do not care much whether the bill passes or not, as we shall feel no injurious effects from it."

THE CAR-WHEEL BUSINESS.

Mr. George H. Thacher, of the Thacher Car-Wheel Works, one of the oldest and best known foundries in the city, said, concerning the changes in the tariff rates on car-wheels: "We hope the bill will pass. The changes will not affect our business in the slightest degree. We do not fear competition from abroad, as we can make better car-wheels. Our business will not be 'paralyzed,' and our men will not be given 'papuer wages.' On the contrary, we shall go right ahead with our business, pay our men their wages as usual, and not decrease our force. The changes in the taxes on car-wheels will be for the positive benefit of some in the trade using special steel tires."

THE STOVE FOUNDRIES.

Mr. Grange Sard, of Rathbone, Sard & Co., said: "I have looked over carefully the iron and steel schedules in the new tariff bill, and so far as the stove manufacturing trade is concerned the provisions are unquestionably for the advantage of those engaged in the business as employers or as employés. From a general knowledge of the iron and steel business I think the reductions proposed are of advantage to the whole iron and steel industry."

Mr. John T. Perry, of Perry & Co., said: "The changes in the iron and steel schedules will not affect unfavorably our business a particle. Of course I hope there will be no general panic or prostration of business."

CARRIAGE FACTORIES.

Mr. James Kingsbury, jr., one of the largest manufacturers of carriages and sleighs in the city, said concerning the proposed changes in the tariff, so far as they related to the carriage business: "The reduction in the duty on carriages will not affect our business at all. We shall go ahead manufacturing, pay the usual wages, and count on selling our goods everywhere as usual. These 'scares' about business and wages remind me of the 'scare' every fall when we begin making sleighs that it is to be an open winter, and there will be no snow and no sleighing. We go ahead just the same and make and sell our sleighs and carriages. The removal of the taxes on lumber is a good thing for our business, and the reduction of duties on paints, cloths, and some pieces of iron and steel work is also beneficial to the carriage business, and if the bill had gone still further and reduced the duty on varnishes, it would have been a good thing. That duty seems to 'protect' no one but a monopoly of two or three manufacturers."

Mr. James Goold, of the Goold Carriage Company, says: "The change in the duty on carriages will make no difference in the trade in this country. There is almost no importation of carriages, because we can make better ones here than they can abroad."

THE LEATHER BUSINESS.

Mr. George Cook, of the firm of Adam Cook & Sons, leather dealers, said: "The addition of extract of hemlock and tanning bark to the free list is an excellent thing for the leather business. We have none too much of it in this country, and we must draw part of our extracts for tanning from abroad. We approve the bill so far as it affects our business, and hope it will pass. Free raw materials would be a good thing for this country. The bill makes no other changes in the leather business so far as I have seen. No, we don't expect to give our employés 'pauper wages' if the bill passes."

There are thirteen leather establishments in this county, employing over 100 men, with $230,000 capital. Besides this there are eleven boot and shoe factories employing about 1,700 which are affected by the bill directly only in the item above, and that, as shown, is to their advantage.

THE DRUG BUSINESS.

Mr. Duow H. Fonda, one of the leading wholesale drug dealers in the city, said: "I have read the provisions of the proposed tariff bill, in so far as they relate to drugs and chemicals, and if the bill becomes a law it will considerably benefit our business and not compel us, at least so far as the drug business is concerned, to go to the poor-house. The changes are beneficial. The reduction of the tax on borax will be a great gain for every one. At present it benefits only one borax mine in California, and a monopoly has been formed which is putting the price of that article way beyond reason. The changes in the drug and chemical schedule are for the benefit of those engaged in the business, and still further for the benefit of the public which purchases drugs and chemicals."

CROCKERY AND GLASS.

Mr. Theodore V. Van Heusen, of the firm of Van Heusen & Charles, said on the subject of the crockery, china, and glass schedules: "The proposed changes are certainly for the benefit of the business, and even the potteries of Trenton, N. J., will have no right to complain. Money has been improperly used in the past to keep the taxes on some articles in this schedule higher than any necessity or good policy demands. In its entirety the bill seems to me a fair concession to the demand for a revision of the tariff and for a reduction of the surplus that comes from every fair-minded business man. From my knowledge of the business, I should say that manufacturers of crockery, china, and glass ware would be benefited by the provisions of the bill on that subject, because it provides free raw materials, earths, etc., for them."

PRINTING AND BOOK-BINDING.

The new tariff bill makes no changes in the products of the printing and book-binding business, except that Bibles and other books printed in foreign languages are admitted free of duty. As no Bibles or books in foreign languages are printed in Albany, the printing and book-binding trade will not be "ruined" in this county. On the other hand, the printing trade gets the advantage of a reduction of the tax on the metal of which the type is made from 30 per cent., as at present, to 20 per cent.; on paper, sized or glued, from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent.; on unsized paper, from 15 per cent. to 12 per cent.; and on ink, from 30 per cent. to 20 per cent., besides reductions in taxes on thread, cloth, and other materials used in book-binding, which can not be here enumerated. In Albany County, by the census of 1880, there were 23 printing and publishing establishments, employing 740 persons, with a total capital of $1,057,100, and seven book-binderies, employing 82 persons, with a capital of $47,100.

CARPETS AND OIL-CLOTHS.

Mr. Amos Van Gaasbeck, of Van Gaasbeck & Co., said concerning the changes in taxes on carpets and oil-cloths: "The provisions of the bill would make carpets and oil-cloths considerably cheaper, and, of course, in that event the value of our stock on hand would be reduced. Ultimately, however, it would not affect our business. Oil-cloth and carpet manufacturers are probably opposed to the changes which reduce the duties about to the rates at the beginning of the war. The advantage they get from free carpet wools, cheaper dyes, etc., under the bill will not compensate them, in my judgment, for the reductions in the carpet schedule. There are no carpet manufacturers in Albany. More carpets would be imported."

BRASS, COPPER, AND LEAD WORK.

Mr. Russ, of Ridgway & Russ, dealers in plumbers' materials, says: "The only fault I can find with the bill is that on these metals (copper, lead, nickel, zinc, etc.) the tariff is still left too high. The lower we can get the stuff the better it will be for our customers and for ourselves and our employés. At present combinations and trusts are being formed for speculation in these metals. Copper has gone way up, the price of solder in one week was advanced 10 cents, in some grades nearly doubling the price. If with our splendid copper and lead mines we can't get these metals out at a reasonable cost, I think we'd better stop trying to mine them and turn our attention to more profitable business. The bill in this way is a step in the right direction, but the duties are not lowered enough."

Mr. Peter Kinnear says: "I am a strong tariff but not a high tariff man. But so far as the duties on copper are concerned I can not see that the new bill will affect our business in the least. The reason is that we export rather than import copper, for Lake Superior copper is better than the English article. There was a time during the war when we imported some, but we don't do it now, and taking off the tariff can not hurt our trade."

COLLARS, CUFFS, AND SHIRTS.

Mr. S. L. Munson, the large manufacturer of collars, cuffs and shirts, said: "The duty on our articles is unchanged, while there is some reduction in some of our raw materials. Directly our business is not disadvantageously affected. A general prostration of American industries would, of course, harm us, and that is what I fear." [In justice to Mr. Munson it should be said that four years ago he feared a "general prostration of business" if Cleveland was elected President. His large factory on Hudson avenue, built under President Cleveland's administration, is thus a monument to the fact that men are often more scared than hurt.]

FURNITURE MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. Theodore Lyon, superintendent of Nelson Lyon's large furniture establishment, said: "Every one desires the prosperity of our manufacturers and workingmen, I assume. So far as our business is concerned, the changes proposed by the bill seem to be for the advantage of furniture manufacturers. Free lumber, of course, is a great gain, and the addition of burlaps and jute to the free list as well as the reductions in duties on the glass used for looking-glasses and on some other articles seem of advantage to us. If the bill passes we shall go right ahead manufacturing and selling our goods."

FREE FOREIGN BOOKS.

Prof. O. D. Robinson, principal of the high school, said: "I am glad that books in foreign languages are to be put on the free list. They are not printed to any extent in this country, and the duty 'protected' no one. It is, to a very great extent, a tax on education, and was also a tax on the chances to read of many of our adopted citizens from the continent of Europe. Every man who reads another language besides English ought to be thankful for that provision. The reduction of the tax on philosophical apparatus is an advantage to all schools as well as to science."

WOOL-GROWING.

Mr. Charles Newman, head of the oldest wool-buying house in Albany, said: "Of course wool dealers are not directly concerned in the tariff on wool. In my business experience I have seen sheep slaughtered in large numbers for mutton and tallow under the highest tariff, and I have seen our wool-growers thrive under a low tariff, and I have also seen these conditions reversed, so I am convinced that the tax on wool is merely an incident in the wool market. It is governed by the laws of supply and demand. For some time past the price of domestic wools has been low and the price of foreign wools has somewhat increased. The expectation of increased demand from this country may have enhanced the price of foreign wools. These commercial causes will soon establish equilibrium, and the laws of trade will determine the prices of wool apart from what Congress may do or may fail to do. I do not, therefore, see any cause for alarm among wool-growers."

TIN IN ALL MANUFACTURES.

Mr. George Cleveland, of Cleveland Brothers, baking-powder manufacturers, said: "The most important and, indeed, the only change in the new tariff bill affecting our business (except two or three reductions, possibly, in articles we use to a slight extent) is the abolition of the tax on tin, or tin-plate as it is commercially called. We use large amounts of tin in packing our goods, and I am heartily in favor of the repeal of that tax, which the bill provides. The tax of 1 cent a pound on tin is a tax on nearly every industry in the country, and is a tax on almost every citizen, for tinware is often called 'the poor man's silver.' That tax adds to the cost of the necessities of life of almost every one, as is evident from the many uses to which tin is put. It does not 'protect' any one, as none is made in this country, and none can be made unless the tax is doubled or trebled, and if that is suggested it would be cheaper for the country to vote $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 right out of the Treasury and board those who contemplate it at Delmonico's or the Fifth Avenue in idleness. So far as my own business is concerned, as I say, the repeal of that tax would be of great advantage. I am willing to speak further, as I have recently talked of the matter with many Albany manufacturers, and we sent together a petition to Congress in February asking for the repeal of that tax."

Among those who signed it were the Littlefield Stove Company, the Ransom Stove Works, P. V. Fort & Son, James Ackroyd, Bacon, Stickney, & Co., M. E. Viele, Delahanty & Co., S. and C. A. Baker, Wasson & Co., S. H. Parsons, George W. Peck, Philip O'Brien, Tracey & Wilson, Walter McEwan, Thomas Myers, and a large number of tinsmiths and other manufacturing firms whose names do not occur to me at the moment. [It was not deemed necessary to ask opinions from those signing the petition.] I am a protectionist, but that feature of the bill to which I have given my undivided attention—the repeal of the tax on tin, or tin plate, exactly speaking—meets my warm approval, and I hope it will pass. It will benefit half the industries of the country, and will benefit everybody, and especially the families of those who work for wages, as every one of those families uses probably as much or more tinware than the families of the rich.

SUGAR, MOLASSES, GROCERIES.

Col. Andrew E. Mather, of Mather Brothers, wholesale grocers, said concerning the change of rates on sugar and molasses: "I have been in favor of the reduction of the taxes on sugar and molasses ever since the necessity for them to meet war expenses passed away. So far as the tariff bill affects those articles in which we deal I approve of it as beneficial to our business and much more beneficial to the people of the country. I apprehend only that the reduction has not been large enough in those matters. The tariff on sugar has been accompanied apparently by the establishment of a monopoly and the heavy duty on molasses leads to adulteration in this country, which can be prevented by lowering the duty and permitting the importation of foreign molasses instead. In a hasty glance at changes in other articles in our line of business I see nothing to apprehend, but I do not care to speak specifically of anything but sugar and molasses without further examination. I am strongly in favor of the sugar and molasses reductions. They are articles of general use and the heavy tax is unnecessary.

Mr. George Boardman, of Boardman Brothers, said: "I do not think the proposed changes will affect the grocery business. Prices are regulated by competition, and while the cost of the articles enumerated would be less, the profits to the dealers would remain the same. The benefit of the reduction would go to the consumer almost instantly. The only advantage which might occur to the dealers would be from an increase in consumption, if there should be any. The combined savings to any family, under the proposed changes, would leave a considerably increased margin of their earnings."

THE HAT AND CAP BUSINESS.

Mr. Edgar Cotrell, of Cotrell & Leonard, hat dealers, said of the changes affecting the hat manufacturing business: "The provisions of the new tariff bill in so far as they relate to the manufacture of hats are decidedly for the advantage of manufacturers and their employés, not to mention consumers, who, of course, are benefited. The bill does not materially alter the duty on hats, but it takes off the taxes on raw materials of which hats are made, and should increase the business of hat-making in this country. Hatter's furs, braids, plaits, etc., are put on the free-list, and the tax on hatters' plush is cut down from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. These are changes which Mr. Dunlap and others representing the hat manufacturers of the United States have tried to effect for several years.

"In 1883 they went to Washington for that purpose, but Congress actually did just the reverse of what the trade needed, and increased the taxes on some of our raw materials. I have examined the bill closely only so far as it relates to our own line of business, and I am sure it will meet the approval of every manufacturer and every dealer in the trade. American hats can, perhaps, be exported if the bill is passed, as the superiority of our styles would secure them a place in foreign markets, especially in Canada, where there is now a slight occasional demand for them in preference to English hats. The duty on shellac should also have been reduced."

Mr. Charles Reed, of Stamper & Strait, co-operative hat store on State street, said: "The changes the tariff bill proposes, as far as hat-making is concerned, are considerably to the advantage of the trade. The bill reduces taxes on several raw materials used to a great extent in hat-making, but not produced in this country. That will tend to increase the business in the United States."

SAWS, STEEL, AND FILES.

Mr. Edward Y. Lansing and Mr. James Goodwin, of the Albany Saw, Steel, and File Works, said: "We are for removal of taxes on raw materials as the one policy needed to push American manufactures ahead of those of every other country and increase business. Our firm was established in 1855, and under the lower tariff we did as much or more business than we do under the present tariff. All the saw manufacturers in the country but two favor the reduction of the taxes on iron and steel, and iron and steel men not in combination are not opposed to it. We are not afraid of competition from abroad, and the moderate reduction of the duty on saws won't lose us a single customer, and we do not intend to reduce wages, either, to compete. The reduction of taxes on raw materials we believe will increase our business, and the more business we do the better our men will be satisfied."

SADDLERY, BLANKETS, ETC.

Mr. Walter W. Woodward and Mr. Erastus Hill, of Woodward & Hill, manufacturers of and dealers in saddlery, harness, and carriage and horse furniture generally, said: "You will find this firm, and we think all other dealers and manufacturers in this line of business, unanimously for the bill as far as it affects our business. All the woolen manufacturers with whom we deal and whom we meet favor free wool. The tax on wool is a considerable item in the cost of horse blankets, and as almost every pound of it used is imported—practically none is raised in this country—they feel the tax is checking their business, and a man who buys a horse blanket feels it much more. The same is true of carriage cloth and furnishings. In leather the only change seems to be free tan-bark, which every leather dealer, shoemaker, and saddler favors, of course, as do we, and the changes in the metal schedules are clearly designed to aid American manufacturers. The bill is the first chance Congress has had to pass upon the question of free raw materials, which manufacturers in this country have favored more and more every year and are now almost a unit upon."

CORDAGE, ROPE, SAILS, SHIP STORES.

Robert B. Wing, ship stores, cordage, rope, canvas, sails, etc., said: "I have read those parts of the tariff bill that relate to our business, and I am in favor of them, and so far as I know, manufacturers of the articles we deal in favor them. Manilla, sisal-grass, and other articles used in making rope ought to be admitted free of duty. They don't grow here, and the more and cheaper we get them the better it is for our rope manufacturers, and of course for 'canalers' and every one who uses rope. That gain much more than offsets the change in the rope duty. The same plan seems to have been followed in arranging the taxes on materials for sails and sail cloths. There are fifty or sixty articles in our business the manufacture of which is affected by the tariff, and, so far as I can see, the change in every case is for the better and ought to increase business. Free raw materials would be a good thing for American manufacturers and employés, and of course consumers will gain."

RATTAN AND WICKER WARE.

Mr. Samuel Templeton, rattan, wicker, and willow ware and household goods, said: "The repeal of the tax on rattan seems to me a good thing. None is raised in this country, and yet it is widely used in every household," pointing to a score or more articles from a cane-bottomed chair to a baby carriage. "The tax on that raw material, I presume, adds to the cost of the manufactured articles and 'protects' no one in this country, for I am a protectionist. It would be well to repeal the tax on rattan. I am not so sure about the tax on willows, used for large baskets, as much is grown in swampy places, cut and sold for almost nothing at certain seasons by those who have other regular occupations. It might not be possible to compete with foreign willows."

UMBRELLAS.

Mr. McElwee, the umbrella maker4said: "I have not kept track of the tariff in umbrellas or umbrella materials. I don't believe in free-trade ideas, but I am not afraid of the tariff bill, for if they don't put down the tariff in finished umbrellas too low we can compete and hold our own, if any one in this country can. The more the tariff on our materials is reduced the better, I suppose, for us."

SOME BUILDING MATERIALS.

Mr. Franklin H. Janes, the architect, says: "Talk with the leading lumber dealers leads me to the belief that taking off the duty on lumber will not give the difference in the price wholly to the consumer. The gain will go in a large part to the dealer and manufacturer. There may, however, be a saving effected for our own forests. On the general principle that raw materials should be free, I am glad to see rough stone put on the free list. Our marble, for instance, is either not as hard, or where it is as hard it is not as fine, as the Italian; so to put the rough marble on the free-list will be to our direct and lasting advantage. So far as fancy tiles are concerned, we hardly need a tariff, for with the exception of the majolica we make the best in the world, and we have received for them first premiums in international exhibitions."

HAIR GOODS.

Mr. Julius L. Theisen, manufacturer of hair goods, said: "Of course our industry is not a large one, but still many families are sustained by it, and it is entitled to consideration. The new tariff bill puts human hair unmanufactured on the free-list. The tax never 'protected' any one, as our people do not cut off and sell their hair as is done to a considerable extent in Norway, Sweden, Germany, and France, where hair is luxuriant and people are poor. Barbers, I suppose, would say that hair restorers are the only way to 'protect' American hair, but good soap, borax, and water do pretty well. The repeal of that tax thus benefits us, small though we are in the great scheme of American industry, and it also benefits our customers. The reduction in the duty on the manufactured article from 40 to 25 per cent. will not harm us at all if the duty on unmanufactured hair is repealed, as foreign styles do not sell in our market. I presume our customers would favor the change, but you can see yourself why they might not care to be quoted in print."

SAVING IN MEDICINE.

Dr. S. H. Carroll said in regard to the abolition of the duty of $1 per pound on opium for medicinal uses: "It would be a blessing to poor people who are obliged to use the drug, which is quite largely prescribed by the old school in one form or another. The profits on the sale of the drug would remain the same, while the consumer would get the benefit of the reduction of $1 a pound."

SCHOOL AND FOREIGN BOOKS.

Professor Warren, principal of the Boys' Academy, said, on the matter of abolishing the 25 per cent. ad valorem duty on foreign Bibles and books in foreign languages: "It is a step in the right direction, and I am heartily in favor of it. It was outrageous, in the first place, to place an import tax on literature and art, along with sugar and salt. The change proposed is better than nothing. It will be of great advantage to our foreign-born population."

STATUARY AND PAINTING.

Mr. E. D. Palmer, the sculptor, said in regard to the abolition of the duty on foreign statuary and painting: "We should have no tax on art; it should be as free as air. If the duty is removed it will be of immense advantage to American art, and, so far as I know, all artists favor it. Americans studying abroad are treated with great courtesy, and receive every encouragement, but when a foreign artist thinks of obtaining recognition here, he finds that his pictures are practically excluded from American homes on account of the almost prohibitory duty which he must pay before he can bring them here."

Artist C. M. Lang said: "The removal of the duty on works of art would be an educational advantage to the country. It would enable people more generally to gratify a love for art, and nearly every home would stand some chance of possessing fairly good pictures without doing injury to home talent; for the more pictures and statuary people buy," he said, "the more they want, and, as they can afford it, the better they will have. I believe artists, almost without exception, favor the removal of the duty."

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will quote from a letter written by Mr. Tilden to the Iroquois Club in 1882:

The Government can never be restored and reformed except from inside, and by the active, intelligent agency of the Executive. We must hope that Providence will, in its own good time, raise up a man adapted and qualified for the wise execution of this great work, and that the people will put him in possession of the executive administration, through which alone that noble mission can be accomplished, and the health and life of our political system be preserved and invigorated.

These words were surely prophetic. In President Cleveland a man adapted and qualified has been found, and the message he so boldly addressed to Congress has given an impetus to this most important work of tariff reform that will cause it to be accomplished. [Applause.]

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in the opening argument against this bill says, among other things, that—

The gentlemen who framed this bill, and who would brook neither modification or discussion of its provisions by their associates on the committee to which the preparation of revenue bills are confided by law, are, with two exceptions, representatives of what was slave territory.

A little further on the gentleman quotes the French maxim:

The Bourbons neither learn nor forget.

He afterwards goes on to say:

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the bill is an anachronism. It has no relation to this era; it belongs to the saddest epoch in our history, the period between 1824 and 1861.

The gentleman then proceeds to talk about slavery, nullification, and the war, quoting from the pro-slavery writings of Dr. A. T. Bledsoe, Senator Hammond, of South Carolina, and others. It is very apparent, Mr. Chairman, that a considerable number of the gentleman's party associates in this House and in the country are in hearty sympathy with the spirit and purpose of the gentleman, as indicated by the remarks which I have quoted.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] have closely imitated the course of argument pursued by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

As a Southern man, and one whose ancestors were guilty of the great political sins of slave-holding, nullification, and secession, I desire in a spirit of kindness and courtesy to the gentlemen who have indulged in this line of remarks to submit a few observations in reply. And if it should be thought that these remarks have no direct bearing on the question under consideration it will scarcely be denied that they are at least in the nature of a reply to the arguments, or rather to the suggestions of the gentlemen to whom I have referred.

Now, sir, I have no apologies or explanations to make for these alleged sins of my people; nor do I deprecate the wrath of those who so constantly denounce those sins and who so diligently "nurse their wrath to keep it warm." I desire to address those who wish to look at this question in a broad, rational, practical spirit. And what I have to say, Mr. Chairman, is simply this: The war closed almost a quarter of a century ago. It has always been supposed, in the South at least, that with the close of the war the questions of slavery, nullification, and secession had been forever and conclusively disposed of. The great controversies over these questions, which had agitated the country for more than thirty years, were finally submitted to the arbitrament of the sword.

From the decision then rendered no appeal could be taken. The Constitution of the United States was so amended as to prevent the possibility of future differences in regard to any of these questions, and they all at once passed from the domain of practical politics into the domain of history. To the historian these are indeed questions of great and even of tragic interest. To the practical statesman, seeking the good of his country, they are simply dead issues. No one now contends that a State has the right to nullify any Federal law whatever. No one contends that slavery should be re-established. No one contends that a State can, on any pretext whatever, secede from the Union. All of these questions are forever closed by the express provisions of the Constitution, ratified and sustained by the unanimous sentiment of the entire country. But a quarter of a century after all these issues have been thus settled they are made to do service in a debate on the reduction of the tariff.

The idea of those who dig up these dead issues from their blood-stained graves seems, when stripped of all courteous disguise and diplomatic indirection, to be this: Here are a number of people who desire a reform of the tariff. A large proportion of these tariff reformers are from the South. These Southern people, or at any rate their ancestors and predecessors, both immediate and remote, were neither wise nor patriotic, for they believed in and practiced slave-holding, nullification, and secession. How, then, can you, the people of the United States, respect the opinions or the arguments of such a people? They are by nature, inheritance, and education wrong-headed and ill-equipped for the proper consideration of any important political question, and the very fact that they favor any given policy is sufficient of itself to condemn that policy. Thus at the very opening of a debate which should be characterized by moderation and a spirit of conciliation an attempt is made to enlist under the banners of a high protective tariff the prejudices of mankind. "These prejudices," it has been well said, "like Swiss troops, may be engaged in any cause and are prepared to serve under any leader."

In this contest they have not only been enlisted under the banners of a high protective tariff, but they are put in the very forefront of the battle. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania at the very opening of the debate attempts to "fire the Northern heart" by saying in substance:

These tariff reformers are your old enemies. Here are the slave barons, the nullifiers, and the secessionists of the South again making war upon you and your property.

Mr. Chairman, I have already said that all these questions, as far as the South is concerned, are historical and not political questions.

In regard to slavery, it is safe to say that the verdict of impartial history will be that that institution as it existed in the United States was a great evil, and that its destruction, even by the untold expenditure of blood and treasure resulting from the war, was a great gain to every part of the country. But, sir, will history go further and say, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would seem to have us infer, that slave-holding is so essentially and unavoidably pernicious in its effects upon human character that it prevents those who practice it from being either wise or patriotic? Will it be forgotten, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and many of his associates seem to have forgotten, that Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Patrick Henry, and John Marshall were all slave-holders? I do not wish to underrate the many other great men of this country, nor do I wish to imitate the somewhat florid rhetoric of some of the gentlemen who seem so much concerned about slave-holding.

But, sir, I should like to ask what would this country have been without the slave-holders (or "slave-drivers," if gentlemen prefer), whom I have named? Whose eloquence would have aroused in a whole continent the spirit of resistance to British tyranny? Who would have written the Declaration of Independence? Who would have been the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army? Who would have been the leader and guide of the convention that framed the Constitution? Who, as Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, would have delivered that long line of immortal decisions which have converted that Constitution from a dead letter into a living spirit? These are questions for those who are always declaiming about "the barbarism of slave-holding" to answer at their leisure.

Now, sir, I repeat I am not defending slavery. I am not lamenting its downfall. I rejoice that it has been forever abolished. But when gentlemen, for the purpose of influencing the judgment of the country in regard to the merits of the tariff question, assert by implication or otherwise that slave-holding is incompatible with wisdom and patriotism, I say that the charge is shown to be absurdly untrue not only by the history of this country, but by all history, both ancient and modern. So much, sir, for slavery. And now, how does the case stand in regard to secession and nullification? These also, as I have already said, are historical and not political questions.

It is to their history that I propose to call attention very briefly. Now, although many educated people in this country, particularly in the Republican party, seem not to be aware of the fact, it is nevertheless true that no sketch, however slight, can be given of the secession question without having much to say of New England. It is very far from my purpose to say one unkind word in regard to New England. I have not one unkind feeling toward her or her people. Whatever her faults and errors have been, New England has a great history, and I, as an American, feel proud of her magnificent contributions to the cause of civilization and human progress. Much has been said in this debate of her great material wealth and prosperity, and of how much her money has contributed to the progress and development of the West.

Her material wealth is no doubt great, and much of it is doubtless now usefully employed in the development of less fortunate sections of the country. But of this wealth it may be said, and indeed it has been said, that it has resulted, in part, at least, from the unjust discriminations of our tariff laws. But New England is rich in wealth which is peculiarly her own, which is the product of her own soil and which at the same time belongs to us all and to the civilized world. She is rich in the heritage of great names; she is rich in the examples and the inspiration and works of her great statesmen and orators and philosophers and historians and poets and thinkers in almost every department of intellectual activity. To these immortal New Englanders all Americans, North, West, and South, high and low, rich and poor, in common with the civilized world, owe a mighty debt—

For noble lessons nobly taught,
For tears, for laughter, and for thought.

As an American I acknowledge the obligation with pride as well as gratitude, and trust and believe that the day is yet far distant when there will be any decline in her material prosperity or her intellectual and moral fertility and vigor.

But, sir, New England, loyal, Union-loving, cultivated, progressive New England, is the very birth-place and nursery of the much hated and much abused doctrine of secession. That doctrine assumed threatening proportions in New England long before it was even dreamed of in South Carolina. As early as 1804 New England statesmen conceived that the interest of that part of the country could be better taken care of out of the Union than in it, and they began to plan schemes of secession and to dream and to speculate about the advantages of an "Eastern Confederacy," including Canada on the one side and the States of New York and New Jersey on the other.

In 1811 Josiah Quincy, one of the most gifted men of his day, and a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, boldly proclaimed the doctrine of secession on the floor of this House. It is not necessary to say anything in regard to the mysterious proceedings and purposes of the celebrated Hartford Convention, but it will scarcely be denied by candid men that it was to all intents and purposes a secession convention.

The facts to which I have referred are all familiar to the students of our history, and are all described with more or less detail in the very able and impartial "History of the United States Under the Constitution," by James Shouler, himself an illustrious living example of New England ability, industry, and culture.

But, although the testimony of Mr. Shouler, as a New Englander, ought, it seems, to be conclusive, it may be said (I do not know his politics) that he is a Democrat, or at any rate that he is a Mugwump. In order, therefore, to satisfy the demands of the most ardent and "truly loyal" Republican I beg to cite the testimony of another living and accomplished New Englander, Mr. HENRY CABOT LODGE, now a member of this House. According to the testimony of so unimpeachable an authority as Mr. LODGE both Washington and Hamilton believed in the right of secession. Indeed, according to Mr. LODGE, there can be no doubt whatever that under the Constitution as ratified in 1789 any State had the right peaceably to withdraw from the Union.

According to the same high authority, this constitutional right was lost in a very peculiar and extraordinary way, namely, because the majority of the people got under the erroneous impression that such a right did not exist. I shall not pause to discuss this somewhat novel and dangerous doctrine of the manner in which a constitutional right can be lost, but let Mr. LODGE speak for himself in regard to the whole matter. In the "Life of Daniel Webster," "American Statesmen Series," by HENRY CABOT LODGE, page 176, Mr. LODGE, speaking of the great debate between Hayne and Webster, says:

The weak places in his armor (Webster's) were historical in their nature. It was probably necessary, at all events Mr. Webster felt it to be so, to argue that the Constitution at the outset was not a compact between the States, but a national instrument, and to distinguish the cases of Virginia and Kentucky in 1799, and of New England in 1814 from that of South Carolina in 1830. The former point he touched upon lightly; the latter he discussed ably, eloquently, ingeniously, and at length. Unfortunately the facts were against him in both instances. When the Constitution was adopted by the votes of States at Philadelphia, and accepted by the votes of States in popular conventions, it was safe to say there was not a man in the country, from Washington and Hamilton on the one side to George Clinton and George Mason on the other, who regarded the new system as anything but an experiment entered upon by the States and from which each and every State had the right to peaceably withdraw, a right which was very likely to be exercised. When the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions appeared they were not opposed on constitutional grounds, but upon those of expediency and of hostility to the Revolution, which they were considered to embody.

Mr. LODGE further says, page 177:

What is true of 1799 is true of the New England leaders at Washington when they discussed the feasibility of secession in 1804; of the declaration of secession made by Josiah Quincy in Congress a few years later; of the resistance of New England during the war of 1812, and of the right of "interposition" set forth by the Hartford Convention. In all these instances no one troubled himself about the constitutional aspect. It was a question of expediency, of moral and political right or wrong. In every case the right was simply stated, and the uniform answer was, such a step means the overthrow of the present system.

On page 216 Mr. LODGE, speaking of the debate between Calhoun and Webster, says:

In a general way the same criticism is applicable to this debate as to that with Hayne, but there were some important differences. Mr. Calhoun's argument was superior to that of his follower. It was dry and hard, but it was a splendid specimen of close and ingenious reasoning, and, as was to be expected, the originator and master surpassed the imitator and pupil. Mr. Webster's speech, on the other hand, in respect to eloquence, was decidedly inferior to the masterpiece of 1830. Mr. Curtis says: "Perhaps there is no speech ever made by Mr. Webster that is so close in its reasoning, so compact, and so powerful." To the first two qualities we can readily assent, but that it was equally powerful may be doubted. So long as Mr. Webster confined himself to defending the Constitution as it actually was and what it had come to mean in point of fact, he was invincible. Just in proportion as he left this ground and attempted to argue on historical premises that it was a fundamental law he weakened his position, for the historical facts were against him.

In the reply to Hayne he touched but slightly on the historical, legal, and theoretical aspects of the case, and he was overwhelming. In the reply to Calhoun he devoted his strength chiefly to these topics, and, meeting his keen antagonist on the latter's own chosen ground, he put himself at a disadvantage. In the actual present and in the steady course of development, the facts were wholly with Mr. Webster. Whatever the people of the United States understood the Constitution to mean in 1789, there can be no question that a majority in 1833 regarded it as fundamental law, and not as a compact—an opinion which has now become universal. But it was quite another thing to argue that what the Constitution had come to mean was what it meant when it was adopted. The identity of meaning at these two periods was the proposition which Mr. Webster undertook to maintain, and he upheld it as well and as plausibly as the nature of the case admitted. His reasoning was close and vigorous; but he could not destroy the theory of the Constitution as held by the leaders and people in 1789, or reconcile the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of the Hartford Convention with the fundamental law doctrines.

Nevertheless it would be an error to suppose that because the facts of history were against Mr. Webster in these particulars this able and ingenious argument was thrown away. It was a fitting supplement and complement to the reply to Hayne. It reiterated the national principles and furnished those whom the statement and demonstration of an existing could not satisfy with an immense magazine of lucid reasoning and plausible and effective arguments. The reply to Hayne gave magnificent expression to the popular feeling, while that to Calhoun supplied the arguments which, after years of discussion, converted that feeling into a fixed opinion and made it strong enough to carry the North through four years of civil war.

It thus appears that the result of Mr. LODGE's careful examination of the celebrated controversy with Hayne and Calhoun, which won Webster the title of "The Great Expounder of the Constitution," briefly stated is, this: Webster utterly failed to establish the proposition for which he contended, namely, that the Constitution was intended by its framers to create, and as ratified did in fact create, a National Government and a Union of States from which no State had the right to withdraw.

On this point (which was the point of the controversy) the facts were all against Webster, and, able and eloquent as he was, he necessarily failed. The Constitution as framed and ratified was in fact a mere compact between sovereign States, from which any State had the right at any time peaceably to withdraw. But by 1833 the majority of the people of the United States "had come to think" differently about the Constitution from what the framers thought.

The majority "had come to think" that the Constitution was "a fundamental law" and that it had created an indissoluble Union. Mr. Webster fell into this popular error, or at any rate pretended to do so, and defended and supported it with such marvelous ability and eloquence as greatly strengthened the sentiment and the argument in favor of the error. The result was an irresistible growth of the national sentiment which when secession came saved the Union at the cost of a bloody civil war.

Now, sir, there can be no doubt that Mr. LODGE is a truthful historian. His statement of facts in regard to the nullification and secession controversies are in entire accord with well-established history. The only difference between Mr. LODGE and the statesmen of the South who maintained the right of secession is on a point of constitutional law. According to Mr. LODGE, when a majority of the people of the United States come to entertain an erroneous view about the Constitution of the United States that erroneous view immediately gets to be the correct view; and it is then both illegal and very wicked for the minority to insist on what was once the correct view, particularly if a great statesman has made a very able and very eloquent argument in favor of the erroneous view.

Inasmuch as the "Great Expounder" himself does not even hint at the point which his biographer makes, either in his speech against Hayne or in that against Calhoun, it may well be doubted whether, if living, he would accept this somewhat new and original view in regard to the manner of changing constitutions. Still there can be no doubt that Mr. LODGE is entitled to the gratitude of all the "truly loyal" for the exceedingly original and ingenious argument by which he proves that New England has been right all the time; right when she preached and threatened secession, and gloriously and everlastingly right when she made war upon the Southern States for practicing her precepts.

But, Mr. Chairman, I should not have made this excursion into the field of "ancient history" had it not been for the example set by the gentlemen on the other side of the House. If these gentlemen will read the history of their country, perhaps hereafter, when they undertake to denounce secession, they may so enlarge the scope of their denunciations as to include originators of that heresy as well as those who have suffered its worst consequences.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "this bill is an anachronism;" that "it has no relation to this era;" that "it belongs to the saddest epoch in our national history, the period between 1824 and 1861."

How is it, Mr. Chairman, in regard to all this talk about slavery and "slave-drivers," about nullification and "virus from the fangs of secession?" Has this a relation to the present era, or does it belong to the "saddest epoch of our national history, the period between 1824 and 1861?" I shall let an intelligent people answer these questions for themselves. But, Mr. Chairman, not only are the feelings and the sentiments of many of the gentlemen who oppose this bill the feelings and sentiments appropriate to a time long since passed, but their methods of investigation and of reasoning are those of a remote antiquity. Even those who generously disdain to appeal to the prejudices and passions engendered by the war have adopted a very antique system of logic.

Hear what the very able and eloquent gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] says in regard to the blessings of a protective tariff:

Henry Clay, speaking in the United States Senate of our industrial condition immediately preceding the tariff of 1824, declared:

"If I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution which exhibited a scene of the most widespread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff of 1824."

But this era of protection was followed by the tariff of 1824 and 1828 which enthused new life into our languishing industries and brought to the country a period of marvelous prosperity. The leading metropolitan journal epitomizes the history of this period as follows:

"So soon as the tariff of 1824 went into operation the whole aspect and course of affairs were changed. Activity took the place of sluggishness. Capital was invested; labor came into demand; wages advanced; mines were opened; furnaces built; mills started; shops multiplied; business revived in all its departments. Revenue flowed copiously into the coffers of the Government. The debts created by two expensive wars were entirely paid off. Such a scene of general prosperity had never before been seen by our people."

President Jackson said in his annual message December 4, 1832:

"Our country presents on every side marks of prosperity and happiness unequaled in any other portion of the world."

Mr. Clay, in speaking of this era of protection, said:

"If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824."

But unfortunately this era of protection and prosperity was followed by the compromise tariff of 1833, which provided for a gradual reduction of duties until they should reach an average of not to exceed 20 per cent. And what was the effect of this change of policy? Long before that limit had been reached the evidences of its pernicious influence were everywhere visible. Capital invested in industrial enterprises, to save itself from absolute destruction, was withdrawn. Contemplated expansion of business was abandoned, our manufacturers one after another went down under a torrent of foreign importations, while American labor stood idle and empty-handed in presence of the appalling and widespread desolation which culminated in the frightful panic of 1837. And not only the people but the Government itself became so impoverished that the President of the United States was forced into a broker's shop to raise his overdue and unpaid salary. In 1842 the protective system was again invoked, and under its salutary influence our drooping industries revived and prosperity took the place of disaster. The general effect upon the country of the tariff of 1842 is best described by President Polk in his annual message in 1846:

"Labor in all its branches is receiving an ample reward, while education, science, and the arts are rapidly enlarging the means of social happiness. The progress of our country in her career of greatness, not only in the vast extension of our territorial limits or in the rapid increase of our population, but in resources and wealth and in the happy condition of our people, is without an example in the history of nations."

But this brief period of prosperity was quickly followed by the revenue tariff of 1846 and 1857, which brought to the country another era of industrial depression, culminating in the panic of 1857, the disastrous consequences of which are still within the memory of living men. Universal bankruptcy overtook the people, and the Government with an empty Treasury was forced in times of peace to borrow money at a discount of from 12 to 30 per cent. Then came the era of protection in 1861, which has now been extended over a period of more than a quarter of a century, and who does not know that during these eventful years our industrial advancement has been steady and without a parallel in the history of the Republic?

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], on the 29th of February last, in discussing the bill to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury, used the following language:

The "iniquity" of protection! A system which lifted us out of bankruptcy at the close of the last Democratic Administration, when, for the sake of paying the salaries of the President and his Cabinet and other officers, a loan of $5,000,000 was authorized and was advertised for and was offered at rates ranging from 8 per cent. to 36 per cent. per annum; ranging up 8, 10, 12, 15, 18, 20, 24, 28, 36 per cent. per annum. The call was for $5,000,000. No foreign house offered to lend the United States a dollar, and the Administration could, in view of the excessive rates demanded, accept offers for but two out of the five millions. There is where free trade had landed the credit and the honor of the American people and nation.

In the next year came the beginning of the protective "iniquity," and now 3 per cent. is too high a rate of interest for us to pay, and a thousand million dollars is not too much for us to ask on a single loan. And what has wrought this wondrous change? The "iniquitous system of protection." [Applause on the Republican side.] The "iniquity" of protection! It emancipated four millions of slaves and has set hundreds of thousands of them at work, on or near the cotton-fields they cultivated as slaves, at a dollar or more a day in mechanical, mining, and manufacturing industries which that same "iniquity" is developing in all parts of the old slave States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

"The iniquity" of protection! Under your old free-trade, pro-slavery government we could not make a pound of crucible steel; we could not make a Bessemer rail; we could make but an average of but 800,000 tons of pig-iron a year. Why [addressing Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], God bless you, under the system of "iniquitous protection" the South in 1887 produced 80,000 tons of pig-iron more than the whole Union had produced in the average of the decade from 1854 to 1863 under free trade and the domination of slavery in the Halls of Congress. We are no longer dependent on foreign countries. We made in 1887 more than half the steel that was made on the face of God's foot-stool. More than half! [Applause on the Republican side.]

Even the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], "who is nothing if not logical," and who in the opening of his remarks tells us that "the President himself in his tariff message, and every gentleman who has spoken thus far in opposition to protection has coolly begged the vital point in issue between the friends and opponents of protection," uses the following language:

Mr. Chairman, look in whatever direction we may to the practical results of the protective policy in the United States in the last quarter of a century, and we find abundant evidence that it has promoted in the highest degree the prosperity of our people. By common consent the United States is pointed to everywhere as the most marvelous national growth recorded in history. [Applause.]

THE LESSON TO BE HEEDED.

Let this illustration of the disastrous effects of free trade in our foreign carrying trade warn us in time against trying the same experiment with other industries in this country.

It ought to be sufficient to deter us from hazardous experiments which look attractive in the figures of rhetoric, that under the protective policy which has prevailed for more than a quarter of a century the United States has grown so wonderfully in population, agriculture, manufactures, and all the elements which have to do with material prosperity, that even the most distinguished and most highly honored statesman of Great Britain—the peerless Gladstone—has spoken of her in debate in Parliament as the most marvelous and prosperous nation in Christendom. [Prolonged applause.]

These are indeed extraordinary statements and assumptions. But these gentlemen, in their serene complacency, do not dream that they "coolly beg the point in issue." With "a smile half pitying, half contemptuous," they tell us in effect that the marvelous progress of this country in wealth and population has not been due in any degree to the boundless extent and fertility of our soil, to the beneficence of our seasons, to the unparalleled richness and variety of our mineral resources, to the wonderful development of mechanical invention and labor-saving machinery, to the intelligence, industry, and thrift of our people, to the equality and justice of our laws. All these things count for nothing. A high protective tariff is the cause of all our progress. Bad seasons, unwise and excessive speculations, extravagant living, failure of markets, unwise monetary legislation, none of these bring adversity or misfortune.

A low tariff has been the cause of all the financial trouble we have ever had. These gentlemen might think it not altogether fair to ask them (though I can not very well see why) how it was that the Chicago fire and the Charleston earthquake both occurred during the existence of a high protective tariff, but surely some of them will not fail to explain the panic of 1873 and the great and growing discontent which has existed for so many years among our laboring classes.

It is a well-known fact, Mr. Chairman, that the fertility of ancient Egypt, with its consequent wealth and civilization, was due to the annual inundation of the river Nile. According to the authority of a distinguished historian the Egyptians attributed these inundations to the benign influence of the Dogstar, Sirius. Observing that just at that time of the year when that brilliant star showed itself above the horizon immediately in advance of the rising sun the Nile invariably began to swell, the Egyptians, mistaking the coincidence for a cause, attributed the rising of the river to the influence of the star.

As the inundations were due to the influence of the star and their material wealth and well-being were due to the inundations, of course the conclusion were that their prosperity and happiness was controlled and regulated by the star.

But—

Continues the historian—

a false inference like this soon dilated into a general doctrine, for as one star could in this way manifest control over the course of terrestrial affairs, why should not another—indeed, why should not all?

He further states that from this simple primary fact, namely, the coincidence of the rising of the star and the rising of the Nile, star-worship arose. An elaborate system of worship, with its creeds and priests and ceremonies, was evolved out of the assumption that the appearance of a star in a certain part of the heavens was the signal for the rising of a river.

Mr. Chairman, the appearance of the Dogstar above the Egyptian horizon and the annual inundations of the Nile are still coincident in point of time; Egypt is still made fertile by these inundations, but star-worship no longer exists. In the light of modern civilization and with the aid of modern methods of investigation, it has been demonstrated in innumerable instances that the most striking, constantly recurring, and invariable coincidence of events is not of itself sufficient to prove that these events stand related as cause and effect.

Egypt, therefore having found that even the remarkable coincidence of the rising star and the swelling river were not related as cause and effect, has abandoned her ancient and very simple logic. But what the Egyptian has cast off the American protectionist has taken up. If the logic of this modern American is in any respect different from that of the ancient Egyptian, it is only in this: The Egyptian, as far as we know, only connected phenomena together as cause and effect when they were invariably coincident. The Nile invariably rose upon the appearance of the star, and had done so through all the ages of the past. No such uniform coincidence of protection and prosperity can be found in the history of this or any other country.

But what the American lacks in facts and logic he makes up in faith and rhetoric. No ancient Egyptian ever ascribed his good or evil fortunes to the ascendancy or obscuration of his star with a more simple, touching, and childlike faith than does the American protectionist the prosperity or adversity of his country to a simple increase or decrease in the rate of the tariff. But, sir, the logic which leads him to this conclusion is "an anachronism; it has no relation to this era."

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct when he says that "this bill is an anachronism;" that "it has no relation to this era;" that it belongs to a past time, then, indeed, there is not the slightest possibility of enacting it into law; and if by any chance it should become a law, it will soon be wiped forever from the statute-book. Nothing is more certain than that under free government no law or institution which is "an anachronism," which "has no relation to this era," which is not in harmony with the spirit and tendencies of the age, can long survive. Nothing better illustrates the truth of this proposition than the history of slavery in the United States.

Slavery was intrenched behind the strong defenses of the Constitution. It was hedged around by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. It was explained and justified by the tongues and pens of statesmen as able and eloquent as ever pleaded for any cause. It was defended on the field of battle by the stout hearts and strong arms of soldiers of unsurpassed courage and constancy. But, sir, it perished.

It was "an anachronism." It had no relation to the era in which it existed. It belonged to the past, and could not stand against the irresistible forces of an utterly hostile civilization. As it was with slavery, so it was with secession. Secession was a political act which was contrary to the whole spirit and tendency of the age. It was an attempt to inaugurate a policy which ran exactly counter to the current of events and to the best interests and strongest aspirations not only of a great majority of the American people but of the whole civilized world. It was an attempt to separate, to divide, to disintegrate, in the midst of a civilization of which every interest, tendency, and aspiration was toward integration, union, and growth. Secession, when attempted by the South, was not, as Mr. LODGE endeavors to show, unconstitutional.

There was no law on the statute-book, either express or constructive, against secession. Secession was lawful. The Constitution of the United States was a mere compact between sovereign States. But as a distinguished historian has said:

There is a political force in ideas which silently renders protestations, promises, and guaranties, no matter in what good faith they may have been given, of no avail, and which makes constitutions obsolete.

Secession was "an anachronism;" it had no relation to this era, and it has forever perished.

Mr. Chairman, is not what the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania says of this bill true of a high protective tariff in the present age? Is it not "an anachronism?" The gentleman from West Virginia, in his very able and eloquent argument in favor of the passage of this bill, has shown how, with the progress and development of the wonderful mechanical developments of the present day for overcoming space, the so-called home market of Mr. Clay has disappeared; how the markets near by and the markets at a distance have gradually merged into one another and become one and the same market; how the whole world is in one sense one community and one market.

This is, indeed, the age in which all the physical barriers which nature interposes between men who occupy different parts of the earth's surface have been surmounted or broken down.

High mountains or deep and dangerous water-courses do not now, as in the past, divide men into distinct and sharply-defined commercial communities. Broad and stormy seas can not so separate them as to prevent the almost instant intercommunication of thought, and the safe and rapid interchange of commodities. The greatest distances may intervene between them without making them aliens and strangers. It may be said with almost literal accuracy that the railroad, the steamship, the telegraph, and the telephone have so united their wonder-working powers as to make every man a citizen of the world and a neighbor to all the inhabitants of the earth. They have placed within his reach the advantages of every climate, the fruits of every soil and the products of every industry.

In this age of steam and electricity, of "liberty, equality, and fraternity," a high protective tariff is "an anachronism;" it has no relation to the era; it belongs to the dull and lifeless epoch of separation and prejudice, of bounties and privileges for the favored few, and burdens for the toiling many. It is an attempt to antagonize and obstruct the march of progress. It is a device for building artificial barriers across the paths of commerce, which have been made smooth and easy by science and mechanical invention. It is a law to keep men in their primitive condition of isolation, prejudice, and weakness. It is so utterly at war with the best interests of the masses of the people, with all the tendencies of the times, all the aims, aspirations, and achievements of modern civilization that, however strong and skillful its friends may be, however they may for a while deceive the people by transparent sophistries and appeals to prejudice, they can not, I say, defend such "an anachronism" against the inevitable destruction and death which await it.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, the power and extent and the purposes for which taxation may be imposed have at all times met with jealous scrutiny. No power is so liable to abuse. Next to that of personal liberty the imposition of taxation more directly affects the interest of the citizen.

Well and faithfully has President Jackson declared in his farewell message:

There is perhaps no one of the powers conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power. The most productive and convenient sources of revenue were necessarily given to it, that it might be able to perform the important duties imposed upon it; and the taxes which it lays upon commerce being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the taxes imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity, which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets.

Congress has no right, under the Constitution, to take money from the people unless it is required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; and if they raise more than is necessary for such purposes it is an abuse of the power of taxation and unjust and oppressive. It may, indeed, happen that the revenue will sometimes exceed the amount anticipated when the taxes were laid. When, however, this is ascertained, it is easy to reduce them; and in such a case it is unquestionably the duty of the Government to reduce them, for no circumstances can justify it in assuming a power not given to it by the Constitution, nor in taking away the money of the people when it is not needed for the legitimate wants of the Government.

What a striking evidence of that abuse is now presented to the American people and to the world. What a prominent example of the excesses to which the Congress of the United States has gone in the exercise of the power of taxation. In the grand contest now waging between the taxing power and the people upon whom its burdens fall history but repeats itself. This contest has its birth in the inauguration of civil government; it has advanced with the steps and kept pace with the progress of civilized and enlightened institutions.

Our fathers rebelled at the unjust and oppressive burdens imposed by taxation from the (then) paternal Government of Great Britain, and the Revolution, which happily resulted in the maintenance, support, and growth of our democratic institutions, was but the necessary sequel of an oppressive system of taxation.

In the organization of this Federal Government, when it became necessary for the States to surrender certain of their powers for the formation of a more perfect Union, for the better protection and promotion of the whole, the question of levying and collecting imposts by the National Government was regarded by the able statesmen of this country of that period as the one of chief consideration and importance.

The high importance which they attached to this question is fully attested by the extended and able debates that it provoked at this early period of our country's history.

This power was conferred on the General Government with certain restrictions.

The language of the Constitution is:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this measure which affects the interests of all classes of the people, this measure that reaches further and wider than any with which we have to deal, this measure that affects the capitalist, the manufacturer, the farmer, the laborer, it is well that we should measure with cautious step, with cool, impassionate deliberation, the import, the meaning, and the extent of the power of the American Congress to levy and collect the revenues of the Government.

This power when exercised within the just limits of the Constitution, responding to the legitimate demands of the Government, will but infuse health and vigor in our system of government and carry content and satisfaction to its people. Transcend it, by the imposition of heavier burdens than are demanded; by discrimination in favor of certain classes to the detriment of others; by building up great industrial combinations and monopolies; by levying tribute on the hard-earned wages of the laboring poor and drawing on the meager profits of the farm, and it not only becomes obnoxious in the extreme, but threatens peril to the institutions it is exercised as a pretense to maintain.

How truly does the message of President Cleveland to the present Congress sound the spirit of the Constitution, and the inequalities and iniquities of our tariff system. This is the language of his message:

When we consider that the theory of our institutions guarantees to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise with only such deductions as may be his share towards the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is indefensible extortion and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice.

This wrong inflicted upon those who bear the burden of national taxation, like other wrongs, multiplies a brood of evil consequences. The public Treasury, which should only exist as a conduit conveying the people's tribute to its legitimate objects of expenditure, becomes a hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, threatening financial disturbance, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

Mr. Chairman, we are confronted, we are menaced already with those evils to which the message refers. Under the present system of taxation it is estimated that we will have on the 30th day of June next $140,000,000 in excess of the legitimate and ordinary expenses of the Government. The Treasury has already accumulated an immense surplus, drawn from the necessities of the people; drawn from the channels of trade and commerce. The exercise of the power of taxation by the representatives of the people, through which this vast amount of money has been needlessly locked up in the Treasury, is indeed enough to awaken their apprehension and arouse them to a sense of present duty.

That this tribute on the country is excessive—that it is indefensible—can not be denied. The other side of this Chamber, which have in previous Congresses opposed obstruction to tariff revision and reduction, will not have the effrontery to question the urgent propriety of reducing the revenues of the Government.

The conclusion of the minority report, submitted by the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, is couched in this language:

The minority regard this bill not as a revenue-reduction measure, but as a direct attempt to fasten upon this country the British policy of free foreign trade. So viewing it, their sense of obligation to the people and especially the working people employed in manufacture and agriculture in all sections of our common country, impel them to resist it with all their power. They will assist the majority in every effort to reduce the redundant income of the Government; but every effort at fiscal legislation which will destroy or enfeeble our industries, retard material development, or tend to reduce our labor to the standard of other countries will be met with the persistent and determined opposition of the minority represented in the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is the method by which they propose to reduce this redundant income, as they term it, consistent with the apparent motive and spirit of the report? Will our industrial enterprises be stimulated in a more restrictive interchange of commodities and higher priced materials? Will the condition of the laboring classes of this country be ameliorated by cheap tobacco and whisky with the necessaries of life coming to them with increased cost, resulting from the burdens of taxation? The statement of the proposition, sir, is a sufficent refutation of the fallacy of the position assumed by the other side on this question.

This appeal for cheap whisky, with the necessaries of life burdened with taxation, comes not from the laboring classes of this country. It is not in their interest. They would repudiate it. They do repudiate it. They will repudiate it in future. It is made in the interest of the monopolist, in the interest of combination, in the interest of the capitalist.

Instead of bringing relief to the laborer, it is only calculated to rivet still more those fetters with which the high protective policy has already bound him.

To remove the internal-revenue tax on whisky will give to the people in reduced price that which is unnecessary, hurtful, and demoralizing. It will at the same time compel the consumer to pay increased prices for the necessaries of life. Is this the policy of the party of protection? That party has so declared it. Yet it claims to be the friend and the advocate of labor. Can such policy advance either socially or financially the laboring classes of this country?

What assumption, what delusion, what mockery does such a policy proclaim in the name of labor!

The just indignation of this great class of our people (whose interest should ever be protected and guarded) should be aroused at this proposition made in the guise of their interest.

INCREASED WAGES NOT THE RESULT OF A HIGH TARIFF.

Mr. Chairman, the history of the protective system refutes the claim that protection has the effect of increasing wages. France and Germany have the protective system, and wages are lower there than in England, where free trade obtains.

Russia, with the highest protective system, amounting almost to prohibition, pays lower wages than either France, Germany, or England. Wages are higher in the United States in similar industries than in England, but, sir, is this due to protection?

Labor, like the commodities of the world, has its market value. This value is regulated by the supply and demand and by the productive capacity of the labor. The dense and overcrowded population of England, Germany, and France afford an oversupply of labor.

The supply is greater than the demand, and consequently labor is not paid so well as in the United States, where the reverse of this proposition is true.

Another important factor is to be considered, Mr. Chairman, relative to the question of wages.

This country has made a marvelous advance in mechanical appliances. It has outstripped the most advanced nations in Europe in mechanical appliances and labor-saving machinery, by which the productive capacity of our factories have been increased and manufactures have been cheapened.

In this country and in England the concentration of capital is the greatest in the world, and the productive capacity of labor is greatest.

It is estimated by an author of ability on this subject that the productive capacity per capita in England and in the United States is five times that of Italy, Spain, and Portugal, twelve times that of China and India, and that the income per capita is about thirteen times that of India and China, six times that of Italy, Spain, and Portugal, and more than twice that of the average on the European continent. The productive capacity of labor in our factories is estimated to be from one and a half to twice that of European labor.

As a striking illustration of the fact that high wages are due not to a protective tariff, but to the concentration of capital and the increased productive capacity resulting from improved machinery, look at the position which England occupies with reference to other European powers.

England stands pre-eminent over the other European powers in the concentration of wealth and capital, and in her improved machinery and mechanical appliances, giving her an increased productive capacity superior to any of them. England procures her raw material from every quarter of the globe, obtains supplies for her operatives in foreign countries, pays her labor better, undersells other countries in their own market, and this she does without any protection from a tariff.

If wages were regulated by the tariff duties, Mr. Chairman, then there should be some uniformity in the rates of wages paid in the different States of this Union in like industries.

I append herewith a table of annual wages, compiled by Mr. Nordhoff from the census reports of wages paid in the woolen and cotton industries of the different States:

The difference in wages in the same industries in different sections of the United States is well illustrated in the following returns of wages in the iron industries of different States, made under the census of 1880: Unskilled labor in blast-furnaces in Virginia, 82 cents per day; in Alabama, 98 cents; in Pennsylvania, $1.09, and in Missouri, $1.29. Skilled labor in iron rolling-mills in Alabama, $2.25 a day; in Massachusetts, $2.70; in Pennsylvania, $3.03; in Ohio, $3.87, and in Kentucky, $1.62. The yearly average wages in the aggregate iron industries of the different sections of the United States is reported as follows: Eastern States, $417; Western, $396; Pacific, $354; Southern, $304.

Mr. Nordhof compiled from the census reports the following tables of yearly earnings in the woolen and cotton industries in the States named:

Connecticut	$335	New York	$285
Maine	320	New Hampshire	280
Pennsylvania	300	Vermont	270
New Jersey	300	Indiana	230
Massachusetts	320	Ohio	196

In cotton industries they are as follows:

New Hampshire	$255	South Carolina	$190
Massachusetts	251	Maryland	188
Rhode Island	250	Georgia	180
Pennsylvania	250	Tennessee	160
Ohio	250	Alabama	160
Connecticut	242	Virginia	150
New York	281	North Carolina	135

From this table it will be seen that in those States where the concentration of capital and improvements in mechanical appliances and machinery are greatest, that the highest rate of wages is paid, thus carrying out the idea that high wages are due not to a protective tariff, but to concentration of capital and the increased productive capacity of the labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us compare the aggregate tariff rates of this and other countries. For this purpose I append the following table, compiled by Mr. Switzler, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 7, 1888.

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

From this table it will be seen that the total tariff rate of this country is wondrously high when compared with that of other countries.

According to this table the total tariff rate of the United States is more than double that of Russia. It is equal to that of Great Britain, France, the German Empire, and Austria-Hungary combined. When we shall have revised and reduced our tariff rates as proposed by the pending bill we will then have a tariff in excess of the countries which I have named—in excess of France, Italy, or Germany.

Whilst these countries are protective, their tariffs have been formulated more on the needs and requirements of the government.

It has remained for the United States to foster and maintain a system of taxation, a tariff exceeding in its percentage of duty on free and dutiable merchandise any other government, and amassing in its treasury for a favored class a surplus unexampled in the financial history of the world.

But let us recur to the question of wages. Is the theory of the protectionist (for it is a mere theory) correct that protection favors increased wages? Is the laboring class the beneficiary of a high protective tariff? The assertion is undoubtedly true that the employer by reason of protection is enabled to pay higher wages to labor. But are increased wages the result of protection?

In 1850 the average yearly wage per hand of employés in manufacturing establishments was $247. In 1860 this average had increased to $288, an increase of 16.6 per cent. in ten years.

In 1880 the average wage was $346, an increase of 20 per cent. in twenty years. The increase of wages therefore in the twenty years of high tariff has been less proportionately than the increase during the ten years when we had a low tariff. Does this consist with the assumption that a high tariff increases wages; that a low tariff has the effect of diminishing wages?

The increase, Mr. Chairman, under the low and high tariff have been due to one and the same cause—to the increased capacity of production resulting from improved mechanical appliances.

Is labor the beneficiary of protection or does its benefits inure to the manufacturer? Does the manufacturer who is posing as the advocate of the laborer and who seems to be advocating the protective system in the interest of labor give him the benefit of that protection?

I desire to refer to a tabulated statement furnished from the Bureau of Statistics, which will throw some light on this subject:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, January 25, 1888.

WM. F. SWITZLER, Chief of Bureau.

This table contains the leading articles in the principal manufacturing schedules, and exemplifies some of the operations of the tariff. Comparing the wage per cent. with the ad valorem rate of duty on similar articles of foreign manufacture and we see that the per cent. of tariff duty is from one and a half to four times as great as the per cent. of wages expended in the manufacture of the home product.

Now, as the duty on the foreign article is added to the price of the corresponding domestic product when sold to our people, the manufacturer receives from one and a half to four times as much as the laborer from these tariff duties.

Take the item of woolen and worsted goods—wages, 16.23 per cent.; tariff duty, 67.21 per cent.

A lot of woolen and worsted cloth of the first cost of $100 would represent for the wages paid out in its manufacture $16.23, while the tariff duties on the foreign article would enable the owner to sell the domestic product at $167.23, and so on through the list.

The laborer, who receives but a small proportion of the tariff rates, is compelled to return it to the manufacturer in the increased cost of the necessaries of life.

This illustrates for whose benefit the protective system operates. Not for the laborer, but for the manufacturer.

MANUFACTURES.

Mr. Chairman, let us now briefly review the history of our manufactures during the low and high tariff period of this country. Let that history respond to the charge that an abatement of our present high duties is at war with our manufacturing interest. In 1850 the capital employed in our manufacturing industries amounted to $533,245,351. In 1860 this capital had increased to $1,009,855,715, an increase in the ten years of low tariff of 89.37 per cent. From 1860 to 1880, a period of twenty years of high tariff, this capital had increased to $2,790,272,606, an increase of 176.34 per cent., something less proportionately than the increase during the ten years of low tariff.

In 1850 and 1860, during the low-tariff period, 54.5 per cent. and 54.8 per cent., respectively, of the value of manufactured products were devoted to the payment for raw material. In 1870 and 1880, the high-tariff years, 58.8 per cent. and 63.2 per cent., respectively, of manufactured products were expended for raw materials, taking away from the wages of labor on one hand and the profits of the manufacturer on the other.

Thus we see that the increase of our manufacturing interest on the one hand during the low-tariff period has been proportionately less than during the high-tariff period. On the other hand, that during the high-tariff period the manufacturer has been compelled to expend a larger proportion of his manufactured product for the payment of his raw material.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the policy of the Democratic party to impair or to overthrow the manufacturing interest of this country, but to maintain in healthful vigor, to build up and expand this great interest.

What is desired is a reduction in the prices of the necessary articles by removing the present obnoxious duties, thereby giving to the poor man and to the consumer that which is necessary to their wants and comfort by giving to labor more employment, and by putting into active, increased, and profitable operation the manufacturing industries of the country, and by giving to our merchant marine a tonnage that will rival the merchant marine of the world.

In 1884 the total tonnage of American vessels was 264,722,452, whilst that of foreign vessels amounted to 1,194,118,585, the percentage carried in American vessels being 16.4 per cent. In 1885 and 1886 this percentage was 16 per cent. against an average of over 70 per cent. from 1850 to 1860, the low-tariff period. If the high-tariff party of this country are endeavoring in good faith to provide for the laboring classes, that party can take no better or more successful step than to build up our marine carrying trade, which has wofully declined under the system of high protection.

DUTY TO THE FARMER.

Mr. Chairman, the interest of the industrial classes and of industrial labor is not alone to be considered in the discussion of this question. There is in this country, not confined to any particular section of the Union, but distributed through the States North, South, East, and West, a large, intelligent, and honorable class of citizens whose interest we can not ignore. The very sinew and hope of the Republic! Toilers in the field, and on the farm; industrious, honorable, and loyal, the products of whose labor constitute the basis of the support and prosperity of our common country. May we not close our eyes to the interest of this class; may we not be unmindful of this great industry of our country; may we consider well and wisely the interest of the farmer!

In the President's message, submitted to this Congress last December, we have the following declaration, based upon the census of 1880:

By the last census it is made to appear that of the 17,392,099 of our population engaged in all kinds of industries, 7,670,493 are employed in agriculture, 4,074,238 in professional and personal service (2,934,876 of whom are domestic servants and laborers), while 1,810,256 are employed in trade and transportation, and 3,837,112 are classed as employed in manufacturing and mining.

For present purposes, however, the last number given should be considerably reduced. Without attempting to enumerate all, it will be conceded that there should be deducted from those which it includes 375,143 carpenters and joiners, 285,401 milliners, dressmakers, and seamtresses, 172,726 blacksmiths, 133,756 tailors and tailoresses, 102,473 masons, 76,241 butchers, 41,309 bakers, 22,083 plasterers, and 4,891 engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, amounting in the aggregate to 1,214,023, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

Now, there are less than 3,000,000 of persons engaged in manufacturing industries, when there are over 14,000,000 engaged in other industries. Over 7,000,000 are engaged in agriculture. If it be true that a high tariff benefits the laborers and the manufacturing interest, is it right, is it just that the 60,000,000 of people not engaged in this industry should be taxed beyond the needs and requirements of the Government that the laborers (less than 3,000,000) engaged in manufacturing interest should be paid higher wages?

Should the 7,000,000 of farmers be compelled to devote the fruits of their labor in paying increased prices for the necessaries of life, that the laborer may be paid high wages? Such a proposition is revolting to the spirit of our institutions. Such a proposition is directly opposed to American fairness and justice. Such a proposition is at war with the highest interest and duty of this Government.

It is a fact well known, drawn from the statistics of the farm, that the values of farm property have increased less proportionately during the high-tariff than during the low-tariff period. It is equally true that the incumbrances on farm property from 1860 to 1880 (the high-tariff period) has almost equaled the increased value of this property during that period.

What, then, has become of the profits of this great industry of the country? They have been absorbed in high prices resulting from high duties. They have gone to the protected industries.

The protectionists claim that the country has advanced and prospered under the high tariff. So the country prospered under a low tariff. This prosperity, however, has not been the result of the tariff. We were prosperous under the low tariff of 1846. Other causes have contributed to advance us. What country on the face of the globe enjoys greater natural advantages? How inexhaustible its natural resources of wealth! What country yields more abundance to ordinary toil? What country presents a greater variety of soil, climate, vegetable and mineral wealth?

Our territory, extending from ocean to ocean and from the great lakes to the sea, offers a promising field for labor, for capital, and all industrial pursuits. It offers abundant returns to toil and wealth, to thrift and industry. The earth beneath us heaves with rich mineral ores. The heavens above us smile on the vegetable products of every clime and country. Such a country would advance and prosper, and has advanced despite the burdens imposed by a high tariff.

But, sir, let us pass this measure of tariff reform, this measure to which the Democratic party stands pledged, we remove from the country the unjust and unnecessary burdens with which it is now taxed, and we vindicate the integrity of our institutions. We give to the world an example of the fairness and justice of our laws, we command confidence at home and abroad, and we move another step towards that grand and glorious destiny in store for the "Great Republic." [Applause.]

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, more than sixty millions of people are watching with intense anxiety the proceedings of this House on the measure now under consideration. The mechanic, the laborer, the blacksmith, the farmer, and the others engaged in useful occupations have paused in their labor to see if the promises made to them at the polls are to be again broken. The rich and the opulent, the owner of bonds and stock, the railroad magnate, the coal lords of Pennsylvania, and the merchant princes of Massachusetts have also halted, and are watching anxiously these proceedings to see if they will still be permitted by the action of the House to rob labor of its just reward and to oppress their fellows in order to enrich themselves. I love my country, the whole country, North, South, East, and West, with a fervent, impassionate love, but to-day I wish to speak as a Western man, and for the great Northwest. For a quarter of a century the West has been the hewer of wood and the drawer of water of this nation. We have paid more than our full share of the national burden and have received little or nothing in return.

In the nation's sorest hour of need the sons of the great prairie State of Illinois rushed to the rescue, and more than 250,000 of them imperiled their lives in its defense. Nor have we been wanting in the payment of our just proportion of the national debt; but as a matter of fact, under the unjust laws made by the party in power in this Government, we have paid more than double our portion of the national debt and nearly one-half the debt yet remains to be paid. Under the pretense of making laws for the payment of the national debt and to pay the current expenses of the Government one section of the country has been robbed to enrich the other section. We have no ill-will to Massachusetts or Pennsylvania or any other State in the sisterhood of States, but we think that the time has arrived when the unjust legislation in favor of certain sections should be stopped. The great agricultural and labor interests of the country demand a readjustment of the laws of the country, so that the burdens of the Government will fall more justly on all the people.

The country is under an excessive tax system, devised by the Republican party twenty-five years ago, and the supreme question of the hour is whether this system which extorts from the people nearly $100,000,000 a year more than the Government has any use for shall be changed or still maintained. The manufacturers, mortgage holders, and money lenders of the wealthy industrial States insist in maintaining it, for they are further enriched by it; but the hard-pressed farmer of the West demands that the taxes be reduced. Whose will will be obeyed? Nor is it, as President Cleveland has well said, a question of protection and free trade. The Government should and must have money enough to pay its necessary expenses. All beyond this is robbery of the people.

When the Government by excessive exactions takes from the people $50,000,000 per annum which it has no use for and keeps up this robbery from year to year, it becomes insupportable. A hundred million of idle money in the Treasury means that much money taken from the channels of business; it means contraction of circulation; it means $8 taken from every head of a family in the land. But, Mr. Chairman, grant for the sake of the argument that the supreme question is one of protection and free trade. Can there be a doubt which is in accord with the laws of nature and good conscience? Protection is forever a delusion and a snare. It denies the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. It lays an embargo on sunlight, water, and air. It is a perversion of the laws of nature. God certainly intended that the products of the fertile Northern soil should be given in exchange for the fruits of the tropical Southern clime without restraint of law. So thoroughly did our forefathers believe in this doctrine that by solemn constitutional enactment they provided that no import duty should be allowed between the States. As between the States there is absolute free trade, but beyond that it is said we can not go.

Our physical wants are endless and full of variety; but the differences of soil, climate, and the productions of the earth are also endless and to a great extent meet our varied wants. By the assistance of railroads the inhabitants of the Middle States eat for their breakfast the fresh fruits from the orange orchards of Florida and the luscious grapes from California, and in exchange for these he gives the product of his farm, and this without tax or tariff to the Government. But if, perchance, the farmer should wish to exchange the products of his farm for the blankets manufactured in England, this he is forbidden to do under the penalty of from 75 to 104 per cent. The Jewish law was that a Jew could not exact usury or interest from a Jew, but he could from a stranger; but the Blessed Master repealed this law by declaring that "You should do unto others as you would have others do unto you;" and who could be bigoted enough to believe that America is the whole world and that the entire race of mankind has not the right to subsist?

Protection has its origin in the selfishness of our natures and not in the general good. Civilization diversifies wants, and each man in a civilized country pursues his own bent and makes what he can make best, and then exchanges the fruits of his labor with others. And as men become more skilled exchange still increases. The Indian was content to eat the meat of the buffaloes he had killed and to use their skin as his only house and clothing. But with civilization commerce springs up, and the field of supply and demand becomes as broad as the world. Under its natural laws all things work best and yield the greatest good to the human family. With a reverend regard for the rights of all mankind we must study the tariff question. It will be admitted on every side that we are a great and prosperous people, the like of which never before inhabited this earth; and it is mete and proper that the economic policy of this Government should keep pace with its intellectual and moral advancement. What was right a quarter or a half century ago may or may not be right now. That will depend altogether on the environments by which it is surrounded.

What we want now is a fair and candid consideration of the question at issue with all the light that we can have before us, and to arrive at the best possible conclusion, and then, having the courage of our convictions, to act upon it. It is, to a great extent, an economic question, and to that extent affects every man, woman, and child in the land. Our farmers and laboring people work early and late, from early morn to dewy eve, and for what? There can be but one answer—money. Money is the reward of labor, and it sweetens toil. It is absolutely true, as President Cleveland stated in his message, that—

> Our institutions guaranty to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise with only such deductions as may be his share toward the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him.

One of the grievances mentioned in the Declaration of Independence by the fathers was "for imposing taxes on us without our consent." More than a hundred years ago this was regarded as a grievous burden, but in the enlightened nineteenth century the people are not only taxed without their consent, but are actually taxed more than is necessary to meet the expenses of the Government. Another grievance mentioned in the Declaration of Independence was that the British Government "had cut off our trade with all other parts of the world." This we are doing now ourselves by our infamous tariff-taxing system, and we are still asked to keep it in force. It was declared in the Democratic platform at Chicago in 1884 that "unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation," and it further declares—

> That Federal taxation should be exclusively for public purposes, and should not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered.

The Republican party, in the same year and place, in its platform pledged itself "to correct the inequality of the tariff," but it failed to go into details on this important question. It is admitted, then, by both the great parties of the country that there is an inequality of the tariff. How is this, and who is responsible for it? Which party enacted this tariff of "inequality," and which party is now most ready to correct this inequality? It was certainly the Republican party which enacted this inequitable tariff, and as yet it has taken no decided steps to correct its errors. The President properly ignored all other questions in his annual message to Congress and alone presented the question of the reduction of the public revenue, for which he is entitled to the thanks of the American people. It is the momentous question of the hour and to it Congress should at once address itself. As he well says in substance, this is not a question of free trade or protection, but one of common honesty. Why should the people be taxed more than is necessary to defray the expenses of the Government? This has been called by us public robbery under the form of law. We are authorized to so call it by the Supreme Court of the United States, a "Republican court." In the case of The Loan Association vs. Topeka, 20 Wallace, the court says:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprise and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

It will be an admitted fact that as long as the Government exists there will be taxes. There is no escaping them. But no good citizen will complain of this, for the Government that protects him must be supported. Then the sole and only question that is left is, where shall this tax or revenue be placed? How shall the expenses of the Government be raised? The late Democratic platform clearly defines this: "Taxes should be heaviest on articles of luxury and bear lightest on articles of necessity."

This is the solution of the whole matter. But I admit that in the adjustment of this tariff there is great latitude for argument, for it is a subject on which able and learned men have written volumes without at all exhausting it. It is the momentous question of political economy. It is the duty of every citizen, then, to fairly and candidly consider the question in the best light in which it can be reviewed, and if the proper system is to levy a tax for protection only, then he should have the courage of his convictions and act and vote with the Republican party. But if on the other hand he should think that the proper system is to levy a tax for the purposes of defraying the expenses of the Government, economically administered, with such incidental protection as that system may afford, then he should vote and act with the Democratic party. The lines are well drawn, and the difference between the two parties is thoroughly defined on this question. The President's message is the bugle-note, and millions of free-born American citizens are rallying to its support.

The false god of protection has sufficiently deceived the people already, and in one mighty effort they will arise in their strength and cast her off once and forever. The bugle note has sounded; the President has come to the rescue, with a courage unprecedented, with an intellect unclouded, and with a single stroke of his pen has cleared the way to reform and advanced the thought of the age at least a half century. The nation is still reading the message, and not only this nation, but the nations of the world. Its words foreshowed victory to his party and the country. The period of agitation, to some extent, has passed, and we are in the living presence of true progress and reform. The friends of reform have for some years sought by agitation to direct the interest of thinking men to the evils of protection and its taxing system, full of inequality and false pretensions. They have succeeded at last in reaching the ear of the nation, and now they are prepared to apply definite measures of reform to the iniquitous system which has for so long a time robbed some of our people of the just reward of their labor. No revolution is contemplated, but they propose at one and the same time to reduce taxation and revenue without materially disturbing the industries of the country.

The great question of the day is one of tariff and reform. A large surplus accumulated by unjust and unnecessary taxation has alarmed all honest classes of the community, and the warning in the message will be heard and obeyed by a grateful public. The people have been asking in piteous tones in the last decade, Why this unnecessary taxation, burdening the people beyond the wants of the Government; and the reason is to be found in the message, That the few might prosper while masses suffer. The note is sounded by the President, and a brave and generous people will give heed to the clarion call; and when we hear from the ides of November he will be indorsed as no other President was ever indorsed in this free land of ours. The greatest boast of our country is her freedom. We have free speech, free press, free soil, free thought, free religion, and our trade should be as free as possible. Freedom is a natural right. Free trade is the natural right of commerce. It makes the total amount of human labor much more productive, and thereby shortens the hours of labor, blesses the earth with plenty, peace, and good-will. Protection is forever a cheat and delusion. Its origin in this country was in the wants of the revenue of the Government in times of war, and the selfishness of a favored class desire to fasten it on the toiling masses forever.

Protection for protection sake is a violation of our Constitution; it is a violation of the spirit of our Government, and is not American. No authority can be found in the Constitution to lay a tax for protection only. The Constitution authorizes the laying of taxes to defray the expenses of the Government, but beyond that it does not go, and every person who insists on a tariff for protection only violates the Constitution of his country.

The fundamental principle of American institutions is "the greatest good to the greatest number." Under our system of government protection of one interest is a war on all other interests. It must be so in the very order of things. The imposition of a heavy tariff upon a particular article of manufacture is not protection to the people. It must be a protection to that particular article, but at the cost of all other articles. The President is absolutely correct when he says that all the expense of the tariff is payed by the consumer, the criticisms of politicians and certain newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding. Protection is a bounty to persons who manufacture goods, to be paid by the consumer, and if the consumers are more numerous than the manufacturers, which is always the case, then the fundamental principles of our Government are violated.

The Government is not administered for the greatest good to the greatest number, but for the greatest good to the least number and the least good to the greatest number. Again, it is not the policy of our Government to confer special privileges upon any class of men, and this protection always does, in the very nature of things. The theory of the Government is that of individual development and manhood, leaving each man to work out his destiny. All that the Government should do is to leave each man equal before the law and protect him in his person and the fruit of his labor. The Government should not protect the interest of one man at the cost of another man's interest, but should afford them both police protection, and thus accomplish the true end of its creation. Protection is not right; for if you protect one interest, that simply means war on all other interests. The imposition of a heavy tariff upon particular articles of manufacture is not protection. No, it is not. It is a burden rather than a protection. It is a burden upon all those who use or consume such articles. If you pay a bounty to the party who manufactures them, that bounty must be paid by the party who consumes the article, and the consumers being more numerous than the manufacturers, in the very nature of things it is a violation of our fundamental principles of government.

Our Government should leave each man and each class of men to be the architects of their own fortunes. We may reason about it as we please, protection to any manufacturing interest means simply such laws as enable the manufacturer to sell his manufactured articles for a higher price than he otherwise could obtain, and the necessary result of that is that the consumer is compelled to pay more than he would if there was no such law. If this is not the result of protection then it has no meaning. If protection does not enable the manufacturer to sell his manufactured articles for more than he would otherwise get for such articles what is the necessity for protection? The only way the manufacturer can be benefited by protection is that it enables him to sell his manufactured article at a higher price, and, as I have stated before, this makes the consumer pay a higher price and therefore is an injury to him. One class is privileged and enriched at the expense of other classes. The American manufacturer is only completely protected when he succeeds in shutting out and excluding from competition all foreign manufacturers, and if that is done then there is no revenue to the Government, and the Government must resort to a direct tax to pay its expenses. Again, protection violates the fundamental principles of our Government by controlling the individual liberty of the citizen, and preventing him from selling where he pleases and from buying from where he can buy the cheapest.

It should be an inherent right in every American citizen to sell his labor and wares where he can get the best price and to buy where he can buy the cheapest. The great question with American labor is not how much he shall get per day for his labor, but how much shall he have left at the end of the year after he supports himself and his family. The laborer who gets $2 per day and can purchase enough for his family to live on for $1 per day, at the end of the year is better off than the man who gets $3 per day and, under protection laws, is compelled to pay $2.50 per day for the support of his family. The laborer should be permitted to get the highest possible price for his labor, and on the other hand to buy the necessaries of life where he can buy them the cheapest. Protection, instead of being protection, is simply a system of legalized plunder of the laborer, and does in no sense protect American labor. But it is said that if our manufacturers are not protected they can not sustain themselves against the manufacturers of Europe. Suppose, then, that as an aid to our manufacturers a direct tax upon all the property of the country was levied and paid over to the manufacturer of America, so that he could sustain himself against foreign manufacturers, but few persons could be found who would favor such a system. Yet the result is just the same.

Protection as it now exists is simply taking by force from one man and giving it to another without any consideration, as stated by the Supreme Court. The law simply makes the consumer pay to the manufacturer from 20 to 50 per cent. of what he consumes, under the false assumption that it is for the protection of American labor, and in some way—they fail to explain it—will return to the consumer. Away with such false doctrine. It is a relic of the past and unworthy of the enlightenment of the nineteenth century. The evil, then, of protection being so apparent, so direct and immediate, the question is a proper one, what benefits does it confer? The protectionist says that it fosters and encourages American "industry." Is this true? The industries of America are numerous and varied. If you levy a tax for protection—for that is what it means, to protect manufacturers—who pays that tax? Clearly, the person engaged in agriculture and other employments. Then is the agriculturist protected? No, clearly not. The man who uses iron is not protected because of the tax in favor of the manufacturers of iron. When the Government puts a tariff on an article imported to this country, say of 20 per cent., that simply means that if the tariff was not on that article the consumer could buy it 20 per cent. cheaper. It is true the Government gets the 20 per cent. in that case and the consumer pays it.

But when the same article is manufactured in this country it is not sold 20 per cent. cheaper than the imported article. The consumer pays the same price for both articles, and the only difference is that in the case of the domestic article the Government does not get the 20 per cent., but the manufacturer puts that in his pocket, and this is called protecting American industry.

We are assured of this protection business, however, in another way. It is said that protection creates home markets for our surplus products. It requires close attention to see the fallacy of this proposition. The farmer, because of protection, is compelled to pay for his plow, his spade, his wagon and harness, his clothing, and everything he uses from 15 to 35 per cent. more than he otherwise would be compelled to pay if there was no protective tariff; and what does he get in exchange for that? It is a fact that the nine manufacturing States produce more agricultural products than they consume. Where, then, will the farmers of the other States sell their surplus products? There can be but one answer to this question—in the foreign market. Then if he must sell in the foreign market where he can sell the highest, why not let him buy where he can buy the cheapest?

It is again insisted that the protection system keeps money at home; that inasmuch as it is not spent in foreign markets, then this money is retained at home. But how can this benefit the laborer? He must spend some part of his money, and if he can purchase for one-half of his money in a foreign market as much as he can for all his money in a home market, the country and himself will be better off.

If the laborer is compelled to exchange a day's labor for a blanket in the home market while he would get two blankets for it in a foreign market, it will be difficult to make him understand how he will be benefited by protection. Nor does protection diversify labor or find employment for it; this is best done by natural laws. It is in the very organizatiion of our being; in diversity of climate and pursuits. The necessities and wants of men produce diversity of labor, and nothing else. We can not all be engaged in the same employment; we do not all raise corn and wheat, although we all eat bread. The farmer needs more than bread; he must have clothing, and the manufacturer supplies them to him; his horses must be shod, and the blacksmith does it for him; he becomes sick, and the doctor treats him; the title of his land must be examined, and the lawyer does it for him; the farmer must market his grain, and the railroad carries it there; he must have a house to protect him from the weather, and the mechanic builds it for him; his children must be taught, and he therefore engages the school-teacher. These all in turn must have bread, and they get it from the farmer. This is in the natural order of things, and all parties are benefited by the exchange of labor. But the natural result of a protective policy is not to diversify labor, but to commit it to a particular channel. For if a protective policy favors one class—and it must be admitted that it does not favor all—then all will seek that class, and the result is overproduction, while if the law would leave them to themselves they would seek those occupations in which they were best qualified, and would thus diversify labor. When the farmer, the laborer, the mechanic, and the school-teacher find that the Government is favoring a certain class they will desire to abandon their several occupations and seek that occupation that is specially favored. This is the natural result of protection in every case. The law should not prescribe the form of garments we should wear nor the food we eat. These will regulate themselves according to our wants, and so will labor become diversified to meet the wants of trade. But the greatest argument used by protectionists is that it is unjust to submit our industries to competition with what they are pleased to call "pauper labor of Europe."

This argument, if it can be called an argument, is used to frighten the laboring classes into the support of the protection ticket, but there is no truth in it. The three industrial States that derive most profit from the protective tariff levied to keep up the wages of American labor are Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts, and these are the three States in which the greatest number of labor strikes occur and in which they involve the largest number of persons and last the longest. These two facts have a strange appearance when placed side by side. By all the rules of protection logic a large share of the several millions of dollars a year paid by the people of the United States into these three States to build up home industries ought to go to the laboring classes, and those laboring classes ought to be content and happy. But they get no part of this money, and, as a result, there is not a day in the year that some of them are not on a strike, and these facts must show that the protective logic must be at fault.

The use of the words "pauper labor of Europe" by the protectionists is for the purpose of drawing a contrast between the laborer of Europe and America. In the first place, the words themselves are false; for, as used and understood in this country, paupers do not labor at all, but are supported at the public almshouse or by public charity. But the attempt by the protectionist is to keep the wretchedness prevailing among the poorer classes of the Old World constantly before the eyes of the American working classes, evidently to induce them to give their votes in favor of maintaining the protective system, and if they do not, then they will share the fate of the pauper labor of Europe.

The truth is, that the protective system as framed by the Republican party is the parent of the millionaire and the tramp, both equally a curse to American society. This iniquitous tariff system make palaces for some and hovels for others.

If we can at all believe the daily papers, and we must believe some of them, for they give the sworn testimony taken on oath as to the condition of affairs in the protected State of Pennsylvania, the laboring classes there are under greater oppression than ever the slave at the South was. The coal and iron master of that State is using and has used more cruelty to the laboring classes than ever did the task-master of the South use to his slaves in the palmiest days of slavery. A correspondent of the Cleveland Herald visited a part of the Pennsylvania mines and interviewed some of the miners, and the facts that he elicited are that some of the men were working for 62 cents per day. A man with a wife and five children were supported on this, their chief diet being bread and molasses, with a few potatoes and some corn-meal thrown in, and in the month of February being without shoes and with only very indifferent clothing. He found, further, that this was the condition of many of the miners, and that even in cases where they made and received more wages the owners of the mines get it all from them by high rents and truck-store bills. Similar facts were given in the Chicago Herald, and others of a like character were shown by testimony taken before the United States Senate Committee on Labor in New York in 1883.

It was developed before the committee on sworn testimony that in the manufacturing districts a man was only paid from $1.25 to $1.70 per day for his labor, and on this he was expected to support himself and family, consisting of a wife and two or three children. This examination was most valuable in showing that protection does not protect "American labor," but does in fact protect American manufacturers; and they never or rarely ever divide the amount they realize by protection with the laborer. So far, then, as protection protecting American labor, it is a delusion and a snare. A quarter of a century ago the slaveholders of the South claimed that it was to the interest of the negro that he should be held in slavery and robbed of his labor, and the iron lords of Pennsylvania and the merchant princes of Massachusetts are setting up a similar claim to-day and insisting that it is in the interest of their workingmen that they ask protection for their products, and the very men who are the victims of this system still vote with these lords and princes to sustain this nefarious protective policy. The negro of the South never followed his master with more fidelity than the oppressed laborer of America follows that class of men who rob them of the just rewards of their labor and turn their families out of house and home.

It is time that the American laborer should awake to his true interest and free himself from the false impression, and equally false fact, that protection protects American labor; for it does not. How can American labor be benefited by protection? Can it be done simply by taking from one class and giving to another? Certainly not; and yet this is what protection does. Let us take the larger half of our population, the American agriculturists, and see how their interests have been affected by protection. We will all agree that of all the important interests in this country this is the most important. It is the barometer of the prosperity of the country. If crops are plentiful and the prices of products are good, the condition of all interests in this country are favorably affected. Whenever the crops of any one year are good, then the prosperity of the whole country, for the time being, is assured. The last census shows us that 17,392,099 of our population are engaged in gainful pursuits; that of this number 7,670,493 are engaged directly in agriculture; 1,139,362 are professions, and 2,934,876 in personal service, while 1,810,256 are employed in traffic and transportation, and the rest, 3,837,112, are engaged in manufacturing and mining. It will be noticed, now, that by odds the greatest number of people are employed in agriculture; and if protection assists the greater class, then it might fall within the principle of the Government—the greatest good to the greatest number. But no one will seriously insist that it will have that effect.

It is to protect our manufacturing interest that the great boast of the protectionist is put forth. We see, then, that there are 3,837,112 engaged in this business, and when protection favors them it must of necessity do it at the cost of the balance of the entire community. In the very nature of things it can not be otherwise. The farmer is not and can not be protected, and why? Simply because there is more provision produced in this country than can be consumed. As long as there is a surplus in the country of the products of the farm then the farmer must seek a foreign market for them, and a protection duty on them would do him no good. The farmer has to give the same quantity of wheat or bacon for a hundred yards of protected American goods that he would for a hundred yards of English goods, with this difference, that in the case of English purchase the tax would go into the United States Treasury, while in the case of the American purchase the tax would go into the pocket of the American who manufactures the goods. In this way not only the farmer is cheated, but the Government also. In other words, the Government taxes foreign goods, which tax is paid to the Government, and then the home manufacturer charges the same for his goods that the foreigner gets and puts the tax in his pocket. Thus the Government and the farmer both are cheated by your protective policy. If the farmer could find a home market for all his surplus then there might be a difference, but this is impossible in the very nature of things.

As I have said before, the nine manufacturing States produce more agricultural products than is consumed in these States, and therefore the farmer of Illinois and Iowa can not sell their surplus grain in these States, but of necessity must sell in the open markets of the world, and then, if he must compete with the world in the sale of his surplus, it is but fair to permit him to buy where he can buy the cheapest. But the protectionist tells the farmer that "we can furnish you a home market for your products. Do you not see," he says, "that the more men that are engaged in manufacturing the more mouths there will be to feed, and the more money they earn the more money they will have to pay you for your products." This is the worst kind of sophistry. The terms "home market" and "pauper labor of Europe" are synonymous terms; that is, they mean about the same thing. The former is used to deceive the farmer and the latter the workingman. In fact they mean nothing, but they have both rendered excellent service in terrifying the farmer of the West and the laborer of the East.

Let us look at this absurdity for a single moment. If you would make one-third more manufacturers I ask how this would make more mouths to feed. If the number of mechanics are to be increased then they must be taken from some other calling, the farm for example, unless you bring in the pauper labor of Europe. Then to change a farmer to a mechanic it is hard to conceive how he would eat any less. It is supposed that a farmer should consume as much as any other man, and the mere change could make no difference. The aggregate would still leave the same surplus of farm products to dispose of. The census of 1880 shows that the grand total farm products of that year was valued at $2,500,000,000, of which $586,000,000 was exported, and $1,914,000,000 was consumed at home. That is, a little less than one-third of our entire farm products must from necessity be sold in a foreign market. But the absurdity of the whole system is made more apparent when the facts are remembered that from 1860 to 1883 the American agriculturist sold in European markets products of the farmer amounting in the aggregate to the enormous sum of $8,000,000,000, being an average of over $300,000,000 per annum for twenty-three years. There is and can be no home market that will consume this surplus. The surplus of farm products has steadily increased, notwithstanding the high tariff during all the twenty-three years. It is therefore evident that you can not consume your farm surplus in this country unless you built a factory in every township in the Northwest, which is impossible.

The question may be asked, what have our farmers done with this $8,000,000,000 arising from the sale of their farm surplus? What have they to-day to show for this vast sum of money? Nothing; they live economically; they are not spendthrifts; they work early and late; no eight-hour-law system for them, and yet they are comparatively poor. The farms in the West and Northwest are mortgaged heavily. The New York Times gives the following figures:

Farms in—
Ohio	$701,000,000
Indiana	398,000,000
Illinois	620,000,000
Wisconsin	250,000,000
Michigan	350,000,000
Minnesota	175,000,000
Iowa	351,000,000
Nebraska	140,000,000
Kansas	200,000,000
Missouri	2,370,000,000
Total	3,422,000,000

It might be interesting to know where these mortgages are held. The bulk of them are held in the East. The Hartford Insurance Company has $70,000,000 of it. The Boston Loan Company holds $76,000,000 more, and so on. The industrial and manufacturing States have mortgages on the agricultural States. They rob the Western farmer by an unjust tariff and then loan back to him the money that they have taken from him by these infamous laws, and take a mortgage on his farm at from 6 to 10 per cent. interest per annum; and after he has been enslaved for eight or ten years trying to pay his taxes his farm is sold, and he is turned out of house and home. This is the end of it. The earnings of the farmer do not exceed 3½ per cent. on the capital invested, while he is required to pay, as I have before stated from 6 to 10 per cent. on his mortgage; and certainly it is clear that it is only a question of time how soon he shall fail and his farm fall into the hands of his creditors, and the money-lending corporations of the rich manufacturing States will own full one-half of the farms in the Western States.

The Republican party can not longer deceive the Illinois farmer with figures. They can not show him simply by figures that he is rich, for he knows by actual experience that he is not. He has no money to pay his taxes, no money to buy proper food and clothing for his family. He knows this as an actual fact. He knows that he was compelled to mortgage his farm to buy food for himself, his family, and stock to get through the winter. These facts he knows by actual experience, and he can not longer be deceived.

It is time for the farmer of the West to call a halt in these matters, and look around him and see what is producing these results. How is it that the industrial States are more prosperous than the agricultural States? Why is it that the wealth of the nine industrial States is $24,630,000,000, while that of all the other States is only $19,012,000,000? How is it that the average wealth in the industrial States is about $1,760 per capita, while in the other States it is only $528?

Why is it that nearly all the telegraph and railroad lines are owned and controlled in the industrial States? The industrial States have large savings in banks, while twenty-three of the agricultural States report none at all. Rhode Island has $51,816,000, while Ohio, Indiana, and Minnesota have only $17,733,000. Massachusetts has $275,000 000 on deposit in savings-banks, while twenty-three agricultural States have none, and while Kansas, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Ohio are encumbered with real-estate mortgages to the amount of $4,421,000,000, three-fourths of which are held in the industrial States. The census of 1880 show $1,718,000,000 invested in manufacturing, and 1,700,000 persons only employed in that vocation, and all the other States show $10,605,000,000 capital invested and 7,670,000 persons employed in farming; yet the manufacturing products of the industrial States (less cost of raw material) was $1,216,000,000, while the entire farms of the whole country show no such gain. The average product of a farm laborer is $300 per annum, while the manufacturer makes $715 per annum. The farmer's net profit is 3½ per cent., while the manufacturer's is 25 per cent.

By the force of this protection policy the poorer or agricultural States are compelled to pay the enormous sum of $750,000,000 a year to the rich or industrial States. It is true that this is not its pretended object, but it is the natural result. We find the largest amount of wealth in the nine industrial States. They are the creditor States; they are the money-lending States. The twenty-eight agricultural States are the debtor or money-borrowing States. They have nine-tenths of the area of the country and three-fourths of the population, and yet the nine industrial States own one-half the wealth of the country. An average citizen of the industrial States owns three times as much property as an average citizen of the agricultural States. The statistics compiled at Washington show the wealth per capita in the nine industrial States as follows:

Connecticut	$1,368
Maine	772
Massachusetts	1,568
New Hampshire	945
New Jersey	1,267
New York	1,499
Pennsylvania	1,257
Rhode Island	1,519
Vermont	870

Wealth per capita in the nine agricultural States:

Alabama	$299
Arkansas	299
Georgia	307
North Carolina	319
Virginia	458
Michigan	837
Minnesota	817
Nebraska	641
Kansas	577

It will be noticed by this table that an average person in Massachusetts owns five times as much wealth as an average person in Alabama or Arkansas. This state of things can not be explained on the ground that the industrial States are the seats of great wealth because they are old communities and their people are industrious and thrifty. This will not explain the phenomenon, but the tariff law will explain it when it shows that the law compels the country to pay $750,000,000 a year to these industrial States to build up flourishing manufactories in them, and this money they invest in western railroads and real estate mortgages, which yield them $75,000,000 a year in interest and dividends. In fact, the hundreds of millions which the industrial States have invested in the West have been extorted from the West by the protective tariff. The whole trouble is the protective system. It builds up manufacturers at the cost of all other vocations and enriches the nine industrial States at the cost of the other States. It is sectional, unjust, and inequitable. To show still further how the farmer is imposed upon you need only look at the further fact that for everything he sells there is no protection, but everything he buys is protected and taxed. His flannel shirt is taxed 95 per cent., his coat is taxed 57 per cent., shoes taxed 35 per cent., his hat 92 per cent., his bucket 35 per cent., his tin bowl 35 per cent., his cotton towel 45 per cent., his plate 60 per cent., his knife and fork 35 per cent., his sugar 68 per cent., salt 59 per cent., his window glass is taxed at 59 per cent., his bridle is taxed at 35 per cent., the nails in his horse's shoes are taxed at 39 per cent., his plow at 45 per cent., his chains at 58 per cent., his sheets at 45 per cent., and his blankets at 104 per cent., his broom 35 per cent., his thread at 74 per cent., calico 58 per cent., yarn 120 per cent.

The farmer is taxed on everything he can use between the cradle and the grave, from 15 per cent. on a 50-cent nursing-bottle to 65 cents a cubic foot on the marble for his tombstone. After his day's work is done he kneels down to pray on a carpet taxed at 47 per cent. and holds in his hands a Bible taxed at 20 per cent., and is expected to thank God that he lives in a free country, while at the same time the rich manufacturer is playing a game of euchre with his friends with a deck of cards placed on the free-list by our Republican friends. And yet many of the farmers are expected to vote the Republican ticket, which is a vote to keep up this iniquitous system. The articles above mentioned are some that the farmer must purchase, and these are the taxes he must pay; and who gets the major part of the money? Clearly the rich manufacturer of the East. It is true some of it goes to the Government, but for every dollar that the Government gets the protectionists of the East get from $5 to $6. This is not mere declamation, but actual facts.

The aggregate value of all the goods manufactured in America last year, it is claimed, was about $6,000,000,000. There is an average tariff of about 47 per cent., but we will call it 40 per cent. Now, while the Government collects on foreign manufactured goods at the ports of entry last year $217,286,893.13, the manufacturer received 40 per cent. on the goods manufactured in America, or the sum of $2,400,000,000, or more than enough to pay the national debt. Thus, you see, while the Government gets $1, the manufacturer of the East gets about $7. What I mean to say is this, that because of the tariff of 47 per cent. on the imported goods they are sold for that much more than they would be without the tariff, and that fixes the price of domestic goods. The Government gets the tariff on the goods manufactured in foreign countries and shipped to this country, but the manufacturers in America get a sum equal to the tariff on goods manufactured in this country and put it in their pockets. No wonder they are millionaires. The Government has paid in all since the war, not including the current year, for pensions the sum of $883,400,000, with which no fault is found; but the people of America pay annually nearly three times this amount to the manufacturer of the East, as I have shown; and can there be any wonder that the farmers, the laborers, and the tax-payers of the country are oppressed? An Irishman coming to this country in winter was attacked by a dog, and when he stooped down to pick up a stone to defend himself he found it was frozen to the ground. He said to himself, "This is a strange country, where the dogs are let loose and the stones are tied to the ground." So the farmer can say that this must be a strange country, when everything he buys is taxed and everything he has to sell must be sold free.

I compile the following table from facts given by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, taken by him from the report of the Commissioner of Labor, which will further show the iniquity of this taxing system:

Articles.	Value.	Cost of labor.	Tariff.
One pair of five-pound blankets	$2.51	$0.35	$1.50
One other pair of blankets	2.70	.70	1.80
One pound of sewing silk	5.56	.85	1.69
One gallon of linseed-oil	.46	.02	.25
One ton of bar-iron	31.10	10.00	17.92
One ton of pig-iron	11.00	1.64	6.72
One ton of steel rails	31.00	7.57	17.00
One wool suit	12.00	2.00	6.48
One cotton suit	10.50	1.65	3.67
One dozen goblets	.48	.15	.19
One hundred pounds of mixed paints	9.50	.41	2.00
Total tariff			59.71

Now, if these goods are manufactured in a foreign country and shipped here the Government will get the tariff, but if they are manufactured in this country the Government will not get the tariff, but the money will go into the pockets of the manufacturers. Now, will the manufacturer divide the profits with the laborer? No.

The fact is that the manufacturer will employ labor as cheap as he can, and if he can not get it cheap enough in this country he will import the pauper laborers of Europe here under an equally infamous convict-labor law enacted by the Republican party.

What do the Jay Goulds and Vanderbilts pay for labor? An average of $1.10 per day. Do they divide any of their large dividends realized from a protective system with their laborers? Who ever heard of such a thing? Yet they and most of the other millionaires of the country are members of the Republican party. This is the reason the Republican party believes in favoring wealth. It repealed the tax on domestic manufacturing, which was $127,000,000 per annum. It repealed the income tax, which was $72,000,000 per annum. It repealed the taxes on the receipts of railroads, insurance companies, and express companies. It repealed the tax on the capital of banks, on bank deposits, and on bank checks. It repealed the taxes on the wealth of the country, on banks and corporations, and permits them to escape paying their just part of the national debt; but it left the taxes on the poor man's blankets and the clothing that his children wear, and it is now putting forth every effort to keep up the taxes on the necessaries of life. The representatives of the Republican party now in this House, Mr. Chairman, are insisting daily that the taxes should be taken off of whisky and tobacco and left on wool and provisions. They are urging the question of free whisky and tobacco while the Democratic party is urging free wool and free provisions, cheaper food and clothing for the people. Can there be a doubt which is right?

The Republican party is responsible for all this misrule, but a brighter day is about to dawn. A Democratic President has sounded the slogan and pointed out the injustice and iniquity of our taxing system, and the people are coming to his support, and by the passage of the Mills bill the tariff will be reduced $78,176,000; that is, the amount received by the Government will be reduced that sum, and more than $450,000,000 will be annually saved to the people which is now given as a bonus to the manufacturers.

The protective system is un-American, and is a perversion of the laws of nature, of God and man. We find by the laws of nature that some countries produce one article and others give a different variety, and we find that the oceans and rivers connect these countries, and, as it were, are highways of commerce created by nature from one country to another, and the winds of heaven bring the products of one clime so that they may be exchanged for the products of another and thus bless all mankind; but the barbaric tariff law interferes and prevents the spirit of civilization and retards the tendency of the age in the drawing together of the nations of the earth through the agencies of commerce. To carry the protective policy to its legitimate result we ought to abolish ships, railroads, telegraph lines, and mails, and prohibit our citizens from going abroad and visiting foreign countries. The spirit of protection is hostile to these things.

It discourages commerce and intercommunication, and we should at once raise the Chinese wall around us. It is condemned by the whole cause and tendency of modern civilization. The enlightened and progressive nations of the earth are incessantly striving with wonderful success to draw near to each other in more frequent intercourse and more cordial relation, and they are multiplying the agencies and facilities of this intercourse every year. Steam and telegraphy have destroyed space, and made the inhabitants of the whole earth as it were brothers; but the barbaric policy of protection tries to prevent this. It is hostile to the best interests of the human family, and to the progressive tendencies of the age; hostile to commerce, steamships, railroads, telegraphs, and interocean canals. It is hostile to the cheapening of human comforts and necessaries, since its object and effect is to increase the cost of these comforts and necessaries to those who consume them. It increases the price of a blanket from $2 to $4, and thus denies the masses of our people of the cheapened comforts that other people enjoy. This barbaric policy shall and will have to go.

The fathers in erecting for us a political fabric based it entirely on self-government. The framers of our Government at least emphasize the greatest freedom to the citizen, not only as to his political right, but also to his private business.

They raise above his head the Stars and Stripes and assure him of the fullest protection and that no one shall molest or make him afraid. To this end we have free speech, a free press, free schools, free religion; in fact everything is free until we touch trade. The citizen is left free in everything. He may say and print what he pleases and can do anything he pleases until he hits trade, and then the tariff law interdicts him and he can not buy where he can buy to the best advantage nor sell where he can sell at the best profit. No one will deny but that the Government was inaugurated to secure equal rights to all, yet we find that in this system of protection, with its immense powers, it robs the many and enriches the few.

Mr. Chairman, be assured that if the bill under consideration becomes a law it may reduce the income of the monopolist and the rich manufacturer, but it will relieve the farmer and the laborer. It will bring health to the cheek of the farmer's wife and light to her eyes. It may reduce the profits on trusts and combines, but it will be the means of paying off the mortgage on the cottage and the farm. May God speed its passage. My greatest ambition is to see it enacted into a law so that the expenses of living may be lighter and the struggle for existence still made easier for those who can scarcely carry it on now. I am glad that I am not a member of a party whose victory is through the misfortune and sufferings of my fellow-men, and is not kept in power on the shoulders of taxation, monopoly, trusts, and combines. But, Mr. Chairman, I am glad that I am a member of that grand old party that assures a better trade to our people, larger wages to labor, better times to the farmer, and greater glory to the American name at home and abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the present session of Congress the President, in the opening sentences of his annual message, sounded the note of alarm and warned Congress of the dangers threatening the business interest of the country from overtaxation and a congested national Treasury. He says:

> You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immedate and careful consideration.
>
> The amount of money annually exacted, through the operation of present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people, largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.
> When we consider that the theory of our institutions guaranties to every citizen the full enjoyment of all the fruits of his industry and enterprise, with only such deduction as may be his share towards the careful and economical maintenance of the Government which protects him, it is plain that the exaction of more than this is indefensible extortion, and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice. This wrong inflicted upon those who bear the burden of national taxation, like other wrongs, multiplies a brood of evil consequences. The public Treasury, which should only exist as a conduit conveying the people's tribute to its legitimate objects of expenditure, becomes a hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, threatening financial disturbance, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

In these sentences he recognizes and calls attention to the two evils growing out of the present taxing laws of the country—excessive taxation, which impoverishes all the people but a favored few, and a redundant Treasury, which depletes the currency in the hand of the people and thereby lowers the prices of property and of labor and of the products of labor. In this way the rich, in whose hands the money of the country is, are made richer and the poor, whose labor is their capital, are made poorer.

Both these evils, unnecessary and therefore unjust taxation and a surplus revenue, ought to be remedied. And in my judgment the remedy ought to be applied at once.

The close of the war found a taxing system in operation which levied contributions upon everything which could bear a tax, and these taxes were imposed and collected in every way authorized by the Constitution. There was a land tax, a stamp tax, an income tax, a tax on railroads, a tax on express companies, excise taxes on spirits and tobacco and patent medicines, and many other articles of domestic production, and most fruitful of revenue of all, the highest tariff taxes in the world. All these were rendered necessary by the requirements of the Government for money to support a vast military and naval establishment for the prosecution of the war.

But when peace was restored and the Army and Navy were reduced to a peace footing, all this revenue was not necessary, and at once revisions of the taxing laws began to be made. First, the land tax was repealed, which was right, because the Federal Government should never, except in cases of extreme necessity, impose burdens upon the productive labor of the country, and a land tax is virtually a tax on agriculture, which has to bear the chief burden of all local taxation. Then the income tax went, which was wrong, because, while it was a direct tax, it was a tax levied upon those who, as a rule, paid but little to support the Government in any other way, and yet they were most benefited and most able to pay. Then the stamp tax, which was purely a revenue tax and fostered no monopoly, went. And in this way all taxes which bore most heavily on the wealth of the country went, and none were left except the two which always have been and are now most burdensome to the masses of the people—a high-tariff tax and the excise tax on distilled spirits and tobacco.

Thus, instead of removing first those taxes which are most obnoxious and bear most heavily on the masses of the people, precisely the opposite course was pursued, and the burthens which bore upon those best able to bear them were removed, and those which fostered monopoly and bore most heavily on the toiling millions have been permitted to remain. Neither of these taxes has ever received the indorsement of a majority of the American people, except in cases of extreme necessity. A high protective tariff, imposing onerous burthens upon the many to enrich the few, was never a Democratic doctrine, neither was an excise tax. The one has always been championed by the party opposed to Democracy, the other has been resorted to but three times in over a hundred years, and always by the opposition party.

The present odious system was inaugurated by the Republican party at a time when none but the bravest had the courage to avow his adhesion to the Democratic party in this Hall. Both these forms of taxation are oppressive, both are war taxes, both foster monopoly, and both are undemocratic. The chief purpose served by the perpetuation of both is to foster monopoly and make millionaires of a few thousand distillers and manufacturers, and paupers of all those who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, and this includes farmers, mechanics, operatives in factories, miners, day laborers, and all those who work with their hands.

I have no sympathy with the cry of protection to American labor. The cry is too often the cry of fanatics, or worse, of hypocrites, who presume on the ignorance of the laboring classes. Equally insincere, it seems to me, is the other and only remaining argument in favor of a high protective tariff, that it creates a home market for the products of the farm. If it were true, as claimed, certainly the American farmer ought to be the most prosperous man in the world, for he certainly pays, for all he consumes, the highest average tariff tax in the world. But it is not true. As I have said on this floor on another occasion, the American farmer is the hardest-worked, the heaviest-taxed, and the poorest-paid man on the continent.

Gentlemen talk about prosperity. There is to-day no prosperity among the farmers and planters of the country. The price of the products of their labor is not increased by a protective tariff, but the price of all they buy is greatly increased thereby. When a people produce a part of any given article of consumption in their own country and import a part, the price of the home product fixes the price of the imported article; but when it produces any article in excess of the home demand and becomes an exporter, the price of that article abroad fixes its price at home. All of the leading products of our farms are produced largely in excess of the home demand, and to find a market have to be sent abroad.

We are large exporters of cotton and wheat and corn and pork, and indeed of almost all the products of the farm. Our cotton and wheat, the leading articles of exports, have to come in competition in the markets of the world with the cotton of Egypt and India and the cereals of the Russian and British-Indian empires. Thus the American farm laborer, instead of being protected by the tariff, is forced, under the operation of these laws, to compete with the "pauper labor" of these countries—countries where 25 cents is a fair average of the price of a day's work—and at the same time pay an average tariff tax of 47 per cent. on all he consumes, four-fifths of which goes, not into the Government Treasury, but into the coffers of the "lords of the loom, the factory, and the furnace." Under this beneficent system twenty-nine States, which are engaged in agriculture, pay tribute to nine States engaged chiefly in manufacturing. The nine have indeed prospered for the last twenty years under the highest protective tariff in the world, but the twenty-nine have grown poorer and poorer all the time.

The following extract from the Missouri Republican, brought to the attention of the House some time ago by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], shows the abject servitude in which the farmers of the West are held by the manufacturing barons of the nine industrial States:

WHO OWNS THE WEST?

All the advocates of high protective tariff have one refrain to their songs, speeches, magazine essays, and sermons—the vast wealth of the country. "We are the richest country on the globe," they assert, "and the protective tariff has made us so;" and then they present us with a bewildering array of figures towering up into the billions to show how prosperous the land has been under the protective policy of the last twenty-six years. In 1862 we had only 32,000 miles of railroad; now we have 150,000. In 1860 we had only $200,000,000 deposits in savings-banks; now we have $1,100,000,000. In 1860 we had 2,044,000 farms; in 1880 the number had increased to 4,008,000, and at the present time it can not be less than 5,000,000. All this they tell us has been brought about by the protective policy—as if the industry, enterprise, and patient hard work of the people had nothing to do with the matter.

It may be admitted that the country is rich, and growing more rapidly in wealth than any other country on the globe. But the people have made it so, not the tariff. It has thrived in spite of protection. That policy has drawn enormous wealth from the twenty-nine agricultural States and concentrated it in the nine favored industrial States; and it is in the latter the affluence that excites the admiration of the high-tariff advocates is most conspicuously illustrated.

But, they tell us, the agricultural States have grown rich, too. They also have prospered under protection. See how farms have multiplied in the West and Northwest, and see how railroads have been built in Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin and the States and Territories west of the Mississippi, even to the Pacific, and how this vast region has been subdued to settlement.

All true. But who owns these farms and railroads in the Western States? In one word, who owns the West? The people of the West, it might be answered. But the answer would not be true, as a few indisputable figures will sufficiently prove.

First, as to farms. In 1880 there were 138,500 farms in Kansas, 256,000 in Illinois, 194,000 in Indiana, 247,000 in Ohio, 185,300 in Iowa, 154,000 in Michigan, and 134,300 in Wisconsin—making a total of 1,309,100 in the seven States named. Recent statistics collected by Granger associations and printed in farm journals make the following exhibit of farm mortgages in these same States:

Kansas	$235,000,000
Illinois	1,000,000,000
Indiana	635,000,000
Ohio	1,227,000,000
Iowa	567,000,000
Michigan	500,000,000
Wisconsin	357,000,000
Total	4,521,000,000

These figures are so startling in their enormity as to seem incredible. We do not vouch for their accuracy. They present the 1,309,100 farms in seven Western States as encumbered with an aggregate of four and a half billion mortgage indebtedness, or an average of over $2,400 for each. The assessed valuation of property in these States in 1885 was as follows:

Kansas	$273,560,000
Illinois	797,000,000
Indiana	793,000,000
Iowa	625,000,000
Michigan	850,000,000
Wisconsin	496,000,000
Ohio	1,671,000,000
Total	5,507,500,000

It will be seen that the reported mortgage debts cover about four-fifths the assessed value of the farms; and the bulk of these mortgages are held in the Eastern industrial States.

Next, as to railroads. In the seven Western States named there were, in 1885, 37,000 miles of railroad with a stock and bond account and net earnings as follows:

States.	Stocks and bonds.	Net earnings.
Kansas	$195,700,000	$9,440,000
Illinois	740,000,000	16,000,000
Indiana	320,000,000	5,700,000
Iowa	105,000,000	2,180,000
Michigan	214,000,000	5,000,000
Wisconsin	236,000,000	6,500,000
Ohio	767,000,000	12,300,000
Total	2,537,700,000	57,520,000

These 37,000 miles of railroad, having a nominal value of $2,537,000,000 (over two and a half billion dollars) and yielding annual net earnings of $57,520,000, are put down in the statistics of the day as part of the property of the States in which they lie. But it is a notorious fact that only a very small fraction of their values are owned in these States. The last report of the Iowa railroad commissioners states that only one out of forty stockholders in Iowa roads lives in the State, and only one-seventieth of the capital stock is held in the State. In Illinois a similar condition of things prevails. The official report of the railroad commissioners does not state what proportion of the aggregate capital stock of the Illinois roads is held in Illinois, but the location of the capital stock of the leading roads will assist us in forming an estimate. The Illinois Central has $29,000,000 capital stock, only $685,000, or less than 3 per cent., of which is owned in Illinois. Of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, about 5 per cent. of the capital stock is owned in Illinois; of the Ohio and Mississippi stock, only one-half of 1 per cent.; of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute, less than one-half of 1 per cent. Taking these figures as a guide we may safely estimate that of the 19,000 miles of railway in Illinois, valued in stock and bonds at $740,000,000, the people of Illinois own 5 per cent.; the other 95 per cent. is owned in the rich industrial States of the East.

As Illinois is called the most prosperous and one of the richest agricultural States of the West, it may be inferred that the other States are in no better condition than it in the matter of railroad ownership, and therefore it may be broadly asserted that practically all the railroads in the seven States named, valued at $2,537,700,000 (two and a half billion dollars and over), are owned in the industrial States. The industrial States are therefore drawing a pretty round sum of money for one thing and another from the seven Western States named every year. The items may be stated as follows:

In protective taxes	$150,000,000
In interest on mortgages	270,000,000
In railroad net earnings	57,000,000
Total	477,000,000

The Western States are in fact being bled to death. Western farmers are actually becoming poorer and poorer every year. As a body they do not make a living, and the convincing proof of this fact is that their farms are fast passing under mortgage to the money-lending manufacturing States of the East. Twenty-five years ago these mortgages were few in number and small in amount; now they number millions and cover an aggregate value of thousands of millions, and all bear 6 to 8 per cent. interest.

The West does not own itself. It is owned by the industrial States. Twenty-six years of the malign, sectional, and oppressive policy of high tariff has done the work and done it effectually. The industrial States of the East, enriched beyond estimate by the annual tribute of $600,000,000 exacted for a quarter of a century from the other States under the false pretense of building up home manufactures, own all Western railroads, telegraph lines, and bridges, and hold mortgages on nearly all farms, their cities, and towns.

This statement of the condition of the farmers of the West is, as suggested, perhaps exaggerated, but it goes to show that their condition is deplorable indeed; and all that is said here of the West applies with equal, and, if possible, with increased force to the South. At the close of the war, a war fought almost wholly on her soil, the most gigantic and desolating that has devastated this fair earth for two thousand years, she found herself with her fields devastated, the flower of her youth and manhood slain in battle, and the accumulation of a century and a half annihilated as if by the magic touch of the genius of destruction.

To add to the hopelessness of her condition when she was prostrate and almost lifeless and bleeding at every pore, the carpet-baggers, the emissaries of the protective theory, pounced down harpy-like upon her, put themselves at the head of the recently emancipated and enfranchised slaves, and while the representatives of the wealth and intelligence of that unhappy section were disfranchised took possession of her local governments and burdened the people with local taxes and debts unheard of hitherto in the history of the country. Without horses, without mules, without oxen, without food, without money, the old men, and the boys, and women, and the disabled soldiers, and the few disbanded soldiers of the Confederacy who had survived the bloody conflict of that fratricidal war without bodily hurt, went to work late in the spring of 1865 to repair their farms and make a crop.

Utterly destitute and without the means of support they were forced to resort to loans, to secure which they had to mortgage their farms and to pay ruinous rates of interest, often amounting to 50 and even to 100 per cent. per annum. Thus each crop was consumed before the next was planted, and again the farm was mortgaged for the means with which to make another. This process has gone on from year to year. Our farmers and their children, male and female, have toiled as their slaves never did, and yet they are loaded down with debt. True, the average rate of interest now is not as great as it was twenty or even ten years ago, but it is still enormous, usually about 15 per cent. As in the agricultural West, so in the agricultural South, our farms are practically owned by those who have grown rich in the nine manufacturing States under the fostering and "protecting" operations of the present tariff.

These "lords of the loom, the factory, and the furnace," not only hold under mortgage a very large per cent. of our farms, but actually own and control and enjoy almost all of our railroads, our factories, and our mines. There are in Georgia railroads which have cost about $75,000,000. Of these the main thoroughfares, the Central, the Georgia, the Western and Atlantic, and the Atlantic and Gulf, were built and owned by the people of Georgia before the war, without the aid of foreign capital. To-day they have passed out of the hands of those whose capital and enterprise built them and are owned by and operated in the interest of Eastern capitalists. Our mines of gold and iron and coal and copper have gone the same way—are owned by nine States whose people have grown rich on tribute levied by our present taxing laws upon the people of the other twenty-nine.

These are the results of a protective tariff at whose shrine we are called upon to fall down and worship. These are the results of a system falsely called the "American system." The most ardent supporter of the protective theory a hundred years ago would stand aghast at the demands of the protected industries of to-day. The ghost of Clay would grow indignant at the enormities perpetrated by his pretended followers in the name of "protection."

But, Mr. Chairman, onerous, unjust, and oppressive as is the present protective tariff, the other and only remaining form of taxation in this Republic is more onerous, unjust, and oppressive. I refer to the iniquitous and inquisitorial system of internal-revenue taxation, the excise tax on tobacco, a leading agricultural product, and on distilled spirits, which is practically another agricultural product, because in many sections of our country the usual and only way in which the farmer can realize anything out of the products of his farm is to convert his grain into spirits.

In many sections, and I have the honor to represent in this House one of them, where the face of the country is mountainous and the means of transportation are few and bad, the cost of transporting to market a bushel of grain is almost as much as the grain will bring when sold. In these sections of country the free and untrammeled distillation of grain is as necessary to the prosperity of the people as the exportation of cotton and wheat without the imposition of an export tax is to the people of those sections which produce these articles.

The fathers of the Republic, in that far-seeing wisdom which characterized all their acts, prohibited in the Constitution the imposition of export taxes. It is true that they at the same time authorized the imposition of excise taxes and direct taxes, but coupled with the latter the provision that "no direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census of enumeration hereinbefore directed to be made." The present excise-tax law is violative of the spirit of that clause of the Constitution, because it does not bear equally upon all the people of all the States, and had the fathers foreseen the perversion of this power that has been made they would have provided limitations to its enforcement, as they did in the clause authorizing the imposition of other direct taxes.

Indeed, it was never intended that resort should be had to direct taxation at all except in cases of extreme necessity, and then only temporarily. This is shown conclusively by the unbroken custom of the Government under the administration of whatever political party for more than a hundred years. Only three times since the birth of the Constitution have they been authorized by Congress, and always to meet the extreme demands of war. On each former occasion their existence was ephemeral; they were repealed as soon as the emergency which called them into being was passed. But now, after the war which created the necessity for them has been over for more than twenty years, these laws are in full force, and are carrying into an already overflowing Treasury a constantly increasing stream of the money of the people, for which the Government has no use, and which, in the language of the President, converts the Treasury into a—> hoarding-place for money needlessly withdrawn from trade and the people's use, thus crippling our national energies, suspending our country's development, preventing investment in productive enterprise, and inviting schemes of public plunder.

Mr. Chairman, it is unjustifiable robbery. This law ought to have been repealed next after the land tax, for, like the land tax, it is a burden upon the agriculture of the country, that industry which after all is the mud-sill of all American prosperity, and in which one-half our people are engaged.

But it has been said that this is a war tax and ought not to be repealed while a vestige of the liabilities incurred on account of the war, including pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Republic, is unpaid. Never was a more unjust or inequitable proposition submitted to Congress. The war was a great national calamity. It is one of those things to provide for which every citizen of the Republic is equally bound; bound not only to fight the battles, but to bear the burden of taxation. This burden can not in justice be shifted from the shoulders of all of the people of every State to those of a few of the people in a few of the States.

It appears from the annual reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, submitted from year to year, since the inauguration of the system, that the great bulk of these taxes, fully 90 per cent., are paid by a few persons in less than half of the States. Is it right to allow the burdens of a war in which were involved the life, the liberty, and the property of all, to be imposed upon a few? Our common sense of justice revolts at the idea.

Again, it is urged that the system of internal-revenue taxation ought to be kept up because it is a tax easily collected. So was the tribute levied by the freebooters, who infested the straits of Gibraltar on the commerce of the world which had to be carried through those straits, an easy tax to collect; but it was an unearned tax, an unjust tax, a dishonest tax, a robber tax. Let us not emulate the example of pirates in the collection of tribute from our people. Let us not place the burden of taxation where it will be "most easily collected;" this is cowardice and oppression. But let us place it where it can be collected in justice and equality, without oppression, without cruelty, without subjecting our people to "undue search and seizure," and without fostering bloated and insolent monopoly. For after all that has been said about monopoly, the whisky trust is perhaps the most insatiate monopoly that ever cursed this monopoly-cursed people.

It is not only protected by our tariff laws from all foreign competition by prohibitory duties on all foreign liquors that could compete with it, but by these unjust excise-tax laws it is protected from home competition by armed marshals and paid spies and informers, and, if need be, by the Army of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, no tax is a proper tax in a free Republic which has to be collected at the point of a bayonet or at the muzzle of a shot-gun. That this is such a tax let the people of the mountains of the two Virginias and North Carolina and Georgia and Alabama and Tennessee and Kentucky, who have been manacled like felons and hurried from their homes and families and friends at the dark hour of midnight, scores and sometimes hundreds of miles away, to languish and perhaps to die in loathsome prison without conviction, or convicted on the suborned testimony of perjured villains, who, for a bribe or to gratify their own unholy hatred, swear away the liberties of unoffending citizens and wreck the peace of communities.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is strong language, but not too strong for those who have seen the cruelties and outrages which these excise-tax laws have made possible. More than half of the country, largely more than half, is but little affected by these laws, because they are practically inoperative in most of the country; but in those sections where they are operative, and where the people have seen and felt the injustice and cruelty and rigor of their enforcement, there is a well-nigh unanimous demand for their repeal at the earliest possible moment.

The following extract from the proceedings of a mass meeting of the Democratic party of Lumpkin County, Georgia, held a few days ago, voices the sentiment of every section in which these oppressive laws are operative:

> Resolved, first. That we, the Democratic party of Lumpkin County, in mass-meeting assembled, indorse the administration of President Cleveland, and recommend his nomination for re-election upon a platform expressing the views hereinafter contained.
> First and foremost, we demand that the internal-revenue laws, as they now exist, be totally repealed.

But it may be inquired, how will you raise revenue to support the Government if you oppose both these laws? I answer, easy enough. Go back to the old Democratic land-marks, revise your tariff laws, adjust them with a view to raising revenue, and if they can in doing this afford protection to American manufactures, let them protect. That is legitimate protection, not robbery.

That is the Democratic idea of protection as taught by Jefferson and Madison and Jackson and the Chicago platform of 1884. I would put no duty on articles of prime necessity which are not produced in this country. I would put a light duty, if any at all, on the raw materials used in our own manufactures, and on those articles of prime necessity which are partly produced at home and partly imported from abroad, and I would put the heaviest revenue duty possible upon the luxuries and superfluities of the rich, who are able to pay for them however heavily taxed. If after all this is done a sufficient revenue for the support of the Government, efficiently, honestly, and economically administered, is not raised, I would, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "by the suppression of unnecessary officers, of useless establishments and expenses, reduce the necessary requirements of the Government." By the repeal of these very laws a horde of "unnecessary officers" can be "suppressed," and the $4,000,000 paid annually to them for salaries would be saved.

I would repeal the sinking-fund act, a "useless establishment," no longer necessary, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to go annually into Wall street and buy nearly $50,000,000 worth of the bonds of the Government at whatever premium the brokers of that malodorous mart may by private agreement demand. The purchase of its bonds by the Government for the sinking fund is no longer necessary; our bonds are already too high; there would be no danger to the credit of the Government in repealing the law. No fair-minded creditor would object to it.

But if objection were made, and the repeal of the law were regarded as an act of bad faith, I would resort to direct taxation for the balance, not to an excise tax, which oppresses the poor and fosters monopoly, but to a graduated income tax; a tax which falls upon those who, having most to protect, derive most protection from the Government and are most able to pay it; one of the last taxes imposed by the Government in the hour of its extremity and one of the first repealed when the war was over, not because it was an improper tax or an unjust tax, but because those who paid it were heard and were powerful in the councils of the nation, while the toiling millions who pay the bulk of tariff and excise taxes were not heard and were impotent there.

But these views, Mr. Chairman, have been characterized as utopian. Perhaps they are utopian to those one-ideaed gentlemen, if there be such, whose sole object is to reduce the tariff, no matter what the consequences may be, and those other gentlemen whose sole idea is protection, at whatever cost to the farmer, the mechanic, and the day laborer of the country.

But to Democrats of the old school they are not "Utopian." To Democrats who have been "brought up at the feet" of Jefferson, the Democratic "Gamaliel," they are sound Democracy. To them any system of direct taxation by the Federal Government is objectionable, and justifiable only by the most urgent necessity. The old Democratic idea, as taught and practiced by this grand old party, the party of the Constitution and of the people, is to raise all Federal revenues at the ports on goods of foreign manufacture, and leave all direct taxation to the States and local governments, from which to derive the means of their support. Mr. Jefferson said:

> It may be the pride and pleasure of an American to ask what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States.

For the last twenty years it would be difficult to find any one of these classes who has not seen not only one but many, and they often accompanied by armed men in all the "pomp and circumstance of glorious war."

Again, the father of Democracy said, in his second inaugural address:

> The suppression of unnecessary officers, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue internal taxes. These covering our land with officers and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary taxation which once entered upon is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successively every article of produce and property.

The American people can fully realize the force of this prophetic language. Accustomed for a quarter of a century to these iniquitous laws, Congress at its last session extended the sphere of their operation by enacting the oleomargarine law, the object and end and effect of which is to strike down one legitimate industry for the benefit of another.

Encouraged by this concession made by the last Congress to the insatiate demands of monopoly, this had scarcely assembled when demand was made for the striking down of another legitimate and important industry, cotton-seed oil, to satiate the greed of another monopoly. And thus it will go on from Congress to Congress, if this pernicious system is not abandoned. One industry will be hampered and strangled by these unjust and inquisitorial laws for the benefit of another. Pope never uttered a wiser sentence than when he said:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
> As to be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

No tyrant ever robbed a people of all their liberties at one time, but always one at a time, gradually, imperceptibly.

The fathers of the Republic rebelled against the British crown, not because the taxes imposed were heavy taxes, but because they were unjust; not because they were taxed onerously, but because they were taxed at all.

But I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the idea of the repeal of all the internal taxes was not only the idea of Jefferson and all the apostles of Democracy in the early history of the country, but also of the Democrats who assembled from every State and Territory and Congressional district in the last national convention. Let them speak for themselves. That convention, the mouthpiece of the national Democracy, said:

> Sufficient revenue to pay all the expenses of the Federal Government economically administered, including pensions, interest and principal of the public debt, can be got under our present system of taxation from custom-house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity.

This is the judgment of the high court of appeals for the adjustment of all Democratic differences. This is the voice of the people themselves in national convention assembled. It is the "vox populi" and therefore the "vox dei" of Democracy.

All the noise about "free whisky and taxed clothing" is uncalled for. No Democrat wants either. Neither is necessary. Clothing ought to be and must be as free as possible. I always have voted and always will vote to make it so; and as to whisky, the sovereign States of this Union always hitherto have been able to take care of that. They are still able to do that. If revenue is to be derived from liquors, let the States have it. They need it; the General Government does not. Let the liquor tax go into the treasuries of the States, and relieve the farmers of the country to that extent from the onerous taxes now imposed upon their lands. Talk about "protection." If there is a class of men on the American continent which needs the fostering care of legislation, State and Federal, it is the overtaxed, overworked, poorly paid farmers of the South and West.

Equally senseless and pernicious is the demand for the perpetuation of the whisky tax as a promotive of temperance among the people. This demand is made not by the temperance people themselves, but by some politicians who care nothing about temperance. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the most numerous, widespread, and effective corps of temperance workers in the country, have unanimously asked for the repeal of these laws as a hinderance rather than a help to the noble cause of temperance.

The prohibition party in my own State, for which I will be pardoned for saying there is no use and no room in Georgia, adopted as a plank in its platform a few days ago a demand for the total and immediate repeal of the Federal excise taxes. So far as I am informed this is the position of every temperance organization in the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, if it were not, the maintenance of these laws for any purpose other than to raise revenue in cases of extreme necessity is unwise and unwarranted, not only for the reasons I have given, but for the additional reason, which is perhaps after all the most cogent, that it is dangerous to try to legislate morality into the people. Our Constitution forbids the establishment of any religion and legislation on the subject. Its spirit, if not its letter, forbids legislating on moral questions. It would be an abridgement of the liberty of conscience. More than that, such legislation by the Federal Government is an infringement upon the rights of the States and a long step toward that centralization of power against which Democracy has always fought and for which the enemies of Democracy have contended.

But, Mr. Chairman, so much for the evils of a protective tariff and an excise tax. Great as these evils are, there is, if possible, a still greater, threatening, not one industry or one class of our people, but every industry and every class.

The rapidly increasing surplus revenue accumulating in the Treasury inviting extravagant and useless and unwarranted expenditures of public money, and withdrawing from the channels of trade the circulating medium of the country can but result in disaster to every interest of the people.

The attention of Congress has been called in unmistakable tones to calamities impending over the business of the country from this cause by the President in his last annual message. He says, and his language is addressed to us, the representatives of the people, upon whom at last the responsibility rests:

> I have deemed it my duty to thus bring to the knowledge of my countrymen, as well as to the attention of their representatives charged with the responsibility of legislative relief, the gravity of our financial situation. The failure of the Congress heretofore to provide against the dangers which it was quite evident the very nature of the difficulty must necessarily produce, caused a condition of financial distress and apprehension since your last adjournment, which taxed to the utmost all the authority and expedients within Executive control; and these appear now to be exhausted. If disaster results from the continued inaction of Congress, the responsibility must rest where it belongs.
> Though the situation thus far considered is fraught with danger which should be fully realized, and though it presents features of wrong to the people as well as peril to the country, it is but a result growing out of a perfectly palpable and apparent cause, constantly reproducing the same alarming circumstances—a congested national Treasury and a depleted monetary condition in the business of the country. It need hardly be stated that while the present situation demands a remedy, we can only be saved from a like predicament in the future by the removal of its cause.

We have got to meet this responsibility and avert, by the wisest legislation possible, the evils threatening the country. These evils not only threaten but are inevitable if Congress still persists in its course of nonaction. To prevent these abortive attempts at legislation and accomplish any results tending to avert the impending dangers mutual concession is necessary. All wise legislation in an emergency like this is the result of compromise and mutual concession.

This spirit of compromise has marked some of the wisest legislation that has ever been enacted in this or any other country. The greatest intellects which have adorned the pages of our country's history have not deemed it derogatory to their dignity nor their manhood to concede something to the opinions of others.

We ought to emulate their example. We ought to remember that however unjust, obnoxious, and partial the present tariff laws are, and however cruel, oppressive and odious the internal-revenue laws may be, however greatly and injuriously they effect certain interests and certain sections of the country, an enormous surplus in the Treasury, withdrawing from the channels of trade the money of the people, the life-blood of commerce, is equally injurious, equally destructive of every interest in every section of the country. We ought to remember that the whole volume of money in the country, including both metals and the paper currency, is only $1,336,000,000. Of this amount not less than half is not in the channels of trade, but hoarded up in the Treasury of the Government or in the vaults of the banks or in the coffers of misers, leaving not over $700,000 000 to do the business of the country. Of this amount three hundred and seventy millions will be collected this year in the Federal Treasury alone, more than half the volume of currency employed in trade, more than a million every day that God sends, Sunday included, more than $6 a head for every man, woman, and child in the land, more than $30 a head for every voter in the Republic.

The business of the country can not stand this strain. If it continues long, ruin must come to every interest. It must be averted; we must avert it; this Congress must avert it. It must avert it by preventing the accumulation of this vast surplus, by keeping in the channels of trade the already too small stream of money left to the people to propel the wheels of our mills and factories and irrigate our fields. It can only be done by lowering taxes. We can not afford to stop to quarrel as to how this shall be done or on what. If we can not get the internal revenue abolished we must reduce tariff taxation. If we can not get the tariff revised we must abolish the internal revenue. If we can not get all of either, let us take a little of both. We must compromise; we must make concessions to one another. This is wisdom; this is statesmanship; this is the spirit of democracy.

The Committee of Ways and Means of this House, the body charged under the rules of the House with the primary consideration of questions of taxation and revenue, have had the conservatism and moral courage to act on this principle, and as a result have presented to the House a bill which, while it does not embody my ideas as to what a revenue bill ought at this juncture to contain, and perhaps does not embody the ideas of its distinguished chairman, nor those of any other member of the committee, is still a bill framed on the idea of mutual concession and compromise, and will, to some extent at least, remedy the evils under which the country labors. It does not remove all the protective features of the present tariff laws; nor is it necessary that it should, for if, in laying duties to raise revenue for the support of the Government, they should reach the protective point, it is no violation of the traditions of the Democratic party, but is legitimate protection.

It does not repeal the entire internal-revenue system, but it does bring from under its blighting influence one of our chief agricultural products, tobacco, and remove many of the asperities of the law and the rigors of its enforcement in the collection of the liquor taxes. It is perhaps as fair a compromise of the extreme views on the questions of how to raise our Federal revenue and prevent a dangerous accumulation of surplus in the Treasury as could be offered.

I therefore, Mr. Chairman, as is well known in this House, long since determined to accept the compromise in the spirit in which it is offered, and shall give the bill a hearty support. In this position I am sustained by the ever-faithful Democracy of Georgia, who on yesterday assembled in convention in the city of Atlanta, and adopted the Mills bill as the party platform on questions of Federal taxation. The Democrats from the mountains, to whom the internal-revenue laws are so odious and oppressive, and the Democrats from the cotton and rice fields of Central and Southern Georgia, who have not felt the oppression and injustice of these laws, but who have felt the burden of the highest tariff taxes in the world, realizing the perils to the people of the country from the accumulation of hundreds of millions of surplus in the Treasury, compromised their differences, as all true Democrats in this House ought to do, by adopting this moderate measure of revenue reform as the party platform.

I take my position on that platform, and shall talk and vote and work to secure the enactment of this bill into law, trusting and believing that it will be found possible in the near future to wipe from the statute-book the entire system of internal-revenue taxation, and that it may never again be found necessary to restore to it laws so unjust, so annoying, so inquisitorial, so oppressive, and so undemocratic to harass and worry a brave and patriotic people.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, in this discussion all agree that it was not the inenttion of the tariff and internal-revenue laws to curtail the currency of the country and hoard it in the national Treasury; that the surplus now there should not be allowed to remain there; and that the laws should be so revised that no more money shall be collected than is necessary for an economical administration of the Government. Both the great parties are pledged to these principles, and every gentleman on this floor is desirous of accomplishing these objects.

The disagreement commences with the method of reduction. The free-trader contends that the tariff should be for revenue only and that the reduction should be made in the interest of free trade, with a view to exchanging our agricultural products in a foreign market for manufactured articles produced by cheap foreign labor. The protectionist adheres to the principle that the tariff for revenue should also be for protection, and that the reduction should be made in the interest of American industries, with a view to furnishing a home market for our agricultural products, with well-paid American artisans and mechanics as consumers.

The free-trader asserts that the farmers are being robbed by a tariff for the benefit of American manufacturers, and that they should buy where they can buy cheapest, which he assumes is wherever labor is cheapest. The protectionist declares that those employed in American factories are now consumers of the products of the soil; that if forced out of employment in manufacture they will cease to be consumers, and must become agriculturists and competitors of the farmers; that the policy of exchanging farm products for foreign goods will not benefit the American farmer, but will the European manufacturer.

Mr. Chairman, when I am the member of a Congress which legislates for the whole world I will be a free-trader and will advocate the theories of free trade. This Congress legislates for the United States only, and its duty is to defend the interests of our citizens against the rest of the world. The American free-trader is endeavoring to fulfill the prophecy made by Adam Smith, in his Wealth of Nations, when he said:

> It will take less time to people America than it does to civilize a barbarous nation; and as it becomes populous it will consume the produce of nations who have more men and less territory. Rich in the possession of a fertile soil, possessing the knowledge and feeling the wants of the most civilized nations of Europe, they will exchange the produce of their soil for the products of our labor.

This pictures America as merely a big farm tributary to European greatness. That was what the British Government tried to make the colonies by prohibiting manufactures and forcing the colonists to be a people of agriculturists. Our Revolutionary forefathers removed these restrictions by the sword, and within the space of a single century under the protective system we have become the greatest manufacturing nation on earth. What the British Government forced this country to do as colonies, the Cobden Club and the Democratic party are endeavoring to persuade it to do now that it is an independent nation.

The free-trader considers a tariff as a necessary evil, to be justified only as a means of raising revenue. But if the tariff is what it has been described by the President and by gentlemen upon this floor why use it as a system of raising revenue? If it raises the price of everything consumed without any corresponding advantage to our citizens, if it robs the poor for the benefit of the rich, if it "impoverishes the people and protects those who are not entitled to protection, and whom it is a shame and a crime to protect, at the expense, the toil, and the suffering of their countrymen," why not abandon the system?

The President calls the tariff "the vicious, inequitable, illogical source of unnecessary taxation." The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] declares it to be an "unholy and unhallowed scheme erroneously called protection." The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] says:

> This tariff is a most insidious enemy. It works in silence and under cover, and whilst it pretends to be giving us "protection," it is really stealing our substance and destroying our lives.

If these statements are true, then I am opposed to a tariff for revenue or to any kind of a tariff.

These very moderate denunciations at the nation's capital have been echoed by friends of the Administration throughout the country, amplified and specifically applied. Hon. Frank Hurd, while recently instructing and edifying the Democracy of Illinois, is reported as follows:

> The tariff touches five thousand articles that enter into daily consumption. They are increased in price 45 per cent., and those most used by the poor 70 per cent. The average wages are $400 a year, and if the tariff is but 50 per cent. out of his $400 the workman has to pay $200. He gets nothing out of the tariff—is absolutely robbed of $200. Six months of every year is owned and controlled by other men.

According to all these statements the tariff itself is at fault. Lowering the duty one-half would, according to Mr. Hurd's theory, still rob the workingman of $100. Reducing the tariff would not stop, but would only mitigate, the evil.

If there be no incidental protection in a tariff; if there is no advantage arising to our people from a home market; if it is a tax on every man, and only justified as a means of raising revenue, then by all means do away with it at once and raise the revenue by an income tax or by direct taxation. If it be true that it taxes everybody without reference to their ability to pay, the workman and the capitalist alike, it is the most unfair and iniquitous system of raising revenue ever devised. Unless it encourages manufactures, gives employment to labor, and makes a home market for the products of agriculture, it can not be justified. If the system is "legalized robbery," "an unholy and unhallowed scheme," "an insidious enemy stealing our substance and destroying our lives," it is a system which ought not to be used for raising even necessary revenue. Whether high or low, a tariff for protection or for revenue, it is an outrage upon justice and ought not to be tolerated by a civilized people.

In addition to all these terrible effects of a protective tariff we are told that it was the outgrowth of the late war, and that it is illegal and unconstitutional. If this statement be true the other arguments were unnecessary; but if it can be proved to be untrue it will cloud with suspicion the testimony of those who make the assertion.

The second act signed by President Washington was the tariff act of July 4, 1789, and the preamble reads as follows:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported, etc.

This proves that the protective policy was not the outgrowth of the late war, that it is older than the Democratic party, and that it is the traditionary policy of our Government, as venerable as the Constitution itself. The fathers of the Republic honestly and openly declared the tariff to be for "the encouragement and protection of manufactures," and such a tariff has ever since existed in peace and in war, and whether high or low, it has always had in view the object stated in the preamble of the act signed by Washington.

Let us hope that the tariff discussion will never entail the misery upon this country which sprang from the discussion of State rights. The people of the United States established a government, and immediately a certain class of men began to discuss State rights, and for half a century this discussion continued, until it seemed as though the Democratic party believed or half believed that it was a fundamental principle of government; but the moment the attempt was made to exercise the rights so long asserted they were astonished to find that a large number of those who acquiesced in the doctrine would not permit it to be carried into practical execution.

In a like manner our forefathers who established the Government established a protective tariff. A discussion in favor of free trade afterwards commenced, and has continued from that time to this. But it is merely a Pickwickian opposition; it pleases those who like controversy, and does not seem to hurt the tariff. An attempt to carry into practice the doctrine of absolute free trade would be met by the farmers and workingmen as the attempt to carry out the doctrine of State rights was met by the loyal men of America.

We are again reviewing the same old question of "protection," so ably presented by Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and so fully discussed in the Presidential campaign of 1844. But under what different circumstances does it now come before the American people for discussion! What a wealth of statistics has been brought forward in this debate, showing the beneficent influence of protection in creating American industries and a home market! Fifty years ago the advocates of protection argued as to what it would do; to-day they point to what it has done.

For the last quarter of a century the tariff in the United States has been higher than was ever dreamed of fifty years ago. Has the country been ruined by it? The census shows that all the wealth accumulated in this country from the time of its discovery up to 1860 was in round numbers sixteen thousand million dollars. The census of 1880 disclosed the wealth of the United States to be forty-four thousand million dollars—an increase in twenty years of twenty-eight thousand million dollars. Millions of men were for four years of that period withdrawn from production and hundreds of millions of dollars in value were wasted or destroyed by the war, and yet the wealth of the nation was three times as great when the Republican party ceased to control the Government as when it came into power twenty-four years before. The protective tariff in force during those years did not ruin the country.

CURRENCY AND CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Whatever system of revenue laws a country may have it can not prosper under a policy which curtails the currency. With a population and business constantly increasing and a currency stationary or decreasing no genuine prosperity is possible, except to those who control the money of the country. Our western farmers and producers understand this. They are not asking for free trade to enable them to send their corn and potatoes to England and to receive in return the clothing, boots and shoes manufactured in England, the American farmer paying the transportation both ways.

They have to pay too much and too high transportation already. They are aware that the average rate of freight has been greatly reduced since 1861 by improvements in transportation facilities on the Great Lakes and on land. They know that railroads have improved, that their road-beds have been ballasted, that they have steel rails in place of iron, that the size of engines has been increased and the capacity of freight cars doubled. They know that these improvements have decreased the expenses of railroad corporations, enabling them to reduce freights and yet increase profits. They also know that $300,000,000 are annually gathered from them as the net earnings of the railroads and taken to the money centers; and these net earnings are not always the interest on capital actually invested, but are dividends on fictitious stock.

They do not ask for a policy which will close the factories of this country, increase the cost of transportation by adding thousands of miles to the distance, and place them entirely at the mercy of transportation corporations. They ask that the water ways be improved and deepened; that the artificial water in railway corporations may be squeezed out by competition with transportation on natural water.

Every other civilized government has assumed that cheap communication and transportation is the most important method of contributing to the public welfare. They foster, subsidize, and own railroads, not for the benefit of individuals and corporations, but in order to fix a maximum rate on freights and to control them in the interest of producer and consumer. In this country our system of railway legislation, or rather lack of system, has conferred the right of eminent domain on corporations, and corporations are controlled by single individuals. In effect it takes the property of the citizen and transfers it to some one stock manipulator, who uses it theoretically for the public benefit but practically for his own.

Under a different system of railway legislation the right of the State to condemn the property of the citizen would be exercised by the State itself, and the title would never leave the State except to revert to the original owner when the land was no longer required for public use. The enterprise of individuals would only be invoked to operate transportation lines for a term of years for the public benefit under strict limitations as to maximum charges, which would insure only just and reasonable compensation for the skill and labor involved. Other nations have solved the transportation problem by providing that capitalists may enjoy dividends for a term of years and that when the charters expire the roads they built shall become freely and absolutely the property of the people and transportation be furnished at the mere cost of operating the roads. In this country we recklessly provide for the present and only such rights and prerogatives have been preserved to the people as it is not in the power of Legislatures to give away.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are at a disadvantage in the international struggle for lack of cheaper transportation. Russia and Germany are providing internal improvements on a scale commensurate with the importance of those empires. France has 7,069 miles of canals which have cost $200,000,000, and 1,813 miles are projected which will cost $218,000,000 more.

The fact that the wheat of India competes with that of the United States in foreign markets has been frequently referred to in this debate. Such competition was made possible by direct governmental expenditures in the construction of canals and railroads. Over $100,000,000 has been expended for canals in India, while the government railroads are run in the interest of producers and at a loss of $124,000,000 in twenty-four years. With the government furnishing cheap transportation, it is easy to flood the markets of Western Europe with the wheat of India. It is, therefore, not alone with the cheaper labor of India that the American farmers will have to contend, but with governments which neither hoard money in their treasuries nor pay a premium on bonds not yet due, but wisely provide cheap transportation for their farmers and producers, protecting these unorganized classes from the extortion of organized corporations.

If our Western farmers are to compete in European markets with the wheat of India, will they have the same governmental aid in transportation which India has? We know they will not. We know that even the navigable rivers and water ways over which the National Government retains legal and exclusive control have not been improved to the proper extent. The excuse for neglecting this plain duty has heretofore been the lack of money and the great national debt; but that excuse does not avail when there is a surplus in the Treasury which creditors will not consent to take except upon the condition that unearned interest be added.

THE FARMERS' MESSAGE.

I will not undertake to say what the cotton States want, nor what the stock operators and bankers at the money centers want; but if the farmers and producers of the Mississippi Valley had been required to send a message to Congress referring to those questions of national importance, which "imperatively demand immediate and careful consideration," it would have contained something different from what was embodied in the President's message. Although they were not required by law to give information to Congress, yet every citizen there has as profound and intelligent an interest in the welfare of this nation as any citizen elsewhere, whether he be in private station or holding the highest office. They have addressed a message to Congress, to which it is my pleasure and duty to direct your attention.

A convention was in session at Peoria on the 11th and 12th of October, 1887, a few weeks before the assembling of this Congress, composed of 607 delegates from seven States of the Union, representing the commercial and industrial interests of the West, and particularly those of the farmers and producers of that great section. These delegates were selected without regard to party affiliations, and they united in addressing the following message to the Fiftieth Congress:

Whereas natural water ways, capable of floating large river steamers, furnish a medium of successful transportation that is open to the public and can not be monopolized by private interests; and

Whereas in promoting the interstate commerce of the country the true policy of the United States Government is to foster, protect, and improve and artificially connect as far as possible all the natural water ways of the country which are of sufficient importance and extent to partake of interstate character; and

Whereas the proper improvement of the Illinois and Desplaines Rivers, with a few miles of a wide and deep canal, will connect 1,660 miles of large river navigation with 1,700 miles of lake navigation, all within the boundaries of the United States, permeating the heart of the Republic, furnishing more miles of inland navigation than exists in any other portion of the world, which, when completed, will add to the clear profits of the interstate commerce and industries of the country a sum greater each year than the entire cost of the improvement, and at the same time furnish an imperatively necessary assistance to our military and naval defenses: Therefore,

Be it resolved, First. That the highest consideration of patriotism, a reasonable solicitude for our national defenses, the interests of commerce and industry, and the public welfare of the nation all imperatively demand that the aforesaid improvement shall be vigorously prosecuted to an early completion.

Second. That to that end we hereby respectfully urge upon Congress that at the coming session it accept the locks and dams ceded to the General Government by the State of Illinois and appropriate the amount of money estimated and asked by the engineers to complete the two locks and dams now under construction on the Lower Illinois, and appropriate at least one-third of the amount estimated to improve the rivers to Joliet.

Third. That Congress may early in the coming session authorize and provide by a suitable appropriation to provide for the appointment of a corps of United States engineers to make surveys and investigations and report the feasibility and estimated cost of developing a water way from Joliet to Lake Michigan at the city of Chicago, suitable for the largest river steamers and capable of drawing from said lake not less than 600,000 feet of water per minute, with a current suitable for navigation purposes, and to report the effect thereof upon the waters and navigation of the Desplaines, Illinois, and Mississippi Rivers.

Fourth. That we respectfully urge that these surveys and estimates be ordered early in the coming session, that the engineers may at once thereafter proceed to their work and be able to report to Congress for action before adjournment.

Fifth. That inasmuch as practically no returns for this expenditure of money can be realized by commerce and industry, or in providing for our national defense, until the whole improvement is completed, we would also respectfully urge at the coming session of Congress a suitable appropriation to be applied upon the section of the improvement from Joliet to Lake Michigan, and by this means the entire route in all its sections will be in course of rapid completion, which will be much more economical than if it should be delayed through a long course of years by small annual appropriations.

Sixth. That we cordially indorse the proposition to connect Lake Michigan with the Upper Mississippi River by a canal from Hennepin to said river at or near Rock Island as a national undertaking of great importance to producers in the West and shippers in the East, and earnestly commend it to Congress and the people of the United States as a national water way to be promptly acted upon.

Seventh. That while this convention is especially desirous of the improvement of the Illinois and Desplaines Rivers and connecting the same with Lake Michigan for purposes of navigation and military defense, it is at the same time in hearty sympathy with all efforts being made to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River and its great tributaries, as well as all other feasible water ways of the country.

This message was indorsed by another convention which assembled at Memphis on the 20th of October, and the Farmers' Congress of the United States (Chicago, November 11, 12, 1887) declared that it—regards as of the highest importance to the agricultural interests of the country the early completion of the project of connecting the Great Lakes with the Gulf of Mexico by means of a water route from Lake Michigan at Chicago to the Desplaines River, thence by way of the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to the Gulf of Mexico, and that the United States engineers be directed to report on the feasibility and approximate cost of the undertaking, and that such water route shall be of such capacity as to allow of the passage of the largest river steamers and of all naval vessels in time of war.

Mr. Chairman, this is the message of the farmers to the Fiftieth Congress, and, sir, no message has come before it of greater or more pressing importance. It urges that the two greatest inland water-way systems of the whole world be connected in the interest of commerce and national defense. In the language of a United States engineer—

It is a plain problem of creating or rather opening up anew what was once a great water-course between the Lakes and the Mississippi River. In the onward march of this great nation this has been found to be necessary for the commercial interest of the community, and, as is easily seen, for the military defense of the country.

Then would the glorious prophecy of the Chicago Daily News be fulfilled:

A commercial fleet greater than the entire seacoast marine, now locked up in the ice-bound harbors of the Lakes 37 per cent. of every year, would sweep through this channel every fall, carrying the produce and manufactures of the Northwest down to the Gulf for the Mexican, West Indian, and South American trade.

If the President of the United States had recommended that a small part of the surplus could be wisely and economically expended for this great national object, thereby restoring the currency to circulation in the interest of cheaper transportation, the English free-trade journals might not have been filled with encomiums upon his wisdom, but he would have deserved the thanks of the American people.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

A recommendation for the revival of American shipping would also have been appreciated by the people. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR] said that "the tariff has destroyed our shipping, our merchant marine." It surely did not destroy the vessels captured and burned during the war. The truth is, our shipping has not since revived because it is in direct competition with the ships of nations which have by subsidies encouraged their merchants to extend the maritime influence of their governments to the uttermost parts of the earth. I am earnestly in favor of restoring our flag to the ocean, so that our people may enjoy their fair share of the carrying trade, and I commend to the attenion of the House the following extracts from the report of the Admiral of the United States Navy:

Our shipping can not be revived without the same assistance that was given the ocean steam lines of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, and, latterly, Spain. Heretofore, when it has been proposed in Congress to grant Government aid to assist in putting afloat lines of ocean steamers, questions of free trade and tariff have been introduced to kill the measure.

* * * * * * *

There is a growing feeling in the country with regard to the neglect which has been manifested in building up our ocean mercantile marine, and it is to be hoped that this feeling will spread until the thousands of unemployed workmen have a chance to earn good wages and the American ocean steamers have a fair share of the $150,000,000 annually paid to foreigners for carrying our goods.

By the course we have pursued in this country we have actually given protection to foreign steam-ships at the expense of our own. The wharves of New York are decorated with foreign flags, while hardly an American ensign can be seen floating above a steamer suitable for conversion into a vessel of war. This is free trade with a vengeance, all on one side and for the benefit of other nations. We ship our goods in foreign bottoms, and foreigners get the lion's share of the profits. No American steam-ships are employed in foreign trade because subsidized ships can drive them off and carry freight cheaper.

* * * * * * *

A closer examination of this subject than has heretofore been given it by the majority of our statesmen will show the loss this country has sustained by a failure of Congress to act in the premises. In the last eight years not less than $1,200,000,000 have been paid to foreign steam-ships, a sum almost equal to our national debt, and a burden that is only made tolerable owing to the immense resources of our country. We should be still further depleted but for the fact that we are sustained by the tariff on foreign merchandise and the protection of our manufactures, which prevents us from being undersold by foreigners and enables us to give employment to our working people, so that with all our drawbacks we grow rich.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

The President might safely also have recommended a postal telegraph, in order that communication by telegraph as well as mail might be at cost. The monopoly now exacting tribute from the people declares that Congress has no constitutional right to establish a Government telegraph. In the United States Statutes, volume 5, it appears that $30,000 was appropriated for testing the capacity and usefulness of the system of telegraph invented by Morse "for the use of the Government of the United States by constructing a line of said electro-magnetic telegraphs." The appropriation bill approved March 31, 1845 (United States Statutes, volume 5) contains the following:

For defraying the expenses of the magnetic telegraph from the city of Washington to Baltimore for the current year ending on the 1st day of February next, the said sum to be disbursed under the direction and superintendence of the Postmaster-General, $8,000.

The United States has lost none of its constitutional powers in the last fifty years. The din of Wall street must have interposed between the ear of the President and the voice of the people, but the numerous petitions which have been sent to Congress indicate that the people intend to be heard.

THE SOLDIERS.

In connection with the recommendations for expenditures absolutely necessary for the prosperity and general welfare of the people, there is another question which touches the honor of this Republic. There are creditors whose rights rest upon the laws and precedents established in former wars and in force at the time that they volunteered for the defense of the Union. They performed their part of the contract, but while the Government was encumbered with debt they patriotically refused to press their claims. Years rolled on; the bondholders have been paid in gold and the Treasury is now overflowing. Is it not time that the claims of the soldiers should be impartially considered with a view to determining whether such claims are lawful or unlawful; whether they are just or unjust? Would such a consideration be inconsistent with the "high and beneficent purposes of our Government?"

THE SILVER SCARE.

During the political contest of 1884 the statement was heralded to the country by Democratic campaign orators that there was $400,000,000 withdrawn from circulation and locked up in the Treasury. President Cleveland's first message, and especially his recommendations regarding that surplus, were looked for with interest. It was a matter of great surprise, therefore, when this subject, together with that of the revision of the revenue laws, was lightly referred to on a single page of the message, while five pages were devoted to the impending danger to the country arising from the continued coinage of silver. A few sentences show the tenor of that message:

Nothing more important than the present condition of our currency and coinage can claim your attention.

* * * * * * *

That disaster has not already overtaken us, furnishes no proof that danger does not wait upon a continuation of the present silver coinage. We have been saved by the most careful management and unusual expedients, by a combination of fortunate conditions, and by a confident expectation that the course of the Government would be speedily changed by the action of Congress.

Prosperity hesitates upon our threshold because of the dangers and uncertainties surrounding this question. Capital timidly shrinks from trade, and investors are unwilling to take the chance of the questionable shape in which their money will be returned to them, while enterprise halts at a risk against which care and sagacious management do not protect.

As a necessary consequence labor lacks employment, and suffering and distress are visited upon a portion of our fellow-citizens especially entitled to the careful consideration of those charged with the duties of legislation. No interest appeals to us so strongly for a safe and stable currency as the vast army of the unemployed.

Notwithstanding the urgency of this message, notwithstanding that "disaster" waited upon us, that "prosperity hesitated upon our threshold," that "capital shrank from trade," that "labor lacked employment," that "suffering and distress were visited" upon us—notwithstanding all these dangers and evils incident upon a continuation of silver coinage, silver coinage continued unchanged.

BLAINE'S WARNING.

But before a year had rolled round another message came to the American people, not from the President, but from a statesman whose careful study of public questions and great experience in public affairs entitled his warnings to consideration, and, sir, this was the first complete statement of the "condition" which President Cleveland discovered more than a year afterwards. I quote from an address made on the 20th of October, 1886, at Pittsburgh, Pa., by James G. Blaine:

Mr. Chairman, a crisis in the tariff system of the United States is rapidly approaching. For a long series of years, ever since the close of the war, we have had a vast debt to be paid. However large the national revenue, its surplus could always be profitably applied to the liquidation of our national obligations. We have discharged that debt so rapidly that there remains now but little more than $200,000,000 of it that can be paid within this century; and all of that falls due within four years from this date—its maturity thus rapidly approaching may be said to be even now pending—so that the matter is one that must be taken into consideration at once; because the remaining $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 goes over to the twentieth century.

When Secretary Sherman, the most accomplished and able Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton, performed the marvelous feat of funding a large proportion of the public debt in United States 4 percents, his success was acknowledged on both sides of the Atlantic as unparalleled in financial administration. But under the wise administration of the Federal Government by the Republican party the credit of the nation has increased so rapidly that the United States bonds which were at par but seven years ago now command nearly 130, and the holders will not relinquish them to the Treasury at less than that rate. It may therefore be assumed as a certainty that their payment is postponed until the next century, and that they fall outside of the present exigencies as they fall outside of the present power of the legislature of this nation.

When, therefore, you shall have diminished the total volume of the obligations of the country to the amount of the $200,000,000 now almost due, what are you going to do with the surplus which annually flows into your Treasury? What disposition are you going to make of the large amount which each year you have been accustomed to apply to the payment of the national debt? The free-trader replies: "Get rid of your surplus by striking down this protective idea; lower the duty on many articles, put a large number of other articles on the free-list, and reduce your revenue in that way." The protectionist answers: "Let us reduce our revenue, that, with a wise discrimination, the American laborer in his daily earnings may be protected by the national law, and keep that in view as a primal object." This is the question which impends for your decision, and, after patient consideration of the probable consequences to result from that decision, I venture the assertion that there has not been, since the national election of 1860, a financial crisis so urgent and pressing as the one which will be upon the American people within the next two years.

Dean Swift told the ministers of Queen Anne that they could double the duty and halve the revenue, or they could halve the duty and double the revenue. We may therefore increase the revenue while decreasing the duties, or we may decrease the revenue while increasing the duties. The main question, therefore, is whether you will exclude from the tariff the protective idea, or whether you will reduce the rates upon articles from the duties on which you gain no protection, and thus so wisely discriminate that, with a new tariff adapted to $100,000,000 less revenue, you will still gain all the protection needed.

I say to you, gentlemen, that in only two periods in our history—namely, the beginning of the Federal Government and the outbreak of the civil war—has the financial ability of American statesmen been confronted by a problem of the magnitude of the one to which I have invited yourattention. Never, therefore, was there a time when men who believe in protection to American industry were more imperatively called upon to gird about their loins for a great battle on that question. It is impending within two years, and will be settled favorably or adversely in that time.

I can not now go into details on the tariff as to the manner in which it should be regulated, but I can say this, that unless it is so adjusted as to continue the doctrine of protection, you gentlemen will see hard times in this country; and that is what I came here to say. For advancing the same views since leaving home, and in the city of Philadelphia, I have been complimented by the notice of the London Times, which tells me from across the water that the views which I hold have been negatived by the people of the United States, and that we are traveling toward free trade and away from protection—from the dark days of our policy towards the enlightened policy of England.

In the same paper in which I read the cablegram I have just quoted, in the same column and immediately following, among this morning's dispatches, comes another from London which says that the poor have risen in a riot against the lord mayor having a splendid dinner while the workmen of London are starving in their hovels. I give you those two telegrams together as forming a better argument than any I could make on the question; and I send back greeting to the London Times that I stand this moment before countless thousands of free American workingmen who have good wages and happy homes, with prosperity behind them and before them. [Tremendous cheering.]

President Cleveland's message to the Fiftieth Congress was but a fulfillment of Mr. Blaine's remarkable prophecy; and how absurd appears the attempt to brand the Republican party as opposed to a reduction of the tariff, when it was a Republican statesman who thus called the attention of the American people to the growing surplus and the necessity for prompt and radical reduction of tariff duties, and that, too, more than a year before the President abandoned his silver-coinage-danger theory and sent his revenue-reduction theory to Congress.

The problem is comprehensively stated by Mr. Blaine:

> The main question, therefore, is whether you will exclude from the tariff the protective idea or whether you will reduce the rates upon articles from the duties on which you gain no protection, and thus so wisely discriminate that with a new tariff adapted to $100,000,000 less revenue you will still gain all the protection needed.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] quotes that section of the Republican platform of 1884 which declared that—

> The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus.

And adds:

> They admitted the irregularities and promised to correct them. This was four years ago. When and how, gentlemen, do you intend to redeem that pledge?

Mr. Chairman, we will redeem that pledge whenever we have control of this House so that it is in our power to do so. We are ready and anxious to do so now. We do not believe that the bill as presented by the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means met the approval of a majority of this House, though it is believed to have had the approval of the executive branch of the Government. We have already had some experience in bills tending to reduce the surplus. A majority of this House were in favor of refunding the direct tax, and endeavored to overcome Southern obstruction during a legislative day of over 200 hours, but the Democratic party for some reason determined to keep that $17,000,000 of the surplus in the Treasury out of reach of the people.

Early in the session I suggested to a distinguished Democrat that we reduce the revenue by taking the duty off of the sugar imported from those countries which do not levy an export tax. He objected on the ground that it would injure the sugar industries of Louisiana, and said that it was a strictly revenue tax. Such an objection from one theoretically opposed to protection was a surprise. So far as it is a revenue tax we do not need the revenue, and I favor free sugar because the tariff on sugar is a tax on a necessity without reference to ability to pay—the poor man with his large family is forced to pay more of it than the rich man with his small family. Better far a graded income tax, troublesome and inquisitorial to the rich, than to thus unjustly wring revenue from the poor!

The Republican sentiment of Illinois has been voiced by Hon. Julius S. Starr, in a recent speech at Peoria, Ill., when he said:

> I would write it in letters as bright as gold that we are in favor of a specific revision of the tariff in the interest of our own products and our own labor; and that in the furtherance of such a policy we believe it to be the duty of Congress to place all raw material including sugar not produced in this country that does not in any considerable degree come in competition with our own products and the labor of our own people, upon the free-list, and stipulate by treaty with the governments and people that produce such raw material for a just reciprocal relation with them, where our people may receive the benefits of the rights conferred. Place over and against horizontal reduction in the interest of England specific reduction in the interest of America; let it be proclaimed from the hill-tops and in the valleys; let it enter the mines and the workshops; let it echo across the continent; let it be the rallying cry in the campaign now upon us, that the distinctive difference upon this question between the Republican and Democratic parties is, that the Republicans are in favor of a specific revision of the tariff in the interest of home labor and home products, and against a revision, as proposed by the Democratic party, in the interest of Southern products, foreign trade, and foreign labor.

NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] has said:

> If you are going to legislate to make wages higher by imposing a tax you should put the tax on men, not on goods. If you want to protect our workingmen against the pauper labor of Europe, why do you not take measures to keep that pauper labor from coming here?

This presents the standard Democratic argument, that while the tariff protects us against the products of European labor the laborers themselves are admitted free.

This is true, and were it not for our tariff and our higher wages there would be less reason for these laborers coming. It is true that warm-hearted liberty-loving Irishmen, thoughtful and thrifty Germans, industrious and persistent Scandinavians have peopled our Western prairies and are incorporated among our citizens. They have left the historic lands of their birth, they have joined in fighting our battles and in preserving the Union, they are here consumers and producers, not to add to the wealth of another country, but to aid in developing the resources of our own.

REVENUE REDUCTION.

The rules of the House of Representatives require that all proposed legislation with reference to revenue shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and all such legislation is controlled by that committee, in which the Republicans are in a minority. So far as the formation of the bill under consideration is concerned, the committee-room has been locked against the Republican members as well as against the representatives of American industries and American workingmen. The rules of this House do not, however, hamper the Republicans of Illinois, and their well-defined opinions about the surplus and revenue reduction were briefly, but comprehensively, stated by a convention in the following resolutions:

> Resolved, That the safest depository for a surplus, especially under a Democratic administration, is the pockets of the people; and it should remain there until the necessities of the Government demand its payment to the public Treasury. In case of urgent need the patriotism and liberality of the people may always be depended upon to meet the wants of the Government without hoarding a surplus to be made a pretext for extravagant and useless appropriations, or to tempt dishonest officials, or corrupt the public morals; and to prevent the accumulation of such surplus, and relieve the people from the burdens of taxation, we are in favor of an immediate reduction of the tax on imports and an economical expenditure of the public money in all departments of the Government.
> Resolved, That we believe, with Lincoln and the Republican party of 1860, "that, while providing revenue for the support of the General Government by duties upon imports, sound policy requires such adjustment of these imposts as to encourage the development of the industrial interests of the whole country; and we commend that policy of national exchanges which secures to the workingmen liberal wages, to agriculture remunerative prices, to mechanics and manufacturers an adequate reward for their skill, labor, and enterprise, and to the nation commercial prosperity and independence," and to obtain these desired results we believe the present tariff laws should be fairly and impartially revised, and adjusted in the interest of the whole people—the consumer as well as the manufacturer and producer—and the tax on imports greatly reduced; that all raw material not produced in this country, and not in direct competition with our own productions and the labor of our own people, and lumber, salt, and sugar should be placed permanently on the free-list; and other products in direct competition with American skill, labor, and enterprise, should be so adjusted as to cover their increased cost of manufacture and production in this country over the cost of such articles in foreign countries, and no more.
>
> Resolved, That the honest laborer is entitled to greater protection than the dishonest capitalist—the latter can take care of himself.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] says:

> The advocates of protection tell us that the country has grown rich under this system. True, it has grown rich; but where is the wealth? In the hands of the few, while poverty abides in the homes of the many. Why is it that the great masses of the people have no share in the wealth that has been wrought by their hands? Of what benefit is it to us as a nation to pour millions into the coffers of the few, when it only increases their power for greater extortions from the many?

These questions are of such vital importance that it is to be regretted that the gentleman did not at least attempt to answer them himself.

Is wealth in free-trade England so much more generally distributed that we should adopt her precepts and follow her example? My own observation has been that this protected country has a less number of the very poor in proportion to its population than any country I have seen. We have received into this country thirteen millions of the poor of other nations, and if they all are not now rich they have at least been relieved from destitution. Will the gentleman point to any free-trade country with such a record?

But where is the wealth? Who are the few whose accumulations have been extorted from the many? Some of our fellow-citizens have grown rich by the advance in real estate, some in manufacturing, and some in the management of flocks and herds; and in the communities where they live they are generally considered examples of industry worthy of imitation. Their wealth is the result of honest and legitimate enterprise. Other names than theirs spring involuntarily to the lips at the mention of the unequal distribution of wealth.

When the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee wished to cite a man "able to pay his boot-black $500 a day" he named Mr. Jay Gould; when he referred to one "able to pay his hostler $10,000 a year" he named Mr. Vanderbilt. It was in telegraph, transportation, Standard Oil monopolies, in business unaffected by the tariff that the greatest fortunes have been accumulated; and these men are the very ones whom free trade will benefit by increasing the distance between producer and consumer. The Democratic proposition is to add to the fortunes of those who control transportation by carrying our corn to England and bringing back her manufactures. The Republicans advocate building factories near the growing corn.

TRUSTS.

With like disingenuousness "trusts" have been thrown into this debate, as though they were related to the tariff and not to the Democratic party. There was no such thing as a "trust" connected with imports or any article touched by the tariff during the whole twenty-four years in which the Republicans were in power. The Peoria Journal says:

The Democratic party found the country free from "trusts" with but one exception—the Standard Oil Company. During the last three years we have heard more about the combinations of capital against labor than ever before. We have the sugar trust, the zinc trust, the envelope trust, and the Lord only knows how many more trusts have sprung into existence during the last two or three years, and that, too, upon articles that are protected by a heavy tariff. One of these, the sugar trust, will cost the people of these United States $60,000,000 annually, and it is openly espoused and fostered by both Houses of Congress—Republican and Democratic alike.

The undeniable facts stated as to the growth of trusts under Democratic rule is coupled with an assertion in regard to Congress which is novel. For my part, I repudiate the sugar and every trust intended to raise the price or in any manner monopolize the necessaries of life as contrary to public policy. Our laws must protect us against home trusts; our tariff against foreign trusts.

EXECUTIVE HOBGOBLINS.

But aside from the "trusts" which have been recently organized, there are many other reasons for doubting whether the highest prosperity will attend the country under Democratic rule. Laws resting upon principles distasteful to the party in power are not likely to produce satisfactory results. The country should be guided by its friends, and the execution of the laws should not be intrusted to those who believe them to be "vicious, inequitable, illogical, and unjust."

A large discretion is necessarily intrusted to the executive Government, and if those in power exercise that discretion, so as to defeat wise appropriations or refuse to pay out the surplus in canceling the indebtedness of the country on purpose to compel a change of the laws according to English theories, the officers should be changed.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the war we were struggling under an enormous debt which enemies maliciously predicted would never be paid. The Government addressed itself with the same earnestness to re-establishing its credit as it had to re-establishing its authority. Having accomplished that and filled the Treasury to overflowing, it was but natural to suppose that measures for the general welfare, not before possible, would be recommended for the action of Congress. I have touched upon some of the more important of them, telegraphic communication, transportation, the internal water ways, the ocean marine, and the consideration due the soldiers who defended the State. Other governments in times of peace and prosperity devote especial care to these objects, and there is not a civilized government in existence to-day except our own which neglects them.

But these are questions calculated neither to delude Mugwumps, satisfy Wall-street money operators, nor arouse Democratic partisanship, and therefore in place of them have been substituted civil service, silver coinage, and the tariff. To each of these subjects in turn is assigned the exaggerated importance and unenviable honor of threatening the Republic with destruction and disaster. In President Cleveland's first message the dangers arising from Jacksonian Democrats aspiring in a free country to hold public office was thus described:

Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which, upon every change of administration, inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of the Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

I have already quoted the predictions of "disaster" and "danger" to the Republic waiting "upon a continuation of the present silver coinage," and we are now assailed by the mythical terrors of a tariff.

To patriotic Americans devoted to the progress and glory of the Republic, to those who have demonstrated their willingness to shed their blood or lay down their lives in its defense, the solemn declaration of the Chief Executive that the country is in danger is a startling message calculated to excite profound concern. This generation has been confronted with all the responsibilities arising from such a peril, and many of them have been subjected to the rigid rule of war which decrees death to him who sounds a false alarm. Why was the long roll beaten, and against what was the country to be defended? Against the civil service of President Jackson; against a silver coinage which existed from the beginning of the Government, and which attracted no attention until we felt the disastrous effects of stopping it; against a tariff under which the country has prospered beyond the wildest dreams of prophecy.

We are told that the marvelous prosperity of this country since 1861 was not due to Republican policy, but has come in spite of it. The Pharisees of the Democratic party perceive that their creed is in danger, and though unable to deny that prosperity and progress distinguished every year of Republican rule, yet lift their hands in holy horror at the suggestion that it was due to the party in power. Addressing their partisans, who were blind, but now see that the truth conflicts with the Democratic creed, they exclaim, "Give the natural resources all the praise; we know that the Republican party is a sinner."

To develop these national resources was the Republican purpose—a purpose which the Democratic reactionary creed declares to be unconstitutional. It was protection to home industries—agricultural and mechanical—free land to homesteaders, and the creation of a currency when money was found to be too scarce to carry on the business of the country; it was the prompt and wise governmental expenditures for necessary objects made by the Republican party in spite of Democratic protests and resistance which not merely saved the Union but placed it in the front rank of nations.

It should not be forgotten that when the Republicans came into power the Government had neither money nor credit; they left it with an overflowing Treasury and peerless credit. The false economy of the Democratic party since it has returned to power has hoarded money idly in the Treasury, curtailed the circulating medium, and squeezed the life out of the business of the country for the purpose of overthrowing the American policy, or, as it was expressed by an eloquent Illinois Irishman, in order to "put out the furnace fires in America and light them on a foreign soil." [Applause.]

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Chairman, the State which I have the honor in part to represent is essentially a manufacturing one. The cheap wheat, corn, pork, and beef of the West have made farming a subsidiary occupation. There was a time when the farmers of Connecticut took from the soil enough for their own State and to spare for others, but this time has gone, and were it not for the markets made for the minor products of their soil, as well as the peculiar adaptability of the land for the cultivation of specific articles, the farmers' occupation would be gone.

Nothing so well illustrates the success of the Western farmer, with his many advantages in the great crops, as the decadence of the Connecticut agriculturist in the same pursuit, and nowhere can a stronger argument be found, if we care to reason by analogy, for looking with suspicion upon foreign nations who, with cheap labor as their advantage, can bring about a similar result. The lesson within the limits of this country is one to which we can take no exceptions, indeed we all glory in the success of the West and the growing greatness of the South, but we can draw a moral from it, and that moral leads one to the inevitable conclusion that the problem differs when we view it from an international standpoint. We must allow the advantages of situation to rule between the States, although we can not allow England to dictate our commercial policy or hand over to Europe the opportunity to put a price upon our labor.

Mr. Chairman, as I said before, my district is a manufacturing one, filled with busy industries, populated with men who are compelled to toil in order that they may eat; and with workmen who, by their skill and ingenuity, have helped to make Connecticut known all over this land. This is also true of the whole State, and it is for this reason that the outcome of this discussion is watched with so much interest, and why I desire to voice what I take to be the sentiments of those who sent me here.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to base my appeal upon the shifting sands of figures. This House has been inundated with statements and bombarded with statistics. Perhaps they prove something and perhaps they do not. Arithmetic is usually supposed to be exact, but when the science of making figures support arguments is called upon in a tariff discussion the honors seem to be very easy. The statesman who can, with the aid of a few characters, demonstrate that a reduction of duty on a certain article 50 per cent. means a corresponding diminution of revenue may be ingenious, although I hardly think he is wise.

There is one item within the domain of computation, however, which allows of no contradiction. It is doubtless true that within a few months the surplus in the vaults of the Treasury will be at least $130,000,000, and it follows that if Congress does not devise some method by which these vaults can be opened and the funds disseminated among the people the result will be an extremely disastrous one. The circulating medium which was free is none too small for the good of the country, but if it is to be locked up at the rate of over $2,000,000 a week the inevitable result will be ruin and disaster. This is freely admitted, and it is also acknowledged that there is but one cure for the trouble, one panacea for the evil—reduction of taxation.

Just here appears to be the division of sentiment; for the protective idea enters as an element in the controversy, and men may differ as to the wants of their particular districts, although admitting that it would not be wise to ignore the demands of other locations. The people whom I represent do not object to a reduction of revenue—indeed, they demand it. They do ask, however, that it be accompanied with a proper regard for their needs. They are not philosophers. They look at life from the practical, not the theoretical, standpoint. Their chief aim is to secure a livelihood; they are content to gain that, for the competition in the labor market, which our Republican friends seem to regard with so much complacency, puts the price of labor at the lowest point. They do not spend much time in studying the census reports; they are not adepts in discussing economic points; they have had no time in the busy struggle for existence to become visionaries, while their reading has not, in but few cases, included any one of that line of writers, from Adam Smith to Professor Sumner or Henry George, who seem to be quoted so much now. They are not averse to a reduction of the tariff provided it is a judicious one, and provided it leaves margin enough to protect them from the condition which many crossed the sea to escape. They recognize that even with the higher prices of labor which obtain here there is much which they produce which can be put upon the free-list if needs be, but they also are forced to the conclusion that there is still need of a duty on some articles.

They accept that declaration in the national Democratic platform of 1884 as sound doctrine, which states that in the revision of the revenue laws the industrial interests of the country shall be guarded and labor protected against the cheaper prices of labor in Europe. They do not believe in monopolies, they desire to have the needs of labor fully recognized in legislation which affects either national or international problems, but they want no law passed which interferes with the price of their labor; and they are firm in their convictions that the dignity of the workingman should be upheld by not accepting as a criterion any condition of things or any country which debases the employé or looks upon all labor as a system of serfdom. In other words, they do not regard protection as a fetich—the time has passed for that—although they do not discard it as a system which is an element in the problem of their existence. The worship has changed to respect, but the respect is deep seated, and it has a reason for its existence in this form.

No class of persons can be relied upon to favor the reduction or abolition of a customs duty if it fosters or upholds a monopoly, or if it leads to excessive or burdensome profits which are taken from the people, more than the average voter in New England; while on the other hand this same class will object most strenuously to a reduction which takes a fair return from capital and puts labor at a disadvantage. Therefore I say, gentlemen, that I favor a judicious revision of the taxes imposed on imports. Many of them are high and can be reduced; others can be abolished altogether, with good results, in my opinion, while there are some which should not be interfered with. In other words, I think I am in line with those who sent me here, and in accord with the best sentiment of my State, when I say that what we want, and what the majority on this side of the House is disposed to give us, is a tariff which protects when protection can be shown to be a necessity—not a tariff which pampers or gives riches to one while it aids in making many poorer.

In illustration of this point—the necessity of a proper discrimination—allow me to call your attention to one industry which the bill under consideration treats, I imagine by an oversight, rather rigorously, and this becomes a better illustration when I allude to the fact that the article under consideration is made by manufacturers who in several instances make other goods in the main. They are not asking for protection on the major part of their output, and yet it is given them, while on the minor portion, where it is needed, the bill deprives them of it. I allude to the manufacture of the article commercially known as wood-screws, which are used by every carpenter and wood-worker in the country, and which are made from iron rods by automatic machinery. This industry has practically grown up in this country since 1861, and although the tariff of 1883 reduced the duty it has managed to continue in existence. It employs $5,000,000 in capital in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, and produces a product of $2,000,000 each year. It was for a time assisted by the patents on its machinery, but these have now expired.

The natural competition has reduced the price 60 per cent. within the last few years, while the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee now proposes to increase the duty on the iron rods from sixtenths to 1 cent a pound, and at the same time reduce that on the finished article about 50 per cent., or to 35 per cent. ad valorem.

That such a reduction would be ruinous to the business is self-evident. It is simply necessary to study the following table, giving the distribution of the cost of the article, to prove it:

Labor	40½
Material:
Duty on	16½
Rods	31
Other expenses, excluding profit	12

It will easily be seen by the above that any reduction in cost must be met by a corresponding decrease in wages, the other elements being fixed; and to illustrate the competition which must be met, I call your attention to the following table, which places the cost of production of the sizes which are classified under the sections of the present law—not the selling price, but the cost of manufacture—in contradistinction to the English export price:

Clause 12c.—Average of twenty sizes:
One gross United States cost to produce	.0624
One gross English export price	.0366
Difference	.0258 = 70 per cent.
Clause 10c.—Average of thirty-six sizes:
One gross United States cost to produce	.1076
One gross English export price	.0613
Difference	.0463 = 75 per cent.
Clause 8c.—Average of fifty-three sizes:
One gross United States cost to produce	.2240
English export price	.1189
Difference	.1051 = 88 per cent.
Clause 6c.—Average of seventy-six sizes:
One gross United States cost to produce	.7089
English export price	.4209
Difference	.2880 = 70 per cent.

Thus the English list, with the discounts of 80, 2½, and 5 per cent. on 185 sizes averages 73 per cent. less than United States cost to produce.

The labor is done by automatic machinery, the human aid necessary being low priced, and it is just this point which makes the reduction all the more oppressive. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] alluded in eloquent terms the other day to the change which had been accomplished by American ingenuity and the skill of the American inventor.

If we could confine the results of this skill to our own country in this case the tariff tax would be a question of no moment, but with American machines running in Italy, as they now are, Mr. Chairman, and with Italian labor at from 10 to 20 cents a day, when similar labor costs here from 50 to 60 cents, protection becomes a vital matter. It resolves itself into a simple question of the cost of labor in this country and in Europe, and the result is inevitable. I desire, Mr. Chairman, in order that this House may have a better conception of this matter than I have had time to give it, to submit the following:

THE WOOD-SCREW MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY.

In the bill to reduce taxation, etc., introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. MILLS from the Committee on Ways and Means, on page 20, lines 275 and 276, it reads:

"Screws, commonly called wood-screws, 35 per cent. ad valorem."

Except under very great reduction in the price paid to American labor, it will be impossible to continue the manufacture of wood-screws in the United States if this becomes a law; and therefore, in behalf of the great number of American workmen employed at remunerative wages in the manufacture of wood-screws, the capital invested in the business, located in six different States, the great cost of special intricate machinery, worthless for other purposes than screw manufacture, we ask that this clause be stricken from the Mills bill; and in support thereof your considerate attention is respectfully invited to the following statements:

The first screw factory of importance in the United States was established in 1838, or fifty years ago.

From 1838 until 1860, during the period of great depression in general manufacturing business, consequent in part on the very slight duties on foreign importations, numerous wood-screw industries were started in the United States, but at the end of this period the two surviving companies of any importance, and they the owners of valuable letters patent upon wood-screw machinery, consolidated their capital and plants into one corporation.

Under the letters patents then controlled by this one company on screw-making machinery, including also a patent on a gimlet-point screw there were during the continuance of the life of these letters patent, no successful results following attempts made by other parties to manufacture wood-screws, and there is not now in existence in the United States but one other screw-manufacturing company that started into the business prior to 1870, but the whole way was strewn with wrecks of earnest endeavors to found the business.

Under this condition of things, the tariff of 8 and 11 cents per pound, according to size, on wood-screws, was adopted in 1861, which rates continued until changed by the present law, enacted in 1883, effecting considerable reduction in the average duties imposed.

There are more than six hundred sizes, lengths, and kinds of wood screws, in the regular assortment ranging from ¼-inch, No. 0, to 6-inch, No. 30, made from iron, brass, and bronze wire, each size and length of different list price, and each kind of different discount; and the detailed knowledge and labor necessary to justly fix an ad valorem duty on each invoice of screws imported would be so great that a wide door will be opened to fraudulent importations. Under the present law it is only necessary to determine within which of the four classes of rates the importations may come by length and the weight included in each class of lengths to correctly fix the duties thereon.

During the period from 1861 to 1875 inclusive the average net price per gross of wood-screws was about 33 cents, the price varying higher or lower at different periods during the several years. It was prior to the close of this period, when, it is now alleged, a portion of the then existing makers induced the English makers, for a consideration, not to export their screws to this country. The principal screw makers at that time in England were Nettleford & Chamberlain, of Birmingham, who then owned the English letters patent on the latest and most improved screw machinery, as well as the English patent on the gimlet-point screw. The Nettleford & Chamberlain Company has since that period, with other English companies, been consolidated into the present corporation, the Nettlefords Company, Limited, Birmingham, England.

The statements regarding the peculiar arrangement between the American companies and the Nettleford & Chamberlain Company seems to have reached the general public through after-dinner remarks made by Mr. Chamberlain at a dinner given him in Birmingham, England, last November, upon the eve of his departure for America as English commissioner upon the fisheries questions pending between the United States and Canada; and also through other statements made while he was in Washington; and it does not appear that the English party is not now desirous of renewing the arrangement.

Whatever may be the truth in the matter, it is safe to say the amount involved has been greatly overstated, and whatever onus there may be should bear alike on both parties to the transaction, and certainly should not and can not justly attach to the screw industries of this country at this time, because three-quarters of the screw companies now in existence were not then manufacturers of screws, and only a portion of those then in existence are alleged to have been participants in the transaction. From the year 1876 to the close of the year 1887 wood-screws have averaged in price about 15 cents per gross, being only 40 per cent. of the average price during the previous term of years while the business was protected by the letters patents on screw machinery.

During the last term of years the sharp competition among American manufacturers has held the price so low that the most favorably located companies have not earned more than an average of 8 per cent. per annum on their investments, while many have realized much less, and several have wholly abandoned the business. The largest screw manufactory in the United States paid to its stockholders no return whatever after January 1, 1884, until January, 1888, and then only 1 per cent. on its capital stock, yet this company is believed by many now to be making large profits and to be a "great screw monopoly," which monopoly, in fact, existed only while under the protection of letters patents prior to 1875, and no company has since that date had any monopoly of the screw business.

There are now in the United States fourteen companies manufacturing wood screws—two in Massachusetts, one in Rhode Island, seven in Connecticut, one in Pennsylvania, two in Ohio, and one in Illinois.

The industry employs directly more than thirty-five hundred people and an active capital in excess of $5,000,000, not including a large amount on which no returns are expected, but which has been sunk in machinery supplanted by other machines having latest improvements. A large share of this entire capital has been invested in the business since the tariff of 1861 and more than two-thirds of the aggregate since 1874.

Whatever may be the statistical average of increase of the cost of labor in this country over that of similar labor in foreign countries, it is true of this industry that the screw manufacturers of the United States pay their labor three times as much as the same labor, male or female, is paid in Italy, two and one-half times as much as in Germany or Belgium, twice as much as in France, and nearly twice as much as in England.

Substantially the same pattern of machinery, known as the Hartford machines, which combine the best features used in screw machinery prior to the expiration of letters patent, with later improvements made, are in use as pattern machines in the screw-works in the various foreign countries. The latest shipment of pattern machines was made to Norway within the past few months.

There can be no considerable difference in the productive capacity of the machine, whether it be operated in the United States or in any foreign country—the speed of the machine is controlled by the motive power which determines the rapidity of production—and certainly our foreign competitors are not behind us in the perfection of their motive power; consequently a day's cheap labor operating this machine in any foreign country will produce the same number of and just as good screws as a day's well-paid labor in the United States.

The wire from which the screws are made, which to the screw-maker is raw material, costs about double in this country over that of England and Germany. The rods from which the wire is drawn are now protected $\frac{5}{8}$ of one cent per pound, equal to about 50 per cent. ad valorem, and if the Mills bill contemplates an increase of $\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, on screw-wire rods, making a new rate of one cent, which equals about 80 per cent. ad valorem, an additional burden will be laid upon the screw business. Other materials used in preparing the goods for market show about the same excess in cost over that used abroad, as is shown in the wire, and this, too, is wholly the product of American labor. Notwithstanding the great reduction in market value of screws during the past twelve years, there has not been any reduction in the gold cost of labor during these years over the cost of labor during the previous period of fifteen years.

There is no margin whatever for the reduction of the tariff on wood-screws without seriously crippling the industry, and unless corresponding reduction be made in the cost of American labor a reduction in the tariff will absolutely destroy the business, wipe out a large part of the investments, and transfer the manufacture of screws to foreign territory. During the tariff agitation of 1861 to 1883, fearing untoward legislation, the American Screw Company of Providence removed a portion of its machinery to Canada, and has recently built new and enlarged works there, preparing, in the event of a reduced tariff here, to manufacture, with Canadian labor and free material, wood-screws to supply the American markets, and this while Canada protects its screw manufacturers by a tariff fully equal in effect to the present American duty on screws. Besides this, such legislation would, while closing the American market against American labor, open wide the doors for the inflow of screws from all foreign countries.

The manufacturers of wood screws do not knock at the door of Congress asking for special legislation to promote an infant industry nor to so legislate that their investments be specially profitable; but they do ask that they may retain their American workmen at fair wages in this industry; that their capital, some of it contributed by widows and orphans as their only means of support, invested in the business when the laws of the United States afforded reasonable protection against cheap foreign labor, capital largely expended in valuable and intricate special machinery, worthless for other than screw-making purposes, shall not by any legislation be destroyed and their industry banished from the United States and their employés driven to seek and learn other trades or find other employment less remunerative to themselves.

But rather that the law shall remain as now, in the enactment of 1883, affording reasonable wages to labor, a fair return upon the capital employed in this American industry, and thus "strengthen the things that remain."

All of which is respectfully submitted in behalf of the screw manufacturers of the United States.

MAY 5, 1888.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to become an exile from the district which sent me here, and if I were to vote for the proposal before the House in regard to this industry I certainly would deserve to be. Not caring to be an Ishmaelite, I can not vote to put myself on record as against the interests of my district. There are thirty-five hundred people engaged in the manufacture of wood screws. Two-thirds of this number are employed in Connecticut, and fifteen hundred of these are to-day at work in the city where I reside. Their interest is my interest; their reasonable desires are my motives, and I can not look upon any reform with favor which exacts as a requisite that the source of livelihood which these people now have should be tumbled in ruin upon them, as was Pompeii upon its residents.

And while I am discussing this point may I not allude to the impression that has wrongfully been given out in certain locations and has been more than once alluded to on this floor? I refer to the idea that this whole country is being drained of its substance for the benefit of the manufacturer, and that this class are the Shylocks of the times. If the majority of this House were as familiar with this portion of the people of New England as I they would hesitate before giving credence to such ideas and halt before they turned to indiscriminate reductions of duties for relief. It is true that many manufacturers have become rich men; but did the tariff aid them? In nine cases out of ten the answer is no.

You ask what did, and I reply by stating that you will find the true cause of rapid enrichment in the monopolies which the patent laws offer. These laws give a protection which is out of the reach of any law reducing duties to restrict. They give the producer the privilege of charging what he pleases for his wares, and in them we have the foundation of almost every one of the colossal fortunes which have been made by manufacturers of late. I do not care to discuss the justice of the present patent laws at this time, but I do desire to call the attention of the House to the erroneous assumption that the tariff and the protection which it gives allows one class to levy tribute upon another. Where competition rules in manufacturing the inevitable result is a cheapening of prices and a reduction of profits.

If you will honestly and in candor inquire into the question of profits you will find that a great number of American manufacturing establishments pay no dividends at all in some instances for several successive years. Others pay much less than the current rate of interest, and what justification the facts give for this talk about the enormous profits made is difficult to see. There is any amount of latent capital awaiting investment at 6 or even 5 per cent., and this capital will rush like air into a vacuum if it can be shown that dividends at such rates will be paid.

The idea that a protective tariff brings enormous profits in its train should be exploded. It is false, pernicious, and misleading, and has no reason behind it in these days of fierce strife for the market and constant competition between manufacturers. It can in no way be upheld except by ascribing to it the profits of monopolists, the result of brains, the outcome of indefatigable labor and study, or of business skill and shrewdness. Such results in dollars and cents the tariff can not abate, and if a desire rules to regulate these elements—the ones which are the source of all great returns—it must make itself felt outside of tariff legislation. If these elements are an evil to be fought, the tariff club is certainly not the weapon to be taken up against them. It would be simply a repetition of the contest between David and Goliah.

All this has been used as the argument of the Southern and Western farmer. I do not find fault with my associates for defending the farmers, although I do object to the putting of false arguments in their mouths. The truth is most potent, and the farmer is not being levied upon in any such ratio as is represented to him. But if this sympathy is genuine why should it not be universal? Why is the farmer in the East exempted from its embrace? What have the agriculturists in Connecticut done to put them away from the effects of this gentle dew of commiseration?

It seems to me, under the circumstances, their Western and Southern brethren in occupation having taken from them the chance to profitably cultivate the great crops, that they are entitled to a greater portion of this intense desire to alleviate the burdens of their class than those of any other State. Has this been the result? No. Does the bill under consideration embody it? No; on the contrary, it seems to single them out to bear the greatest burden, and exacts from them more concessions than it asks from any mechanical industry. I believe this to be an unintentional error, but it is an error nevertheless which would do great damage, as I think I can show.

Our farmers have one source of revenue which nature seems to have guarantied to them in the cultivation of tobacco suitable for the manufacture of cigars. The tobaccos of different States have different qualities, and while the Carolinas, Virginia, and Kentucky produce a crop which enters into the composition of manufactured tobacco, it remains for Connecticut and New York in the main to furnish the leaf of which cigars are made.

The proposed bill proposes to reduce the duty on leaf-tobacco from 75 to 35 cents a pound, and while I know these distinctions are odious, I ask you to examine the effect of this reduction from a sectional point of view. We will take, if you please, three of the States producing tobacco which is used in the composition of manufactured tobacco, Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina, and compare their crops with that of the cigar tobacco grown in Connecticut. The last census puts it as follows:

	Pounds.
Kentucky	171,120,840
Virginia	80,000,000
North Carolina	26,986,218
Connecticut	14,044,062

The relative importance of these States as tobacco producers can be seen at a glance, and yet this proposed reduction affects Connecticut and the leaf-producing States alone for the very simple reason that the other States all export their crop in large quantities. Even now with the present rate of duty Sumatra tobacco, used for cigars alone, has greatly reduced the price of the Connecticut product; 3,651,349 pounds were imported within the last fiscal year alone. Listen to the following figures, which give the imports and exports for the three months ending December 31, 1887:

Imported: 6,638,477 pounds, valued at	$1,394,809
Exported: 60,130,362 pounds, valued at	5,295,047

It will thus be seen that one sort of tobacco is exported largely, while another is imported. The latter is the quality which comes in direct competition with leaf-tobacco, and it is now proposed to increase this competition and drive Connecticut farmers out of the field.

It is simply a question whether a Dutch syndicate or the American farmer be given the preference, whether this tobacco is to be grown by cooly labor or American citizens; and as for me I have no hesitation in declaring in favor of the farmer who tills our land, pays his taxes here, and is with us and of us. It pleases me to say that the farmers who produce tobacco are practically in unison on this issue as far as I can learn. There is no desire on the part of the Southern farmer who is not financially troubled by this proposed reduction to have his Northern and Western brothers wrecked by it. He can see no reason why the difference in soil and the consequent difference in product should create invidious distinctions. He wants justice to tobacco-raisers as a class, and he does not accept his own immunity as all that is necessary, but allows his desires to cover all classes and to extend to all locations.

The farmers who cultivate tobacco have for years been clamoring for an abolition of the internal-revenue tax upon their manufactured product, and in this cry the interests of all sections have been united. They think that the $30,108,067.13 which was last year collected is an odious tax and a restriction upon their calling which the needs of the Government do not warrant. This cry has but partially been heeded by the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee. They have recommended that the tax be taken from manufactured tobacco, but fail to complete the work commenced by making it thorough. Is there any reason why this reform should stop at the door of the Connecticut farmer or leave his crop and its product as a spared monument to remind the people of the war period? None at all.

The committee have admitted, by the partial action which they have taken, that this theory is a good one, and there is no reason why they should halt when it is but partially exemplified. This becomes all the more apparent when we note that the justice of the farmer's claim is admitted by a recommendation that the restrictions be taken from him and that he be allowed to sell his crop to whom he pleases. The committee evidently desire to do this, but the results will not follow their intentions. The only way in which this can be practically accomplished is to allow all, who have the skill, to make cigars—thus is the market thrown open in truth and not in theory. As long as the present restrictions remain the market is in the hands of monopolists who can make prices at their own option, as they have done, and the farmer is still at their mercy.

It seems anomalous to reflect upon the results of a bill which endeavors to do justice, but alters no condition now obtaining. It offers the farmer the right to sell to whom he pleases in one clause, while in another it says that the number of persons who can buy or use his tobacco shall be practically limited. It would be just as reasonable to restrict the number of millers and then state that a wheat-producer could sell to any one. People who have no use for commodities do not usually buy them, and the privilege of selling to purchasers who do not want to buy is rather a barren one.

There is no alternative. If this House desires to give the farmer the same right to sell his tobacco that he now has to dispose of his wheat, it can be done practically in no other way than by a total abolition of the tax on the manufactured product. There are no better students of this problem than the men who have to cope with it every day, and as a result of their experience I submit the following resolution, adopted by the New England Tobacco-Growers' Association, October 29, 1887:

Resolved, That we unanimously favor and aggressively demand the abolition of all internal-revenue taxes on tobacco and all internal restrictions on the tobacco trade. In short, we demand free leaf of our own growing. We have submitted patiently and patriotically to the present war tax, but now that (happily) the occasion for it no longer exists, we emphatically protest against it and the restrictions and monopolies the internal-revenue system fosters in the tobacco industry.

Looking at this proposed law from the standpoint of the tax-collector develops a fact which is sufficient to condemn it. If it is thought best to collect a tax on cigars, nothing should be done to interfere with the thorough and efficient administration of the law. This, under the bill proposed, would be impossible. The restriction upon the farmer gives the data for the collection of the tax; that was the reason of its imposition, and without it no check remains or no guard exists by which manufacturers who retail can be compelled to pay their full proportion of tax if they see fit to evade the law. That it would put the large manufacturer who wholesales and the dealer who retails at the mercy of the ones who manufacture and also retail is self-evident, and as the tax is $3 per thousand, it can easily be seen that the temptation is great so to do.

It surely puts a premium on fraud and extends an opportunity for swindling without a possible chance of detection. The effect of the revenue tax on tobacco and cigars is a subject with which the people of Connecticut are familiar; the sentiment in favor of its total abolition has been gradually growing as the cause of the evils which it fosters and breeds has been investigated, and as the latest crystallization of this sentiment I present the following section of the platform adopted by the Democracy of my State at a convention held but one week since:

Resolved, That the Democracy of Connecticut respectfully appeal to Congress to so amend the internal-revenue taxes as to permit producers of tobacco to dispose of their crops as the farmers are permitted to dispose of their wheat, and that every individual or family may be permitted to manufacture our leaf-tobacco without being subjected to arrest, fine, or imprisonment as criminals.

But there is another argument which can be advanced in regard to the reform which I hope to see incorporated in this bill, and that is the one put forward by the workingmen. Thirty years ago when our farmer marketed his crop as he pleased, and when any person who could make cigars was allowed to do so without being hampered, there were at least thirty persons making cigars in the district I have the honor to represent where there is one now. The tax has fortified the monopolists so strongly and aided the large manufacturers so materially that the individual has had to succumb.

The mechanic is denied the right to exercise his calling by a Government that exacts a tribute which it has no use for. He is compelled to give bonds to submit to a surveillance almost inquisitorial, to regulate his business by a law which he can not interpret, and in addition he must keep his accounts to the satisfaction of the guardian which the Government appoints to watch him. This, gentlemen, is the only branch of business in which a mechanic must have two trades in order to get a living by following one, for if he be never so good a cigar-maker he must of needs have a knowledge of book-keeping before his trade can be used. If he desires to exercise that privilege which all Americans are supposed to have, the laudable ambition to be his own master, he is debarred. He lives in fear of the collector and in the shadow of the jail. He turns to the law for information, to quiet his fears and dispel his apprehensions, and his consolation reads as follows:

He (the violator) shall, in addition to the penalties elsewhere provided in this title for such offenses, forfeit to the United States all raw material and manufactured or partly manufactured tobacco and cigars, and all machinery, tools, implements, apparatus, fixtures, boxes, barrels, and all other materials which shall be found in his possession or in his manufactory, and used in his business as such manufacturer, together with his estate or interest in the building or factory and the lot or tract of ground on which such factory or building is located, and all appurtenances thereunto belonging.

This is but a sample. It is simply the penalty for having in his possession an empty cigar-box on which the stamp has not been destroyed. I could, if I had the time, give you many more choice selections from the cigar-makers Koran, but the above will convey a general idea of their rigor and positiveness. If he keeps out of jail he is extremely fortunate, and if he is not driven out of business by the milder punishment of a fine he congratulates himself. He is watched, harassed, treated as a thief, and compelled to disclose the results of his business by stating to whom his goods are sold and incidentally what prices they bring. He finally deserts the contest in despair, he can not compete with his greater rivals, and he relapses into his old state of dependency. His ambition is crushed, his hopes are wrecked, and he naturally looks upon the Government as the instrumentality. And all this is possible in free America!

That this system of taxation has never been popular is a truth, and that it would be particularly oppressive if no part of it but that which applies to the growers and manufacturers of cigar-tobacco was allowed to remain must be apparent. We can go back to 1875 in the reports of the Commissioners of Internal Revenue and discover that Hon. D. D. Pratt, then acting, denounced the law in the following words:

These forms of taxation have never met with popular favor, and, with the exception of the present revenue law, have never maintained their footing upon the statute-book for any considerable time. The tax-gatherer from earliest history has been an unwelcome presence and his business an ungracious one. His office is inquisitorial in its very nature, leading to inquiries into people's affairs, the condition of their business, their losses and gains, matters which most people prefer keeping secret from the public. The process of assessment and collection is summary, involving in case of delinquency penalties and sacrifice of property. The tax is a palpable thing to be paid, or some cherished possession is to be sold to meet it.

No circumstances of poverty, misfortune, sickness, or death stay the distraint. Injustice in the assessment itself is relievable only by a circuitous process, involving first an application for abatement, next an application for a refund after the tax is paid or collected, and, these being overruled, an appeal to the courts against the collector. Here at last the claimant, who has insisted that he either owed no tax at all, or a tax less than that demanded, collects from the Government what he has compulsorily paid, but frequently at the expense of ruinous delay and sacrifice.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I desire but to say in closing that the people of Connecticut desire a reduction of the revenue to the needs of the Government. They desire, as I have said before, that that portion which is to come from customs duties shall be deducted with discrimination. They are of the opinion that no sacrifices should be made to obtain a visionary foreign trade, and they think that when an odious tax can be removed with no attendant result but good it should be done. They fail to see why the farmers and men with one particular trade should be singled out for oppression by taxation, and they urge emphatically that justice shall be extended to all. This is their belief, and I hope the results reached by this House will indorse it. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, at the commencement of the debate upon this bill it was not my intention to take any of the time of the House for the expression of my views; but since the gentlemen upon the other side have so grossly misrepresented the condition of things, as I conceive them to be, at least in Michigan, a part of which I have the honor to represent, and when I see them unwilling to meet this issue in a manly way, Mr. Chairman, I consider it a duty to state, in as brief a manner as possible, in what condition of prosperity, in my opinion, this bill finds us after twenty-five years of Republican control, and what will be its effect should it become a law.

Mr. Chairman, I view with concern and regret, the present and rapidly increasing inequalities existing among our people. And it seems to me that the man who is unable to discover, or who willingly closes his eyes to this most unfortunate tendency in our social life, is unworthy the inheritance bequeathed him by the founders of our Government. And he who does not know that it is the result of iniquitous class laws has given the social and political aspect of our country but little consideration. Allow me to call your attention to the warning of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], delivered February 15, 1878, in the United States Senate. Mr. INGALLS said:

We can not disguise the truth that we are on the verge of an impending revolution;

THE OLD ISSUES ARE DEAD.

Mr. Chairman, how strangely this contrasts with this gentleman's recent brutal attack upon the honored memories of McClellan and Hancock, for the evident purpose of reviving these "dead issues;" and how eagerly the members upon this floor, in weak imitation of their chief, harangue this House, and through it the country at large, about "slavery," the "ignorance," the "violence," and the "fraud of the South," and the "evil designs" of the "Confederate brigadiers," all for one purpose—to trade upon men's prejudices rather than their intelligence. Mr. Chairman, there is another side to this charge against the solid South. While I admit that the South came out of the war crippled and impoverished, feeling greater need for the lessening of unnecessary and burdensome taxation, still, gentlemen, let me read to you the tariff plank of the Greenback party of Michigan, adopted at the convention in 1886. It reads as follows:

The Constitution expressly declares that Congress shall have power to levy a tariff for revenue; therefore we declare that we favor a constitutional tariff for revenue so adjusted as to afford protection to such industries as employ labor without creating monopoly of any kind or increasing the burden of other industries; and a tariff based upon the selfish idea of protection to any particular individual business or branch of industry at the expense or to the detriment of others is not only unconstitutional, at variance with the true theory of the Government, which is equality of persons and property before the law, but unjust and oppressive to the laboring and consuming classes of the country and directly calculated to destroy industrial enterprise, establish manufacturing corporations, and build up colossal fortunes for the few at the expense of the many, and we denounce it as hypocritical, oppressive, and unjust.

Does not this furnish ample proof that it is not the South alone that desires, that asks this relief for her people? This party cast some 40,000 votes in Michigan, and upon this question is in direct sympathy with the Democratic party, and, Mr. Chairman, I give it as my deliberate conviction that if we were to have a fair expression at the polls in November next upon this tariff question, uninfluenced by the money of the millionaires, made such by protection, Michigan would not send one Republican to the Fifty-first Congress. The people of Michigan want cheaper food, clothing, lumber, and farming implements. They are aware that they can escape the whisky and tobacco tax, if they so desire, by leaving these articles alone, and they also know that Congress alone has the power to furnish them the cheaper necessaries of life.

Mr. Chairman, let me quote further from the speech of the Kansas Senator. Mr. INGALLS proceeds:

The people are arraying themselves upon one side or the other of a portentous contest. On one side is capital, formidably intrenched in privilege, arrogant from continued triumph, conservative, tenacious to old theories, demanding new concessions, enriched by domestic levy and foreign commerce, and struggling to adjust all values to its own standard. On the other is labor, asking for employment, striving to develop domestic industries, battling with the forces of nature, and subduing the wilderness; labor, starving and sullen in cities, resolutely determined to overthrow a system under which the rich are growing richer and the poor are growing poorer; a system which gives to a Vanderbilt the possession of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice and condemns the poor to a poverty which has no refuge from starvation but the prison or the grave.

Why did the able Senator abandon his convictions and again turn a deaf ear to the cause of oppressed humanity? Mr. Chairman, it was because he could not carry his party with him, although he was by no means the only one who was temporarily conscience-stricken.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has a history in this connection well known and so unsavory to the great majority of the people of Michigan that, were he a Presidential candidate, Michigan's place in the coming campaign would be predetermined. Nor was the knowledge that the legislation of their party was disastrous restricted to these gentlemen. The leaders of the party generally knew that their policy was vicious from the time they began paying the bondholder in one kind of money and the soldier in another down to and culminating in the shameless villainy and cunningly-devised fraud of 1873, whereby silver was demonetized and the most colossal and unparalleled robbery of the debtor class ever perpetrated upon a free people was consummated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it not astounding, after having built palaces for some, and making wrecks and homeless tramps of others, that this great moral party should have the brazen audacity to continue to extort from the people—made poor by their pernicious legislation—the maximum of burdens justified only in the exigency of war? Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to criticize the tariff when it was necessary, nor am I willing to go back and traduce the South in order to divert the people from the calm consideration of a question which is of the most vital importance to them. I do not believe that this tariff question will stagger the people; they know better than they can be told by the Solons of this House whether their "yoke is easy and their burdens light," or whether this measure to lessen and more equitably distribute the cost of supporting the Government recommends itself to their favorable consideration or not.

Mr. Chairman, I believe there are gentlemen upon the other side of this House who feel conscious, or at least fear that there is an increasing sentiment among the people, not only to question the wisdom but the sincerity of their position. One thing is certain, the limit of taxation is reached. Although certain ones favor a higher tariff—even a prohibitive tariff—and would build a Chinese wall around our country, these men are not the ones who shape the policy of their party, for no party dare come before the country with a proposition to increase the duties on the necessaries of life. What does this prove? Either we are satisfied with our present condition and determined not to do anything for the relief of the people or we must reduce the tariff. We should not be governed by the temporary interests of a much less than a majority of our people, but we should try to place our country upon the highway of permanent success.

Mr. Chairman, it seems clear to me that when any article of commerce is held above its normal value, either by a duty or a trust, that the consumer who is unable to get an equally enhanced price for what he sells, which may be either products or services of whatever nature, is obliged to pay this difference. Let us see how this works. The large importer of foreign goods or jobber of American manufactured goods does not stand any of this increased price; in fact it helps to give him a monopoly to just such an extent as the increased price of the goods requires more capital to do business; and so in addition to the entire charge of the duty he is enabled to add somewhat from decreased competition. Exactly the same thing is true with the retail merchant. So all is easily and very satisfactorily disposed of until the farmer and the laborer who are unable to pass the charge along become too poor to buy sufficiently to prevent overproduction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we begin at the wrong end to establish permanent prosperity. Instead of trying to support agriculture by building up manufactures, we should have our commercial greatness rest on the prosperity of our agricultural interests, which are of necessity the source of all our wealth. As a merchant I know that it is ruinous to buy goods higher in price than customers can pay for; it is equally ruinous for the Government to pursue a policy by which the manufactured goods, especially the necessaries of life, are made higher in price than its wealth producers are able to supply their wants with. I am aware that the wealthy manufacturer is afraid that his business will be ruined, and he cries out that he "will have to lower the wages of labor." Capital is always timid, and, with too much Government aid, is incapacitated to serve its proper use, and becomes a positive mischief to industry, degrading skill and destroying invention.

But, Mr. Chairman, the Mills bill, should it become a law, will not ruin the manufacturers. I admit it will lower his prices; just exactly what is most sadly needed. Who will deny the justice of a public policy which will furnish cheaper and better food and clothing? Who dare deny the demand for it? And who but a protected and immatured statesman does not know that lower prices will develop a better demand, and that a "nimble sixpence is better than a lazy shilling?" If any rich manufacturer distrusts his ability to meet this demand in inaugurating a new era in our commercial importance, let him call into his office one or more of his most competent and trusty employés and offer them an interest in the business; there will be no question of their meeting the demand and helping to place us on the highway leading to the greatest commercial success.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to stigmatize or restrict the rights of capital—legitimate capital—acquired by industry and economy; but when capital wrung from the people by means of watered stocks, chartered privileges, unearned grants and trusts, stalks into this House and expects any other than its representatives to make laws for its especial good it presumes upon their ignorance. And in just so far as it succeeds, becomes a further menace to all capital engaged in legitimate business.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] says in referring to the free-list:

There is not a schedule of our tariff it does not invade. The great wool-growing interest of the country, a matter of prime necessity to a civilized people, only in the infancy of its development, capable of producing, if properly fostered and encouraged, the material for the clothing of all our people, is to be exposed to a ruinous foreign competition which will surely prove its ultimate destruction, with all the capital invested therein.

A most extraordinary statement to come from a man representing an agricultural district. No one knows better than the farmer that under this very protection he is robbed of the benefits of the duty. The commission merchant, after he has secured the clip, raises the price just so much as the market, protected against foreign wool, can be manipulated. It is a very significant fact, Mr. Chairman, that the great wool merchant is opposed to free wool upon the plea that it injures the farmer. If his profits were restricted to legitimate commissions, why should he object to foreign wool? That also will admit of regular commissions. But no, Mr. Chairman, merely legitimate commissions are not sufficient; he wants the privilege of fleecing the farmer under the plea of protecting him.

The gentleman also points with pride to the fact that the balance of trade, under protection, is in our favor. Why does he not go further and show what class of exports make up this balance of trade? Possibly he has not investigated the matter to that extent. Of manufactured goods our imports are largely in excess of our exports; therefore this shortage and whatever more comprises the exports in excess of all our imports is made up from farm products, and in order to sell these products abroad what is the farmer obliged to do? He has to meet the competition of the world, and more than that, he has to compete with nations who enjoy better commercial relations in the mutual interchange of products than his own; and here it should be borne in mind that he gets no higher price for the home consumption than what he gets abroad, while the manufacturer charges him a higher price than he receives when he sends his products abroad. So, Mr. Chairman, this system makes the farmer not only pay the highest price for what he buys, but also subjects him to a disadvantage in selling even when competing with the lowest markets of the world.

It seems strange to me that intelligent men would be willing to so handicap an industry so important, an industry than which none in America should be more profitable nor honorable, an industry which has generously borne more than its share of the burdens, and now, when its condition is fully appreciated, it seems extreme selfishness and short-sightedness on the part of the manufacturers not to yield the slight reduction proposed by the Mills bill. With reference to free wool, which no doubt many farmers think will cause them further loss, I have only to add that were I a farmer I would say to these high protectionists: "Here gentlemen, I propose to 'throw in the tail with the hide' and part company with you! I propose no longer to be a recipient of your kind of benefits, but from this time on shall be an actual participator in a policy which tends to distribute more equitably the products of labor." Mr. Chairman, it is a policy which must be adopted, or we as a nation must retrograde, and so long as we put it off we show ourselves unable to meet a crying demand. I am firmly convinced that this bill is in the interest of oppressed humanity, and if passed will be but an act of simple justice.

One more word in conclusion. The gentleman feels aggrieved and thinks the country will suffer because the minority have not had sufficient consideration shown them. Does he not know that the people in placing them in the minority do not expect them to shape legislation; that they purposely stripped them of that privilege when they turned them out of the temple? And if they do not feel the consequent chagrin and humiliation, it is because "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." [Great applause.]

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, my only excuse for making any remarks upon the proposed revision of our revenue laws is that the importance of the subject seems to demand that every Representative shall place upon the record his ideas of the extent and manner in which taxation shall be reduced.

It is conceded by every member of this body that we are collecting more revenue than is necessary to defray the expenses of the Government; that therefore a reduction has become a vital necessity.

The manner in which such reduction shall be made is the prolific source of discussion and disagreement, and has gone to an extent that threatens to leave the admitted robbery and plunder of the people in statu quo.

If this excessive taxation is to remain as it now is, then it is surely proper that the tax-payers should definitely know what party or what individuals are responsible therefor. Hence, as before stated, every member should tell where he stands and place it upon record. This I will attempt to do as briefly as possible.

I believe that a tariff for protection is the foundation and principal cause of all the complaints and unrest that has either threatened or actually disturbed the public peace and quiet for years, because it fosters one industry at the expense of another, it transfers the labor and production of one class and gives it to another; thereby building up a small class of great wealth and impoverishing the great body of our people.

I am opposed to any tariff whatever for protection simply.

I favor a tariff that will bring a sufficient revenue to defray the expenses of the Government; and I favor this because we must collect a tax sufficient to meet the actual wants of Government, and this is the best way to make such collection.

If we did not require money to defray the expenses of Government, I would be an absolute and uncompromising free-trader.

A tariff, however, for revenue only necessarily gives some protection, and to the extent that it does protect it should be placed where it will do the most good and be the least burthensome to the people.

I will not attempt to follow the innumerable and oftentimes sophistical arguments that have been made on this floor upon this question. I do not deem it necessary, after so many extensive arguments, to make more than a general statement.

The argument of those who favor protection is (among other things) that such tariff is necessary to protect labor and production, and, to prove it, it is shown that the laborer is paid higher wages in America than anywhere else on the globe.

Admitting the fact that in dollars and cents the United States pays higher wages than England; that England pays more than other countries in Europe, and that Europe pays higher than India, yet it is also an established fact that the laborer in the United States can not, as a general rule, save anything from the result of his toil at the end of each year; nor can he do so in England, nor elsewhere in Europe, nor in India. It is equally as well established that in all those countries the laborer does eat and wear clothes adapted to his country and climate. Then what is the difference between earning $1 per day or 10 cents per day, if the result is the same, namely sufficient to eat to preserve life and sufficient to wear to protect the body?

This plain, simple statement, that the habits of the people and the cost of living are different in different countries is a complete and unanswerable refutation of all the arguments that have been made which assume that a high tariff is necessary to protect labor. And it further proves (if men act from motive) that this intense desire for protection to protect the laboring man is the cry of the thief to "stop the thief." It is not to protect the laborer. He has never directly or indirectly derived any benefit from it. But it is to enable a privileged class to increase their wealth at the expense and toil of the laboring masses.

I maintain that this tariff for protection is the principal cause of all our troubles. It has taken the property of those who have justly earned it and transferred it to those who have not earned it; it has enabled a favored few to accumulate immense wealth; it has caused the creation of trusts to an extent that threatens to make mere serfs of the people; it has lain the foundation for privileges that are sapping the necessary wants of society; it has created monopolies that have grown sufficiently powerful to defy the laws of the United States and of the several States; it has caused the concentration of sufficient capital in the hands of the few that has enabled them to extend the banking system, prevent the payment of the public debt, avoid taxation, force the people to pay millions in interest, while they have millions in their Treasury which could be used to extinguish the public debt. It has given them the exercise of a portion of the sovereign power, and they are attempting to use it to make the banking system perpetual.

It forces the farmer to compete on equal terms in the markets of the world and pay a large premium on the purchase of his clothing and other things of necessary use. It builds up an aristocracy that degrades the laboring man and makes him the mere slave that moves at the will of his master, the protected nabob. It has done all this and much more, until labor, having grown restless and dissatisfied, and having looked in vain to the law-making power for relief, has attempted to right these wrongs within itself, and in many instances has bidden defiance to the laws and by force demanded that their labor should be compensated to some extent beyond the absolute wants of life.

It has caused labor and production to form combinations for self-protection. It has caused many good people to demand that the Government purchase railroads and telegraphic lines, and, in fact, that in many respects the Government shall become paternal. It has caused a condition of things that now stalk in open daylight before the lawmaking power of this land, and in a manner not to be misunderstood, demand legislative relief; a condition that substantially says: If this relief is refused, the peace of society, the safety of our institutions, the integrity of our Union may be jeopardized.

These conditions are here, are in our midst, and the cause is a high protective tariff. Allow me to give one illustration. Texas pays 40 per cent. more for her manufactured goods than she would pay were there no tariff; therefore Texas, to the extent of that per cent., is impoverished.

Massachusetts sells her manufactured goods 40 per cent. higher than she could sell them were there no tariff, therefore Massachusetts is enriched this per cent. by reason of such protection. This is caused by the law prescribing the manner in which taxes shall be collected.

Now, result. If this statement be true (and it substantially and for illustration is), then does not Texas pay the taxes of Massachusetts, and in addition thereto give her a bonus for the privilege? This may explain why Massachusetts favors a protective policy while Texas does not.

There is nothing in the world that capital ever created without labor. Capital in itself is incapable of creating anything. Labor creates all capital, and surely the laborer should have a just and full share of that which he creates. Labor and capital should be allies, not enemies. And if the country allows labor equal privileges with capital then there would be no conflict. But when the Government steps in and by the exercise of power takes from labor the fruits of its production and gives it to capital, then labor becomes the slave of the master it has created.

Wealth has accumulated in this country in the past twenty years at a rate never before known, but it has been at a fearful cost to the great body of the American people. The accumulation has not been of a uniform character. Wealth has been piled up in heaps. Hundreds have grown to be millionaires, while tens of thousands have become paupers. Two classes have grown up under this protective system that threaten the very existence of our Government.

On the one hand is the moneyed aristocratic class, clamoring for legislative protection and such laws as will more effectually enable them to govern the country exclusively in their interest.

On the other hand comes the great body of men who under the forms of law have been robbed of their share of the wealth created by their labor, becoming desperate by their want of the necessaries of life and by reason of the inequalities of law. They are the ready listeners to the anarchist and communist. In their zeal to right the wrongs under which they labor, they threaten to repeat in this country the scenes and horrors of the French revolution.

However much we may desire to shut our eyes to the dangers that threaten the stability of our Government, we can not fail to see that the time has come for the peace-loving men in all parties to realize the fact that steps must be taken to guide aright the ship of state and steer it clear of those dangerous rocks known as anarchy and communism. We must return to that just and fundamental principle which declares that all men shall be equal before the law; that exclusive privileges shall be given to none.

I believe in a poor government and a rich, happy, and prosperous people. I believe in protecting property and vested rights.

I commend the brain that by industry and management accumulates wealth.

I do not believe in a parental government, but would have every one free to pursue the calling of his choice. I do believe that great and grievous inequalities now exist. To my mind it is clear that one class are now not only burdened with expenses of government, but they are made to contribute a portion of their earnings to another class of our own citizens. Where all are supposed to be equal this state of things can not exist and peace be preserved.

We may fritter away our time here in talking and wrangling. What the people want is less talk and more results.

They demand a reduction of taxes. That the claim is just is admitted. They demand that such reduction shall be made on the necessaries, not luxuries, of life. This claim seems to be equally just. Yet in a spirit more or less selfish many of us are contending that special interests of some particular constituency shall be exempt. They demand that the burdens of taxation shall be made equal. Yet with a sectional and partisan feeling, sometimes amounting to bitterness, we are liable to disagree upon this plain fundamental and just claim of right.

Whatever may be the result or the manner in which we dispose of this bill, it ought to be clear that delay will in time make the reasonable relief therein provided for harsher and severer. Delay will not mellow, but it will intensify. The people are speaking, their determination can not be mistaken. The voice that comes almost unbroken is, "Reduce the taxes, lessen expenses of Government, and let the necessaries of life bear the benefit of such reduction." The man that fails to heed this warning has my sympathy, for such failure can only finally result in his political death.

I here pause to inquire of those who oppose this bill. Do the almost constant and increasing labor uprisings mean nothing? Have this class, generally obedient to the law, no just cause of complaint? Do combinations of laborers and farmers mean nothing? Have they become exacting and unjust in their demands? I think not, and further, that the increasing momentum of their power must arrest attention.

Why do many of our people favor the purchase by the Government of telegraph lines? The answer must be that this enterprise has grown to be such a huge monopoly that no other means is left to curb or limit its power. While I believe that such purchase would be undemocratic, yet if there is no other remedy left, and it should appear that such purchase would result in equalizing burdens and be of benefit to the people, I should favor it, even though it might be paternal and tend to enrich the Government at the expense of the people—and ought not be done so long as it could be avoided. Yet, if it has grown so powerful that it can break down all competition and can hold this great medium of intercourse as a monopoly, and the people are compelled to bow to its dictates, then if it can be reasonably shown that such condition now exists or may exist I should favor the purchase or building of telegraph lines by the Government.

I mention this because a protective tariff must go down with the monopolies it has created.

I fully and unequivocally indorse the President's message. It demonstrates the wisdom of the people in placing him in this high position.

I indorse the substantial features of this bill. Possibly, slight amendments might be advantageously made, but if I have any objections they are that it does not cut deep enough. I have confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of those who framed it, and it shall have my hearty support.

Having thus, in a general way, announced my position on this important measure, I will (as all other Representatives must) account to my people for its correctness.

Mr. VANCE. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. STOCKDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGE—GEORGIA A. STRICKLETT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 7715, entitled "An act for the relief of Georgia A. Stricklett."

By the terms of this bill a pension is allowed to the beneficiary above named, whose husband died on the 21st day of July, 1873. It appears from the records that he was mustered into the service to date from October 10, 1863, to serve for one year. It is alleged in the report of the committee of the House who reported this bill that he was wounded with buckshot in the face and head by bushwhackers when on recruiting service, on the 23d day of July, 1863.

If these dates are correct, he was wounded before he entered the service; but this fact is not made the basis of the disapproval of the widow's application for relief. There seems, however, to be no mention of any such injury during his term of service, though he is reported sick much of the time when present with his regiment, and is reported as once in hospital for a disease which, to say the least of it, can not be recognized as related to the service.

The soldier himself made no application for pension.

A physician testifies that he was present on the 21st day of July, 1873, when the soldier died; that he examined the body after death, and to the best of his knowledge such death was caused partially by epilepsy, and that the epilepsy was the result of "wounds about the face and head received during his service during the war."

Another physician testifies that the soldier applied to him for treatment in 1868, and that his disability was the development of confirmed epilepsy, and he expresses the opinion that this was due to a wound from a buckshot. This physician, while not giving epilepsy as the cause of death, says that "had he lived to die a natural death he certainly would have died an insane epileptic."

The report speaks of his death by "an accidental shot."

The truth appears to be that he was killed by a pistol-shot in an altercation with another man.

Unless it shall be assumed that the epilepsy was caused by the buckshot wound spoken of, and unless a pension should be allowed because, if the soldier had not been killed in an altercation, he might have soon died from such epilepsy, this bill is entirely devoid of merit.

Surely no one will seriously propose that a claim for pension should rest upon a conjecture as to what would have caused death if it had not occurred in an entirely different way.

The testimony of the physician who testified in this case that death was caused partially by epilepsy suggests the extreme recklessness which may characterize medical testimony in applications for pension.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 10, 1888.

PAY OF CERTAIN REVENUE OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of appropriations for compensation to officers assigned to duty at distilleries and rectifying-houses; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIFE-SAVING STATION, KEWAUNEE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wis.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred as follows, namely:

The bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, Revised Statutes—to the Committee on the Judiciary; and

The joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis—to the Committee on the Library.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CHESTER, PA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 129) for the erection of a public building at Chester, Pa.

Mr. DARLINGTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. It has passed the Senate twice, and has received favorable recognition from the last Congress as well as this. It is very much needed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think this had better take the regular course.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MOORE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SCULL, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GRANGER, for two weeks from next Monday, on account of important business.

To Mr. FRENCH, until the 17th of May, on account of important business.

To Mr. DARGAN, for ten days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. HUDD to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving certified copies, papers in the case of Jasper Hanson.

ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

The SPEAKER. An error has been committed in the printing and enrollment of a bill which has passed both Houses and been sent to the President. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL] asks to have the following resolution passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be requested to return to the House the bill of the House No. 2699, for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer, for the purpose of correcting the same; and the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to insert in said bill the word "unexpected" instead of the word "unexpended," in accordance with the original bill.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MILLS. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read the resolution, which had been referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter when the House adjourn it shall adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on the next succeeding day, and after general debate has been closed on the bill entitled "An act to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue" the session shall close each day at 5 o'clock p. m.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration the resolution to change the hour for the regular meeting of the House from 12 o'clock m. to 11 o'clock a. m., and report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

It is only necessary to state in support of the resolution for the change that the large amount of business on the Calendars of the House makes it necessary to meet earlier than at present.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether the resolution provides that the House shall adjourn each day at 5 o'clock?

Mr. MILLS. The proposition is that hereafter the House shall meet at 11 o'clock, and after the general debate on the tariff bill is closed it shall adjourn at 5. It has been thought that six hours are enough for a business session.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the question been considered as to the effect of this as to evening sessions?

Mr. MILLS. The House can change the order at any time. We did not take into consideration whether the House would meet in evening sessions or not. If the arrangement in practice is found to be impolitic, the House can change the order when it chooses.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will this interfere with the Friday evening sessions?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution has that effect, as a general proposition.

Mr. MILLS. Very well; let the resolution be amended so as not to interfere with Friday evening sessions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Or other orders.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is adopted it will always be in order for the House before 5 o'clock to take a recess; but if no such action should be taken it would be the duty of the Chair when the hour of 5 o'clock arrived to declare the House adjourned. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:

"This resolution not to interfere with the sessions provided for Friday evenings."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference for the purpose of promoting arbitration and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the United States of America and the Republics of Mexico, Central and South America, and the Empire of Brazil.

AWARDS TO CITIZENS OF JEFFERSON COUNTY, KENTUCKY.

Mr. CARUTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 328) for the allowance of certain awards made by a board of claims, to certain citizens of Jefferson County, Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the said awards to be audited, and shall pay the several sums to the person or persons to whom the same may be due as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. KERR. I ask for the reading of the report, subject to the right to object.

The report (by Mr. STOCKDALE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 328) for the allowance of certain awards made by a board of claims to certain citizens of Jefferson County, Kentucky, report as follows:

It appears from the records and evidence obtained from the War Department that the facts relative to this case are as follows:

The following order was issued July 14, 1865, by General Jeff. C. Davis, commanding the Fourteenth Army Corps:

"Special Orders No. 110.

"HEADQUARTERS FOURTEENTH ARMY CORPS.
"Louisville, Ky., July 14, 1865.

"[Extract.]

"IV. A board of officers is hereby appointed to meet at the headquarters of Second Brigade, First Division, Fourteenth Army Corps, to-morrow, July 15, at 9 a. m., or as soon thereafter as practicable, to examine, determine, and assess the amount of damages and loss sustained by the owners of property upon or near which the Fourteenth Army Corps has been encamped during the last month. Detail for the board:

"Bvt. Brig. Gen. George P. Buel.
"Col. Thomas Shea, Twenty-second Indiana Veteran Volunteer Infantry.
"Maj. James S. Crall, Eighty-second Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.
"Capt. Gideon W. Gifford, Fourteenth Michigan Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

"The board will sit without regard to hours, and, as far as practicable, they will notify the parties interested of their times and places of session. When necessary, division and brigade quartermasters will be called upon to state what troops or trains have caused the damage inflicted.

* * * * * * *

"By command of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Jeff. C. Davis.

"A. C. McCLUNG,
"Assistant Adjutant-General and Chief of Staff."

The record of the proceedings of this board shows that the claimants presented itemized accounts, and that after being in session several days the awards were made as set forth in the bill.

The principle involved in this case is not a new one, but was considered in the Forty-sixth Congress, and reported from this committee by General Bragg, whose report (No. 1166, Forty-sixth Congress) uses this language:

"The committee do not regard the payment of these awards as a question submitted to their decision upon the original facts on which the awards are based. They have been determined and allowed by a military board, called under the apparent sanction of the Government, and whose action seems to have been approved not only by the major-general commanding, but by the War Department, and they have not been paid. The committee use the term 'seem to have been approved,' because the papers and record remaining in that Department show no disapproval, which may be said to be a negative pregnant, almost as strong as affirmative proof.

"This board was composed of officers in actual service, whose sympathies may not be suspected of leaning overmuch to the claimants. It held its sessions in the vicinage of the claimants, and its facilities for proof were better than any civil tribunal that has been constituted to hear such claims; and your committee think its findings are entitled to credit.

"It may be said, in addition, the Government afterward furnished tribunals to hear this class of claims. These claimants, presumably relying on the awards made by this board, have not prosecuted their claims elsewhere, and statutes of limitations have run against them. But the committee do not care to rest the allowance on an estoppel in pais or anything analogous to it. They prefer to stand upon the awards made, as an adjudication of a court created by authority of the Government to hear and adjudicate claims of individuals against it, and to hold such adjudications, not formally disapproved by the authority convening the court, as final."

Congress approved the views of the committee, and the awards were paid by act approved March 3, 1881. (Private, No. 82.)

Your committee, therefore, in view of the foregoing statement of facts, report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object to this bill, but I desire to call attention to the fact that these are the same class of claims as those under what is known as the 4th of July law. The tendency of the passage of such a bill as this will be to open up the adjudications under that law. They are barred claims. I do not object to that, however, because I can see that in many cases the statute of limitations should not apply. This may be one of those cases.

Mr. KERR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he can give any reason why these claims were not presented long ago.

Mr. CARUTH. I will state to the gentleman that this claim has been pending for a number of years, but has not been pressed. These gentlemen relied upon the award made by the board, and consequently did not present their claim to the Court of Claims.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARUTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 347) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Youngstown, Ohio, and that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Youngstown, in the State of Ohio, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue office, pension office, and for other Government uses. The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $100,000, and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Ohio shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State, and the service of any civil process therein.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendments, which were agreed to:

In line 2, after the word "purchase," insert the words "acquire by condemnation."

In line 10 strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five."

In line 15 strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five."

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF COUNTIES IN ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 9673) for the relief of the counties of the Territory of Arizona and to legalize the indebtedness thereof and provide for funding the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the indebtedness of each of the counties in the Territory of Arizona, incurred and contracted subsequent to the 30th day of July, 1886, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1888, is hereby legalized and declared a valid indebtedness.

SEC. 2. That each of said counties is hereby authorized to fund said indebtedness and issue bonds therefor under the provisions of law for funding county indebtedness as the same now exists in said Territory.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds of the sale of said bonds shall be applied to the payment of the indebtedness of said counties which accrued within the time hereinbefore stated, and if said proceeds are not so applied said bonds shall be void.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there ought to be some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly there ought to be an explanation.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. The report explains the bill fully, but it is rather long.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then perhaps the gentleman will make a statement.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. The case is simply this. Under the operation of what is known as the "Harrison act," all debts of counties over and above 4 per cent. of the taxable property of the county as shown by the assessment list became absolutely void. At the time of the passage of the act all of the counties in Arizona except one—all of them, in fact—were indebted in amounts above 4 per cent. of the assessed valuation of their property; but the assessed valuation did not come near the actual value of the property. The result was that the boards of supervisors, being compelled under our law to pay the older warrants of indebtedness by the latest collection of taxes, it was found impossible in several of the counties to run the government at all except by paying out the taxes as they came in, and to do that was to violate the law. They therefore made payments from the latest collection of taxes, but in order to run the county governments they had to incur indebtedness in excess of the 4 per cent. limit, and this bill is required to legalize and validate the indebtedness thus incurred. It does not apply to any new indebtedness, but simply to the debts already existing.

Mr. WEAVER. Can the gentleman state the actual amount of this indebtedness?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. The actual amount of the indebtedness in the county of Pima, the county named in the title of the bill, is about $50,000. The county was already in debt over the 4 per cent. limit at the time of the passage of the "Harrison act."

The report (by Mr. MANSUR) is as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8166) for the relief of the counties of the Territory of Arizona and to legalize the indebtedness thereof and provide for funding the same, submit the following report:

The act of the Forty-ninth Congress, known as the "Harrison act," limiting the indebtedness of the counties of the various Territories to a sum not exceeding 4 per cent. of the assessable property as shown by the tax-list, seems to have resulted in hardship to various counties in Arizona, and threatens to overturn organized government in divers counties in that Territory.

At the time that the Harrison act took effect nearly if not all the counties in Arizona were in debt exceeding the 4 per cent., as shown by the tax list. It is very doubtful if new valid obligations in certain counties can, under that act, be created, and such counties were left entirely without resources to carry on the daily demands of political existence. Under such circumstances various counties were forced to issue their promises to pay, for current expenses, in the usual form of county warrants, bearing interest at 10 per cent. per annum. These necessary obligations are, under the Harrison act, of very doubtful validity. Suits are threatened to enjoin the payment of these just obligations. The existing condition of affairs has reduced said 10 per cent. warrants to less than 80 cents on the dollar, and such county promises to pay are daily growing less and less valuable, forcing the said counties to pay for any service largely in excess of current prices, and thus involving them still deeper in debt.

The passage of this substituted bill will enable said counties to fund their present indebtedness at a longer time with less interest, and by devoting the necessary sum received from taxes to the payment of current expenses the counties can be placed on a cash basis, and by means of their rapid development soon be able to discharge the whole of their bonded indebtedness.

A resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of the county of Pima, Territory of Arizona, shows the conditions existing in said county, and your committee is informed that the same troubles, yet in a less degree, exist in nearly all the ten counties of said Territory. Said resolutions are appended in printed form at the end of this report.

In view of these facts your committee recommend that the accompanying substituted bill do pass.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the board of supervisors of Pima County, Territory of Arizona, would most respectfully represent:

That on the 30th day of July, 1885, said Pima County's indebtedness was $250,000.

That the value of the taxable property, as ascertained by the last assessment prior to July 30, 1886, was the sum of $3,449,541.53.

That on said 30th day of July, 1886, the indebtedness of said Pima County, then existing, was greater by the sum of $112,018.34 than 4 per cent. of the value of the taxable property within said county.

That the indebtedness of said Pima County, necessarily incurred, for the purpose of maintaining said county government subsequent to the 30th day of July, 1886, is the sum of $50,000.

That said Pima County has funded its indebtedness existing prior to the 30th day of July, 1886, and has issued its bonds for the payment thereof.

That, owing to doubts that have arisen as to the legality of the indebtedness incurred by said county since the 30th day of July, 1886, it is not possible to fund said indebtedness and sell the bonds issued therefor at par; that the doubts existing as to the validity of said indebtedness have very much depreciated the credit of said county, and have reduced the selling price of the 10 per cent. warrants of said county to 80 cents on the dollar.

That the indebtedness of said county incurred prior to July 30, 1886, was largely for public improvements and buildings necessary for the use of said county.

That the small amount of taxable value ascertained by said assessment for 1886 was largely owing to the general depression of all business in said Territory of Arizona, brought about by the recent Indian troubles in this Territory.

That, if Congress will pass an act for the relief of said Pima County, legalizing said indebtedness incurred subsequent to July 30, 1886, to authorize said county to fund the same, said county will be able to sell its 7 per cent. bonds at par, to take up its floating indebtedness, now bearing 10 per cent. per annum interest, to administer its government on a strictly cash basis and at a great saving over the present cost, and to ultimately pay and discharge its present indebtedness without seriously burdening it citizens: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the board of supervisors of Pima County, Territory of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States of America is earnestly requested to pass at an early day a bill for the relief of the said county of Pima, legalizing the indebtedness of said county incurred and contracted subsequent to the 30th day of July, 1886, and authorizing said county to fund said indebtedness, and issue bonds therefor under the provisions of law for funding county indebtedness as the same now exists in said Territory of Arizona.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to our Delegate in Congress, and that he be requested to present the foregoing memorial to Congress, and do all in his power to accomplish the purposes of this memorial.

H. E. LACY, Chairman.
JNO. ANDERSON, Member.
F. L. PROCTOR, Member.

M. S. SNYDER,

A bill (S. 2542) to reimburse certain persons who expended moneys and furnished services and supplies in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities within the territorial limits of the present State of Nevada.

P. H. BRIDGEWATER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 3708 for the relief of P. H. Bridgewater, reported from the Committee on War Claims, be recommitted to that committee. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House opens the whole field of tariff discussion, and it is a vast one. Principles settled by the experience of mankind and accepted elsewhere as axioms of science appear to be considered open questions here. So rapid and tremendous are the changes in all the conditions of business, arising from the successive occupations of fresh soils and the unheard-of development of new industries, together with the enormous increase of population, that before accepted principles can be applied to a given situation the situation itself has changed; and your demagogue, with his mouth full of catch-words, insists that your science, though it be ever so true a science, can furnish no solution of a problem or an aggregation of problems which never arose before. I, sir, do not agree with the demagogue.

I hold with the statesmen, that political economy is a science; that the true principles of taxation are as definitely ascertained as are any truths not susceptible of mathematical demonstration, and that their application in any country or to any condition will produce approximately the same results. Shall the United States, with their mighty bound of nature and giant industries, shrink from the struggle for possession of the world's markets? Shall we, the teeming Republic of the great West, 60,000,000 strong, with inventive genius keener, with labor more skilled, than any other people on the globe, decline to compete for supremacy in the marts of mankind, and continue forever to trade among ourselves, under the insane delusion that we are growing rich by the process?

Our friends, the enemy, say, "Yes; let us build a Chinese wall around this young and vigorous people, whose eager enterprise already chafes under the bounds of nature, and if we can not make it wholly impervious let us make it as nearly so as we can. Let us, if we can not go clear back to the barbarism of China a thousand years ago, go back at least to the feudal ages, when traffic in almost every important commodity was a monopoly farmed out by the sovereign, and industry and commerce were alternately restricted and plundered under the 'tariff' regulations of rulers extremely solicitous for the interests of the labor which thus furnished the pillage."

Mr. Chairman, they are Bourbons, Bourbons all, and of the densest kind. Their faces are turned backward, not forward; they are looking through the dismal shades of the dead past, not through the glowing day of the living present. Instead of removing the barbarous artificial restraints imposed upon the natural energies of the mass of men by ignorance, rapacity, and tyranny for the benefit of the few, they deliberately propose to reimpose them, to re-enchain commerce, to reshackle labor, and to confine the industries of sixty millions of natural traders by a system, considering the time and the conditions, far more absurd than the Chinese wall.

I have said that his bill and the subject of tariff taxation which it necessarily brings before the House are a vast theme. A very small part of it only can be fairly discussed within the compass of an ordinary speech, and I have therefore deemed it proper to select for examination in detail several of the most important articles upon which existing duties are changed by the committee's bill, using these as illustrative of the whole. But I wish here, Mr. Chairman, to say in the most decisive language I can command, that every alteration of duty effected by this bill has been matured by the majority of the committee with the same equal, conscientious, deliberate, and painstaking care. Nothing has been done in haste; nothing without the most exacting scrutiny. I have personally attended every one of the meetings devoted to the consideration of the bill, with perhaps five exceptions, and every line and word has had from me the most minute attention I was able to bestow. The same, I am sure, can be said of every other member of the majority of the committee. The bill is framed in the interest of the people—of the whole people. We intended in the first instance to stay the mounting surplus in the Treasury, threatening overwhelming and possibly immediate disaster, even now vividly impending; and, second, to relieve, as far as prudence would permit at this time, the overburdened industries of the country from excessive taxation, the proceeds of which do not pass into the Treasury, but go directly to the support of grasping monopolies which are, for the most part, combined in utterly indefensible and atrociously oppressive trusts. If the bill does not measurably accomplish these purposes, it is because the majority of the Ways and Means Committee is incompetent to frame such a law, and of that the country will be the judge.

And this Bourbon, sir—I use the word in no offensive sense, but merely to designate the man who dwells in the political barbarisms of the past and vainly resists the enlightened progress of the present—has a theory all his own, almost as liberal as that of the Chinaman in the time of Confucius, and quite as liberal as that of the potentates of Northern Africa, who blackmailed commerce and called it "tariff." He says that no matter what this alleged science of political economy may teach, no matter what may be the experience of the rest of mankind, and especially of that obnoxious little island which manages to dominate the trade of the world, everything must necessarily be different here. Though freedom of exchange may produce the most satisfactory results elsewhere, restriction is absolutely essential here. Though elsewhere men thrive by buying cheap and selling dear, it is the reverse here. But his most remarkable assumption is that the true way to advance the interests of the industrial classes is to tax their earnings, not into the public Treasury, but into the private pockets of a favored few, monopolizing American markets under a protective tariff, and regulating both production and price, by that last, most effective, and most terrible expedient in restraint of trade, the irrepressible trust. Now, I agree with my semi-civilized friend, the Bourbon, that our situation is radically different from that of any other people on earth. But the difference does not consist in any exemption from the laws of nature, of trade, or of finance, but in the character of our free institutions, by the genius and theory of which the people are left at liberty each man to pursue his own happiness; that is to say, whatever may be the object of his endeavor, in his own way, and without hindrance by an intermeddling paternal government except where regulation may be imperatively necessary for the safety of the whole. The illustrious Gallatin, for over fifty years a citizen of my own State, the most enlightened financier who has appeared in all American history, third in the great Republican triumvirate—Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin—Secretary of the Treasury eight years under Jefferson and four years under Madison, in that famous memorial of 1832, containing the ripened fruits of his vast experience and profound reflection, said of the alleged protective system in general:

> Let it be recollected that the system is in itself an infraction of an essential part of the liberty of the citizen. The necessity must be urgent and palpable which authorizes any government to interfere in the private pursuits of individuals, to forbid them to do that which in itself is not criminal, and which every one would most certainly do if not forbidden. Every individual, in every community, without exception, will purchase whatever he may want on the cheapest terms within his reach. The most enthusiastic restrictionist, the manufacturer most clamorous for special protection, will each individually pursue the same course and prefer any foreign commodity or material to that of domestic origin if the first is cheaper and the law does not forbid him. All men ever have acted, and continue, under any system, to act on the same principle. It is impossible that they should universally act in that manner, unless it was evidently their interest so to do. The tariff system is founded upon the principle that what is true of all men individually is untrue when applied to them collectively. We can not consider the adherence of enlightened nations to regulations of that description but as the last relic of that system of general restrictions and monopolies which had its origin in barbarous times. If the corn laws are the most odious of those protecting monopolies, it is because they enhance the price of that which is still more essentially necessary than sugar, salt, clothing, or fuel; and we may safely predict that their repeal will be the first result of an improved representation of the people.

We sit here under a written Constitution, exercising only those powers which are expressly granted, and nowhere in that instrument do we find the power to tax for any but a public purpose, and even a tax for a public purpose must be uniform in operation.

I quote the Constitution, as follows:

> SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power: 1. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

I hold:

First. That we have no power to lay a tax which, by excluding the article taxed, defeats the object of taxation, namely, revenue for the economical support of Government.

Second. That we have no power to lay a tax which carries nothing to the Treasury, but which draws money from one man's pockets to put it in the pockets of another. A tax with this avowed object is as manifestly unconstitutional as would be a law taking the life of one man because his existence was inconvenient to another man.

Third. That we have no power out of moneys actually collected and in the Treasury to grant largesses, or to make gifts to any man or class of men, and still less can we by the use of the taxing power constitutionally transfer the earnings of the many to the few.

These are cardinal principles of the Democratic party. When Alexander Hamilton, in the administration of Washington, to build up a business aristocracy as an important part of his projected government of corruption and splendor, declared that Congress might indirectly subsidize manufacturing industries at the expense of all others, Mr. Jefferson answered that such a proposition involved the subversion of our whole republican system; that it presented squarely the question whether we were "to live under a limited or an unlimited government;" whether we were to have a fixed constitution or no constitution; whether the people were to be freemen, left to the free enjoyment of their individual earnings, or to be the slaves of rapacious monopolies, corrupting the legislature and combining to create and to support administrations in the interest of the favored few as against the plundered mass. That question was determined in 1800 by the American people in favor of Jefferson and the Constitution. It has never since been determined otherwise when nakedly presented; and, sir, it never will and never can be otherwise determined until we are prepared to abandon our free institutions forever.

A CURIOUS AND DANGEROUS BILL.

Mr. Chairman, in our efforts to meet the situation which confronts us to-day, a dangerous surplus and a necessary reduction of revenue, I will not attempt to discuss whether we should make whisky and beer free as against the proposition to reduce the cost of the necessaries of life. A bill has been introduced by a member of this House, and referred to the committee, which provides a large reduction of internal taxes, and deals very curiously indeed with customs duties. At the time of its introduction the Republican press, though opposed to tariff reform, was loud in praise of it as a bill on which all could unite, not only gentlemen on the other side of the House, but gentlemen on this side also, who were supposed to differ with the majority. I can not believe these anticipations will be realized when this bill is understood, or that any Democrat on this floor could be brought to favor any of its provisions.

It is fair to presume that those who have inconsiderately approved this remarkable bill did not understand its provisions. Covering one hundred and twenty-seven pages, it is too voluminous to be analyzed without great labor. It is impossible in one short view to present a statement of its whole effect or the system on which it was constructed. But taking the iron and steel schedule as a fair index of the genius of the proposed bill, and the one with which the member introducing it is supposed to be most familiar, one which he would naturally desire to conform most nearly to the demands of his immediate constituents or advisers, and passing judgment on the whole from this, it is safe to say it is not in line with revenue reform; not in the interest of the consumer, nor the middleman, nor the manufacturer: in truth and in fact it increases the burdens on every avocation, every industry, the iron-
